It has been contended that, in most of the OT passages where tannîn and liwyāthān occur, a mythological or semi-mythological allusion is present. Such an allusion is discovered, for instance, in Is 27^{1} 'In that day the LORD with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish liwyāthān the fleeing serpent (נָחָשׁ בָּרִחַ, LXX ὄφις φεύγων, Aq. ὄφις μοχλός, Symm. ὄφις συγκλείων) and liwyāthān the coiled serpent (נָחָשׁ עֲקַלָּתוֹן, LXX ὄφις σκολιός, Aq. and Symm. ὄφις ἐνεσκισωμένος), and he shall slay the tannîn that is in the sea.' The language here certainly recalls the Babylonian mythology with its account of the primeval conflict between Marduk and Tiāmat (see art. COSMOGONY). The 'fleeing serpent' (cf. Job $26^{12f.}$) is portrayed on a Bab. seal, with Marduk in pursuit; the 'coiled serpent' might be the earth-encircling ocean. These two liwyāthāns are held to be simply differentiations of Tiāmat, whose consort, Kingu, may be 'the dragon in the sea' (so Gunkel, followed by Cheyne, et al.). At the same time Gunkel (p. 40) admits that they are employed by 'Isaiah' to symbolize kingdoms. In Is 51^{9} (on which see art. RAHAB) the 'dragon' (symbolical, as the context shows, of Egypt at the time of the Exodus) appears, as in the Bab. cosmogony, as having been destroyed by God long ago (so also in Ps $74^{13f.}$ 'Thou brakest the heads of the tannînîm in the waters, thou didst crush the heads of liwyāthān in pieces,' 89^{10} al.), whereas in 27^{1} the monster is thought of apparently as imprisoned in the sea, and destined to be destroyed at last by Jahweh's sword (cf. Job 3^{8}, where, as was noted above, magicians have the power to 'rouse up' liwyāthān; 7^{12}, where watchers are set over the tannîn; and Am 9^{3}, where the serpent [נָחָשׁ, δράκων] is in any case no venomous marine snake, for such are not found in the Mediterranean, but 'an imaginary monster, supposed by the Hebrews to have its home at the bottom of the ocean, and to be at the disposal of the Almighty' [Driver, ad loc.; similarly Nowack, who has no doubt that there is a reference to the sea-monster of mythology]). Again, in Ezk 29^{3-6} and 32^{2-8} the tannîn to which Pharaoh is compared, although it has points in common with the crocodile, is held to find its only true equivalent in the monster Tiāmat. The treatment to be meted out by God to Pharaoh recalls, we are told, the way in which Tiāmat and her allies were vanquished and afterwards treated by Marduk; compare, for instance, Ezk 32^{3} 'I will spread out my net for thee,' etc., with Creation tablet iv. ll. 95, 112, 'Bel (Marduk) threw wide his net, made it encompass her'; 'In the net they lay, in the meshes they sat.' But the net is a common OT figure, and may be used here independently. Upon the whole, while it is practically certain that the Tiāmat myth had reached Palestine and that there are allusions to it in the OT, it will hardly be questioned that Gunkel exaggerates its influence.

[*] The creature which is said to have swallowed Jonah (see vol. ii. p. 750) is called simply a great fish (דָּג גָּדוֹל), Jon 1^{17} [Heb. and Gr. 2^{1}]. The familiar 'whale' comes from LXX κῆτος (μέγα), reproduced in the κῆτος of Mt 12^{40}.

[†] Pocock in his Commentary on Mic 1^{8} (1677) first showed that these two words had been confused, and pointed out that תַּנִּים must denote some kind of jackal.

[*] The word 'dragon' in AV should probably be viewed merely as an old and poetical word for a large serpent (not necessarily a fabulous monster). See examples of its use in this sense in old writers as quoted by Murray in Oxf. Eng. Dictionary, s.v.

[†] This is the only occurrence of 'sea-monster' in AV.

The 'dragon' of Neh 2^{13} is probably a serpent regarded as the tutelary deity of the spring, and believed to give living power, perhaps healing virtues, to its waters (cf. W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 156, 161 [^{2} 172, 176]).

It does not fall within the scope of the present article to discuss the 'dragon' of the Greek Book of Daniel (see art. BEL AND THE DRAGON), the 'dragons' of Ad. Est 10^{7} 11^{6} or of Ps-Sol 2$^{28ff.}$, or the 'dragon' of Rev 12$^{3ff.}$ 13$^{2.4.12}$ 16^{13} 20^{2}, for which last see REVELATION (BOOK OF), p. 256, and Bousset's Comm. ad loc. See also art. SEBA (סְבָא).—Son of Cush, Gn 10^{7}=1 Ch 1^{9}. Since Seba is mentioned in connexion with Cush in Is 43^{3} and 45^{14}, it is probable that this genealogy is a gloss on the passages of Isaiah, or, at any rate, based upon them. Of Seba this author knows that its inhabitants were tall; and since he prophesies that they should be brought in chains to Jerusalem, it seems reasonable to identify them with a race mentioned in the oracle of Is 18$^{2.7}$, who were to be brought as an offering to the temple, who also were connected with a nation living beyond the rivers of Cush, and who are described as 'drawn out, clean-shaven, and of power from ancient times.' The rest of the description is at present unintelligible. There is a further reference to them in Ps 72^{10}, where, however, they are merely typical of a distant race, and coupled with the familiar Sheba on the ground of the resemblance of their names. On this resemblance Glaser (Skizze, ii. 387 ff.) bases his theory that they represent the Sabæans of Jebel Shammir in Nejd—a theory which is to be rejected on the ground that the only author who knows anything definite about them keeps them carefully apart from the Sabæans, and mentions them in connexion with Cush and Egypt. Since from the 8th cent. B.C. Cush had played an important part in politics, it is probable that an educated man would have some idea of the locality of Cush, and therefore any attempt to seek for Seba anywhere but in the heart of Africa should be rejected. The researches of Mr. Theodore Bent (Ruined Cities of Mashonaland, 1892) have certified the existence in the heart of Africa of the vestiges of ancient States, the names of which are lost to history. The description given by him of the ancient State of Mashonaland bears some resemblance to that given in Is 18, possibly on the ground of Egyptian despatches or the statements of Ethiopians then dominant in Egypt. 'There is,' says a Portuguese traveller quoted p. 207, 'a tower or edifice of worked masonry, which appears evidently not to be the work of black natives of the country, but of some powerful and political nations'; p. 231, 'there is little doubt that the ancient builders of the ruins in Mashonaland, the forts and towns between the Zambesi and the Limpopo, utilized the Sabi river as their road to and from the coast.' This, like other African rivers, was in ancient times suitable for large craft, but, through silting, is no longer fit for it (p. 231). It does not appear that epigraphic research has as yet thrown any light on this name.

SEBAM (שְׂבָם; Σεβαμά; Saban).—A town in the pastoral district, 'a land for cattle,' in which Heshbon, Elealeh, and Nebo were also situated (Nu 32^{3}). It is apparently the same place as Sibmah, which was in the territory of Reuben, and was rebuilt by the children of Reuben (Jos 13^{19}, Nu 32^{38}). Sebam probably soon fell into the hands of the Moabites, in whose possession it was in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah. It was then celebrated for its vines, which were destroyed by 'the lords of the nations' (Is 16$^{8.9}$, Jer 48^{32}). Jerome (Onom. s. 'Sabama') calls it a town of Moab in the land of Gilead, and says that it was barely 500 paces from Heshbon (Com. in Is. v.), and one of the strong places of the district. It is perhaps Sûmia, on the south side of Wâdy Hesbân, and 2 English miles from Heshbon. There are here some ruins, rock-hewn sarcophagi, and rock-cut wine-presses (PEF Mem. East Pal. p. 221).

SECACAH (סְכָכָה; B Αἰχιοζά, A Σοχοχά; Sachacha).—One of six cities situated in the 'wilderness' (midbār) of Judah (Jos 15^{61}), that is, in the waste land west of the Dead Sea. It was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σακχά, Scacha), and there is no clue to its position. Conder (Hbk. to Bible) identifies it, doubtfully, with Khurbet ed-Dikkeh, also called Khurbet es-Sikkeh, 'ruin of the path,' 2 miles S. of Bethany. This is too near Jerusalem. Secacah was probably between the Kidron ravine (Wâdy en-Nâr) and En-gedi.

SECU (הַשֶּׂכוּ, with the article; B ἐν τῷ Σεφεί, A ἐν Σοκχώ).—A place mentioned only in 1 S 19^{22}. It was not far from Ramah (Samuel's residence), and apparently on the road from Gibeah to that place. In or near it there was a large cistern (RV 'the great well' [בּוֹר הַגָּדוֹל], RVm 'the well of the threshing floor' [בּ׳ הַגֹּרֶן, LXX φρέατος τοῦ ἅλω]) which Saul passed on his journey. The place is unknown, and its site depends upon the position assigned respectively to Gibeah and Ramah. Several identifications have been proposed: for instance, Bîr Nebala, near Gibeon (Smith's DB), Khurbet Shuweikeh, a little S. of Bîreh (Conder, PEF Mem. iii. 52, 126), and the ancient reservoir at Solomon's Pools (PEFSt, 1898, p. 17), but this last is dependent upon an improbable site for RAMAH (see above, p. 198^{a}). The LXX (B) ἐν τῷ Σεφεί implies the Heb. בַּשְּׁפִי='bare height' (often in Jeremiah). This is preferred to MT by Thenius, Driver (Text of Sam. ad. loc.), Löhr, H. P. Smith, and recent writers in general.

SECUNDUS (Σεκοῦνδος [TR], Σέκουνδος [WH

The name (with SOSIPATER) occurs in the well-known inscription of Thessalonica, CIG ii. 1967, which gives a list of Politarchs.

SECURE.—As used in AV 'secure' means 'confident,' 'trustful,' 'not anticipating danger.' It is always in OT the tr. of בָּטַח to trust, confide, or some of its derivatives. In NT it occurs only as a verb, and only in Mt 28^{14} 'And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you,' where the Gr. is ὑμᾶς ἀμερίμνους ποιήσομεν, i.e. 'make you free from care,' which corresponds exactly with the derivation of the Eng. word (Lat. securus, i.e. se 'free from,' and cura 'care'). Cf. Jg 18^{7} 'they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure.' How greatly the word has changed its meaning may be seen from Jg 8^{11} 'Gideon . . . smote the host: for the host was secure.' Davies (Bible Eng. p. 103) quotes from Sandys (p. 210), 'There is no where any place wherein it is safe to be secure.'

Securely (Pr 3^{29}, Mic 2^{8}, Sir 4^{15}) has the same meaning. And so also security in 2 Es 7^{53}, Sir 5^{7}; but in Ac 17^{9} 'when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go,' this word is used in its modern sense (Gr. τὸ ἱκανόν).

SEDEKIAS (Ζεδεκίας, AV Zedechias), 1 Es 1^{46} (LXX ^{44}), Zedekiah king of Judah.

SEDUCTION.—See art. CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, vol. i. p. 522^{b}.

SEED, SEEDTIME.—There is a threefold usage of the words rendered by EV 'seed.' 1. Botanical and agricultural.—The common Heb. term is זֶרַע (Aram. זְרַע Dn 2^{43}), usually 'seed,' but in Gn 8^{22} 'seed time,' and in Lv 26^{5} 'sowing time.' In Ezk 17^{5} שְׂדֵה־זֶרַע is tr. 'fruitful field' (RV 'fruitful soil'). 'Sowing seed' (Lv 11^{37}) and 'things that are sown' (Is 61^{11}) are equivalents of זֵרוּעַ. In Jl 1^{17} פְּרֻדוֹת is tr. 'seed' (RV 'seeds'). 'Mingled seed' (Lv 19^{19}) and 'divers seeds' (Dt 22^{9}) are renderings of כִּלְאַיִם. In Is 19^{7} כֹּל מִזְרַע appears in AV as 'every thing sown,' RV 'all that is sown.' The usual Gr. word in Apocr. and NT is σπέρμα, but σπόρος also occurs Mk 4^{26} [cf. Swete's note], Lk 8$^{5.\ 11}$, 2 Co 9^{10}. The most interesting Scripture references to 'seed' in this sense are the poetic figure in Ps 126^{6} and our Lord's parables of the Sower and the Tares. See AGRICULTURE, vol. i. 49^{a}. 2. Physiological.—The phrase שִׁכְבַת־זֶרַע is variously tr. in Lv 15$^{16.\ 17.\ 18.\ 32}$ 18^{21} 19^{19} 22^{4}, Nu 5^{13}. 'To conceive seed' stands in Lv 12^{2} for the Hiph. of זָרַע, in Nu 5^{28} for the Niph. with the noun זֶרַע, and in He 11^{11} for εἰς καταβολὴν σπέρματος. σπέρμα has this meaning in Wis 7^{2}, and σπόρα bears the same sense in the metaphor of 1 P 1^{23}, where Christians are said to have been 'begotten again, not of corruptible seed (ἐκ σπορᾶς φθαρτῆς), but of incorruptible (ἀφθάρτου), through the word of God.' 3. Metaphorical for offspring, whether of animals (Jer 31^{27}) or of man. Here the words are זֶרַע and σπέρμα. The former is twice tr. 'child' (Lv 22^{13}, 1 S 1^{11}). 'Seed' has the meaning of genealogy or pedigree, Ezr 2^{59}, Neh 7^{61}. 'The holy seed' is a special designation of the people of Israel, Is 6^{13}, Ezr 9^{2}, 1 Es 8^{70}. 'Seed,' like 'generation,' is sometimes used to describe a class of people with reference to character rather than to descent. Thus we have 'seed of evil-doers' (Is 1^{4}), 'of falsehood' (Is 57^{4}), 'blameless seed' (Wis 10^{15}), 'accursed seed' (Wis 12^{11}), a seed 'honoured' or 'dishonoured' (Sir 10^{19}).

Two NT passages call for separate remark. (a) The words σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει (1 Jn 3^{9}) have been interpreted to mean either (1) that Christians, as the 'seed' or children of God, abide in Him and are thus kept from sinning; or (2) that a Divine principle of life remains in the Christian, which secures the same result. The latter is the view now almost universally accepted. It makes αὐτοῦ=θεοῦ, and the σπέρμα θεοῦ is much the same as the σπορὰ ἄφθαρτος of 1 P 1^{23}. (b) In Gal 3^{16} St. Paul bases an argument on the promises of Gn 13^{15} 17^{8}, and lays much emphasis on the use of the singular σπέρματι rather than the plural σπέρμασιν as pointing to the fulfilment of the promises in an individual, viz. Christ. Now it has to be admitted, first, that neither in Heb. nor in Gr. would it have been natural to use the plural form of 'seeds,' even if the promises had been meant to point only to a plurality of descendants of Abraham; and, second, that St. Paul's language elsewhere (Ro 4^{18} 9^{7}) shows that he did not regard the singular σπέρματι as necessarily excluding the plural meaning. St. Paul's argument in Gal 3^{16} is therefore somewhat artificial and Rabbinical in its form. It does not logically prove that the promise to Abraham must be fulfilled in a single individual. But we can take from it the thought that the collective noun, with its singular form, suggests an individual in whom the destiny of Abraham's posterity is summed up, and by whom their mission to the world is carried out. The terms of the promise, though not incompatible with a multiple or national fulfilment, are peculiarly compatible with one which centres in a single person, as Christ's fulfilment does (see Lightfoot, Beet, Eadie, Findlay, Lipsius, Meyer, ad loc.).

SEER.—See PROPHECY, p. 108.

SEETHE.—To seethe is to boil, as Berners, Froissart, xvii, 'These Scottish men . . . take with them no purveyance of bread nor wine, for their usage and soberness is such in time of war, that they will pass in the journey a great long time with flesh half sodden, without bread, and drink of the river water without wine, and they neither care for pots nor pans, for they seethe beasts in their own skins.' The old past tense is sod, Gn 25^{29} 'Jacob sod pottage'; 1 Es 1^{12} 'As for the sacrifices, they sod them in brass pots and pans with a good savour'; and past ptcp. sodden, Ex 12^{9} 'Eat not of it raw, nor sodden at all with water.'

SEGUB.—1. (שְׂגוּב Ḳerê, שְׂגִיב Kethîbh; B Ζεγούβ, A Σεγούβ) the youngest son of HIEL who rebuilt Jericho, 1 K 16^{34}. The death of Segub, which synchronized with the setting up of the gates, may have been due to an accident in the building operations, or he may have been offered in sacrifice by his father—a circumstance purposely obscured in the present form of the story. See FOUNDATION and HIEL. In any case, popular opinion finally connected the death of Hiel's two sons with a curse believed to have been pronounced by Joshua on the man that should rebuild Jericho. The form in which this curse is expressed in Jos 6^{26} is moulded by a knowledge of the events recorded in 1 K 16^{34}. See, further, Bertholet, and esp. Kittel on this last-named passage. 2. SEIR (שֵׂעִיר 'rough,' 'shaggy').—1. The name of a mountainous district east of the 'Arabah, peopled by the Edomites. It was originally occupied by Horites or 'cave-dwellers' (Gn 14^{6} [where read, after LXX and Sam., הַרְרֵי שֵׂעִיר for הַרְרָם שׂ׳ of MT] 36^{20} [in the latter passage Seir is personified as the eponymous ancestor of the indigenous inhabitants]). As Mt. Seir (הַר שֵׂעִיר, τὸ ὄρος (τὸ) Ση(ε)ίρ, Gn $36^{8f.}$, Dt $2^{1.5}$ al.) is practically synonymous with Edom (cf. Gn 32^3 'the land of Seir, the field of Edom,' אֶרֶץ שֵׂעִיר שְׂדֵה אֱדוֹם, γῆ Σηείρ χώρα Ἐδώμ), it will suffice to refer for further details to art. Edom. 2. Quite different is the Mt. Seir (B Ἀσσάρ, A Σηείρ) mentioned in Jos 15^{10} amongst the points defining the boundaries of Judah. The name may still be preserved in that of the ruins at Sâris, S.W. of Kiriath-jearim (cf. the name Σωρής in LXX A [but B Ἐωβής] of Jos 15^{60}). SEIRAH (הַשְּׂעִירָה, with the article; B Σετειρῶθα, A Σεειρῶθα; Seirath).—The place to which Ehud escaped after killing Eglon, king of Moab (Jg 3^{26}). It was in the hill-country of Ephraim, and apparently not very far from Gilgal. Its site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. Σειρωθά, Sirotha), and it has not yet been identified. C. W. Wilson.

SELA (סֶלַע 'the cliff'; πέτρα, Is 16^1 42^{11}; הַסֶּלַע, ἡ πέτρα, Jg 1^{36}, 2 K 14^7).—The capital of Edom or Mt. Seir, situated in a valley amidst the Edomite mountains, five days' journey (of 12 miles each) by the Arabah from 'Aḳabah (Elath), and 6 from the Dead Sea by the same route.[*] Its identification as the capital of Edom may also be inferred from its proximity to Mount Hor (if we are right in identifying this with Jebel Haroun), which rises in a grand escarpment immediately to the N.W. of the ancient city, and which, as observed by Dean Stanley, is one of the few spots connected with the wanderings of the Israelites which admit of no reasonable doubt (Sinai and Palestine, 86). According to Strabo, Petra was the metropolis of the Nabatæans, and it is described as a city situated in a valley, decorated with gardens and fountains, but bounded on all sides by rocks.[†]

Description.—Petra is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable of the ancient cities of the East, not only for its position, shut in by mountains and formidable rocky precipices from the outer world, but for the peculiar character of its architecture and the degree of preservation in which the structures themselves have come down to us through many centuries. It lies along the course of the Wâdy Mûsa,[‡] a stream which descends by a narrow gorge called the Sîk from the tableland of Edom at the margin of the great Arabian desert, and which ultimately finds its way into the Wâdy el-Jeib, and thus to the Dead Sea, in a north-westerly direction. On issuing from the Sîk, the valley suddenly opens out into a plain, about 1000 yards across,[§] bounded by stupendous cliffs of red and variegated sandstone, into which several other valleys enter from the north, west, and south, also lined by lofty cliffs, through one of which the river escapes by a channel almost as narrow as that by which it entered. This central plain, of a rudely quadrangular form, contains several ruined temples and foundations of habitations. On all sides the nearly vertical walls of rock are covered by works of art—not built up of hewn stone, but cut out of the living rock itself; while a few ruined structures occupy sites rising directly from the valley. This style of architecture, not unknown in other Eastern countries, such as the Valley of the Nile, Peninsular India, and Asia Minor, here attains a variety and magnificence elsewhere unreached; and as the tombs appear to predominate in number above other kinds of structures,—not excepting the temples,—Petra has been likened by travellers to a vast necropolis, where the inhabitants could never issue forth from their dwellings without being confronted with monuments of death.

It would be out of place here to attempt to describe even some of the finest examples of ancient architecture to be found in Petra, which call to mind the varied styles of Egypt, Greece, and Rome. We will only observe that in hewing out the porticoes, columns, and architraves or crowning parts of the buildings, the architects commenced at the top and worked downwards; so that, as the face of the rock was not absolutely vertical, the hewn portions became more and more deeply set into the mass of the rock itself. To this protection, caused by the projection of the original face on either side, as well as sometimes overhead, may be attributed the degree of preservation of the structures themselves. The following are the more important of the monuments as known by their present names:—(1) el-Khaznê, a portico of a tomb with Corinthian columns at the entrance to the Sîk; (2) the Theatre; (3) the Tomb, or Temple of the Urn; (4) Corinthian Tomb; (5) Great Tomb, with three rows of columns; (6) Tomb with Latin inscription[*]; (7) Ruin of Triumphal Arch; (8) Ruined Basilica (Zob Phiroun); (9) Temple (Serail Phiroun); (10) Large Tomb (ed-Deir); (11) Isolated Column. All the lateral valleys entering the great central plain have their walls perforated with tombs, and a few habitations, the entrances to which are adorned with sculptured façades, while niches for statues are to be observed at intervals. Amongst the most interesting objects is the Roman Theatre, cut out of the solid rock on the western side of the city, and estimated to have afforded seats for 3000 spectators; and lastly, the Circular Arch, which spans the Sîk high above the floor, which was doubtless constructed as part of an aqueduct to carry the waters of the brook to the higher parts of the city.[†] For figure of the recently discovered high place of Petra, see Sanctuary, p. 396^a.

Outline of the history of Petra.—The history of Petra has yet to be written. The following are some of the leading historical events:—

(1) Its history commences in the time of Abraham, when Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, with his allies, swept over the region of Mount Seir, then inhabited by the Ḥorites (or cave-dwellers), Gn 14^6.

(2) Esau settled in Mount Seir on separating from his brother Jacob, and the country was henceforth ruled by his descendants, the Edomites (Gn 36^9).

(3) At the time of the Exodus the Edomites appear to have been a powerful nation under a king; and on the Israelites requesting permission to pass through Mount Seir, by the king's highway, on their journey towards the plains of Moab, they were refused, and the Edomites made a demonstration of force to resist the passage (Nu 20^{14-21}).

[*] There is no doubt in the mind of the present writer that Petra of the present day is the Sela of the OT, the Greek name being the equivalent of the Semitic; and the importance of the place in ancient times, together with its situation, point to it as the capital of that part of Arabia. But see Moore, Judges, 55 f., and cf. art. Rock, No. 4.

[†] Urbem in regione plana, et hortis fontibusque instructam, cinctam tamen rupibus undique (lib. xvi.).

[‡] How this stream obtained its name, unless from the fancy of the Arabs, it is impossible to say; but it cannot be admitted that it ever had any connexion with Moses, the Israelitish leader. It is one of the grounds on which Dean Stanley (Sinai, p. 92) endeavours to make out that Petra is Kadesh-barnea; but to this point we shall return further on.

[§] Measured by scale from Laborde's plan near the centre of the quadrangle.

[*] Giving the name of the Roman governor, Quintus Prætextus Florentinus, who died in the city probably in the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 117–180.

[†] A rude plan of the city is given by Burckhardt; but a much more full and perfect one by Laborde, together with numerous views and illustrations of the works of art. The beautiful drawings of David Roberts need only be referred to. The wonderful colouration of the sandstone rock ('the Nubian sandstone' of the Cretaceous age), in which the prevalent red is varied by wavy bands of pink and yellow in one direction and of purple to blue in the other, has called forth the admiration of all travellers.

(4) In later times they were sufficiently powerful to maintain wars with the kings of Israel and Judah. At an early stage they were brought into subjection by David, who put garrisons in the Edomite strongholds (2 S 8^{14}); but, in the days of Joram, Edom revolted from the rule of Judah (2 K 8^{20}), and, although defeated, maintained their independence and set a king over themselves. After their defeat by Amaziah in a great battle in the Valley of Salt on the shore of the Dead Sea, Sela, the capital, was captured, and re-named by the conqueror Joktheel (? 'protection of God'), 2 K 14^7. At the end of the 4th cent. B.C. Edom came into possession of the Nabatæans, one of the two chief tribes descended from Ishmael. These established a powerful dynasty, successfully resisting the attacks of Antigonus (Diod. Sic. xix. 731, ed. 1604), and encouraging commerce and works of art. One of their kings, Aretas, was father-in-law of Herod Antipas, and during their sway many of the monuments of Petra which have come down to the present day were constructed.

(5) The sway of the Nabatæans was terminated by the capture of the city, and the reduction of Arabia Petræa to a Roman province by Trajan's general, Hadrian, from whom the capital received the name of Hadriana, as appears from the legend on the coins of this period (Dion Cass. lib. 68). Under the fostering care of the empire it probably attained to the summit of its commercial prosperity and grandeur.

(6) Christianity appears to have been introduced into Petra at an early date, though it is impossible to verify the tradition that the city was visited by St. Paul on his retirement to Arabia after his conversion. Petra, however, became the seat of a bishopric, and Athanasius mentions Asterius as bishop of Petra early in the 4th cent. (tom. ad Antioch. 10: 'Αστέριος Πετρῶν τῆς 'Αραβίας, et al.); again we find Petra mentioned as the metropolis of the episcopal province of Palestina Tertia, which included a large number of towns or villages, all of which seem to have since disappeared. (Excerpta from MS in the Vatican, quoted by Reland, i. 160).

(7) With 'the decline and fall' of the Roman empire a period of decadence for Petra set in, which was hastened by the invasion of Chosroës, king of Persia, in the middle of the 6th cent.; and its ruin was consummated by the desolating wave of Mohammedan conquest which swept over Arabia Petræa from A.D. 629 to 632. The Christian inhabitants were either massacred or compelled to embrace the faith of the conqueror, and their temples and monasteries were reduced to ruins. Of the large number of ecclesiastical buildings which existed at the beginning of the 7th cent. in Arabia, only the monastery of Mount Sinai remains to the present day. Henceforth Petra became a city of ruins, absolutely lost to the view and knowledge of the outer world for several centuries during the Middle Ages till rediscovered by Sultan Beybars of Egypt towards the close of the 13th cent. It is now only the home of the Bedawîn; and the terrible predictions of the prophet, 'Thus will I make Mount Seir an astonishment and a desolation' (Ezk 35^7), have been literally fulfilled. Dean Burgon has well expressed this desolation in the following lines:

> 'How changed—how fallen! All her glory fled,
> The Widow'd City mourns her many dead.*
> Like some fond heart which gaunt disease hath left
> Of all it lived for—all it loved—bereft;
> Mute in its anguish: struck with pangs too deep
> For words to utter, or for tears to weep.'

Petra and Kadesh-barnea.—The suggestion that these two places were identical comes from Dean Stanley, and would not have been considered worthy of notice had it emanated from a less distinguished writer. Both topographical and historical reasons are sufficiently clear to render the view untenable. (1) Kadesh was a place situated in immediate proximity to the Canaanitish inhabitants (Nu 13^{29}). This does not apply to Mount Seir, which was separated from them by the wide valley of the Arabah (wilderness of Zin). (2) Kadesh was in the wilderness of Paran (Nu 13^{26}), a region lying to the west of the Arabah, and generally corresponding to the Badiet et-Tîh of the present day (cf. Gn 21^{21}, Nu 10^{12} 12^{16} 13^{26}). This is in harmony with (1) above. (3) As the king of Edom refused the Israelites a passage through his territory when about to leave his neighbourhood, is it conceivable that he would have permitted them to occupy the capital of his kingdom for a period of thirty-eight (or forty) years? Dean Stanley's main reason for his suggestion is the name Wâdy Mûsa (or Moses' Valley) attached to the stream along the banks of which Petra is situated. But however difficult it may be to account for the name, the reasons against the suggestion far outweigh whatever evidence may be derived from this source. See article SANCTUARY.

SELAH (סֶלָה).—This word occurs 71 times in the Psalter, 17 of these occurrences being in Book I., 30 in II., 20 in III., 4 in V. The majority of the psalms wherein it appears are Elohistic, and all of them ascribed, in the titles, to David, Korah, Asaph or Ethan, except Pss. 66 and 67, the latter of which has ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυείδ in the LXX. In 16 psalms it is found once, in 15 twice, in 7 thrice, in 1 four times. It stands also three times in the psalm which is known as Hab 3. In the so-called Psalms of Solomon διάψαλμα is used twice (17^{31} 18^{10}), but m, one of the eight MSS of which Swete has availed himself (*The OT in Greek*², vol. iii.), omits it in both cases. Its usual position is at the end of a poem or of a strophe, the only instances of its occurrence in the middle of a verse being Ps 55^{19} 57^3, Hab $3^{3.9}$. These exceptions, however, are apparent rather than real: the first passage is full of impassioned feeling, and the Ṣelah immediately follows a Divine title; in the second the LXX has διάψαλμα at the close of the verse; the other two are connected with loose quotations from Dt 33^2, Ps 77^{16-21}.

It is universally agreed that Ṣelah is a musical or liturgical sign of some kind. Nowhere has the word any grammatical connexion with the context. Ps 9^{16} is not an exception, for Higgaion, Ṣelah, are both used interjectionally, 'Resounding music! Up!' It is not found in the prophetical writings, and its reference to the temple music is evinced by the fact that 31 of the 39 psalms containing it are ascribed in their titles לַמְנַצֵּחַ, as is Hab 3 at the close.

The derivation and precise significance of the note have been much disputed. (1) One suggestion is that we have in it simply the Heb. form of ψάλλε. But the musical signs of the Psalter date from an earlier period than that of the Greek influence. Besides, if the word had come from the Greek, it is strange that no tradition to that effect should have reached any of the Greek translators. (2) It has been taken as an abbreviation. For example, סב לְמַעְלָה הַשָּׁר=da capo. But these abbreviations, however agreeable to the taste of later writers, are not biblical. (3) It has been derived from a verb סלה, supposed to be equivalent to שׁלה: the imperative would be סְלֵה, with ה paragogic סַלָּה, in pause סָלָה. The interchange of ס and שׂ is, however, rare in the Heb. of the OT, and the sense thus obtained, 'Pause!' does not suit many of the passages: as, for instance, those where it stands in the middle of a verse or would break the flow of thought (Ps 55^{19} $67^{1.4}$, Hab $3^{3.9}$), or at the end of a psalm (Ps 3. 24), where no direction to pause is needed. (4) Several of the VSS translated it by words which mean 'for ever.' The Targ. has לְעָלְמָא, לְעָלְמִין, לְחַיֵּי, עָלְמָא, לְעָלְמֵי עָלְמִין, etc.; Aq. ἀεί; Theod. ἀεί; Sexta διαπαντός, once εἰς τέλος; Quinta εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας; Jerome, semper, in sempiternum. (5) In all probability it is connected with the verb סָלַל = to lift up, to cast up. In this case the meaning may be (a) 'Lift up! Loud!' a direction to the orchestra, which had hitherto been playing a soft accompaniment and is now to strike in with loud music, trumpets and cymbals, whilst the singer's voice was hushed. Additional force would thus be given to those parts of the psalm where it seemed appropriate. It will be noticed that Ṣelah is not found at the beginning of a psalm, for instrumental preludes were in all probability unknown, the instruments being always secondary to the voices. Or (b) it may mean 'Lift up your benediction,' the reference being to a doxology 'sung after every psalm and section of a psalm which for any liturgical reason was separated from a section which followed' (Briggs, JBL, 1899, p. 142).

* On the coins of Petra the city is represented as a veiled and turreted female sitting on a rock. For other predictions of the desolation of Edom, see Is 34^{5-17}, Jer 49^{15-22}, Ob $^{1-10}$.

The διάψαλμα of LXX, Theod., and Symm. has received almost as many varying interpretations as the original word itself. 'Quidam diapsalma commutationem metri dixerunt esse: alii pausationem spiritus: nonnulli alterius sensus exordium. Sunt qui rhythmi distinctionem, et quia psalmi tunc temporis juncta voce ad organum canebantur, cujusdam musicæ varietatis existimant silentium' (Jer. ad Marcellam). It seems not unlikely that the true meaning is 'an interlude': Hesychius explains the similarly formed word διαύλιον of the flute-playing in the interval between two choruses.

B. Jacob's 'Beiträge zu einer Einleitung in die Psalmen' (ZATW, 1896, pp. 129-182) is a very full discussion of the word. Denying the possibility of an etymological explanation, he reaches two main conclusions: (1) 'סֶלָה signifies a pause, whether in the temple song or for the temple song'; (2) 'the meaning of ס׳ was purposely concealed to prevent the synagogues and perhaps also the churches from obtaining one of the privileges of the temple.' Briggs' article, quoted above, is marked by great freshness in its discussion of the problem: see also under the word סֶלָה in the Oxf. Heb. Lexicon.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH (סֶלַע הַמַּחְלְקוֹת; πέτρα ἡ μερισθεῖσα; Petra dividens; 'the rock of divisions or escape,' RVm).—A rock or cliff in the wilderness of Maon, at which Saul 'returned from pursuing after David' (1 S 23^{28}). The 'rock of divisions' is the interpretation of the Jewish commentators (Midrash, Rashi), and is pronounced probable by Driver (Text of Sam. ad. loc.); the 'rock of escapes' that of Gesenius (Thes. 485). The great gorge of Wâdy Malâki, which runs eastward between Carmel and Maon, would be a suitable position, and the name may be a corruption of the Hebrew by the loss of a guttural (Conder, PEF Mem. iii. 314).

SELED (סֶלֶד).—A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2^{30}. The name occurs twice in this verse: B has, the first time, Ἀλσάλαδ; the second time, Σάλαδ, which last is the reading of A both times.

SELEMIA.—One of the swift scribes who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14^{24}).

SELEMIAS (Σελεμίας), 1 Es 9^{34} = Shelemiah, Ezr 10^{39}.

SELEUCIA (Σελεύκεια, WH Σελευκία), the great maritime fortress of Syria, was built by Seleucus Nikator. It was the seaport of his new capital Antioch, and in it he was buried. The town was situated on the southern slopes of Mt. Pieria, and on the level ground at its foot. On three sides it was protected by nature as well as by art; and on the side of the sea, where the ground is level, it was strongly fortified. Seleucia was taken by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Mac 11^{8}), and afterwards (c. B.C. 220) recovered by Antiochus the Great. It was one of the most important military stations of the Seleucidæ, and was greatly improved by the Romans. In St. Paul's time it was a 'free city'—a privilege granted to it after its capture by Pompey. It was afterwards greatly favoured by the emperors, who enlarged the harbour, constructed moles, etc. The geographical position of Seleucia, at the mouth of the Orontes valley, gave it great commercial importance. Thence ships sailed southward along the Syrian and Phœnician coasts to Egypt, and westward to Cyprus, the coast of Asia Minor, and the Roman world. And it was in one of these trading ships that Paul and Barnabas, after coming down from Antioch, sailed for Cyprus on their first missionary journey (Ac 13^{4}).

There are many remains of the old walls, temples, theatres, and other buildings of Seleucia. The walls of the inner harbour, now a morass, can be followed throughout; the canal through which ships passed from the outer to the inner harbour can be traced; and the piers of the outer harbour can still be seen beneath the sea. The most remarkable relic of Seleucia, however, is the great rock-hewn channel, partly a tunnel, which was apparently made to convey to the sea the waters of a stream that might, in times of flood, have endangered the city, and at the same time to store water for the use of the people (Chesney, Euphrates Expedition; Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epp. of St. Paul; Baedeker, Guide to Syria and Palestine).

SELEUCIDÆ, the members of a Syrian dynasty founded by Seleucus, one of the generals of Alexander. They ruled over Syria from B.C. 312 to B.C. 65, their empire extending, when they were at the height of their prosperity, from Mesopotamia in the east to the borders of Greece in the west. The Seleucid era begins with Olym. 117, 1, A.U. 442, B.C. 312, and was very largely used, especially in the districts round the Euphrates and Tigris. The Seleucid year was usually regarded as beginning in autumn, but Schürer (I. i. 36-44) argues in favour of spring. None of the Seleucidæ are expressly named in any of the books of canonical Scripture, but in Daniel allusions are made to several of them, including the four kings bearing the name Seleucus. In the Books of Maccabees Seleucus IV. is mentioned by name. From certain references in Josephus' Antiquities, it has been commonly supposed that the Jewish historian had written a special History of the Seleucidæ. Destinon, who in his Quellen des Fl. Josephus, pp. 21-29, has investigated the subject carefully, decides against the existence of such a work.

SELEUCUS I. (Nikator), the founder of the Seleucid dynasty, on the death of Alexander, in B.C. 323, after a successful conflict secured recognition for himself under this title as ruler over all the countries between the Hellespont and the Mediterranean on the one side, and the Indus and Jaxartes (Sir-Daria) on the other. In the partition of territories which took place in B.C. 321 he obtained the governorship of Babylon, and, though driven out by Antigonus in B.C. 316, he succeeded in B.C. 312 in establishing himself in the Babylonian provinces in the east as well as in the Syrian provinces in the west. He then founded the Seleucid dynasty, which held its place for about two hundred and fifty years. He died by the hand of an assassin in B.C. 282. He is the captain (שַׂר) of the king of the South, Ptolemy Soter of Egypt, referred to in Dn 11[5] as having become stronger than the king. He founded several cities which became famous, among them Antioch and Apamea on the Orontes, Laodicea and Seleucia, Edessa and Berœa. He settled many Jews, who had served their time under him, in Antioch and others of the cities founded by him, and conferred upon them all the rights of citizenship.

SELEUCUS II. (Callinicus), king of Syria, B.C. 246–226, son of the grandson of Nikator, Antiochus II. Theos. His mother, Laodice, having murdered the Egyptian princess Berenice, Ptolemy Euergetes, the brother of the murdered lady, in order to avenge his sister's death, invaded the territories of the Syrian monarch, and plundered Syria and Babylonia. Reference to this episode is made in Dn 11[7-9]. Ptolemy took possession of Seleucia, which for a considerable time was retained by the Egyptians. Seleucus afterwards sought to retaliate, and for this purpose led an expedition against Egypt, but was immediately put to flight. We have no particulars about the close of his reign.

SELEUCUS III. (Ceraunus), king of Syria, B.C. 226–223, son of Callinicus and brother of Antiochus the Great. These brothers are referred to in Dn 11[10] in the word 'his sons.' Seleucus did not make war directly with Egypt, but his campaign in Asia Minor may be regarded as preliminary to the expedition carried out against Egypt by his brother. Seleucus was killed in that campaign, after a reign of two years, before the accession of Ptolemy Philopator, against whom Antiochus fought unsuccessfully (cf. Driver, Daniel, 168 ff.).

SELEUCUS IV. (Philopator), king of Syria, B.C. 187–175, son of Antiochus the Great and brother of Antiochus Epiphanes. Dn 11[20] refers to this Seleucus, whether we understand the writer to speak of him as sending an exactor, or (transposing two words) as himself the exactor who rises up in the place of his father. In the former case, we shall understand by the exactor Heliodorus, whom Seleucus is said (2 Mac 3[7] 5[18]) to have sent to obtain the money treasured up in the temple of Jerusalem. Bevan prefers the above transposition, rendering the passage thus: 'And there shall arise in his place an exactor, who shall cause the royal dignity to pass away.' Such a designation would be very suitable for Seleucus, who was notorious for his avarice. He is spoken of in 2 Mac 3[3] as 'the king of Asia.' In 1 Mac 7[1], 2 Mac 14[1] he is alluded to as father of Demetrius, and in 2 Mac 4[7] mention is made of his death, and of the fact that he was succeeded by Antiochus. After having reigned twelve years, Seleucus was murdered, some say by Heliodorus, his minister, who sought to win the kingdom to himself; but others say at the instigation of his brother Antiochus, who was on his way from Rome, where he had been detained for some years as a hostage. This latter view seems to be most agreeable to the language of Daniel.

SELF-SURRENDER.—By this title we may understand to be indicated the fundamental principle of Christianity on its subjective side. The roots of it may be traced back in the OT and further to the primitive instincts of religion. Schleiermacher's definition of religion as 'the sense of dependence' is defective and one-sided in leaving out of account this most essential element. It is seen in an extreme form in the extravagance of pagan fanaticism. The Indian fakîr, the yogi who abandons himself entirely to religious devotion, aims at making the most absolute surrender of his life and person; and yet it is seen that pride, self-will, vanity, and various self-regarding affections are not excluded by the extremity of fanaticism, and therefore some deeper if not more demonstrative experience must be looked for in real self-surrender. The OT prepares for this, and the NT shows the way of completely realizing it.

i. SELF-SURRENDER IN THE OT.—(a) This is an important element of the Hebrew faith in its various phases. In the patriarchal history it appears in the submission and obedience of Abraham and his family in leaving Ur of the Chaldees and migrating to an unknown land where they must live a nomadic life in response to the call of God (Gn 12[1-5]), and in the subsequent conduct of Isaac (26[1-6]) and Jacob (28[16-22]). In the prophets it is apparent as the very foundation of their work and mission. The prophet is not an involuntary instrument in the hands of God through whom the Divine will is declared. Before he receives his message he surrenders himself to the call of God; he must be a 'man of God' if he is to be a 'seer.' Moses surrenders his prospects at the court of Pharaoh in the passion of patriotism; and later, receiving his call at the burning bush, gives himself up to the service of God as His ambassador to Pharaoh. A spirit of complete self-surrender is seen later in his willingness to be blotted out of God's book that the offending people might be forgiven (Ex 32[32]). Ruth's devotion to her mother-in-law, though issuing in a great act of self-surrender (Ru 1[16. 17]), has only a secondary bearing on the giving up of self to God. Samuel is dedicated to God from his birth by his mother (1 S 1[11]), and his subsequent career shows that he confirmed this dedication by his own conduct. Elijah throughout his adventurous career manifests a life completely given up to the service of God in face of the greatest dangers. Elisha, responding to the call of the older prophet, takes solemn farewell of his parents and the circle of his friends at a final feast (1 K 19[21]), which may have furnished Levi the publican with the precedent for his similar action (Lk 5[29]). Amos leaves his herds and his orchards to go as God's messenger to the dissolute court of Jeroboam II. at Bethel. But the typical act of prophetic self-surrender is seen in the case of Isaiah, who gives us a full account of God's call and his response in a vision at the temple (Is 6). Jeremiah, shrinking from the difficult task laid on him, but going to it with the supreme courage of a naturally timorous man who is braced to face danger by a strong sense of duty and a full faith in God, lives his martyr life in the spirit of entire self-sacrifice.

(b) When we turn from the history to the teaching of the OT, we find that this supreme act of religion is repeatedly insisted on. The prophets call upon the people to give themselves up to God. Hosea invites the unfaithful to return (Hos 14[1. 2]). Isaiah, denouncing the sin of Jerusalem as unfaithfulness and rebellion (1[21-23]), calls the people back to their loyalty, and promises a redemption that implies a return to God in the spirit of submission (v.^{27}). Early in the Captivity, Ezekiel sketches the ideal of a restored nation fully devoted to God, and in Deutero-Isaiah the restored Israel appears as a people given up to the service of God. The completed Pentateuch gives a large place to the idea of self-surrender on the part of the Jewish people. The whole nation is holy, i.e. set apart for God (e.g. Ex 19^{5} 22^{31}). The Levites and the priests are dedicated to God in an especial way for the performance of specific functions, but not to the exclusion of the self-dedication of the laity. Thus the people generally are expected to 'sanctify' themselves and to be 'holy' (e.g. Lv 20^{7}). Among the sacrifices the burnt-offering ('ôlāh, i.e. 'that which goes up') was especially significant of the self-surrender of the man who offered it. This was entirely consumed on the altar (therefore thought of as a 'whole offering'), while other sacrifices were eaten in whole or in part by the priests and the worshippers. As the smoke ascended to heaven the essence of the victim was supposed to pass up to Jehovah, and represented the offerer, who was thus supposed to give himself up to God under the symbol of his sacrifice (see Bennett, Theol. of OT, pp. 148, 149, and art. SACRIFICE).

ii. SELF-SURRENDER IN THE NT.—(a) This is first presented to us in the life of Jesus Christ, whose whole course consists in the abandonment of self and self-interest in order to do the will of God; which is summarized in sayings reported in the Fourth Gospel, 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (Jn 4^{34}); 'I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (6^{38}), and described in Hebrews by the application to Christ of Ps 40^{8} 'Lo, I am come to do thy will' (He 10^{9}). The agony in the garden reveals the spirit of perfect self-surrender under the severest trial when our Lord cries, 'Howbeit, not what I will, but what thou wilt' (Mk 14^{36}), and the endurance of the passion consummated in the crucifixion completes the sacrifice.

(b) Jesus Christ invites His disciples to a similar life of self-surrender. That is seen outwardly in the call of the Twelve, which leads each to give up his work and his home in order to follow Christ. At Cæsarea Philippi the underlying principle is made a rule of universal application when our Lord says, 'If any man would come after me, let him deny himself (ἀπαρνησάσθω ἑαυτόν), and take up his cross, and follow me' (Mk 8^{34}, Mt 16^{24}, Lk 9^{23}—Luke has 'take up his cross daily'). Plainly, this means much more than what we commonly understand by self-denial, i.e. the giving up of certain of the conveniences of life. The essential difference is that it involves the abandonment of self altogether as the end of life (see Swete, St. Mark, in loc.). The word rendered 'deny' (ἀπαρνέομαι, stronger than ἀρνέομαι, and meaning a more thorough abandonment, suggested by the prefix ἀπό) is used for St. Peter's denial of Christ (Mk 14^{30}) and for the denial in the presence of the angels of those who deny Christ on earth (Lk 12^{9}). But while the absoluteness of the surrender is thus demanded, certain mistaken forms of self-denial are excluded. The notion does not involve asceticism or any form of self-torture. Primarily it is negative; it is requisite as a preliminary condition to following Christ, which is the real object to be aimed at, not commended as a meritorious act on its own account. Self must be renounced in order that Christ may be followed. Further, there is no idea of the abandonment of the ego in the destruction of the personality, or the fusing of the individual in the universal being of God. Christ's teaching does not tend in this pantheistic direction. The very appeal to the act of self-renunciation brings in the idea of the will that is to perform it (εἴ τις θέλει), and that will is equally requisite for the following of Christ, which is to be the subsequent aim of His servant. The disciple is to follow Christ as an individual personality, walking after his Master, though in the Master's footprints; not to merge his own consciousness and activity in the being and life of Christ. But while the individuality of the ego is to be thus preserved, the surrender of the will in submission and obedience is to be unconditional and complete. Probably we should regard our Lord's hard sayings on the subject of riches in the light of this primary condition. That He did not lay down a rule of poverty as a universal condition of discipleship is proved by the fact that some of His disciples who possessed property were not required to sacrifice it, e.g. Zacchæus, the Bethany household, the mother of St. Mark—in whose house the Church met after the resurrection. Therefore the difficulty of a rich man in entering the kingdom of God, concerning which Jesus spoke with great emphasis, must be found in the entanglement of worldly goods hindering the complete surrender of will, and not in the hard necessity of giving up all the possessions. The case of the young ruler, who, when asked what he should do to obtain eternal life, was told to sell all he possessed and give it to the poor, stands by itself: we have no other instance of such a demand, and therefore it is just to conclude that it had a specific application to this man, his wealth being his fatal hindrance, and a career of discipleship being open to him if he would abandon all his worldly goods to follow Christ with the peasants and fishermen. Thus riches may be classed with the hand, or foot, or eye that is to be cut off or plucked out if the member offend. Poverty per se is no more required as a condition of membership in the kingdom of God than mutilation. But if any hindrance is found in what seems most valuable and our own by right—even a limb of the body—so that the precious thing must be abandoned rather than that the life should be ruined, much more must this process be followed in the case of what is so extraneous as material wealth. For a full discussion of this position see Wendt, Lehre Jesu, pp. 376–389 [Eng. tr. ii. 58 ff.].

While absolute surrender to the will of God is thus required by Christ at any cost, pure altruism is not demanded. The 'golden rule,' which may be regarded as the primary law of Christian ethics, enjoins that we should do to others as we would wish them to do to us, on the principle that we should love our neighbours as ourselves, where some self-regarding thought is allowed, since this is expressly named as the measure of our feelings and actions towards others. Still it is to be observed that the more advanced teaching of the Fourth Gospel carries us beyond this line of measurement with the 'new commandment,'—perhaps new in contrast with the old commandment about love to our neighbour,—inculcating love like Christ's ('even as I have loved you,' etc., Jn 13^{34}), because His love involved complete self-sacrifice for the saving of others. In the same way Jesus spoke of the necessity of bearing the cross, not meaning the endurance of some hardship, but the readiness to face death, like the condemned man who carries his cross to the place of execution; and He laid down the great principle contained in the words, 'Whosoever would (or rather wishes to, θέλῃ) save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, shall save it' (Mk 8^{35} etc.). Confusion has come into the interpretation of this passage through the two senses of the word ψυχή, as life and soul, being introduced; but the previous sentence about the cross, an instrument of capital punishment, should make it clear that it is not the soul, especially as we now understand the word 'soul,' but the life, that is here referred to. The Gr. word is used in the same sense in Mk 10^{45}, where Jesus speaks of giving His ψυχή, i.e. His life, in the sense of giving Himself up to die. The passage, then, means that whoever is willing to face martyrdom for his Christian faith shall save his life—i.e. live on in spite of being killed, by entering into the eternal life; while he who makes it his aim to escape martyrdom will really die, because he will miss the eternal life. Here the self-surrender, even to the extent of suffering a martyr's death, i.e. the surrender which will face that extremity if necessary, is what Christ requires, not in every case the actual endurance of the martyrdom,—for the sentence is hypothetical. But this self-surrender is not the end, it is the means through which we are to enter into life. In a larger application of the essential principle it may be said that we must renounce ourselves in order to realize ourselves. The end then, as we saw above in another connexion, is not self-abnegation, much less is it extinction of being, or loss of personality and conscious existence, Buddhist Nirvana, or Hindu absorption in Brahm, but the very opposite—the full, enduring, conscious activity known as eternal life.

(c) In St. Paul's Epistles this principle comes out with regard to the mystical union of the Christian with Christ. He dies with Christ (Col 2^{20}); he is crucified with Christ (Gal 2^{20}); through the cross of Christ the world has been crucified to him, and he to the world (6^{14}); the old man is crucified with Christ (Ro 6^{6}). The last of these phrases throws light on the others. St. Paul is thinking of the pre-Christian condition, the life of sin and the world. This is so completely put away in Christ that it is said to be killed, crucified. The apostle means more than repentance; he is thinking of an actual end of the old thoughts, affections, desires, habits. But the peculiarity of his teaching is that this result is brought about by union with Christ, and especially by an inward, spiritual assimilation to His death. Thus, on our part, the cause is self-surrender to Jesus Christ, for Him to be the supreme commanding influence over the soul. Then this same surrender to Christ, resulting in union with Him and assimilation to His experience, carries the soul on to a resurrection. Accordingly, St. Paul writes of Christians as being 'raised together with Christ' (Col 3^{1}). Writing of his own experience, the apostle declares that it is no longer he that lives, but Christ who lives in him (Gal 2^{20}). This, which may be called the mystical element in St. Paul's thought, links itself to his rabbinical and legal view of redemption as an act of justification by God which we receive through faith. The bond of union between the two parts of the apostle's teaching may be found in his ideas on faith. It is faith that secures the grace of forgiveness, and so places the guilty person in a state of justification. Now, faith with St. Paul is not merely intellectual assent to dogma; it is personal trust in and adhesion to Christ. But such a condition of soul is the very surrender which secures the mystical union with Christ. Thus the two experiences—the subjective dying and rising, and the objective forgiveness and justification—spring out of the same act on our part, the faith that implies self-surrender. Further, out of this and its results arise moral obligations to continual self-renunciation for the service of Christ and the benefit of mankind. The Christian is not his own, because he has been bought with a price (1 Co $6^{19, 20}$). Therefore a special obligation is on him to spend his life in unselfish service. For the same reason he must avoid unchastity, since his body is a temple of the Holy Ghost. Christians are exhorted to present their bodies to God as a living sacrifice, an act which the apostle calls 'reasonable service' (λογικὴν λατρείαν), perhaps meaning 'spiritual service' in contrast to the external service of Judaism (Ro 12^{1}).

(d) The Epistle to the Hebrews, treating chiefly of Christ and His work, does not devote much attention to the subjective side of religion. Still it exalts faith as the secret of spiritual power and heroism, and this faith involves the renunciation of self in accepting the help of God to do His will. Thus one instance is that of Moses, who gave up the treasures of Egypt, enduring 'as seeing him who is invisible' (He 11^{27}).

(e) St. Peter describes Christians as persons who were going astray but are now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls (1 P 2^{25}); and this return involves surrender to obedience, since the sheep of the flock follow their shepherd.

(f) In the Johannine writings the act of self-renunciation does not come forward so prominently on its own account as elsewhere in the NT; but it is even more completely involved in the requirements that correspond to the Divine side of religion than in the other apostolic writings. The new birth of which Jesus speaks to Nicodemus (Jn 3^{1-8}) requires the surrender of self in the abandonment of pride and self-sufficiency, in order that it may be experienced. To drink of the water of life, to eat the bread of life, to follow the Light of the World, are actions that require the abandonment of all claims to self-sufficiency. Then St. John demands faith as the great condition on our part for the reception of eternal life (1 Jn 5^{13}). At the same time, in the prominence which he gives to this gift of eternal life as a present possession, it is plain that he does not teach any doctrine of the abandonment of the human personality for absorption in the Divine. SEMACHIAH (סְמַכְיָהוּ 'J" has sustained').—The name of a Korahite family of gatekeepers, 1 Ch 26^{7} (B Σαβχειά, A Σαμαχίας). It is not improbable that the same name should be substituted for Ismachiah (יִסְמַכְיָהוּ 'J" sustaineth'; B Σαμαχειά, A Σαμαχιά) in 2 Ch 31^{13}. See Gray, HPN 291, 295.

SEMEI (B Σεμεεί, A Σεμεί), 1 Es 9^{33} = Shimei of the sons of Hashum, Ezr 10^{33}.

SEMEIAS (B Σεμεείας, ℵA Σεμείας; AV Semei), Ad. Est 11^{2} (LXX, A^{1}) = Shimei, the ancestor of Mordecai; cf. Est 2^{5}.

SEMEIN (B Σεμεείν, A Σεμεεί; AV Semei), Lk 3^{26}.—The father of Mattathias in the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

SEMEIS (B Σενσεΐς, A Σεμεΐς; AV Semis), 1 Es 9^{23} = Shimei the Levite, Ezr 10^{23}.

SENAAH (סְנָאָה; B Σαανά, Σαναάτ, A Σαναά, Σενναά, Ἀσάν; Senaa).—Amongst the 'people of Israel' who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel were the 'children of Senaah.' Their numbers were 3630 according to Ezr 2^{35}, and 3930 according to Neh 7^{38}. The name occurs again, with the article, haṣ-Ṣenaah (Neh 3^{3}), in connexion with the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. The people of Senaah built the Fish-gate, and are mentioned next in order after the people of Jericho (cf. Ezr 2^{34}). From this it may perhaps be inferred that Senaah was in the vicinity of Jericho. In this case it may possibly be the village Magdalsenna, Μεγδαλσεννά, which Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) place 7 M.P. north of Jericho.

In the lists in 1 Es. (5^{23}) the name is given as Sanaas (AV Annaas; B Σαμά, A Σανάας; Anaas), and the number of the children as 3330.

SENATE is the rendering of γερουσία in Ac 5^{21}, where 'all the senate of the children of Israel' appears to be epexegetical of the preceding 'council' (συνέδριον). See also EPHESUS, vol. i. p. 722^{a}, and SANHEDRIN. It is the Jewish 'senate' that is meant likewise by γερουσία in 2 Mac 1^{10} 4^{44}. The allusions to the Roman senate in 1 Mac $8^{17ff.}$ will be found handled in art. ROME, p. 306^{b}.

SENEH (סֶנֶּה; Σεννά; Sene).—One of two jagged points, or 'teeth of the cliff,'—the other being Bozez, between which the 'passage of Michmash' ran. It is mentioned in connexion with the exploit of Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and was to the south of and nearer to Geba than Bozez (1 S 14^{4}). Seneh was possibly so called from the thorns (cf. סְנֶה of Ex 3^{2-4}, Dt 33^{16}) which grew upon it (cf. 'the plain of thorns,' ἀκανθῶν αὐλών, near the village of Gabathsaul, Jos. BJ v. ii. 1). The name is retained in the Wâdy Suweinît, on the right bank of which, not far from Jeba, the rock Seneh must have been. A good description of the locality is given by Conder (Tent-Work, ii. 112–114). See also Robinson (BRP^{2} i. 441).

SENIR (שְׂנִיר; Σανείρ; Sanir).—The Amorite name of Mt. Hermon (Dt 3^{9}), and one of the few Amorite words preserved in the Bible. In 1 Ch 5^{23}, Ca 4^{8}, Senir is apparently distinguished from Mt. Hermon, and probably designated a particular part of the Hermon range (so Driver, Buhl). In Ezekiel's lamentation for Tyre (27^{5}) the builders are said to have made planks of the 'fir trees of Senir,' and in 1 Chronicles Senir is given as one of the limits to which the children of Manasseh overflowed from Bashan. In an inscription of Shalmaneser, Hazael of Damascus is said to have made Mt. Sanir, the top of the mountain opposite Lebanon, into a fortress (Schrader, KAT^{2} 210). The Arab geographers, as late as the 14th cent., also called Anti-Lebanon Jebel Sanîr, and attached the name more particularly to that portion of the range near Damascus and between Baalbek and Homs. There was also a district of Sanîr in which Baalbek was situated (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 32, 78, 79, 295–298).

SENNACHERIB (סַנְחֵרִיב, Σενναχηρείμ, Assyr. Sin-akhi-erba, 'the Moon-god has increased the brethren,' from which we may infer that he was not the eldest son of his father, Sargon).—Sennacherib succeeded Sargon on the 12th of Ab, B.C. 705. His first campaign was against Babylonia, where Merodach-baladan (or another prince of the same name) had reappeared. (See, however, MERODACH-BALADAN). After a reign of six months the latter was forced to fly for his life. Sennacherib made a certain Bel-ibni king of Babylon, and then turned against the Kassi or Kossæans in the western mountains of Elam. After this he swept Ellipi, north of Elam, with fire and sword. In B.C. 701 came the campaign against Palestine, which had rebelled after Sargon's death. Lulia (Elulæus), king of Tyre, fled to Cyprus, and Sidon and other Phœnician cities were sacked by the Assyrians, Ethbaal being appointed king of the country. Ashdod, Ammon, Moab, and Edom now sent tribute, Judah with the dependent Philistine cities of Ashkelon and Ekron alone holding out. Ashkelon and Ekron were captured, and Hezekiah was compelled to restore to the throne of the latter city the anti-Jewish prince Padi, who had been imprisoned in Jerusalem. The Egyptians, now ruled by the Ethiopian Tirhakah, came to the help of Hezekiah, but they were defeated at Eltekeh and driven back. Sen. thereupon swept the country of Judah, capturing 46 fortresses and carrying into exile 200,150 persons. While he was besieging Lachish, Hezekiah sent rich presents to him, in the vain hope of buying off his attack. The presents consisted of 30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, precious stones, couches and seats inlaid with ivory, girls and eunuchs, male and female musicians (?). But all was of no avail: Lachish was taken and plundered, and the Rab-shakeh or Vizier sent a letter to Hezekiah demanding the surrender of his city (2 K 19^{8} ff.). Then came the catastrophe, which obliged Sen. to leave Judah without punishing his rebellious vassal, and over which he draws a veil of silence in his annals. The events and the date of this campaign are fully discussed by Prášek in a series of articles in the Expos. Times, xii., xiii. (1901–2). Prášek contends that there were two campaigns of Sennacherib to the West and against Judah.

The following year he again entered Babylonia, of which he made his son Assur-nadin-sum king, and drove Merodach-baladan out of the marshes. A few years later he had a fleet of ships built on the Euphrates, at Til-Barsip near Birejik, which he manned with Ionians and Phœnicians. They then sailed across the Persian Gulf to the mouth of the Eulæus, where the followers of Merodach-baladan had taken refuge, and burnt and plundered the Chaldæan colony. In return for this Assur-nadin-sum was carried off to Elam, and the Elamites made Nergal-yusezib king in his place (B.C. 694). The usurper was defeated and captured by the Assyrians, but with little result, since the Elamites remained all-powerful in Babylonia for a time. In B.C. 691, however, Sen. again marched into the country. At the battle of Khalulê the Bab. and Elamite forces were obliged to retreat after a hard-fought day, but two years more were required before Babylonia could be finally subdued. Sen. had already attempted to invade Elam, but the winter had set in before he began his march, and the snow obliged him to return. At last, in B.C. 689, Babylon was taken and razed to the ground, and the canal Arakhtu, which flowed by it, was choked with its ruins.

On the 20th of Tebet, B.C. 681, Sen. was murdered by his two sons (2 K 19^{37}). The deed seems to have been prompted by jealousy of their brother Esarhaddon, who was at the time conducting a campaign against Ararat. For 42 days the conspirators held Nineveh; then they were compelled to fly to the king of Ararat and seek his aid against their brother. (The subject of the assassination of Sennacherib, and esp. the question whether this was the work of one or of two of his sons, is treated in art. SHAREZER, No. 1).

Sen. was vain and boastful, with none of the military skill and endurance which distinguished his father. He built the palace of Kouyunjik at Nineveh, 1500 ft. long by 700 ft. broad, and restored a second palace on the mound of Nebi-yunus. He constructed brick embankments along the sides of the Tigris, and repaired the ancient aqueducts which had gone to decay. To him also was due the great wall of Nineveh, 8 miles in circumference.

SEPHAR (סְפָרָה [with ה locale]; LXX A Σωφήρα), Gn 10^{30}.—Given as a limit of the territory occupied by the Joktanides, and apparently identified with the Eastern mountain. This place is ordinarily identified (since the time of Fresnel, ap. Ges. Thes.) with Ẓafār, the name of two places of importance in S. Arabia—one of them the capital of the Himyarites, near San'a in Yemen, the other a coast town in the district of Shiḥr, to the extreme east of Ḥadramaut, and, indeed, a place, from its situation with regard to Ḥadramaut and the great Dahna, likely to serve as a landmark. So in the Taj al-'arus (iii. 370) this place is said to be 'at the extreme end of Yemen.' Wellsted (Travels, ii. 153) says of it: 'Dofar is situated beneath a lofty mountain; the country around is well cultivated,' but it only deserves to be called 'a miserable village.' Apparently, then, with the depopulation of S. Arabia that has gone on for some centuries, the place has declined from the importance which the Arabic geographers sometimes assign to it. Against this identification Glaser (Skizze, ii. 437) urges that we cannot prove Ẓafār to have existed at so early a period; but we also have no record of its foundation. The representation of the Arabic Ẓ by ס is surprising, but scarcely constitutes a serious objection, when the situation of the place corresponds so well with what the Biblical writer intends.

SEPHARAD (סְפָרַד; BA 'Εφραθά, Q^a Σαφαράδ, Q* Σφραθά; Vulg. in Bosporo).—Ob^{20} speaks of Jews who were in captivity in the land of Sepharad. Sepharad or [see Driver, LOT^{6} 320] Sĕphārēd is the Šapardâ of the Assyr. inscriptions, who, in concert with the Kimmerians, Medes, and Minni, attacked Assyria in the reign of Esarhaddon. Their allies would seem to indicate that they came from the north-east of Assyria; but in the inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis at Behistun and Naksh-i-Rustem the province of Sparda is named between Egypt and Ionia in one instance, and between Cappadocia and Ionia in another. A Bab. inscription (Rw. 710. 31, 36) states that in 'the 37th year of Antiochus and Seleucus, the 9th day of Adar, the governor of Chaldæa and an officer of the king, who had gone to the country of Sapardu in the previous year to meet the king, returned to the city of Seleucia.' We may gather from this that the district was in the northern part of Asia Minor, though, in the annals of Sargon, Šapardâ is placed to the east of Assyria. The Targum of Jonathan identified Sepharad with Spain, probably in consequence of the similarity of the name to that of Hesperis; hence the Spanish Jews are known as Sephardim, as distinguished from the Ashkenazim or German Jews. See, further, art. 'The Land of Sepharad' by the present writer in Expos. Times, March 1902; cf. Maspero, Passing, 354 n., with references.

Sippar of the Sun-god was discovered by Hormuzd Rassam in 1881 at Abu-Habba on the Euphrates, 16 miles S.E. of Baghdad. A large quantity of valuable monuments and tablets have been found in the ruins of the temple of the Sun-god, which was termed Bit-Uri by the Semites, Ê-Babara by the Sumerians. The Sumerian name of Sippar was Zimbir. Among the colonists transplanted to Samaria were men of Sepharvaim (2 K 17$^{24.31}$), and the capture of Sepharvaim by the Assyrians is referred to in 2 K 18^{34} 19^{13}, Is 36^{19} 37^{13}. According to Berosus, Xisuthros, the Chaldæan Noah, buried the records of the antediluvian world at Sippara, as it was called by the Greeks. Abydenus (Fr. 9) states that Nebuchadnezzar excavated a great reservoir there; and Pliny (HN vi. 30) affirms that Sippar (which he calls 'oppidum Hipparenorum') was the seat of a university. In the reign of Nabonidos the camp of the Bab. army was just outside its walls, under the command of 'the king's son,' and the fall of Sippar followed immediately upon the decisive battle at Opis, which laid Babylonia at the feet of Cyrus.[*]

i. IMPORTANCE.—The Greek version of the OT, called Septuagint, is in most respects by far the most important version of the Bible treated in this Dictionary. To the Fathers of the Greek Church it appeared of such weight that they praised the Septuagint with one accord as a token of the special providence of God, as a link in the Divine dispensation for the salvation of mankind, seeing in it the work of direct inspiration, and placing it in a line with the writings of the prophets and the preaching of the apostles (cf., for instance, Irenæus [III. xxi. 4], 'unus enim et idem spiritus Dei, qui in Prophetis quidem præconavit, quis et qualis esset adventus Domini, in Senioribus autem [i.e. the Seventy Elders, to whom this version was ascribed] interpretatus est bene, quæ prophetata fuerant, ipse et in Apostolis prædicavit.'

The various claims which call for careful attention to the LXX are, perhaps, best summed up in the second edition of it published in England (Cambridge, 1665, 12°), by John Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester:[†] 'The LXX is useful and even necessary (utilis atque necessaria): (1) ad Hebraicam veritatem probe perspiciendam; (2) ad auctoritatem testimoniorum Apostolicorum confirmandam; (3) ad nativum Novi Fœderis stylum recte intelligendum; (4) ad Græcos Latinosque patres rite tractandos; (5) ad scientiam denique linguæ Græcæ ipsamque criticen adornandam: quis eam doctis omnibus, præsertim theologis non videt esse commendatissimam?'[‡]

[*] [The identification of Sepharvaim with Sippar, which has the weighty support of Schrader (KAT^{2} 279 [COT i. 271 f.]), has been challenged by Halévy (ZA ii. 401 ff.), who would identify it with Shabarain, a place subdued by Shalmaneser IV. (B.C. 727-722). Halévy suggests that the same place is meant by the SHIBRAIM of Ezk 47^{16}. It created a language of religion which lent itself readily to the service of Christianity, and became one of the most important allies of the gospel. It provided the Greek-speaking Church with an authorized translation of the OT, and, when Christian missions advanced beyond the limits of Hellenism, it served as a basis for fresh translations into the vernacular.

'The LXX has long ceased to fulfil these or any similar functions. . . . On the other hand, this most ancient of Biblical versions possesses a new and increasing importance in the field of Biblical study. It is seen to be valuable alike to the textual ii. NAME.—The name 'Septuagint' is shortened from secundum or iuxta Septuaginta (interpretes or seniores), and is based on the legend that the translation of the OT from Hebrew into Greek was made by seventy, or more exactly seventy-two, elders or scholars, whom king Ptolemy Philadelphus, by the advice of his librarian Demetrius Phalereus, sent for for this purpose, from the high priest Eleazar of Jerusalem.

κατα τους εβδομηκοντα stands in the subscription to Genesis in Codex B; παρα εβδομηκοντα stands at the end of Proverbs in C; ἡ τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα ἔκδοσις in the note of Q before Isaiah; ἡ τῶν ο′ (or οβ′) ἑρμηνεία (or ἔκδοσις), and shorter οἱ ο′ (or οβ′), became a common expression, especially subsequent to the labours of Origen in textual criticism (ad Africanum, § 5, τὴν ἑρμηνείαν τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα; in Mt. xv. 14, παρὰ τοῖς ο′); see Hexapla, ed. Field, i. p. xlviii ff.; and the 'testimonia' at the end of Wendland's edition of Aristeas.

Augustine (de Civit. Dei, xviii. 42=Eugippius, p. 1018, Knoell) writes: 'post ille (Philadelphus) etiam interpretes postulavit: et dati sunt septuaginta duo, de singulis duodecim tribubus seni homines, linguæ utriusque doctissimi, Hebrææ scilicet atque Græcæ, quorum interpretatio ut Septuaginta vocetur, iam obtinuit consuetudo.' Where and when the word 'Septuagint' first makes its appearance in English we cannot tell.[*] On title-pages of editions it occurs subsequent to the editio Sixtina of 1587: η παλαια διαθηκη κατα τους εβδομηκοντα, Vetus Testamentum iuxta Septuaginta (in the reprint of Paris, 1628: secundum LXX). The London reprint of 1653 adds Interpretum, writing ex versione Septuaginta Interpretum; and this has been retained in all following reprints.

An edition of Bagster (1821) is entitled, secundum Septuaginta Seniorum interpretationem (=Irenæus, III. xxi. 2, ἑβδομήκοντα πρεσβύτεροι, in Latin septuaginta seniores).[†] The English form 'Septuagint' occurs in the title of an edition of Bagster, as well as in that of the Cambridge edition of Swete (The OT in Greek according to the Septuagint), and the great Oxford Concordance of Hatch-Redpath (A Concordance to the Septuagint and the other Greek Versions). The Dictionnaire de l'Académie Française$^{2.7}$ gives only the plural, Les Septante, la version des Septante, la traduction des Septante.[‡]

In English as in German it became common to use the word as singular, supplying 'version,' 'Übersetzung,'[*] though of course the plural is also used, especially when Septuaginta is translated into the vernacular, 'the Seventy,' 'die Siebenzig.' Many scholars now prefer 'the Alexandrian' or 'the Greek version of the OT,' or 'the OT in Greek.' We retain here the familiar name 'Septuagint,' for which 'LXX' has been hitherto the usual abbreviation, but for which the modern sign 𝔊[†] is still more convenient.

A frequent designation among the old Greek writers was also ἡ κοινὴ ἔκδοσις, or merely ἡ κοινή, 'the common, the Vulgate edition,' in contradistinction to the Hebrew text and the later Greek versions; cf., for instance, Basil, i. 447 D, on Is 2^{22} ἐν τοῖς ἀντιγράφοις τῆς κοινῆς ἐκδόσεως οὐ κεῖται ταῦτα, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ Ἑβραικῷ κείμενον ἐκ τῶν Λοιπῶν μετεκομίσθη. In the writings of Jerome ἡ κοινή has a more definite signification assigned to it, on which see p. 445^{b}. Other designations are: ἡ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἔκδοσις (Gregory of Nyssa, in Psalm. 8); τὰ ἀντίγραφα τῆς ἐκκλησίας (Origen); τὰ ἡμέτερα ἀντίγραφα (Eusebius, in Psalm. ed. Mai, 591).

iii. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE LEGEND.—The story that there were seventy (or rather seventy-two) translators was first told by Aristeas, who claims to have been one of the ambassadors sent by Philadelphus to the high priest Eleazar of Jerusalem, to ask from him the copy of the Law and the men to translate it.

This interesting piece of literature was published first in Latin in the famous Roman Bible of Suueynheym and Pannartz (1471, fol.), reprinted at Nurnberg, 1475; separately at Erfurt, 1483. The editio princeps of the Greek text was prepared by Simon Schard, printed at Basle 1561; subsequent editions, 1610, 1691, 1692, 1705 (Hody), 1849 (Oikonomos), 1869 (Moritz Schmidt in Merx, Archiv, i.); all superseded by that of Mendelssohn-Wendland (Aristeæ ad Philocratem epistvla . . . Lipsiæ, Teubner, 1900), and that of H. St. J. Thackeray in the Appendix to Swete's Introduction to the OT in Greek (Cambridge, 1900). L. Mendelssohn had begun to add a commentary, only a part of which appeared after his death, edited by M. Kraschennikow, Jurievi (ol. Dorpati), 1897. A German translation (by P. Wendland) opens the second volume of Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments übersetzt. . . . u. herausgegeben von E. Kautzsch (Tübingen, 1900, ii. 1–31).

Fresh investigations are necessary; for though it is now generally acknowledged that the letter is a literary fiction,—Constantine Oikonomos (περι των ο′ ερμηνευτων της παλαιας διαθηκης, βιβλια δ′, Athens, 1844–1849, 4 vols.; cf. also E. W. Grinfield, An Apology for the Septuagint, in which its claims to Biblical and Canonical Authority are briefly stated and vindicated, London, 1850) is the last defender of its genuineness,—scholars disagree entirely about its date and value. E. Schürer places it not later than c. 200 B.C.; Herriot (on Philo), c. 170–150; Wendland, between 96 and 93, nearer to 96; L. Cohn (Neue Jahrbücher für das klass. Altert. i. (1898) 521 ff.) doubts whether it was used by Philo; H. Willrich (Judaica, Göttingen, 1900, pp. 111–130) brings its composition down to 'later than A.D. 33.'

Strange, above all, are the varieties of form critic and to the expositor, and its services are welcomed by students both of the Old Test. and of the New.'

From this point of view, Prof. Ferd. Hitzig of Heidelberg, one of the acutest commentators on the OT, used to open his academical courses on OT exegesis with the question to his students: 'Gentlemen, have you a Septuagint? If not, sell whatever you have, and buy a Septuagint.'

Even the student of early English cannot succeed without a knowledge of it. When he reads in king Aelfred the word to the serpent (Gn 3^{14}), 'on dinre wambe ond on dinum breostum du scealt snican,' he ought to know that the words in italics go back through the medium of the Old Latin Bible to the LXX, and that it is therefore out of place to print beside them the Latin Vulgate of Jerome, which rests on the Hebrew, as has been done by A. S. Cook, Biblical Quotations in Old English Prose Writers (Lond. 1898; cf. the notice of Max Foerster in Englische Studien, xxviii. p. 421). The English Church retained substantially the LXX in the Prayer-Book version of the Psalms and in her Liturgy.—No words of praise are spared by E. W. Grinfield (Apology): he calls the LXX the viaduct between the OT and NT, the vestibule of the Christian Church, the first interpreter of the OT and the sole canonical of the NT, the bond of union between Jews and Gentiles, the morning star before the sun of righteousness, the key of the sacred treasury, the light of the Alexandrian Pharos, the sacred amalgam; he who studies the LXX is declared to be in no danger of falling into neology (p. 173). Grinfield also rightly refers to the introduction of its study by Maltby at Durham, Arnold at Rugby; to its recommendation by great philologists like Valckenaer, Heinsius (Vos exemplaria græca, etc.).

[*] On book titles cf. W. Wall, The Use of the Septuagint Translation, 1730; Charles Hayes, A Vindication of the History of the Septuagint, 1736; Letters to a Friend concerning the Septuagint, 1759; H. Owen, An Enquiry into the Present State of the Septuagint Version of the OT, 1769. Grinfield (Apology, p. 157) uses the adjective 'Septuagintal MSS,' and calls Bp. Pearson (p. 177) 'the best Septuagintalist.'

[†] The adjective 'septuagintaviralis' we have found in titles of dissertations since 1631, 1706, etc.

[‡] In Italian, 'La Versione de' Settanta,' 'i Settanta.'

[*] At one time it was common in German to speak of the '70 Dollmetscher'; cf. J. D. Michaelis, Programma worinne er von seinen Collegiis über die 70 Dollmetscher Nachricht giebt (Gött. 1767); the translation of Owen's Enquiry (Untersuchung der gegenwärtigen Beschaffenheit der 70 Dollmetscher, 1772). Lessing seems to have formed the noun 'Siebziger' (see Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, x. 834); in Old German we read in Isidore, 7. 4, in dhero siibunzo tradungum='in translatione LXX.'

[†] It is strange that Lic. Kabisch (Religionsbuch, i., Göttingen, 1900, p. 2) finds the sense of the name obscure, and thinks of connecting it with the legend of the 70 hidden (or apocryphal) books in 4 Ezra (2 Esdras).

which the story assumes in the writings of Epiphanius, though he refers to Aristeas as his authority. He makes the number of books in the Alexandrian Library '54,800 πλείω ἢ ἐλάσσω,' Aristeas 'more than 20 myriads'; he has two letters of Philadelphus, and in one of them the saying from Sir 20^{30} 41^{14} θησαυροῦ κεκρυμμένου καὶ πηγῆς ἐσφραγισμένης τίς ὠφέλεια ἐν ἀμφοτέροις. He alone, and that only in the Syriac text as first published by Lagarde (Symmicta, ii. 148 ff.), states that it was 'the seventh year of Philadelphus, more or less,' when the translation took place. He makes the translators work by pairs in 36 different cells, and originated the statement, repeated as late as 1587 in the preface to the Sixtina, that this happened 'trecentis uno plus annis ante Christi adventum' (cf. Sw. p. 176; Wendland, 153, 159; Nestle, Sst. i. 12). Draeseke believed that Epiphanius drew from the lost chronicle of Justus of Tiberias, and that Augustine was dependent on Epiphanius; but this has been refuted by Wendland (Rheinisches Museum 56, 1. 112 ff.). On the use made of this story by Philo, Josephus, and the ecclesiastical writers see Sw. 12–17, and especially the 'testimonia' in Wendland's edition, pp. 85–166.* That the number 70 and the legend of their wonderful harmony may be due to Ex 24^{11}, where 𝔊 reads καὶ τῶν ἐπιλέκτων τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ οὐδὲ διεφώνησεν οὐδὲ εἷς, was first pointed out by Daniel Heinsius in the Aristarchus sacer, ch. 10.

As the year in which the translation originated, other ecclesiastical writers give the 2nd, 17th, 19th, or 20th year of Philadelphus; in the Chronicle of Eusebius the MSS vary between the years 1734, 1735, 1736, or 1737 of Abraham (see Walton's Prolegomena). As the day, the Jews name the 8th of Tebet; according to the letter of Aristeas the arrival of the interpreters coincided with the day of a great naval victory of Philadelphus in the war against Antigonus, and was ordered to be celebrated for ever. Rabbinical Jews called that day the fast of darkness, for they regarded this translation as a national disaster, 'like the day on which the golden calf was made' (see D. S. Margoliouth, 'The Calendar of the Synagogue,' in the Expositor, Nov. 1900, p. 348 f.). Philo relates that in his time the Jews of Alexandria kept an annual festival, τὸ χωρίον σεμνυνοῦντες, ἐν ᾧ πρῶτον τὰ τῆς ἑρμηνείας ἐξέλαμψε καὶ παλαιᾶς ἕνεκεν εὐεργεσίας ἀεὶ νεαζούσης εὐχαριστήσαντες τῷ θεῷ. He knows that the interpreters, before they began, asked God's blessing on this undertaking, ὁ δ' ἐπινεύει ταῖς εὐχαῖς ἵνα τὸ πλεῖον ἢ καὶ τὸ σύμπαν γένος τῶν ἀνθρώπων ὠφεληθῇ χρησόμενον εἰς ἐπανόρθωσιν βίου φιλοσόφοις καὶ παγκάλοις διατάγμασι.

This aspiration was fulfilled when the work became one of the chief aids to the spread of Christianity. As this was at the same time the first attempt made on a larger scale, in the domain of Græco-Roman or Mediterranean culture, to translate a literary work from one language into another, it is the more interesting to ask whether this attempt, as the above story relates, was due to the literary interest felt by a bibliophile king—φιλόκαλος καὶ φιλόλογος, as he is styled by Epiphanius*—or to the wants of a religious community. The latter view now generally prevails (cf. Wendland in Kautzsch, Pseudepigraphen, ii. 1; ZNTW i. 268). A third view is, that the undertaking was intended as an aid to Jewish propagandism. This explanation may find some support in the words of Philo (who expresses the hope that these laws will obscure those of the other nations, as the rising sun obscures the stars), and in the very first document which speaks of 𝔊, namely the prologue of the Bk. of Sirach (compare the whole, especially ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς ἐκτὸς δύνασθαι τοὺς φιλομαθοῦντας χρησίμους εἶναι καὶ λέγοντας καὶ γράφοντας).

This last passage is also the first to speak of all three parts of the Hebrew Bible (νόμος, προφῆται, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα πάτρια βιβλία) as already extant in Greek; Aristeas, Philo, and Josephus restrict their language to the Law, a fact to which Jerome emphatically called attention. If the LXX version was due to the wants of the synagogue, it is all but certain that the Torah was the first part translated. How soon and in what order the other parts of the OT were overtaken is not made out; nor has even the question how many different hands may be distinguished in the present collection yet been sufficiently investigated. Two books only contain a notice bearing on this point.

(1) Esther (see Jacob, ZATW, 1890, 241 ff.; Willrich, Judaica, Gött. 1900, 2 ff.; art. ESTHER, vol. i. 744). Willrich thinks that the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, in which a priest and Levite, Dositheus and his son Ptolemy, are said to have brought τὴν προκειμένην ἐπιστολὴν ἣν ἔφασαν εἶναι καὶ ἑρμηνευκέναι Λυσίμαχον Πτολεμαίου τῶν ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ (Est 11^1), was not that of Philometor (B.C. 166–165) nor of Soter II. (B.C. 114), but that of Ptolemy XIV. (B.C. 48–47); but this seems very doubtful.

(2) The second note, which is equally obscure, stands at the end of Job (in Cod. A even twice, with strange variations): οὗτος ἑρμηνεύεται ἐκ τῆς Συριακῆς βίβλου (cf. art. JOB, vol. ii. 660, where it is translated, 'this man is described in the Syriac book as living,' etc.).

In accordance with the usage of the ancient Church, we include in this article not only those books, the original of which was or is in the Hebrew Bible, but also those which were originally written in Greek, as the Wisdom of Solomon, or not received into all MSS or editions, as the Prayer of Manasses. In an appendix we shall refer briefly to similar literary productions, as the Psalms of Solomon, the Bk. of Enoch, and other 'Pseudepigrapha' (see p. 450^b).

As 𝔊 was the Bible of the Early Church, it has a most intricate and complicated history; it seems practical to begin with the history of the printed text, and to work our way backward as far as possible.

iv. PRINTED EDITIONS.—Long before the first edition of the New Testament in Greek appeared in print, a Greek and Latin Psalter was printed in Milan as first part of 𝔊 (20th Sept. 1481), containing among the Canticles at its end the Magnificat and Benedictus from Lk $1^{46.68}$. On the following editions of the Greek Psalms (Venice, 1486; Aldus [without date, c. 1497]; the Polyglot Psalters of Justiniani, Genua, 1516, and Potken, Cologne, 1518), see Sst. iii. 7. 30–32. The first complete edition was the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes (1514–17; the OT finished 10th July 1517), in which the Latin Vulgate is placed between the Hebrew on the left and 𝔊 on the right, 'tanquam duos hinc et inde latrones, medium autem Jesum.'

* That the preservation of Aristeas goes back to the library of Cæsarea bas been suggested by Wendland. It may have had a place in one of the Bible MSS issued by Eusebius and Pamphilus.—Add to the 'testimonia' collected by Mendelssohn-Wendland the strange statement from pseudo-Eusebius on the Star (publ. by W. Wright in Journ. of Sacred Literature, 1866, vol. ix. 117, x. 150), that the version was made under a king [ל]ארטמרסוס (=Artaxerxes?); and the notice, translated from Greek into Syriac at the end of the Fourth Book of Kings in the Syro-Hexapla, that the men came from Tiberias (Origenis fragmenta, ed. Lagarde, 355; Bibliotheca Syriaca, 254). Cf. further the notice of F. Nau on 'Fragments d'une chronique Syriaque Maronite' (Revue de l'Orient Chrétien, iv. [1899] 318), in which the names are given of the 72 translators who produced 36 identical versions. Nau has not printed the names. See on the names: The Book of the Bee, by Salomo of Basra, ed. by A. Wallis Budge (Anecdota Oxoniensia, Semitic Series, vol. i. part ii., Oxf. 1886, 4° p. 120 f.). The last but one of the interpreters has the strange name Ἀβιήτης in the Greek text, אביטום in one of the Syriac lists, Abbāyā in another. If this stands for the Latin name Avitus, the list would be late. But this identification is rather uncertain. An Arabic chronicle combines the two figures 72 and 70 by the supposition that two of the interpreters died on the way. On the Jewish notices about the origin of the version and its (13) deviations from the Hebrew text, see the literature quoted in Urt. p. 63, and by Oikonomos, ii. 558, iii. 43. Zosimus Panopolitanus (de Zythorum confectione, ed. Gruner, 1814, p. 5) relates that Simon the high priest of Jerusalem sent to Ptolemy Lagi, Ἑρμῆν, ὃς ἡρμήνευσε πᾶσαν τὴν Ἑβραΐδα ἑλληνιστὶ καὶ αἰγυπτιστί (Oikonomos, ii. 328).

* On the notice of Aristobulus (Clement Alex. Strom. i. 22; Euseb. Præp. Ev. 13. 12), see Schürer³, iii. 384–392.

See on it Sw. p. 171; Nestle, Introd. to Textual Criticism of NT, p. 1. On the 'Spanish Greek' of this Bible, i.e. the places in which the editors translated passages missing in their Greek MSS for themselves into Latin, see Urt. 64, and Field's edition of 1859, Append.; Ceriani on Cod. Marchalianus, Ezk 33^{27}.

Its text—best signature c—rests chiefly on the MSS lent by the Vatican, Ho 108, 248,* and a copy of the Venice MS Ho 68.

The Complutensian was reprinted (1) by Arias Montanus in the Antwerp Polyglot of Plantin, 1569–72; (2) in Wolder's Polyglot, Hamburg, 1596; and (3) in the greatest of all, that of Michel le Jay, Paris, 1645. On (1) and (3) see Nestle, Introd. 10 f.

The second great Greek Bible was that of Aldus Manutius and his father-in-law Andreas Asolanus (1518, mense Februario),—signature a,—based, as the editor states, 'multis vetustissimis exemplaribus collatis'; as far as is ascertained as yet, on the Venice MSS 29, 68, 121. An interesting commentary on this edition is Steuchi Augustini Eugubini, VT ad Heb. veritatem collata editione Septuaginta interprete, Ven. 1529, 4°.

This was reprinted (1) 1529 by Joh. Lonicerus, Strassburg, in the Lutheran order, with the addition of 4 Mac. [ED. PR.] and various readings from Ho 44; (2) 1545, at Basle, with Preface of Melanchthon, various readings and restoration of the common order in Proverbs and Sirach; (3) 1550, at Basle; (4) in the Heidelberg Polyglot 'in officina Santandreana,' edited by B. C. Bertram, 158[6]7 (new title-pages, 1599, 1616); (5) 1597, by Franciscus Junius (du Jon; others say Fr. Sylburg), with alterations from c, and useful notes, the basis of the Concordance of Trommius; (6) 1687, by Nic. Glykas, Venice.

The third and best edition was that printed at Rome, 1586 (most copies by pen, 1587; signature b), 'auctoritate Sixti V. Pont. Max.,' based chiefly on the Codex Vaticanus κατ' ἐξοχήν (1209 = Ho II., now B), but making use of the preceding editions, a c 1526, 1545, 1572, and of the MSS Ho 16, 23, 51.

The prefatory matter is reprinted (partially) by Breitinger, Tischendorf, and others, and recently by Swete, Introd. Useful are the 'Scholia' at the end of most chapters from the other Greek versions, and the Church Fathers; and an important complement is the Latin translation, published 1588, patched up by Flaminius Nobilius (and others) from the fragments of the Old Latin (vol. iii. 53^a), with additional Notes to the Greek Text.

Reprints: (1) Paris, 1628, by Joh. Morinus, together with the Latin of Nobilius, as even then copies were rare; (2) 1653, London, R. Daniel, 4° and 8° (and Cambridge); (3) 1657, in the London Polyglot of Brian Walton, with useful additions (collations from A D G, Ho 60, 75), and valuable Prolegomena, the latter reprinted by Wrangham, Camb. 1828, in 2 vols.; (4) 1665, Cambridge, with the fine Preface of J. Pearson (see above); (5) 1683, Amsterd.†*;‡ (6) 1697, Lipsiæ (prepared by Johannes Frick); (7) 1709, Franekeræ, by Bos, source of many reprints; (8) 1725, Amsterd., by Mill * (facsimile of cod. G and variants collected by Vossius, Ho 133); (9) 1730, Lips., Reineccius *; (10) 1759–62, Halæ *; (11) 1798–1827, Holmes-Parsons (see below); (12) 1805, Oxford *, 3 vols.; (13) 1817, Oxford *, 6 vols., with Pref. of J. Nestle; (23) 1874–76, Londini, Biblia Hexaglotta †*, ed. E. R. de Levante;§ (24) the latest Polyglot advertised from Paris, to be edited by F. Vigouroux, printed by Didot, published by Roger & Chernovitz, has not been seen by the present writer. From notices in the periodicals (Vigouroux, l'Univers, 4th Nov. 1898; F. Nau, Journ. Asiat., May–June 1899, 545 ff.; Fonck, Zeitschrift für Kath. Theol. xxiii. (1899) 174–180; P. Th. Calmes, RB, 1900, 301, 302) it is apparent that it is only a mechanical reprint of the Greek column in the Polyglottenbibel of Stier and Theile (1847–55), the text of which is based on unsound principles.

A merit of its own belongs to the fourth great edition which was begun by Ernest Grabe (†1712), and appeared in 4 vols. fol. or 8 in 8° at the Oxford University Press, only the first (Octateuch), 1707, and the fourth (Poetical books), 1709, during his lifetime, the second (Historical books), 1719, being finished by Fr. Lee, M.D., the third (Prophets), 1720, by W. Wigan, D.D., 'ex antiquissimo codice Alexandrino accurate descriptum et ope aliorum exemplarium ac priscorum scriptorum præsertim vero Hexaplaris editionis Origenianæ emendatum atque suppletum additis sæpe asteriscorum et obelorum signis,' with useful Prolegomena.

As the title indicates, Grabe followed a twofold plan: (1) to represent the text of the Codex Alexandrinus, and (2) to make his text at the same time correspond with the Hebrew text. This he accomplished by the use of smaller type for the changed and supplemented passages, placing the readings of the Codex in the margins, and inserting the critical signs of Origen.

Grabe's text was repeated (1) by Breitinger, Turici, 4 vols. 4°, 1730–32, compared with the Vatican; (2) by Reineccius in the Biblia quadrilinguia, 1750, 1751; (3) in a Bible issued by the Holy Synod of Russia (Moscow, 1821), but without any attention to the meaning of the additions in small type, to the marginal readings and the critical signs, thus completely spoiling the work; and this is circulated δι' εὐλογίας τῆς ἁγιωτάτης διοικούσης συνόδου πασῶν τῶν 'Ρωσσιῶν as παλαιὰ [διαθήκη] κατὰ τοὺς ἑβδομήκοντα ἐκ τοῦ ὡς οἷόν τε ἀκριβῶς ἐκδοθέντος ἀρχαίου 'Αλεξανδρινοῦ χειρογράφου, and was repeated, as the title states, (4) ἐκ τοῦ ἐν Μοσχᾳ . . . ἐκτυπωθέντος ἀρχαίου 'Αλεξανδρινοῦ Κώδηκος, in an edition of 4 vols. printed at Athens, δαπάνη τῆς ἐν 'Αγγλίᾳ ἑταιρίας τῆς πρὸς διάδοσιν τῆς Χριστιανικῆς παιδείας (1843, 46, 49, 50). The 5th edition, based on Grabe, is that which Fr. Field prepared for the same Society at Oxford, 1859, avoiding as much as possible the faults inherent in the conditions of the task enjoined on him: see his preface, and Lag. SSt. i. 5–8.

The result, so far, is, that we have up to the present day not a single edition of 𝔊 based upon sound critical principles; for even the two editions which remain to be mentioned have not yet attained this end. These two editions we owe to the two great universities of England—the Vetus Testamentum Græcum cum variis Lectionibus, ed. Robertus Holmes (. . . editionem a R. H. inchoatam continuavit Jacobus Parsons), Oxonii, 1798–1827, 5 vols. fol.; and The Old Testament in Greek according to the Septuagint, edited for the Syndics of the University Press by H. B. Swete (Cambridge, 1887–94, ^{2}1895–99, 3 vols. 8°).

As early as 1779, Joseph White published a letter to the Bishop of London, suggesting a plan for a new edition of the LXX. In 1788 R. Holmes appealed to the liberality of public bodies and private persons, and obtained such a response as enabled him to procure collations from all parts of Europe. On the history of this edition, see an appreciative article in the Church Quarterly Review, April 1899, 102 ff., and Sw. 184 ff. It was the greatest attempt ever made to bring together a critical apparatus; the list of MSS at the end of vol. v. numbers 311. Of Versions used were those in Arabic (several), Armenian, Bohemian, Coptic, Ethiopic, Georgian, Latin, Slavonic, Syriac; further, the quotations of the ancient writers from Philo and Josephus downwards. In spite of some points in the plan and in the execution of the work, which are open to criticism, it is a unique monument of the love to learning of the editor and his nation, and remains a storehouse of materials, indispensable to all who have to do with the OT in Greek.* The work as sold at present is divided into 5 vols. fol.: I. (Pent.) 1798, II. (Jos.–2 Chron.) 1810, III. (Ezra–Cant.) 1823, IV. (Proph.) 1827, V. (Apocr.) 1827; but it does not seem to have been published in this order (see Jac. Amersfoordt, De variis lectionibus Holmesianis locorum quorundam Pentateuchi Mosaici, Lugd. Bat. 1815, p. 45).

* On this designation see below.

‡ Editions omitting the scholia are marked *, omitting the Apocrypha †; no edition without the scholia is to be recommended, because they supply to those who cannot afford to procure Field's Hexapla a minor edition of the latter.

§ The edition London, 1837 (ex editione Holmesii et Lamberti Bos, in 2 vols.), quoted by Sw. 182, from Urt. 67, seems identical with No. 19; whether the date 1819 given by Urt. 67, Sw. 182, for the edition of Valpy is correct, seems doubtful; it is taken from Græsse's Trésor, where editions are mentioned, Glasgow 1822, 18° (= No. 19), and London, 1827 (= No. 15?).

The text in the work is a reprint of b; but, as it seems, after a copy of Bos, corrected, but not everywhere according to an original copy. Its value lies, therefore, exclusively in the apparatus.

The advance that has been made in the course of the 19th cent. upon the work of Holmes-Parsons is due, on the one hand, to the discovery of new materials—for instance, the Codex Sinaiticus—which led to an enriching of the apparatus; on the other hand, to greater exactness in using them, which was promoted especially by the progress made in the reproduction of MSS by the various methods of photography.

Of both advantages use was made in the Cambridge Septuagint (Sw. 188–190). The text is no longer that of b, but of B itself, given in the first ed. after the so-called (printed) facsimile-edition of Vercellone-Cozza, revised for the second by Dr. Nestle, after the photograph of the Codex. In the apparatus the variants are given of such uncial MSS as have been published in a similarly trustworthy way; above all of the Codices Alexandrinus, Sinaiticus, Ambrosianus, Marchalianus. This text will be repeated in the larger Cambridge Septuagint, the joint editorship of which is entrusted to A. E. Brooke and N. McLean. Its apparatus will embrace the evidence of all uncial MSS and of a considerable number of cursives selected after investigation, with the view of representing the different types of text; the Old Latin, Egyptian, Syro-Hexaplar, and Armenian versions; and the quotations from Philo, Josephus, and the more important Christian Fathers.

It is clear that the manual and even the larger edition are but a step towards the ideal of a truly critical edition. For the text is that of a single MS with all its faults, while in the manual edition the grossest blunders are corrected only occasionally (e.g. Gn $6^{1.10}$ Χαφ, 10^{31} Σηθ, 32^{5} βόες for παῖδες; but not, for instance, 36^{31} Ἰερουσαλήμ for Ἰσραήλ, 37^{18} ἐπορεύοντο for ἐπονηρεύοντο, etc.). The present writer cannot but repeat his wish (see Proceedings of the 9th International Oriental Congress held in London, ii. (1892) p. 57 ff.) that at all places where the text of the MS, and, in consequence, of the edition, is clearly false, the better readings might be placed on the outer margin.† Thus the advantages of Grabe's plan would be secured and its disadvantages avoided; we should get at the same time a diplomatic reproduction of the MS, and a hint as to the true reading. The Octateuch, forming the first volume of the larger edition, may be expected, as we are informed (Sw. 189), in the course of a few years.

In addition to the 32 editions mentioned in Sw. p. 192, there have come to the knowledge of the present writer editions of 1521, Venice (mentioned by Grabe, Prol. to Psalms, ch. iii. § 3, as lent to him by the Bp. of Ely; but perhaps this may be a misprint for 1524; see British Museum Catalogue of Bibles, col. 396); 1525, Venice; 1545, 4 editions from Basle, Paris, Strassburg, Venice; 1548, Basle; 1584, Antwerp; 1605, Paris; 1652, London (different copies, with Ψαλτηριον and Ψαλτεριον on the title-page); 1673, Venice; 1700 [s.l. probably in Bucharest]; 1706, in Montfaucon's Collectio nova, i.; 1740, Blanchini's Psalterium duplex; 1743, Venice; 1754, with the Commentary of Euthymius Zigabenus, reprinted 1857 in Migne's *Patr. B. APOCRYPHA:—The first separate edition of the so-called Apocrypha appears to be that of Plantin, Antwerp, 1566, 4°: Το των Βιβλιων μερος, ὃ ἑβραιστὶ εὑρεῖν οὐκ ἔστιν. This edition has the strange arrangement, that on the first three sheets the leaves are numbered and the lines counted on the margins, on the following sheets the pages and the verses. The same arrangement appears in the copies, which have the title: Το των Βιβλιων μερος, ὃ ἑβραϊστὶ γραφὲν οὐχ εὑρίσκεται; Bibliorvm pars Græca, Quæ Hebraice non inuenitur, Antverpiæ, 1584. v. EARLIER HISTORY OF THE SEPTUAGINT.—Much more complicated is the earlier, especially the earliest, history of 𝔊. Of its pre-Christian times we know next to nothing; the history of 𝕲 is almost entirely its history in the Church. A Hellenist, Demetrius, who lived, as it seems, under the fourth Ptolemy, and wrote περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ βασιλέων,* is the first known to us who used 𝕲. The fragments preserved from other writers, such as Eupolemus, Aristeas (the historian, not the author of ad Philocratem), Ezekiel, Aristobulus, are too small to show more than that these writers were acquainted with 𝕲. More extensive is the use made of 𝕲 in such books as Wisdom (16^{22} 12^{8} 6^{7}), Sirach, 2 Maccabees (7^{6}), 4 Maccabees (18^{14}), which became afterwards parts of 𝕲, or in the Jewish portions of the Sibyllines. In the writings of Philo, which can be traced back only to the library of Origen, and have been transmitted to us probably exclusively by Christian copyists, the quotations from the Law are very numerous; those from the rest of the OT are few; quotations from Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, are entirely absent. Yet it is difficult to get a clear impression of the Greek Bible he had before him. This is owing partly to the unsatisfactory state of his text in former editions,† partly to the loose way in which he sometimes quotes the text: it is apparent, however, that already his copy of 𝕲 cannot have been free from errors.‡

---

* Comp. on some faults in the new edition of the works of Philo, which would have been avoided by the use of Holmes-Parsons, Philologus, 1900, p. 259 ff.; or see Ulysse Robert in his Preface to the Latin Heptateuch of Lyon (1900, p. xxxi).

† To quote some of the examples pointed out in the paper mentioned—

Is 8^{21} text πάτρια, which is nonsense, for πάταχρα, 'idols'; 1 Es 4^{40} αὔτη for αὐτῇ; Ps 77 $(78)^{36}$ ἠγάπησαν for ἠπάτησαν; Sir 7^{18} 27^{1} 42^{5} ἀδιαφόρου for διαφόρου; Sir 16^{26} κρίσει for κτίσει, etc.

* Other editions in the complete (Polyglot) Bibles of Plantin of 1584; 1613, 10, 15; Aureliæ Allobrogorum, 1609; Christian Bened. Michaelis, Zullichaviæ, 1741, 40 (the latter the only complete Bible in the original languages hitherto existing).

Equally unsatisfactory is a comparison of Josephus; we must rest content with knowing, for instance, that for his description of the Restoration he used what is now called the First Book of Esdras (vol. i. of the present work, p. 760); but as to his relation to our chief MSS of the book we are uncertain.§

Even the New Testament, with its great number of quotations, does not permit of any very definite statements, except that it proves again that textual corruption had already found its way into the copies used by the writers of the NT (cf. He 3^{9} ἐν δοκιμασίᾳ, 12^{5} ἐνοχλῇ). Even then the situation must have been what is described as existing in his time by Origen—chiefly, it is true, with reference to the MSS of the NT, but including also those of 𝕲—> νυνὶ δὲ δηλονότι πολλὴ γεγονεν ἡ τῶν ἀντιγράφων διαφορά, εἴτε ἀπο ῥαθυμίας τινῶν γραφέων εἴτε ἀπὸ τόλμης τινῶν μοχθηρᾶς τῆς διορθώσεως τῶν γραφομένων εἴτε καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν τὰ ἑαυτοῖς δοκοῦντα ἐν τῃ διορθώσει προστιθέντων ἢ ἀφαιρούντων.‖

This variety of texts, strange as it may appear, is not difficult to account for. (1) 𝕲 was liable to all the dangers connected with transmission to which literary works were exposed in the days before the invention of the printing-press. (2) These dangers were increased in the case of works which were frequently copied and used not only privately but also in public service. (3) 𝕲 is not an original text, but a translation, or rather a series of translations, and therefore much more exposed to alterations than an original text; for every reader possessed of some knowledge of Hebrew, or of a different exegetical tradition from that embodied in 𝕲, might change his text (cf. the changes introduced in many MSS of the OT from the quotations in the NT, e.g. in Ps 13^{3} from Ro 3^{10-18}). (4) If the situation was bad enough before, it became worse when other Greek versions of the OT, especially those of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, appeared and began to influence 𝕲. At last a comparison of 𝕲 with 𝕸 and the versions just named was carried out systematically by Origen; but what appeared to him a safeguard against the calamity that threatened the text turned out—not by his fault, but by that of later ignorance and laziness—the worst aggravation of it.

Continuing the passage quoted above, Origen goes on to say—

> τὴν μὲν οὖν ἐν τοῖς ἀντιγράφοις τῆς Παλαιᾶς Διαθήκης διαφωνίαν, θεοῦ διδόντος, εὕρομεν ἰάσασθαι, κριτηρίῳ χρησάμενοι ταῖς λοιπαῖς ἐκδόσεσιν· τῶν γὰρ ἀμφιβαλλομένων παρὰ τοῖς ο´ διὰ τὴν τῶν ἀντιγράφων διαφωνίαν τὴν κρίσιν ποιησάμενοι ἀπὸ τῶν λοιπῶν ἐκδόσεων τὸ συνᾷδον ἐκείναις ἐφυλάξαμεν· καί τινα μὲν ὠβελίσαμεν ἐν τῷ Ἑβραϊκῷ μὴ κείμενα, οὐ τολμῶντες αὐτὰ πάντῃ περιελεῖν, τινὰ δὲ μετ᾽ ἀστερίσκων προσεθήκαμεν, ἵνα δῆλον ᾖ ὅτι μὴ κείμενα παρὰ τοῖς ο´ ἐκ τῶν λοιπῶν ἐκδόσεων συμφώνως τῷ Ἑβραϊκῷ προσεθήκαμεν· καὶ ὁ μὲν βουλόμενος προῆται αὐτά, ᾧ δὲ προσκόπτει τὸ τοιοῦτον, ὃ βούλεται περὶ τῆς παραδοχῆς αὐτῶν ἢ μὴ ποιήσῃ.

We can sympathize with his joy (θεοῦ διδόντος) at having found this criterion, though he used it, according to our view, in the wrong direction. It is of lesser weight that he simply took the Hebrew MSS which were at his disposal, and the Greek versions that agreed with them, for the original text. Whence he got the former we are not informed,* though we hear something about his intercourse with a Jewish Patriarch called Jullus (Hillel?);† but he acted on a more dangerous principle when he took what agreed with 𝕸 or the other versions for the true text of 𝕲, instead of what differed from them.‡ Animated by this principle, and instigated, it would appear, and helped by his ἐργοδιώκτης, Ambrosius,§ he under-

* In Gn 25^{3} he had the additional two sons of Dedan in his text, Raguel and Nadbeel, and traced the descent of the wife of Moses to Raguel; see Eus. Præp. Ev. ix. 29.

† Not only earlier investigations into the quotations of Philo (Hornemann, 1773; Siegfried, 1873), but also the latest and excellent work of H. E. Ryle (Philo and Holy Scripture, London, 1895), were vitiated at the outset, because even Mangey's edition of Philo proved untrustworthy. To give one example. What was the name of the second book of the Law in Philo's Bible? Ryle says (p. xxii): 'Philo in one passage states that Moses gave to this book the title Ἐξαγωγή. . . . Elsewhere, however, he refers to it by its familiar Greek name Ἔξοδος (e.g. i. 474, 509, 638).' But in all these passages we have now in the edition of Cohn-Wendland (iii. 4, 57, 230) the reading Ἐξαγωγή, as offered by the better class of MSS. The poem of Ezekiel was also entitled Ἐξαγωγή, not Ἔξοδος.

‡ A well-known instance is the reading τραφείς in Gn 15^{15}, which is found in all our MSS of 𝔊 (for ταφείς, not θαφείς, as Melanchthon put in his edition of 1545), presupposed already by Philo (the same insertion of ρ is illustrated by Codex F, spelling εθραψαν for the third εθαψαν in Gn 49^{31}; see Sw.'s edition, p. 807); compare also his etymology of Βαράδ (Gn 16^{14}) = ἐν κακοῖς, which presupposes Βαρακ, a reading actually found in 7 MSS of 𝔊, including the Lucianic ones, and in the Coptic version.

† Jerome, Apol. adv. Ruf. l. ii. (from the 30 τόμος of Origen in Is.), and Montfaucon, Hexapla prael. pp. 21, 79. Origen refers elsewhere to instructions he received from the Jewish side: for instance, from a Jewish convert (in Jer. 20, Hom. 20, Op. iii. 178). Nor do we know where he got his Greek text. It differs sometimes very strangely from that of his predecessor Clement.

took the greatest biblical work which Christian antiquity ever saw—the first Polyglot Bible, the so-called Hexapla, and a smaller edition of it, the Tetrapla.

In the first column he placed the Hebrew text in Hebrew letters, in the second the same in Greek transliteration; then followed the version of Aquila the Jew,—no doubt because it was the most literal one; in the fourth column that of Symmachus. Then followed the column of 𝔊 with the critical marks; finally, the version of Theodotion, as being a recension of 𝔊. For some biblical books, especially the poetical, he added a fifth, sixth, and even a seventh version;[*] so that in those parts there were seven, eight, and even nine columns. The Tetrapla was an abridged edition,—whether later or earlier is not quite certain,—containing only Aquila, Symmachus, 𝔊, and Theodotion.

Till quite recently Origen's great work was known only from the description of Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, and other writers, and some specimens preserved in scholia of biblical MSS; but in 1896 Giovanni Mercati discovered in a palimpsest MS of the 10th cent. at Milan the first continuous fragments of a copy of the Hexapla (Psalms). These helped us to understand what an enormous task it must have been to arrange the whole OT in such a way, and at the same time showed also how easily mistakes might arise in it, and whence the variants come which are found in the statements about the Hexaplaric text.

And now there has been published quite recently by C. Taylor another leaf from among the Hebrew-Greek Cairo Genizah Palimpsests from the Taylor-Schechter Collection (Camb. 1900, 4°), containing a fragment of Ps 22. From this double-leaf the outer columns and some lines of the top are cut away, but it is at least 200 years older than the MS discovered by Mercati, and confirms the view that the arrangement according to cola (διελὼν τε πρὸς κῶλον), of which Eusebius speaks (HE vi. 16), consisted in this, that Origen generally placed only one Hebrew word, or at the most two, in one line, and was careful to see that the Greek corresponded to it exactly. Even so small a word as אַל in Hebrew, μή in Greek, had a separate line. In the Cairo Palimpsest all the Hebrew lines, 105 in number, consisted—they are cut off, but we are quite certain about their extent—of only one word; in the Milan-text this was the case with 10 out of 17, the rest contain two, none more than two. As a full page of the Cairo Palimpsest contained 42 (or 43) lines, just as many as Codex B, which, when opened, represents with its six columns the appearance of the Hexapla, a manuscript of the Hexapla Psalter arranged like the preserved Cairo fragment must have filled about 450 leaves; for the Hebrew Psalter has about 19,000 words.[†] As the Psalter is, further, something like the 14th or 15th part of the Hebrew Bible, the whole Hexapla would have filled more than 6000 leaves or 12,000 pages. It is probable that these figures go beyond the real extent, for we may assume that other books were treated less luxuriously than the Psalms. At all events, the Hexapla was much larger than even the latest estimate supposed.[*] These specimens,[†] besides giving a glimpse of the whole, show at the same time that for the Church at large, and even for its most learned members, so costly a work was not necessary; it was sufficient to copy the 𝔊 column, and to place on its margins the most notable various renderings from the other versions. This was done partially already by Origen himself, and especially by his followers Pamphilus and Eusebius. Such manuscripts, more or less carefully copied by later copyists, translated into Latin, Syriac, and Arabic, and excerpted by the commentators, are the sources from which hitherto our knowledge of the Hexapla has been derived, thanks to Drusius (1581, 1622), Nobilius (1587, 1588), Montfaucon (1713, 1769), and especially Fred. Field (1875, 2 vols.): see on this highly deserving scholar Expos. Times, viii. 160, 274, 325.

The later fate of the original is unknown. Jerome saw and used it in the library of Cæsarea;[‡] perhaps it was destroyed by the invasion of the Arabs. A similar fate may have brought the codex, from which the Cairo-leaf was saved, into the hand of the Jew who used it in the eleventh cent. for a Hebrew liturgical book. In these specimens there was no occasion to apply either obelus or asterisk. In Gn 1 the first occasions to use the obelus occurred v.[4] ÷ καὶ ἐγένετο οὕτως ⋌, v.[8] ÷ καὶ εἶδεν ὁ θεὸς ὅτι καλόν ⋌, v.[9] ÷ καὶ συνήχθη . . . ἡ ξηρά ⋌. In vv.[8, 9] the only document known which has preserved the obelus in the text is the Arabic version made from the Syriac; on vv.[8] and [9] Origen himself, Basil, and some scholia testify that the obelized passages were not found in the Hebrew. The first occasion to insert a piece with the asterisk occurred at the end of v.[7], where ויהי כן had no equivalent in 𝔊 and Origen supplied ※ καὶ ἐγένετο οὕτως ⋌, and so on.

These are simple cases; but what was to be done when there was variation of order or difference of sense? In the former case (different arrangement of 𝔐 and 𝔊, as in Exodus, Proverbs, Jeremiah) Origen adopted a twofold course. If the difference was not too great, he let the text of every column follow its exemplar, but marked these passages by both signs at once, asterisk and obelus (ὡς παρὰ πᾶσι μὲν φερόμενα, οὐκ ἐν αὐτοῖς δὲ τόποις). It is true, Eusebius speaks here only of the commentaries of Origen; but Epiphanius refers the help of Ambrosius also to the Hexapla, and 'copyists' (βιβλιογράφοι) and 'type-girls' would be needed by Origen for this costly work even more than for his commentaries.

[*] Eusebius (HE vi. 16) goes on after the words quoted p. 442b, note*: ἐφ' ὧν (the other versions besides Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion) διὰ τὴν ἀδηλότητα, τίνος ἄρ' εἶεν οὐκ εἰδώς, αὐτὸ τοῦτο μόνον ἐπεσημήνατο, ὡς ἄρα τὴν μὲν εὕροι ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ἀκτίοις Νικοπόλει, τὴν δὲ ἐν ἑτέρῳ τοιῷδε τόπῳ· ἔν γε μὴν τοῖς ἑξαπλοῖς τῶν ψαλμῶν μετὰ τὰς ἐπισήμους τέσσαρας ἐκδόσεις οὐ μόνον πέμπτην, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἕκτην καὶ ἑβδόμην παραθεὶς ἑρμηνείαν, ἐπὶ μιᾶς αὖθις σεσημείωται, ὡς ἐν Ἱεριχοῖ εὑρημένης ἐν πίθῳ, κατὰ τοὺς χρόνους Ἀντωνίνου τοῦ υἱοῦ Σεβήρου. ταύτας δὲ ἁπάσας ἐπὶ ταὐτὸν συναγαγών, διελών τε πρὸς κῶλον, καὶ ἀντιπαραθεὶς ἀλλήλαις μετὰ καὶ αὐτῆς τῆς Ἑβραίων σημειώσεως, τὰ τῶν λεγομένων ἡμῖν ἑξαπλῶν ἀντίγραφα καταλέλοιπεν, ἰδίως τὴν Ἀκύλου καὶ Συμμάχου καὶ Θεοδοτίωνος ἔκδοσιν ἅμα τῇ τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα ἐν τοῖς τετραπλοῖς ἐπικατασκευάσας.

[*] See Sw. p. 74: 'It is difficult to conceive of a codex or series of codices so gigantic as the Hexapla . . . Its bulk would have been nearly five times as great as that of the Vatican or Sinaitic OT. It may be roughly estimated that the Hexapla, if written in the form of a codex, would have filled 3250 leaves or 6500 pages; and these figures are exclusive of the Quinta and Sexta, which may have swelled the total considerably. Even the Tetrapla would have exceeded 2000 leaves.'—According to the edictum Diocletiani copyists were paid at the rate of 25 or 20 denarii for 100 lines, according to the quality of the writing. From the stichometrical lists of the Bible we know that the Psalter had 5100 lines, a complete OT about 80,000, a complete Bible about 100,000. This would make 25,000 or 20,000 denarii for the copying of an ordinary Bible. In the time of Constantine, Epiphanius, when becoming monk, reserved from his fortune for buying the divine and life-giving Scriptures μ' νομίσματα (forty gold coins).

Dom Morin, Anecdota Maredsolana, 1895 (iii. 1, p. 5): 'nam ἑξαπλοῦς Origenis in Cæsariensi bibliotheca relegens'; and p. 12 on Ps 4[8] 'Id quod in plurimis codicibus invenitur, "et olei eorum," cum vetustum Origenis Hexaplum Psalterium relegerem, quod ipsius manu fuerat emendatum, nec in hebræo nec in ceteris editionibus nec apud ipsos quoque Septuaginta interpretes repperi.' (All MSS have it, and the Syriac Hexapla has it). It may have belonged to those books in his library which Acacius and Euzoius took care 'in membranis instaurare,' ἐν σωματίοις ἀνανεώσασθαι, to transcribe from papyrus on vellum (Philonis opera, ed. Cohn-Wendland, i. p. iii; Jerome, de Vir. Ill. c. 113; cf. 34, i.).

(for instance in Jer $25^{15ff.}$) he followed the order of 𝔐, as did Lucian, Chrysostom, and all modern editors of Polyglot Bibles. No doubt Origen would make a note on this different arrangement, but this is missing in the documents as we now have them.

The obelus appears under various forms, mostly −̣, but also with two dots −̤ or ÷; or without any dot ∼; so especially in the Codex Sarravianus. The form ÷ was called λημνίσκος, −̣ ὑπολημνίσκος; their exact meaning is unknown, for what Epiphanius says about their difference is nonsense (see Field, Proleg. lix.). The metobelus ⋌ (a mallet) or : signifies the end of the notation. As a specimen

As it is of importance to have a view of the documents from which the 𝔊 column of the Hexapla can be recovered, the present writer had drawn up a list of all MSS which trace back their origin to the Hexapla and Tetrapla, and designed stemmata for them, but want of space forbids the printing of them here. One of the most important means is the Syriac version made by Paul of Tella in the year 617 (=𝔭), and, where this is defective, the Arabic version made by Hārith ben Sinān ben Shahāt so late as 1486 (see Præf. of Holmes, vol. i.). The Hexapla is expressly cited in still existing documents as the source for Ex., Josh., 1 Kings, Ezra, Esth., Prov., Cant., Lam., Is., Ezek.; the Tetrapla for Gen., Josh., Ruth, Is., Ezek., Job, 12 Proph., Dan.; the Heptapla for 2 Kings. The Ὀκτασέλιδον (Octapla) is occasionally quoted as having a different reading from the Τετρασέλιδον (Tetrapla) in a scholion on Ps 86^5 (μὴ τῇ Σιών for μήτηρ Σιών). Heptapla is used in 𝔭 at 2 K 16^2; Πεντασέλιδον (not Τετρασέλιδον) in Q at Is 3^{24}. See, for Genesis, Field on Gn 47^{56}; for Ex., Josh., Judges, Ruth, 1 and 2 Kings, Job, Prov., Eccles., Cant., 12 Proph., Is., Lam., the notes of 𝔭, for Ezra and Esther the notes in Cod. S, for Is. and Ezek. the notes in Q; for Ezek. and Dan. the Codex Chisianus. On the order of the biblical books in the Hexapla we are not perfectly informed; in Q it is Octateuch, Kings, Chron., Ezr.(-Neh.), Judith, Tobit, Psalms, Job, Prov., Eccles., Cant., Wisd., Sirach, 12 Proph., Jer., Bar., Ep. of Jer., Dan., Sus., Bel, Ezek., Isaiah.

For Exodus a copy is attested, in which the Hebrew was compared by Eusebius with the Hebrew of the Samaritans. Seventeen such passages are preserved in 𝔊, and 5 from Numbers.† Curious is the expression μετελήφθησαν ἀφ' ὧν εὕρομεν ἑξαπλῶν (Tischendorf, Notitia, 122); the note in S at the end of Esther speaks of τὰ ἑξαπλᾶ 'Ωριγένους ὑπ' αὐτοῦ διορθωμένα. At the end of Ex. τὰ κατὰ τὰς ἐκδόσεις ἑξαπλᾶ are distinguished from a ἕτερον ἑξαπλοῦν. In the note at the end of Proverbs (Sw. p. 75) for καὶ πάλιν αὐτὰ χειρί we must read καὶ πάλιν αὐτοχειρί, 'and again: by Pamphilus' own hand.' Strange is the quotation of Origen on La 1^{17} (Op. iii. 252) κατὰ Σύμμαχον καὶ ἑτέραν ἔκδοσιν τῶν Ἑβδομήκοντα.

If the copies of the 𝔊 column of the Hexapla, which it was the task especially of Pamphilus and Eusebius to prepare, had been copied with all its marks, it would have been well; but later copyists neglected these completely, and produced thus what we may call krypto-Hexaplaric copies, completely spoiling by this carelessness the value of 𝔊—such a copy is found, for instance, in the Codex Alexandrinus for 1 and 2 Kings. At the same time we have no right to complain, seeing that in the 19th cent. the same process was repeated in the case of Grabe's edition.‡

Now it is clear that if we were to succeed, by a comparison of those documents which go back directly or indirectly to the Hexapla, in restoring its 𝔊 column, we should have a Septuagintal text, but not the original one; for, as indicated above, the principles on which Origen chose his text are not the true ones; moreover, it would appear that he even further introduced little changes, so as to make his text correspond to the Hebrew, for instance in the matter of proper names, writing Γηρσων (Ex 6^{16}) for Γεδσων, etc.§ We must therefore look for other sources. These have been found in the recensions which Jerome mentions as being circulated in his times, besides the copies produced by Eusebius and Pamphilus. Jerome, who was almost the only one who opposed the popular views about 𝔊, had also the right insight into the consequences of Origen's labours in textual criticism, when he wrote to Augustine—

> 'Et miror quomodo LXX interpretum libros legas non puros ut ab eis editi sunt, sed ab Origene emendatos sive corruptos per obelos et asteriscos. . . . Vis amator esse verus Septuaginta interpretum, non legas ea, quæ sub asteriscis sunt, imo rade de voluminibus, ut veterum te fautorem probes. Quod si feceris, omnes ecclesiarum bibliothecas damnare cogeris. Vix enim unus aut alter invenietur liber qui ista non habeat.'

He mentions several times three sets of Bible texts as used in his time (Præf. in Paralip., adv. Ruf. ii. 27)—

> 'Alexandria et Ægyptus in Septuaginta suis Hesychium laudat auctorem, Constantinopolis usque Antiochiam Luciani (var. lec. Juliani) martyris exemplaria probat, mediæ inter has provinciæ Palæstinos (var. lec. -næ) codices legunt quos ab Origene elaboratos Eusebius et Pamphilus vulgaverunt; totusque orbis hac inter se trifaria varietate compugnat.'

The Gothic priests, Sunnja and Fretela, who had addressed him about questions in textual criticism, he instructed in the year 403—

> 'Aliam esse editionem quam Origenes et Cæsariensis Eusebius omnesque Græciæ tractatores κοινήν, i.e. communem appellant atque vulgatam, et a plerisque nunc Λουκιανός * dicitur, aliam Septuaginta interpretum quæ in ἐξαπλοῖς codicibus reperitur et a nobis in latinum sermonem fideliter versa est et Jerosolymæ atque in orientis ecclesiis decantatur . . . κοινή autem ista, hoc est communis, editio ipsa est quæ et Septuaginta, sed hoc interest inter utramque quod κοινή pro locis et temporibus et pro voluntate scriptorum vetus corrupta editio est, ea autem quæ habetur in ἐξαπλοῖς et quam nos vertimus, ipsa est quæ in eruditorum libris incorrupta et immaculata Septuaginta interpretum translatio reservatur.'

About the person and the work of Hesychius we know very little. He may have been (not the lexicographer of the second half of the 4th cent., who was a pagan, but) the martyr-bishop mentioned by Eusebius, HE viii. 13, together with Phileas of Thmuis (Sw. 79: 'It is pleasant to think of the two episcopal confessors employing their enforced leisure in their Egyptian prison by revising the Scriptures for the use of their flocks, nearly at the same time that Pamphilus and Eusebius and Antoninus were working under similar conditions at Cæsarea'). The fruit of his work is now sought for the Octateuch in the MSS 44, 74, 76, 84, 106, 134, etc. (see N. McLean, JThSt, ii., Jan. 1901, p. 306); for the Prophets, at least for Isaiah and the XII, in Q and its supporters, 26, 106, 198, 306 (see A. Ceriani, de codice Marchaliano, Romæ, 1890, pp. 48 ff., 105 ff.).

More clearly defined is our information about Lucian and his work (see on him Sw. p. 80 ff.). Westcott-Hort came to the conclusion, that for the NT the growing diversity and confusion of Greek texts led to an authoritative revision at Antioch, which was at a later time subjected to a second authoritative revision, carrying out more completely the purposes of the first. Of known names, they wrote, Lucian's has a better claim than any other to be associated with the early Syrian revision. These revisers of the NT 'evidently wished their text to be as far as possible easy, smooth, and complete, and for this purpose borrowed freely from all quarters, and as freely used the file to remove surviving asperities' (ed. min. p. 557). This description agrees fully with our information about the Lucianic revision of the OT, and with the observations we can gather from the existing documents, in which it is found to survive, for the Octateuch in 19, 82, 108, 118; in the Historical books 93 is to be added; in the Prophets 22, 36, 48, 51, 62, 90, 93, 144, 147, 233, 308.

The Lucianic recension is of the highest value for the textual criticism of the Hebrew OT; for the Hebrew MSS, used by Lucian at Antioch, seem to have been different from those which were at Origen's disposal, further removed from the traditional Hebrew text; but it must not be confounded, as its editor P. de Lagarde was careful to warn us (see especially Mittheilungen, ii. 171), with the Septuagint. On the question, whether among the materials used for his revision the Syriac version was also included, and the other, how his revision is related to the Latin versions, see Nestle, Introd. p. 182.* The statement that his autograph copy in 3 columns was, after his martyrdom, found at Nicomedia, we see no reason to doubt (against Sw. p. 85).†

* Origen took this whole system of notation from the Alexandrian critics of Homer, especially Aristarchus; see the passages quoted by Swete, p. 71, and the enumeration of the passages of Proverbs which varied in order from the Patmos codex, in Tischendorf's Notitia, p. 76. How inconvenient this was before the invention of numbering the verses and chapters may be seen there.

† On other passages (Gn 4^8 5^{25} etc.) for which τὸ Σαμαρειτικόν is quoted, see Field, i. p. lxxxii ff., and S. Kohn, 'Samareitikon und Septuaginta' in Monatsschrift für Wissenschaft des Judenthums, N. F. i. [1894] 1–7, 49–67; ZDMG, 1893, 650. Kohn believes that there was originally a complete Greek translation of the Samaritan Targum.

‡ See above, p. 440^b, on the Moscow and Athens reprints of Grabe's edition of the Codex Alexandrinus; and cf., for its disastrous results, e.g. Oikonomos, ii. 251, on the reading θηραν and χηραν in Ps 131^{15}.

* Oikonomos, iv. 99, wishes to read Λουκιανίς

No express statements emanating from later times are known to the present writer regarding attempts to revise 𝔊. That the emperor Constantine ordered 50 Bibles for his churches from Eusebius, and that Athanasius procured for Constans πυκτία τῶν θείων γραφῶν, may be mentioned in this connexion. Later emperors and empresses showed their religious zeal partly by writing copies with their own hands. The history of 𝔊 passed on to the nations, which received it in the form of translations.

vi. VERSIONS MADE FROM THE SEPTUAGINT.—If we are to trust the statement of Zosimus Panopolitanus (see Oikonomos, ii. 328), the Hebrew Bible was translated for Ptolemy at one and the same time into Greek and into Egyptian; but Latin, not Egyptian, was probably the first language into which 𝔊 was translated.

On the Latin versions of 𝔊 see the exhaustive article of H. A. A. Kennedy in vol. iii. p. 47 ff.‡ The most important addition to note is the publication of Heptateuchi partis posterioris versio latina antiquissima e codice Lugdunensi par Ulysse Robert (Lyon, 1900, 4°). This discovery, already noticed by Kennedy (p. 49), called by McLean the most important event of the past decade in connexion with Sept. studies (JThSt, ii. 305), shows the mixed character of the Latin Bible text, already acknowledged by Kennedy, in the most striking way; no Greek MS or group of MSS being known to which this Latin text adheres persistently. And the second, not less puzzling feature of these Latin texts becomes once more apparent, namely their variety. Cf., for instance, Dt 31 in the L[ugdunensis], M[onacensis], and W[irceburgensis].

In the Bk. of Judges the new text sides regularly with A against B; in some cases (1^{9} 5$^{29.30}$) it alone offers what seems to be the original reading (see McLean, l.c.). On Wisd., Sirach, Esth., Job, Judith, 1 and 2 Mac., Passio Maccabæorum, Bar., 3 Es., Cant., see Ph. Thielmann, 'Bericht über das gesammelte handschriftliche Material zu einer kritischen Ausgabe der lateinischen Uebersetzungen biblischer Bücher des alten Testamentes' (Sitzungsberichte der K. bayer. Akad. d. Wiss. 1899, Bd. ii. Heft 2, pp. 205–243).

On the Egyptian versions see Forbes Robinson in vol. i. p. 668 ff. There is but one important addition to mention—The earliest known Coptic Psalter, edited by Wallis Budge (Lond. 1898). F. E. Brightman (JThSt, ii. 275) has shown that it represents the complete Greek text, of which U contains fragments, and that it has some remarkable readings, which do not occur in the common Greek text but only in Latin documents, e.g. ἐβασίλευσεν ἀπὸ ξύλου in Ps 95^{10}, which is quoted from Justin onwards. Cf. further, Lieblein, 'Thebansk-Koptick Oversaettelse af Davids 89. 90 Psalme' (Academy of Christiania, 1896); W. E. Crum, 'Coptic Studies' in Eg. Expl. F. Rep. for 1897, 1898).

On the Ethiopic versions see R. H. Charles in vol. i. p. 791. With the fact quoted there that the Ethiopic Bible at no time contained the books of Maccabees, compare the parallel fact that they are unknown also to the Canon in the 39th festal letter of Athanasius and in Codex B, which is connected by Rahlfs with Athanasius (GGN, 1899, i. p. 72).

Scarcely any addition has been made to the Arabic versions since they were treated by F. C. Burkitt in vol. i. p. 136 ff.

Of the Gothic version ascribed to Ulfilas, only a few fragments of the OT are extant, from Gn 5$^{3-30}$, Ps 52^{23}, Ezr 15. 16. 17 (not 2$^{8-42}$); but these are sufficient to show that Ulfilas, as might have been suspected, followed the recension used in Constantinople—that of Lucian. The best edition is that of Uppstrom (Upsala, 1854, 1857, 4°), the most convenient that of Stamm-Heyne (^{9}1896, in which, however, as in all, the order in Ezra must be reversed in the way indicated above), or E. Bernhardt, 1884.* For the literature see Sw. p. 116; Urt. 119–121.

The recension of Lucian is the basis also of the Slavonic version (first printed at Ostrago, 1581). From the quotations in Holmes (on Gen.) one might almost conclude that its present form is based on the Aldine edition of 1518, so frequently does it agree with it. For literature see Urt. p. 215 (Leskien); Sw. p. 120; Holmes, Præf. in Pent.

The Georgian version was used for Holmes (see Praef. in Pent.), but the first edition (Moscow, 1743) was made conformable to the Slavonic Bible by the Prince Vakhusht, son of Vakhtang, king of Georgia. See Urt. p. 161; Sw. p. 120.

The Armenian version (see the article of F. C. Conybeare in vol. i. p. 151) rivals, in importance for the textual criticism of 𝔊, the Syriac, and will be used for the larger Cambridge edition of 𝔊.

The version of the OT which came into common use in the Syriac-speaking churches was made from the Hebrew, though it occasionally underwent influences from 𝔊 (see art. SYRIAC VERSIONS). But besides this common version (Peshiṭta), the zeal of this Church produced a translation of 𝔊, probably the most literal that ever appeared in any language, and therefore of the greatest importance for the textual critic. It was the work of one Paul, bishop of Tella dhe Mauzelath (Constantine in Mesopotamia), and was executed by him in Alexandria in the years 616-617. There he had at his disposal several MSS, which went back—with few intervening links—to the very Hexapla or Tetrapla of Origen; hence the usual name of this version, the Syro-Hexaplar. Andrew du Maes (Masius, †1573; see on his merits Sst. i. 13-16) possessed a copy containing part of Deut., Josh., Judges, 1 and 2 Sam., 1 and 2 Kings, Chron., Ezr., Esth., Judith, and part of Tobit. Unfortunately, this codex has disappeared; but what, in all likelihood, is the second volume of it, is preserved at the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and was given to the world through the labours of Ceriani and a generous gift of Frederick Field (see above, p. 443^{b}) as the Codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus in a photo-lithographic facsimile edition as tom. vii. of the Monumenta sacra et profana (Milano, 1874, fol.); while the other parts that survived of this version (from Gen., Ex., Numb., Josh., Judges, 1 and 2 Kings) have been most carefully edited in the last work of P. de Lagarde (Bibliothecæ Syriacæ a Paulo de Lagarde collectæ quæ ad Philologiam Sacram pertinent, Gottingae, 1892, 4°, finished by A. Rahlfs). Of the former publications—see the list in Nestle, Litt. syr. p. 29 f.—only that of Thomas Skat Rordam (Libri Judicum et Ruth secundum versionem syriaco-hexaplarem, Hauniæ, 1859-61, 4°) deserves mention, on account of the 'Dissertatio de regulis grammaticis, quas secutus est Paulus Tellensis in Veteri Testamento ex Græco Syriace vertendo' (pp. 1-57), together with Field's Otium Norvicense, sive Tentamen de Reliquiis Aquilæ Symmachi et Theodotionis e lingua Syriaca in Græcam convertendis, Oxon. 1864, 4°. On account of the MSS used by Paul, and the principles followed by him, this version forms our chief authority for the text of Origen's recension. On the Arabic translation based on it see above, p. 445^{a}. For the literature see W. Wright, art. 'Syriac Literature' in Encyc. Brit. vol. xxii. = Short history, p. 18; Field, Hexapla, i. p. lxvii ff.; Sw. 112 ff.; Urt. 117.

* E. Klostermann (Origenes' Werke, iii. p. xi) promises an investigation on the Jeremiah text used by Origen, which agrees frequently with the group of MSS which are considered as Lucianic. Adam Mez (Die Bibel des Josephus untersucht für Buch v.–vii. der Archäologie, Basel, 1895) notices that the Bible used by Josephus shows in Judges and Samuel many agreements with Lucianic readings, and presupposes, therefore, an 'Ur-Lucian.' The paper on 'Lucian's recension of the Septuagint' (Church Quarterly Review, Jan. 1901, pp. 379–398) came to the knowledge of the present writer too late to be used for this article.

† On a copy going back to Basil, see Syncellus (Chronogr. p. 382): ἐν ἑνὶ δὲ ἀντιγράφῳ λίαν ἠκριβωμένῳ κατά τε στιγμὴν καὶ προσῳδίαν, ἐκ τῆς ἐν Καισαρείᾳ βιβλιοθήκης, ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐπεγέγραπτο, ὡς ὁ μέγας καὶ θεῖος Βασίλειος, τὰ ἐξ ὧν ἐκεῖνο ἀπεγράφη, ἀντιβαλὼν διωρθώσατο. In this copy Syncellus found 28 (κη) years for the reign of Φακεε in 2 K 15^{27}. This number is found to-day in the MSS 55, 56, 64, 119, 245, 246.

‡ The influence which 𝔊 exercised on the formation of the mediæval Roman and even Teutonic languages through the medium of the Latin Bible version can be only hinted at. Even words of common life like canapé, cidre, find their origin ultimately in 𝔊.

* An American edition was published by G. H. Balg, Milwaukee, 1891. That of Massman is from 1855–1857.

On other attempts to translate parts of 𝔊 into Syriac, by Polycarp in the 5th cent. (Psalms), Jacob of Edessa in the years 704-5, see Sw. p. 115 f.; Gwynn, Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 433.

On the fragments of translations in the so-called Palestinian dialect, we may refer to Sw. p. 114 f., and especially to F. C. Burkitt ('Christian Palestinian Literature' in JThSt, ii. 174 ff.). The fragments enumerated by Sw. p. 115, from Gen., Ex., Numb., 1 Sam., 1 Kings, Psalms, Prov., Job, Wisd., Amos, Micah, Joel, Jonah, Zech., Is., Jeremiah, have been augmented since by the publication of Palestinian Syriac texts from palimpsest fragments in the Taylor-Schechter collection, edited by A. S. Lewis and M. D. Gibson (Lond. 1900, 4°), containing portions of Numb., Deut., Psalms, Is., Jer., and—as recognized by V. Ryssel—of Sirach (frag. xviii.). On the date and place of this whole literature see Burkitt, l.c.

Up to the present day several of the Churches in which these various versions of 𝔊 arose, have never emancipated themselves from them. But even in those parts where, as in the Latin West through Jerome, or in modern Europe through the influence of the Reformation, new Bible versions, based on the Hebrew original, came into use, there is still, in greater or less degree, an echo of 𝔊 to be heard through worship and theology. It may suffice to recall the Prayer-Book version of the Psalms, or even the latest revision of the English Bible, in which it is not the names alone of the books of the OT from Genesis to Ecclesiasticus that tell of this first and most remarkable of all biblical versions.

MATERIALS FOR THE RESTORATION OF 𝔊.—The materials for the restoration of 𝔊 are, as can be gathered from the preceding history, (1) manuscripts, (2) versions, (3) quotations.

(1) Manuscripts.—The MSS used for the work of Holmes-Parsons are counted at the end of vol. v. as 311; I.-XIII., being uncial MSS, are designated by Roman, the rest, being cursives, by Arabic figures. There are some mistakes in this list: 23, for instance, the Codex Venetus, is an uncial codex; others, counted under different numbers, have turned out to be parts of one and the same MS. Another system of designation, used by Lagarde and in the Cambridge Septuagint, is to denote the uncial MSS by the capital letters of the Latin (and Greek) alphabet; for a particular class of MSS Lagarde used small letters of the Roman, Cornill (in Ezekiel) of the Greek alphabet. It will be the task of the large Cambridge Septuagint to introduce a system of notation that will be generally accepted; meanwhile it is best to adhere for the uncials to the system of Lagarde-Swete, for the cursives to Holmes-Parsons, always keeping in mind that the sharp distinction between uncials and cursives is in no way justified.

As to the contents, the MSS may be divided into those which contain the whole Bible (OT) or parts of it, the Octateuch,* the Historical, Poetical, and Prophetical books. Most frequent are MSS of the Psalms. The arrangement of these groups, and of the books within each group, varies greatly (see Sw. pp. 195-230: 'Titles, Grouping, Number, and Order of the Books').

The books of Moses seem to stand at the head with no exception, and in all MSS the order seems to be the usual one, the inverted order, Nu. Lev. being attested only by Melito (Eus. HE iv. 26; Sw. p. 203), in the list published by Mommsen (Sw. p. 212), and by Leontius of Byzantium (Sw. p. 207). In Latin the third book is sometimes called Leviticu*m*, the fifth Deuteronomi*us*. Philo's designation of the latter, ἡ Ἐπινομίς, is taken from the book of Plato so inscribed; Judges he calls ἡ τῶν Κριμάτων βίβλος. The counting of four books of Kings or rather Kingdoms (Βασιλειῶν) has been retained by the Latin Bible, partially also the name Παραλειπόμενα for Chronicles. The form Παραλειπόμεναι occurs not only in Gregory of Nazianzus and Leontius (see Sw. pp. 205, 207), but also in Origen (new Berlin edition, iii. 74, l. 15; not decisive ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ [δευτέρᾳ] τῶν Π., i. 341, ii. 374). On the other books and their names see Sw. p. 216; but note that the last books are generally called τὰ Μακκαβαϊκά, books treating of (Judas) Maccabæus; the extension of the name to the whole family, now generally in use, the Maccabee*s* (plural), is not original. On the grouping of the books (Historical, including Pentateuch, Poetical, Prophetical) see Sw. p. 218; on their number, Sw. p. 219; art. CANON in vol. i. p. 348 ff.; on the internal order, Sw. p. 226. The statement of J. M. Fuller (Speaker's Commentary on the Apocrypha, i. 368), that the MSS ordered by Constantine from Eusebius were 'the first complete Greek Bible,' and that it contained apparently the books of the Hebrew Canon and the Alexandrian version of the Apocrypha added as an Appendix, does not seem to rest on sure foundation. When Eusebius writes that he sent off the books ἐν πολυτελῶς ἠσκημένοις τεύχεσι τρισσὰ καὶ τετρασσά, the most probable explanation of the much disputed closing words seems to be, that each Bible consisted of three or four volumes. In a note at the end of Esther in the Codex Sinaiticus it is stated that it was compared with a MS belonging to Pamphilus, which ἀρχὴν μὲν εἶχεν ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης τῶν Βασιλειῶν, εἰς δὲ τὴν Ἐσθὴρ ἔληγεν. From this it is probable that it was arranged, not like B, which inserts the seven Poetical books (the five Canonical + Wisdom and Sirach) between Ezra and Esther, nor like A, in which the Prophets follow Chronicles, and after them Esther, but like S and N, in which Ezra and Esther follow immediately upon Chronicles. This would give a Bible of four volumes (Octateuch, Historical books, Prophetical books, Poetical books).

* Greek MSS mostly count Gen.-Ruth as books 1-8, as ὀκτάτευχος; the Latin MSS Gen.-Judges as Heptateuchus; the word Hexateuch, now so much in use that it has an article devoted to it in the present work, seems to be an innovation of the late 19th century.

As regards their age, the MSS range from the 3rd to the 16th cent. To the 3rd cent. is ascribed a scrap of papyrus in the British Museum, yielding the text of Gn 14^{17} (Pap. ccxii.; see Sw. p. 146) and the fragment of a Psalter (cont. Ps 12^{7}–15^{4}), 'the oldest Bible MS in any language in the British Museum and one of the oldest in existence anywhere' (see Facsimiles of Biblical Manuscripts in the British Museum, edited by Fred. G. Kenyon, 1900, pl. i. Pap. ccxxx.).

It is impossible to give here a list of the MSS of 𝔊, or even of the uncials; some of them have been treated under separate articles; see the letters AℵBCL; we must refer to Sw. p. 122 ff. and the literature quoted there; only some supplementary remarks may be offered—

In A (Alexandrinus) the Psalter appears not to have been copied from the same original as the rest of the MS, but taken from a separate Church-Psalter (just as in the Aldine Bible of 1518). Hence the additions before and after the Psalms (letter of Athanasius, canon of morning and evening psalms, etc.; Canticles). It would be well to control its use in the Cambridge Septuagint by comparison once more with the original or a former collation; see, e.g., 1 Es 4^{14} A + αὐτῶν; 2 Es 7^{5} A has πρώτου, not πατρῴου).

On the connexion of B (Vaticanus) with Athanasius see Th. Zahn, Athanasius und der Bibelkanon (Erlangen, 1901: Sonderabdruck aus der Festschrift der Universität Erlangen zur Feier des . . . Prinzregenten Luitpold von Bayern), p. 33: 'It must be seriously considered whether the famous Codex Vaticanus is not that Bible which was produced by Athanasius at the order of Constans at Rome about 340 through Alexandrian copyists' (see Nestle, Introduction, p. 181, where in the note read 'Constantius' for 'Constans'). Ceriani's view, that B was written by a Western scribe, had been proposed already by Richard Simon (Hist. Crit. du NT, c. 32). That it contains the recension of Hesychius, was for the first time, as it seems, stated by Grabe; Masius believed it was that of Lucian, Montfaucon that of Origen. On the text of Judges in this MS see below.

S is a more convenient symbol than ℵ for the Codex Sinaiticus, and is adopted in Swete. That the copyist who wrote the note at the end of Esther on the collation with the Codex of Pamphilus is identical with the corrector ℵ^{c} is an important hint for the restoration of the recension of Eusebius-Pamphilus.

D (Cottonianus). As this famous MS was reduced by fire in 1731 to a heap of charred and shrivelled leaves, it would be worth while to make investigations whether the collation made before that time by Wetstein (NT i. p. 134) is still in existence. On the relation of its pictures to the mosaics of San Marco in Venice, see J. T. Tikkanen, Die Genesismosaiken von San Marco in Venedig und ihr Verhältnis zu den Miniaturen der Cottonbibel, etc., Helsingfors, 1889, 4° (Acta Soc. Scient. Fenn. xvii.).

G (Sarravianus). Add to the publications mentioned by Sw. p. 137:—P. de Lagarde, Semitica, Zweites Heft, Gött. 1879 (vol. xxv. of the 'Abhandlungen,' etc.: 'Die pariser blätter des codex Sarravianus').

M (Coislinianus), collated by Wetstein (NT i. 134), for a great part by Lagarde (Symm. ii. 142; Ankündigung, iii. 27; SSt. i. 8).

Q (Marchalianus). The distinction established by Ceriani between the origin of the text and of the marginal matter in this MS, the latter only being Hexaplaric, is a great help for the classification of the MSS of 𝔊.

On the 23 uncial MSS, or parts of such, which have not yet been used for any edition, and remain for the present without a symbolical letter or number, see Sw. 146 ff., 170. No. 14 (formerly in the possession of W. H. Heckler) has lately been acquired by the University of Heidelberg, and will be edited by Prof. G. Deissmann. On No. 6, the oldest biblical MS in the British Museum, see preceding column.

The transition from the uncials to the cursives may be made by the MS E, which is now dispersed in Oxford, London, Cambridge (1 leaf), and St. Petersburg. It was brought by Tischendorf from the East in 1853 and 1859; the Oxford part written in uncials, the Cambridge leaf, which was kept back by Tischendorf, making the transition from uncial to cursive writing, the rest in cursives. The whole recent history of this MS has been described by A. Rahlfs in GGN (not GGA as in Kenyon, Facsimiles, plate v.), 1898, 98–112; see also Sw. 134 f.; Lagarde, SSt. i. 1–11; facsimile in Kenyon, pl. v.

Most cursives await careful investigation; some will repay it; others may be discarded by it, as later copies of MSS still existing, like 33, 97, 238, which belong to one MS, and are copied from 87, or even as copied from printed editions. This we suspect to be the case with Ho 31 (Genesis with catena), at Vienna (Theol. Gr. 4) [on the date of this MS Holmes wrote, 'videtur esse xiii. vel xiv. sæculi'; Sw. p. 149 '(xiv.)'; Lagarde, Genesis græce, 'sæculi xv. a me non collatus, sed inspectus tantum'; H. Achelis, 'Hippolytstudien' in TU, N. F. i. 4, p. 97, places it in the 16th cent.], and with 83, a Pentateuch at Lisbon (formerly Evora) 'of the 16th cent.' Both will turn out to be copied from the Aldine edition of 1518.

See on the cursives the list of Sw. pp. 148–168, and note that 25 is at Munich in the 'Staats- (not Stadt-) bibliothek'; 53 agrees in Numbers frequently with the Old Latin Codex Lugdunensis; 130 is by Lagarde called t, and ascribed to the 13th 'ut vid.', Sw. '(? xi.)'; 93 in 3 columns, with 2 texts for Esther; facsimile in Kenyon, pl. viii.; 155 'Cod. Meermanni ii.' is now Bodl. misc. Gr. 204; 156 the only Greek MS containing in Ps 95 (96)^{10} the addition a ligno, in the form ἀπὸ τῷ ξύλῳ.

(—) A Psalter not mentioned by Sw. is in the Brit. Museum, Add. MS 19,352 A.D. 1066, valuable not only as a dated example of Greek writing of the 11th cent., but especially as an example of the best style of Byzantine decorative art, applied to the ornamentation of copies of the Scriptures [see Kenyon, Facsimiles, pl. vii., where Jesus Christ is enthroned between two cherubim (or rather seraphim) as illustration of Ps 79 (80)^{2}].

On the Lectionaries, which must be classed among the MSS, see Sw. p. 168 f. Their value would be increased if the Lectionary-system of the Greek Church is as old as has been contended for recently by C. R. Gregory, Textkritik des Neuen Testamentes, i. (1901), p. 327 ff.

In spite of the great mass of witnesses thus used for the great work of Holmes-Parsons and later editions, their classification is still a problem, even in a book like that of Judges, where the differences are most marked. Compare the judgment of G. Moore (SBOT, 'Judges,' p. 22): 'A complete stemma exhibiting the filiation of these MSS and recensions cannot be made from the collations in HP'; we may even doubt the correctness of the remark added by Moore: 'it would be comparatively easy if we possessed a few accurate collations of typical MSS properly arranged.'

Perhaps a good step towards this end would be to arrange complete lists of the singular and subsingular readings of our oldest witnesses, as ABS, especially for B, because this MS serves as standard for the collations of the larger Cambridge Septuagint.

Another fact worth mentioning in this connexion is, that every new witness, in spite of the great number of MSS already collated and the still greater number of variations extracted from them, adds a new reading, even for the Psalms, for which some 120 MSS have been used for HP. See, for instance, the spelling πρόσσχες instead of πρόσχες first making its appearance in Kenyon, Facsimiles, plate v. Ps 79 (80)^{2}.

(2) (3) The same is the case with the Versions and Quotations. On these see above, §§ iv. and vi. As but few of the Greek Fathers are accessible in trustworthy editions, a large field waits here for patient and careful workers. But, even before these minutiæ be settled, 𝔊 can and must be used for that purpose for which it is of the greatest importance, namely the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible.

vii. USE OF 𝔊.*—The remark of Swete has already been quoted—that 𝔊 possesses a new and increasing importance in the field of biblical study (p. 437^{b} n.†). Its value as a witness to the Hebrew text was recognized partially in the time of Origen and Jerome, and afresh in the days of the Renaissance and onwards from the 17th cent.; but it can be fully acknowledged only by those who adopt the views maintained chiefly by Olshausen, Lagarde, and their followers, that all existing MSS of the Hebrew OT go back to a single official copy or recension, made up somewhere in Palestine, perhaps at Jamnia, about the 2nd cent. after Christ. To quote only one statement. G. Moore (SBOT, 'Judges,' p. 23) writes—

> 'The other Ancient Versions [except 𝔊]—the Latin of St. Jerome in its Vulgate form (𝔍), the Syriac (𝔖), and the Jewish Targum (𝔗) are all based on the Palestinian Hebrew Standard Text of the 2nd cent. A.D., as are also the new Greek translations of 'ΑΣΘ, and the revisions of 𝔊 after these, and in the main the translation found [for Judges] in 𝔊^{BVBmN} [i.e. B and its allies]. The pre-hexaplaric 𝔊 alone represents a Hebrew text older than the official revision made in the school of R. Aqiba.'

In other words, 𝔊 represents for us (1) the exegetical tradition, or at least the exegetical opinions of a Jewish school, or—if that name asserts too much—of individual scholars more than 2000 years before our time; it is the oldest commentary on the Hebrew Bible in existence; (2) when re-translated into Hebrew—with the necessary precautions, of course—it represents for us the Hebrew MS (or MSS) lying before its authors, which is 1000 years older than the oldest MS at present at our disposal, and 300 years older than the one to which all of our Hebrew MSS go back.

In the first instance, it is sufficient to recall the great number of hapax legomena which occur in the limited range of Old Hebrew literature. In the second place, we learn first that the palæographical character of the pre-Massoretic MSS was very different from ours: few matres lectionis, no vowels, no litteræ finales, no separation of words, so that even in liturgical books there was uncertainty about those points (cf. Ps 105 (106)^{7} ἀναβαίνοντες=עֹלִים for עַל־יָם); perhaps abbreviation strokes for ה, ם, ת; see Lagarde, Mittheilungen, i. 21; Fel. Perles, Analekten (1895, pp. 4–35).

The second fact that comes to light from a comparison of 𝔊 and 𝔐 is, that there is a great difference between particular books or sets of books in the OT. This arises partly from the circumstance that all the books are not due to the same translators, but still more from the different character of the text lying before them. That Isaiah, for instance, found an interpreter not worthy of this book, was remarked long ago by Zwingli; the translator of Job, says Swete, p. 316, was perhaps more familiar with Greek pagan literature than with Semitic poetry; where the grandson of Jesus Sirach made his mistakes, we can judge better now than before. But more important is the fact that already the Hebrew texts used by the translators differed in varying degrees from the Massoretic text.

The differences between 𝔊 and 𝔐 can be tabulated as touching the sequence or the subject-matter. The differences of the subject-matter are, of course, of greater interest; they are of a threefold character—additions, omissions, variations.

On the differences of sequence see Sw. pp. 231–242. There are unimportant differences in Gn 31. 36. 47, Ex 20 (order of commandments); Nu 1. 6. 26, Jos 9. 19 (vol. ii. p. 782); great differences in Ex 35–40, 3 Regn. 4. 5. 6. 7. 10. 11, Pr 15. 20. 24, Jer 25–41. On Ex. see vol. i. p. 810 f.; on Kings, ii. 862 ff.; on Prov., Sw. p. 241; on Jer., vol. iii. p. 573 f.).* Very awkward is the different numbering of the Psalms.

On the difference in the subject-matter see Sw. 242 ff. If we were to have a complete edition of Origen's Hexapla with its critical signs, it would be convenient to see at a glance the omissions and additions.

The Law offers the smallest number of differences; but besides some famous additions, as Gn 4^{8} διέλθωμεν εἰς τὸ πεδίον, the second Καινάν (who has been erased in Cod. A 10^{22}) $10^{22.\ 24}$ $11^{12.\ 13}$ (1 Ch $1^{17\text{-}23}$ A)—his addition, in connexion with other variations, made the whole chronology of the world different, see vol. i. p. 397 ff.; Oikonomos, iii. 703–835—there are smaller additions of interest, as 8 sons of Japheth for 7 in Gn 10; 11 nations for 10 in Gn $15^{19.\ 20}$ (the addition of the Εὐαῖοι, either overlooked by Origen or wanting in his copy); 5 sons of Dedan for 3 in 25^{3}; 13 heinous offences for 12 in Dt 27 (on v.^{8} see Grinfield, Apology, pp. xii, 191).

On Joshua, which does not seem to have been translated together with the Pentateuch, see vol. ii. p. 781 ff., and Bennett (SBOT). On the word γαῖσος—or γαισός; this is the accentuation of B^{b}—Oikonomos, ii. 495 ff., 551, has 40 pages.

For Judges, e.g. $16^{13.\ 14}$, it is sufficient to refer to G. Moore.

The chapters 1 Regn. (Samuel) 17. 18 furnish a good example of how much difference of opinion still prevails. What Kuenen and Wellhausen call a harmonistic omission on the part of 𝔊, is considered by others as a later interpolation in 𝔐.

That 𝔊 preserved in 3 Regn. (1 K) $8^{12.\ 53}$ a quotation from the Book of Jashar (see vol. ii. p. 551), and, with it, what Kittel (Handkom.) styles the oldest more explicit confession of Jahweh in Israel, should alone be sufficient to prove its importance.

For the Book of Psalms even cursive MSS of 𝔊 enrich our knowledge about the liturgical use of the Psalms (see Sw. 250); in the alphabetic psalm 145 the missing letter נ is restored, perhaps only by conjecture. The addition to Ps 13^3 quoted in Ro 3^{13-18} is omitted by A and 95 cursives out of 105. Already Jerome declared the codices of 𝔊 which contain it, to be interpolated from Ro 3. If this be so, the agreement of ℵB, on which for the NT Westcott-Hort laid so much stress, is of no great value at least for the Psalms;[*] on the other hand, it is to the credit of these MSS if they have preserved a text similar to that in the hands of St. Paul.—On Ps 151 see Oikonomos, iii. 634 f.; on the ecclesiastical Canticles and the Prayer of Manasses among them, Nestle, Sst. iii. 6 ff.; and note that this piece has not been utilized for the Greek Concordances of Trommius and Hatch-Redpath (cf. ἀνεξιχνίαστος, ἀνυπόστατος, ἄστεκτος).

* Cf. for the following, Sw. ch. v. 'The Septuagint as a Version,' pp. 314–341.

* B. Pick in The (Americ.) Independent (1897, p. 1273) writes on Cornill's edition of Jeremiah (in SBOT): 'If I have counted right, no less than 1821 words have thus been eliminated from the text; and it is surprising that none of these relegated passages concern any of the quotations from Jer. in the NT.'

On Proverbs Lagarde's early book of 1863 is still useful.

Whether the shorter form of Job, in which, according to Jerome's reckoning, 'septingenti ferme aut octingenti versus desunt,' preserved a primitive form, or is, on the contrary, the effect of abbreviation, see vol. ii. p. 164; and correct there the statement from Origen, that sometimes 16 or 19 verses were missing, into 14 or 15 (Expository Times, x. 523; Sw. 255).

On Esther see vol. ii. p. 774; the Greek of the book reminds one of 2 Mac. (cf. τρισαλιτήριος); on Jeremiah see ii. 572; and cf. i. 252 as to the identity of language in Jer. and Baruch, which book in all MSS of 𝔊 is immediately connected with Jer. and Lamentations. On the heading of the latter see vol. iii. p. 22. On Daniel see i. 557. Dn 11^{30} is the only passage where the name of the Ῥωμαῖοι occurs in a translation from the Hebrew (for כִּתִּים as in 𝔗 $^{\text{Onk}}$ Nu 24^{22}). The affinity of the Greek of this book with that of 1 Esdras has been justly pointed out in i. 761.

In Jeremiah, Esther, and Daniel 𝔊 offers considerable passages not to be found in 𝔐; but in addition to these 𝔊 has preserved whole books, some of them of the highest historical or theological interest, which are not to be found in the Hebrew Canon, partly because they were originally written in Greek, partly for unknown reasons. The number of these books varies greatly in the still existing documents; of others only the titles have survived; a certain number remained known through the medium of the mediæval Bible as 'Apocrypha' even in the Protestant Churches. On these see art. APOCRYPHA, vol. i. p. 111 ff., and the special articles, as BARUCH, i. 251;[†] BEL AND THE DRAGON, 276; ESDRAS, FIRST AND SECOND, 757, 763;[‡] JEREMY, EPISTLE OF, vol. ii. p. 578; JUDITH, 822; MACCABEES, BOOKS OF (i.–v.), vol. iii. p. 187; MANASSES, PRAYER OF, 232; further, SIRACH, THREE CHILDREN (SONG OF THE), SUSANNA, WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

That the collection of these books, though it is transmitted to us almost exclusively through the Church, began to form itself in pre-Christian times, is clear from the contents (see vol. i. 117, iii. 35). A trace that 𝔊 differed from 𝔐 in its order and extent may be found in Josephus; for he uses not only the Greek Esdras and the Additions to Esther, but follows also the order of 𝔊 (not 𝔐) when he counts 5 books of Moses, 13 Prophetical and 4 Poetical books, placing, apparently, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, Esther (from the Hagiographa) after Kings (see Strack, 'Kanon des AT,' in PRE^{3} ix. 752).

On some lists of other Apocryphal books see Sw. p. 281; the Catalogue of the Sixty Books begins after the canonical and so-called 'apocryphal' books (the two Wisdoms, etc.): Καὶ ὅσα ἀπόκρυφα· Ἀδάμ, Ἐνώχ, Λάμεχ, Πατριάρχαι, Προσευχὴ Ἰωσήφ, Ἐλδάδ, Διαθήκη Μωυσέως, Ἀνάληψις Μ. etc. It is an interesting question, whether a trace of this apocryphal tradition is not to be found already in Sirach (49^{14-16}). For, after he has gone through the whole literature of the OT down to Zorobabel and Nehemias, he suddenly returns to Enoch, Joseph, Shem, Seth, and Adam.

In an appendix to the Cambridge Septuagint at least two of these books have found a place—the Psalms of Solomon (the apparatus being much enlarged in the 2nd ed. (iii. 765 ff.)) and the Greek fragments of the Book of Enoch (for the first time added in the 2nd ed. (iii. 789 ff.)). On the Psalms of Solomon cf. the German translation of Kittel in Kautzsch, Die Pseudepigraphen, 127–148; on Enoch, the new Berlin edition, Das Buch Henoch, herausgegeben von Dr. Joh. Flemming und Dr. L. Radermacher, 1901. Much to be welcomed would be a collection of the OT apocrypha as sketched by Sw. p. 285, including amongst other remains the Rest of the Words of Baruch, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Testament of Abraham, parts of the Oracula Sibyllina, the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs, the Latin Ascension of Isaiah (with the new Greek Fragments published by Grenfell-Hunt in The Amherst Papyri, part i. 1900; see on it F. C. Burkitt, The Classical Review, xiv. 457–459); perhaps also the Latin versions of 4 Esdras, Assumption of Moses, Book of Jubilees.

All these additions and omissions cover but the smaller part of the differences between 𝔐 and 𝔊; far more numerous are the variations in the proper sense of the word, the passages where 𝔊 offers a reading different from 𝔐. On this point cf. Sw. part ii. ch. v. 'The Septuagint as a Version,' and part iii. ch. iv. 'The Greek Versions as aids to Biblical Study.' A thorough, accurate, and cautious comparison between 𝔐 and 𝔊 will exhibit these variations. The comparison must be cautious, else there is the risk of stating variations where there are none, and it must be accurate and thorough, else real variations might be overlooked. In the first place, care must be taken to eliminate as much as possible from 𝔊 all intra-Greek corruptions, i.e. clerical errors, that sprang up in the course of transmission of the Greek text, and it is a mistake of many Commentaries to rest content to take the text of the small Cambridge Septuagint as the standard, as former scholars used to acquiesce in that of the Sixtina. Take as example the latest German Commentary on Genesis, that of Gunkel (Göttingen, 1901), and the very first note touching the textual criticism of this book. It concerns the use of the Divine names in ch. 2, and runs: 'יהוה אלהים is found in Genesis in Hebrew only in chs. 2. 3 (LXX, differing from the Hebrew, has in $2^{5.\,7.\,9.\,10.\,21}$ ὁ θεός).' Now, this is true of the Codex Alexandrinus: if Gunkel had used the editio Sixtina, he would have had to add vv.$^{8.\,22}$; and if we are still more circumspect, as commentators ought to be, and resort to Philo, Field's Hexapla, the collations of [*] Swete's statement, that Origen marked the passage with an obelus, lacks reliable testimony; the words of Jerome are curious: 'in hebraico non haberi nec esse in septuaginta interpretibus, sed in editione vulgata, quæ græce κοινη dicitur et in toto orbe diversa est.' The words in italics are omitted in Field's quotation from ed. Vall. iv. 668.

[†] The puzzling fact that on the margin of the Syro-Hexaplaric text of Baruch there are 3 notes stating that certain words in 1^{17} 2^3 are not found in the Hebrew, which has been quoted for a Hebrew origin of this part of the book (i. 252; Sw. 275, n. 3, from Bevan in Encyc. Bibl. i. 494), is in contradiction to the remark at the head of the book, that the whole was obelized by Origen, and finds a very simple solution. For these notes do not refer to the text of Baruch, but of the Hebrew OT quoted by Baruch 2^3 from Dt 28^{53}. Origen called attention to the fact that the generalizing 'every man' ἄνθρωπον in Bar 2^3 has no אִישׁ אִישׁ to correspond in Dt 28^{53}. Thus these notes are a token of the great care which Origen bestowed on his Hexapla.

[‡] On the statement of Sw. p. 265, and Thackeray (DB, vol. i. p. 758), that Cod. A entitles both books ἱερεύς, cf. Nestle, Marginalien (1893), p. 28 f., where it is shown that this is merely due to the knife of the English bookbinder, who cut away in both cases the first line of the title Εζρας (or Εσζρας) α', β'.

Holmes, the versions as witnesses for 𝔊, we must add further v.^{4}; i.e. not 5 times, but 8 times, 𝔊 omits יהוה in this chapter, and has it only twice (vv.$^{15.\ 16}$).* The second care must be to observe the practice of these translators; cf. Sw. p. 325: 'The Alexandrian translators, while loyal to their original, sometimes even to a fault, manifest nothing like the slavish adherence to the letter with which Aquila has been charged. They often amplify and occasionally omit; they render the same Hebrew words by more than one Greek equivalent, even in the same context; they introduce metaphors or grammatical constructions which have no place in the Hebrew text, and probably at no time had a place there, or they abandon figures of speech where they exist in the original.' There is no mention here of the fact especially urged by Frankel, that the translators followed some sort of exegetical tradition (L. Frankel, Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta, 1841; Ueber den Einfluss der palästinischen Exegese auf die alexandrinische Hermeneutik, 1851). We must further bear in mind that the translators were accustomed to the Aramaic speech rather than to the Hebrew. To the examples quoted by Sw. p. 319, add, for instance, Ps 59 (60)^{8} רחץ = ἐλπίς, 140 (141)^{5} רְעוֹתֵיהֶם = εὐδοκίαις αὐτῶν. Already Jerome remarked on this word in Ec 1^{14} רעות = προαίρεσις: 'non hebraicum sermonem expresserunt, sed syrum.' On meanings attached to Hebrew roots known to us only from Arabic see Sw. p. 498, Ps 83 (84)^{7} δώσει, Dn 7^{22} (LXX) ἐδόθη = √עטה.

A glance into modern commentaries or the 'Critical Notes' after the Hebrew text in SBOT will show the importance of 𝔊 in this direction. No conscientious commentator on the Hebrew OT can dispense with constant reference to 𝔊. We quote some examples from the first chapter of some books in SBOT—

In Gn 1 Ball replaces מָקוֹם by מִקְוֶה = συναγωγήν; but he, too, has overlooked the interesting variant in v.^{16} (like all commentaries [to our knowledge, Dillmann, Spurrell, Holzinger, Gunkel], except T. G. Meintel, Critische Polyglotten-Conferenzen über das erste Buch Mose, 1796; a work of praiseworthy industry), 𝔐 giving the sing. מֶמְשֶׁלֶת, 𝔊 the pl. ἀρχάς, i.e. מַמְשְׁלֹת, the latter being confirmed by Ps 135 (136)^{8}, where 𝔐 has the plural, 𝔊 ἐξουσίαν the singular. The same difference occurs 2^{2} (𝔊 'his works'); and that this is not unintentional, is shown by the Targum Jonathan, which understands the passage of those 10 wondrous works which God is said by rabbinical wit to have created.

In Lv 1 Driver receives readings of 𝔊 into the text in vv.$^{2.\ 7.\ 8.\ 16}$; in Nu 1 Paterson in v.^{14} רעואל for דעואל, 𝔐. For Jos 1 it is sufficient to quote Bennett's remark on v.^{2}: 'In this and other cases glosses, etc., not found in 𝔊 are probably glosses later than the MS from which 𝔊 was translated, and therefore better treated as variations of the text.'

A remark on Judges by Moore has already been quoted; in 1^{16} he reads העמלקי for העם; one witness of 𝔊 and the Coptic offering the doublet μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ Ἀμαλήκ. The original reading, the simple Amalec, has been found since, for the first time, in the Latin Lugdunensis, published by U. Robert.

On Samuel, after what has been done by Thenius, Wellhausen, Driver, Klostermann, Budde, H. P. Smith, any word is superfluous; but the question may be asked, whether one would have found, e.g., in 1 S 1^{24} the true reading בְּפַר מְשֻׁלָּשׁ for בְּפָרִים שְׁלֹשָׁה by mere conjecture without the help of the versions (ἐν μόσχῳ τριετίζοντι). And if we had hit on it in this way, we should not have had the same confidence in its truth as we have now, when it is attested by the oldest witness attainable.

As far as we have seen, in every part of the SBOT that has appeared as yet, one or more readings from 𝔊 have been received into the text in the first chapter by such different scholars as Cornill, Toy, Wellhausen, Siegfried, Kamphausen, Guthe, Kittel. But how much remains to be done may be illustrated by two examples from 1 Ch 1. On v.^{5} Kittel remarks: '𝔊 + Ελισα; it has crept in by error from v.^{7} after יון (cf. 𝔊^{L}),' overlooking the fact that 𝔊 has 'Elisa' among the sons of Japheth already in Gn 10^{2}. Again, in v.^{32} Kittel omits to mention the additional names Raguel and Nahdeel, offered by many witnesses, just as in Genesis. If carefully compared with 𝔐, 𝔊 turns out to be the most valuable aid for the explanation of the Hebrew Bible.

But 𝔊 is not less indispensable to the study of the NT: see on this point Sw. pp. 450–457; Pearson's judgment (at the head of this article); Thayer's art. LANGUAGE OF THE NT, vol. iii. p. 40. To quote only one example: ἀγαπητός and μονογενής both correspond in 𝔊 to Heb. יָחִיד; the one occurs in the Synoptic Gospels, the other in John.

Nor can the student of Ecclesiastical Literature succeed without familiarity with 𝔊 (see Sw. pt. iii. ch. v. 'Influence of the LXX on Christian Literature,' p. 461 ff.). The doctrinal as well as the devotional writings are full of its influence. Take a book like Brightman's Liturgies, Eastern and Western, where the quotations are printed in black type, or an edition like that of the Apostolic Constitutions by Lagarde, which gives at the foot of the text the references to the biblical passages; the index of the latter shows more quotations from the OT than from the NT.

Even many works of Christian art cannot be understood without recourse to 𝔊. Cf. D. Kaufmann, 'Errors in the Septuagint and the Vulgate from which Illustrations and Sculptures derived their origin' (JQR xi. 163–166). If we speak of the firmament, we do so because 𝔊 used στερέωμα, considering the heavens as frozen water.

One side of the importance of 𝔊, which Pearson was not yet able to appreciate, lies in the value it has for Semitic philology, apart from the exegesis of the OT. The system of Hebrew vocalization is an invention of about the 7th cent. A.D.; how the words were pronounced in the time of Christ, or Isaiah, or king Mesha,—𝔊 calls him Μωσα, see vol. iii. p. 349,—or David, or Moses, we do not know. Our oldest witness is again the transliteration of proper names and other words in 𝔊. Whether nouns of the form מֶלֶךְ melek were still heard as monosyllables (malk), can be ascertained by the help of 𝔊. To have pointed out this importance of 𝔊 is one of the merits of Lagarde (Uebersicht, etc.); the Supplement to the Concordance of Hatch-Redpath (Fasc. i., containing a Concordance to the Proper Names occurring in the Septuagint, 1900) helps much to facilitate studies in this direction. These transliterations have, vice versâ, their bearing on the question of Greek pronunciation; see some remarks in this direction by Kittel (SBOT, 'Chronicles,' p. 52 f.) and Macke, Erasmus oder Reuchlin (Siegburg, Progr. 1900).

On the place which 𝔊 occupies in the history of the Greek Language, philologists now judge much more favourably than twenty years ago; cf. ch. iv. in Sw. 289–314, 'the Greek of the Septuagint,' and add to the literature quoted there, p. 314, a reference to Iv. Korsunskie, Perevod LXX (Moskoa, 1878, 704 pp.), in Russian: The version of the Septuagint and its importance in the history of Greek Language and Literature; further, Thayer's art. LANGUAGE OF THE NT, vol. iii. p. 36 ff.; and Paul Kretschmer, 'Die Entstehung der Koine' (Sitzungsb. d. Wiener Ak., phil. hist. Kl., vol. 143, and separately, 1900); Albert Thumb, Die griechische Sprache im Zeitalter des Hellenismus: Beiträge zur Geschichte und Beurtheilung der Κοινή, Strassburg, 1901 (cf. Ed. Schwyzer in Neue Jahrb. 1901, p. 233 ff.); Oikonomos, ii. 914 ff.; Grinfield, 146; H. A. A. Kennedy, 'Recent Research in the Language of the NT' (Expos. Times, xii. 341, 455, 557); J. H. Moulton (ib. p. 362 in the notice of G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies; Authorized Tr. by Alexander Grieve; Edinburgh, Clark, 1901 *).

* Even in v.^{15} it is omitted by a few witnesses (Cod. 37, Ambrosius), but Augustine testifies to it, saying expressly: 'Nullo modo vacare arbitror . . . quod ab ipso divini libri huius exordio . . . usque ad hunc locum, nusquam positum est Dominus Deus, sed tantummodo Deus: nunc vero ubi ad id ventum est . . . ita Scriptura locuta est: Et sumpsit Dominus Deus.'

* Interesting are the philological remarks of Origen (new ed.), ii. 367, τίς γάρ ποτε Ἑλλήνων ἐχρήσατο τῇ ἐνωτίζου προσηγορίᾳ . .

If the use and importance of 𝔊 are such even in the unsatisfactory condition in which it lies at present before us, how much more will these be acknowledged when we have a better edition of it. In such an edition, also, the accessory matter will demand due attention, the capitulation, lections, etc. (see Sw. pp. 342–366, 'Text-divisions: Stichi, Chapters, Lections, Catenæ').

(a) In careful MSS of the classics (as in those of Demosthenes, Herodotus) the lines have been counted by hundreds or by fifties, and their total stated at the end, because the copyists were paid according to their number, the normal line or στίχος being the Homeric hexameter of 16 syllables or 37 to 38 letters on an average.* This has been introduced into Bible MSS. One of the copyists of B, for instance, preserved on the margins the numbers from the MS which he copied; so did Paul of Tella from the copy which he translated (616) into Syriac. Afterwards the numbers were gathered into stichometrical lists; the most important of those lists are that in the Codex Claromontanus, the one first published by Mommsen, and that of Nicephorus; see Sanday, Studia Biblica, iii. 266; Sw. 346; Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate, 1893, pp. 316–327, 363; C. H. Turner in JThSt, ii. (Jan. 1901) 236. For books like Sirach and Job (with asterisks, 2200; without, 1600 stichi) these lists are especially valuable.

(b) Jerome introduced into his Latin Bible the custom of writing the text according to sense-lines, κῶλα or κόμματα, 'quod in Demosthene et Tullio solet fieri'; the same was done for the Greek Dodekapropheton by Hesychius of Jerusalem, who at the same time divided the text into chapters.

(c) Such a capitulation is found already in some of our oldest MSS, as ABS; for several books B gives even a double capitulation, dividing, for instance, Proverbs into 61 and 16, Eccles. into 25 and 7, Canticles into 40 and 5 chapters. Likewise the Syriac Hexapla (apparently from the copy from which it was taken) has in Joshua 52 and 11, Judges 65 and 7, 3 Regn. 105 and 18 chapters. In the same version and several Greek MSS summaries, τίτλοι or κεφάλαια, are added, and lists of them prefixed to the books (Sw. p. 354). The 'Synopsis' ascribed to Chrysostom is, to a large extent, nothing but a collection of such κεφάλαια. The 88 chapters into which Hesychius divided Isaiah have been published lately by M. Faulhaber (Hesychii Hierosolymitani Interpretatio Isaiæ prophetæ, Friburgi, 1900). These capitulations may become important hints for the classification of MSS. In Canticles the summaries assume the character of stage directions; see Er. Klostermann, 'Eine alte Rollenverteilung zum Hohenliede' (ZATW xix. (1899) 158–162, from Cod. V).

(d) The beginning and the end of the Lessons, which were read in Church already in the times of Origen and still earlier, were marked with ἀρχή and τέλος, the occasion sometimes being added on which the lesson was read (Sw. p. 356). An early specimen was the copy from which Paul of Tella made his version.

On the division of the Psalter into 20 καθίσματα see Sw. p. 359, or any printed Greek Church-Psalter.

Interesting is the different numbering of the Commandments of the Decalogue in AB (see Sw. p. 365), and the division of the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20–23) into 77 sections in the Codex Zittaviensis (H. A. Redpath in Expos. Times, viii. 383).

All these particulars must be attended to in a future edition, somewhat in the same way as in the edition of Jerome's Latin NT published by Wordsworth-White; but the chief difficulty is about the constitution of the text. For some books, as Judges, Esther, Tobit, it will be indispensable to give parallel texts. In the closing chapter of his Introduction Swete has sketched some of the lines on which a future edition must be prepared. But before this great work can be finished, and for the benefit of all who cannot afford to procure it, it seems desirable to put together, either on the outer margins of the minor edition or in an Appendix, those emendations of the errors of B which are certain or all but certain. Still better would be a Commentary on 𝔊, which is as urgently needed as a Grammar and a Lexicon.†

APPENDIX: THE LATER GR. VERSIONS.—The question whether 𝔊 was used also in Palestine in the synagogues, has been answered affirmatively and negatively. At all events after 𝔊 had passed into the hands of the Church, and an official Heb. text, different from the old one, had received the approbation of the Rabbis, attempts were made among the Jews at new translations. From Justin we learn that the Jews declared 𝔊 to be wrong in some details (μὴ εἶναι ἔν τισιν ἀληθῆ), and that they tried new translations (αὐτοὶ ἐξηγεῖσθαι πειρῶνται). Irenæus mentions two who dared such a thing in his time (ὡς ἔνιοί φασιν τῶν μεθερμηνεύειν τολμώντων τὰς γραφάς)—Theodotion of Ephesus and Aquila of Pontus, both Jewish proselytes. Origen was so zealous as to procure both these translations and, in addition, that of Symmachus and parts of three more. With those materials he composed his Hexapla (see above). And all that we knew till quite recently of these translations—apart from a few Talmudic translations from Aquila—we owed to Origen. It was only in 1897 that the first fragments of a separate copy of Aquila were found among the palimpsests of the Taylor-Schechter collection; but even those may go back to the library of Origen. For brevity's sake we must refer to Sw. pp. 29–58.

(1) The version of Aquila, according to one tradition πενθερίδης or πενθερός of the emperor Hadrian, superintendent of the building of Ælia Capitolina, won for Christianity, but finally pupil of R. ʿAḳiba, is the most literal imaginable. By the emperor Justinian it was ordered that no other was to be used in the Jewish synagogues. It is therefore possible that the copy of which fragments were found among the Hebrew-Greek palimpsests from Cairo, and which is ascribed to the 6th cent., may have been a synagogue copy. But as it has been used for Jewish purposes apparently by the same time and hand which turned the fragments of Origen's Hexapla to the same use, both Greek MSS may have come from the same quarter; and of the Hexapla it is the more probable that it came from Christian hands, because fragments of Greek MSS of the NT were found along with them. See, besides the publication of Burkitt, Taylor's new book mentioned above. On plates iii–viii it contains portions of Ps 90–92. 96–98. 102. 103. Another small but interesting fragment of Aquila (mentioned by Sw. p. 170, postscript) has been published by Grenfell-Hunt in The Amherst Papyri, part i. (Lond. 1900, pp. 30, 31). On the top of a letter from Rome, written probably between 250 and 285 A.D., an uncial hand of the late 3rd or, more probably, early 4th cent. has written part of the first verse of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and a more cursive hand, apparently about the time of Constantine, the first 5 verses of Genesis in 𝔊, followed by the version of Aquila. These two biblical fragments may therefore claim 'to be amongst the earliest known, and the Genesis fragment is the oldest authority for the first 5 verses.' In the Aquila fragment the beginning of v.^{4} and the end of v.^{5} are here recorded for the first time.

The Hebrew text which was translated by Aquila agrees very closely with 𝔐; but it is interesting to observe that, of his few variations, some at least have the support of still existing Hebrew MSS. The tetragrammaton יהוה is written in the old Hebrew letters. The version seems to have covered the whole of the Hebrew canon.

ἀντὶ τοῦ εἰς τὰ ὦτα δέξαι; iii. 159, ἐοίκασιν οἱ ἀπὸ Ἑβραϊσμοῦ ἑρμηνεύσαντες μὴ εὑρόντες τὴν λέξιν κειμένην παρ' Ἕλλησιν ἀναπεπλακέναι ὡς ἐπ' ἄλλων πολλῶν καὶ ταύτην καὶ πεποιηκέναι τὴν ἐτροποφόρησεν. But this very word is found in Cicero, ad Attic. xiii. 29.

* By a happy fortune the lines in the Greek NT of the Würtemberg Bible Society at Stuttgart agree as closely as possible with the length of the ancient στίχοι; see Nestle, Introduction, p. 49.

† Take some examples at haphazard. In 3 Regn. 18^{10} all texts (MSS, etc.) give καὶ ἐνέπρησεν τὴν βασιλείαν ('and he burnt the kingdom'); 𝔐 has והשׂביע ('he took an oath of the kingdom'). This is correct; the translator mistook it for והשביע ('and he satisfied,' ἐνέπλησε). Again, we have in 19^{11} ἐν πνεύματι κυρίου for οὐκ ἐν πν. κύριος, the latter (κύριος) being read in A. A commentary would have further the task of calling attention to the interpunction; cf. Ps 44 (45)^7, where it is a question whether there must be a comma before and after ὁ θεός, or in v.^{8} after ἔχρισέν σε, or in Is 61^1 after ἔχρισέν με and ἀπέσταλκέν με. In Is 7^{16} ἀπειθεῖ is in the Concordance of Hatch-Redpath referred to ἀπειθής, while it is a verb, etc.

Strange is the statement of Origen on Lamentations (new edition, iii. 256): Ἔκδοσις δὲ Ἀκύλα καὶ Θεοδοτίωνος ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις οὐ φέρεται, μόνου δὲ Συμμάχου καὶ τῶν Ἑβδομήκοντα, especially when we compare the same author's remark on 4^{20} (p. 276): ὁ δὲ Ἀκύλας ἔφη πνεῦμα μυκτήρων ἡμῶν, Σύμμαχος δὲ πνοὴ μ. ἡ. (see Field, ii, 743 ff.).

(2) Theodotion's work—on his date see Sw. p. 42 f., and Th. Zahn, PRE^{3} ix. 403 (on Irenæus)—was rather a revision of 𝔊 than an independent version, the revision being made on the whole upon the basis of 𝔐. For a specimen of it see Jer 40^{14-26} and the Bk. of Daniel, where it replaced the original 𝔊; see S. R. Driver, The Book of Daniel, in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1900, pp. xviii, xcviii–c. The statement that his version seems to have included Baruch (Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 44; Sw. p. 44, etc.) is to be corrected after the explanation given above, p. 450, note †. Cf. on Theodotion (whose name has the same meaning as that of the Targumist Jonathan), Rahlfs in GGN, 1898, p. 109.

(3) The works of Symmachus, including a Commentary on St. Matthew,* Origen got from a Christian woman, Juliana,† who had received them from the author himself. If Aquila is the most important of the three because of his literalness, Symm. is in many respects the most interesting for his attempt to produce good Greek and for many of his interpretations; cf. Gn 1^{27} ἔκτισεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐν εἰκόνι διαφόρῳ· ὄρθιον [ὁ θεὸς] ἔκτισεν αὐτόν with 1 S 28^{14} (Nestle, Marginalien, p. 3).

(4) Besides these versions of the whole of the OT, Origen had at his disposal for single books two or three other versions, which from their place in the Hexapla got the designations Quinta (ε′ πέμπτη), Sexta (ς′ ἕκτη), Septima (ζ′ ἑβδόμη). As to whence and when he obtained them, tradition varies (see Sw. p. 53 ff.): one at Nicopolis near Actium, the other at Jericho; one under Caracalla, the other under Alexander Severus. One at least is reported to have been found ἐν πίθοις; from this and from the expression of Eusebius, οὐκ οἶδ' ὅθεν ἔκ τινων μυχῶν τὸν πάλαι λανθανούσας χρόνον εἰς φῶς ἀνιχνεύσας, it has been concluded that they were, perhaps, hidden during a time of persecution, and that the one found at Nicopolis may have been a relic of the early Christianity of Epirus (see Sw. p. 55, quoting from Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 432). But πίθοι—see Sw. p. 53, n. 2—are mentioned elsewhere, as used for preserving books instead of cistæ or capsæ. Jerome attributes both to Jewish translators; but they seem rather to be due to Christians. The author of the Quinta is characterized by Field as omnium elegantissimus. Which of the books of the OT were preserved in them is not quite clear; in the Quinta at all events 4 Regn., Job, Psalms, Canticles, Minor Prophets; in the Sexta also Job, Psalms, Canticles, Hab 3.

A kind of version sometimes seems to be quoted as ὁ Σύρος (see SYRIAC VERSIONS) and ὁ Ἑβραῖος; but under the latter designation are to be understood Greek quotations from the Hebrew, due to such authors as were acquainted with that language.

The so-called Græcus Venetus, a version of part of the OT, preserved in a single MS of the 14th or 15th cent. at Venice, is interesting as the work of a mediæval Jew, perhaps a certain Elisseus at the court of Murad I. at Adrianople in the 2nd half of the 14th cent.: it attempts to give the Hebrew in Attic Greek and the Aramaic parts of Daniel in the Doric dialect, and renders יהוה by ὀντωτής, οὐσιωτής, ὀντουργός. See the edition of O. v. Gebhardt (Leipzig, 1875, with a Preface by Franz Delitzsch; Sw. p. 56).

The Greek column of the Hebrew-Chaldee-Spanish-Greek Polyglot of the Pentateuch, printed at Constantinople in Hebrew characters (1547), has been transliterated and printed separately (1897) by D. C. Hesseling, and described by Lazare Belléli (Paris, 1897, La version néogrecque du Pentateuche Polyglotte). It is of interest for the student of modern Greek, and so are the translations of the whole Bible or of parts of it into modern Greek; but they do not fall within the scope of the present article. Of the OT as a whole the Catalogue of the British Museum mentions but one edition in modern Greek (London, 1840, by H. D. Leeves, assisted by N. Bambas).

LITERATURE.—At the end of the article on the Greek Bible Versions (PRE^{3} iii. 20 = Urt. 80) the present writer has given a list of about 280–300 books and articles treating of these versions from 1601 up to 1897 in chronological order. Swete gives in his Introduction, at the end of most chapters, literary references, amounting to about 600 in number. The first list (p. 27) embraces a mere fraction of the vast literature selected for the purpose of representing the progress of knowledge since the middle of the 17th cent. It begins with the Critica sacra of S. Cappellus, 1651; Pearson's Præfatio and Ussher's Syntagma, 1655; the Prolegomena of Brian Walton, 1657. It is impossible to repeat these lists here. A few remarks must suffice. The most copious work on 𝔊 that appeared in the 19th cent. is that of Constantine Oikonomos περὶ τῶν ο′ ἑρμηνευτῶν, 4 vols., Athens, 1844, 1845, 1846, 1849, more than 3700 pages. Though it starts from wrong premises (canonical and inspired character of 𝔊), it contains much useful information; in vol. iii. 130 pages are devoted to the difference of chronology between 𝔐 and 𝔊, in the last vol. 170 pages to the quotations of the NT, 325 paragraphs to a list of the writers who used or praised 𝔊. The author may be compared to Grinfield, whose Apology for the Septuagint (Lond. 1850) is equally wrong in its principles, but still useful. Of Jewish books L. Frankel's Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta (Leipzig, 1841) and Ueber den Einfluss der palästinischen Exegese auf die alexandrinische Hermeneutik (1851), are not superseded. A standard work for all times remains, H. Hody, de bibliorum textibus originalibus, Oxf. 1705. On the views of the ancient Church, especially Jerome and Augustine, it is useful to compare P. Wendland, 'Zur ältesten Geschichte der Bibel in der Kirche' (ZNTW [1900] 267 ff.). On Augustine see also Joh. Haussleiter, Der Aufbau der altchristlichen Litteratur, Eine kritische Untersuchung nebst Studien zu Cyprian, Victorinus und Augustin (Berlin, 1898 = GGA, 1898, v. 337–379). Of all the scholars of the 19th cent. none has done more in this field than Paul de Lagarde (1827–1891). Of his publications which bear directly or indirectly on 𝔊, note: Libri apocryphi syriace 1861, Constitutiones Apostolicæ 1862, Anmerkungen zur griechischen Uebersetzung der Proverbien 1863, Clementina 1865 (Preface), Pentateuch koptisch 1867, Materialien zum Pentateuch 1867 (here the notice on the original copy of 𝔐), Genesis græce and Hieronymi quæstiones in Gen. 1868, Onomastica sacra 1870, ^{2}1887, Psalterium Hieronymi 1874, Psalterium memphiticum 1875, Symmicta i. and ii., Semitica ii. 1879, Orientalia ii., Veteris testamenti ab Origene recensiti fragmenta 1880, Ankündigung einer neuen Ausgabe der griechischen Übersetzung 1882, Librorum veteris testamenti canonicorum pars prior græce 1883 (cf. GGA, 1883, 1249–52), Ægyptiaca 1883, Mittheilungen i.–iv. 1884, 1887, 1889, 1891, Probe einer neuen Ausgabe der lat. Uebersetzungen des AT 1885, Catenæ ægypt. 1886, Specimen novæ edit. psalterii græci 1887, SeptuagintaStudien i.–iii., 1891, Bibliothecæ syriacæ quæ ad philologiam sacram pertinent 1892, Psalterii græci quinquagena prima 1892. Among the MSS he left there is a complete collection of the biblical quotations of Augustine (13,176 from OT and 29,540 from NT, now in the University Library of Göttingen), MS Lagarde 34, and others; see Urt. p. 77. No other scholar can be mentioned beside him.

Among articles in Encyclopedias add: Hoberg, 'Septuaginta' in Wetzer-Welte's Encyklopaedie^{2} xi. (1899) 147–159.

To Sw. p. 56 (Lit. on Hexapla) add the first attempt to collect their fragments made by J. Driesschus (= Drusius) in psalmos Davidis veterum interpretum fragmenta, Antw. 1581; the enlarged edition of the collection of Nobilius in the Latin translation of the editio Sixtina (Rome, 1588, reprinted by P. Morinus, 1624, see above, p. 440^a); Bahrdt's abridgment of Montfaucon's Hexapla (Lips. 1769, 2 vols.).

To Sw. p. 108 (Coptic version) add: J. Goettsberger, 'Die syro-koptischen Bibelcitate aus den Scholien des Barhebräus' (ZATW xxi. [1901] 128–140).

EB. NESTLE.

SEPULCHRE (קֶבֶר 'grave,' קְבוּרָה 'burying-place' [Mishn. כּוּךְ, כּוּכִים 'burial lairs or niches']; Gr. μνῆμα, μνημεῖον 'tomb,' 'monument,' τάφος 'sepulchre') is represented in Scripture, and particularly in OT, not only by these Hebrew and Greek equivalents, but also by words and phrases which are synonymous. It is the pit (בּוֹר Is 38^{18}), the stones of the pit (אַבְנֵי בוֹר Is 14^{19}), a man's house (בַּיִת Is 14^{18}), his everlasting house (בֵּית עֹלָם Ec 12^5), the house of assemblage for all living (בֵּית מוֹעֵד לְכָל חַיִּים Job 30^{23}), and field of burial (שְׂדֵה הַקְּבוּרָה 2 Ch 26^{23}).

Of the terms used for the grave by the later Judaism none is more significant than the house of the living (בֵּית הַחַיִּים), and this is the euphemism by which the burying-place of the dead is now generally designated by modern Jews. 'We are the dead, they are the living,'† was the remark actually made to the present writer by an aged Rabbi in Smyrna, whose office it was to attend at the burial of his Jewish kinsmen, and see them laid to their last rest. The ancient Egyptians thought of the departed as the living, and called the coffin the chest of the living. The Egyptian conception of the grave as the everlasting house was not, however, inconsistent with a strongly cherished hope of resurrection. But there was no expectation among the Jews of a return to earthly life in the original body, such as prevailed among the Egyptians and led among them to the embalming and preservation of the dead. The later literature of Judaism speaks rather of a general resurrection, when the souls of the departed shall enter into new bodies and live on in them.

The terms employed to describe the grave are used often to describe the Underworld where the dead live on. The gathering-place of the departed in the world beyond is, as above, the pit (Is 38^{18}), the nether parts of the earth (Is 44^{23}), Sheol and Abaddon (Job 26^6, Pr 15^{11}), the pit of destruction (Ps 55^{23}), the place of silence (Ps 94^{17} 115^{17}), the land of darkness and of the shadow of death (Job 10^{21}). 'Hence,' says Dr. Salmond,*

> 'the distinction is occasionally sunk in the OT, and it became confused in the later usage of the Targums. But that Sheol denotes a definite realm of the dead, and is not identical with the grave, appears from the usage of the term, and is recognized by the ancient Versions. It is to Sheol that Jacob speaks of going to join the son whose death he mourns, but of whose burial he knows nothing. It is Sheol that swallows up Korah and his company alive. That a common habitation of the dead like the Suâlu of the Babylonians, the Hades of the Greeks, the Orcus of the Romans, is meant, is indicated also by the fact that the expressions to be gathered to one's people or to one's fathers, to go to one's fathers, to sleep with one's fathers, are used in cases like those of Abraham, Jacob, Aaron, Moses, David, and others, where the temporary or permanent resting-places were far removed from the ancestral graves.'

A touching illustration of the father looking forward to a meeting in another world with a departed child is David's 'I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me' (2 S 12^{23}). But while Sheol is thus 'the house of assemblage for all living,' it was in the sepulchre of his fathers, in the ancestral burying-place and with his departed kindred, that the ancient Israelite desired to be buried. And there can be no doubt that the wish to be reunited with parents and children in Sheol had to do with the desire to be buried in the family sepulchre. The object of burial, not merely in a grave but in the family grave, was to introduce the departed into the society of his kinsfolk and ancestors. In the earliest times this society was supposed to exist either in the family grave or in its immediate neighbourhood.† 'Bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt,' said the dying Jacob to Joseph, 'but I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt and bury me in their burying-place' (Gn $49^{29.30}$, cf. Joseph's burial, Jos 24^{32}). And nothing could be more pathetic in this reference than the request of Barzillai, who declined king David's invitation to live with him at court, and said, 'Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, by the grave of my father and my mother' (2 S 19^{37} RV). It was a duty of piety to see the bones of the dead placed in the family sepulchre, as David did for the bones of Saul and his sons (2 S 21^{12-14}); and it was the proper punishment of disobedience to the command of Jehovah that a man's carcass should not come into the sepulchre of his fathers (1 K 13^{22}). To be deprived of burial was the last indignity and the greatest of calamities; the spirits of the unburied dead were believed to wander restlessly abroad, or to lie in recesses of the pit, if they were admitted into Sheol at all (Ezk $32^{23ff.}$, Is 14^{15}). For this reason the possibility of death at sea was regarded with horror. So, too, no vengeance upon enemies could be more cruel than to throw their bodies to the dogs, or to allow them to rot upon the battlefield, or to be left as a prey to the fowls of heaven and the beasts of the field (Ezk 39^4, 2 K 9^{36}). Of Jason, who 'slaughtered his own citizens without mercy,' it is said (2 Mac 5^{10}), 'he that had cast out a multitude unburied had none to mourn for him, nor had he any funeral at all, or place in the sepulchre of his fathers.' But the humane prescription of the law of Moses was that the criminal hanged upon the gallows should be buried, and buried at all hazards, on the day of execution (Dt 21^{23}); and in the case of the enemies of Israel captured and hung we find the law precisely carried out (Jos 8^{29} 10^{26}). The treatment of the body of Jesus (Jn 19^{31}), and the burial of John the Baptist (Mt 14^{12}), and of Stephen (Ac 8^{2}), by their friends are later illustrations. Even suicides received the ordinary rites of burial, as is seen in the case of Ahithophel (2 S 17^{23}). It was the duty of any one who found a corpse in the open field to give it burial (To 1^{18} 2^{8}, cf. 1 S 21^{10}); and it is creditable to Jewish feeling that the bodies of the Gentile dead were allowed to rest in the Jewish burying-place side by side with Jewish remains.[*]

* Niese begins with the remark, that the origin of the common text in Holmes-Parsons, Tischendorf, etc., was apparently accidental and arbitrary ('offenbar ziemlich zufällig und willkürlich entstanden'); Kautzsch, Apokryphen, p. 32, gives 'aus cod. V. und aus nicht näher bezeichneten Minuskelcodices'; Fritzsche, Libri apocryphi, p. xix, 'nescio unde desumptus.' Now take the edition of 1588, where Nobilius remarks on 1 Mac 4^{20} 'Addendum est ex codice quem potissimum in his libris sequuti sumus et multis aliis οἱ περὶ Ἰούδαν'; on 8^4 'delendum est ex auctoritate codicum quos sequuti sumus et vulgatæ illud ἕνος, quod in multis antecedit et in nostram editionem per typographi incuriam irrepsit.' These and similar passages confirm the present writer's suggestion (see Sw. p. 181, n. 2), that, besides the Aldine edition, Cod. Ho 19 has been used for the Sixtine edition. To these there must perhaps be added 64 (93).

† It is natural to connect such an expression with the argument which Jesus summed up in the memorable words, 'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living' (Mk 12^{27}.) Cf. also the striking words 4 Mac 16^{25} 'Those who die on behalf of God live unto God, as do Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.'

Into the family grave only members of the family were admitted. In the Nabatæan sepulchral inscriptions[†] a curse is pronounced upon the man who defiles or sells a grave, or who buries in it any who are not members of the family. And the famous inscription on the tomb of Eshmunazar, king of Sidon, pronounces doom upon any who may disturb his repose, or open or carry off his coffin for the sake of treasure,—may they have no rest among the departed, may they be buried in no grave, and may they have no prosperity in their city![‡] The family grave was holy ground and a permanent possession. The family might lose their estate, but never the ancestral tomb; for in selling land no Jew could dispose of the burying-place, to the use of which his descendants were entitled to all time.[§]

When the Jewish people came to be dispersed among the nations it was an object of solicitude and ambition to be buried in the sacred soil of Canaan. 'Whoever,' says the Talmud, 'is buried in Palestine is as if he were buried under the altar.' And again: 'Whoever is interred in Babylonia is as well off as if he lay in Palestine, and whoever is buried in Palestine lies the same as under the altar.'[‖] About the 3rd cent. it became 'a pious custom to be buried in Judæa's holy earth, to which was attributed an expiatory power. The resurrection was confidently expected to take place in that country, which it was also believed would be the scene of the coming of the Messiah. Those who had died in unhallowed countries would roll about in the light loose earth until they reached the Holy Land, where they could be revivified. In place of living inhabitants who were continually decreasing, Judæa was becoming every day more thickly populated with corpses. The Holy Land, which had formerly been an immense temple, inspiring great deeds and noble thoughts, was now a holy grave which could render nothing holy but death.'[¶]

Burial was the universal mode of disposing of the dead at all periods of Jewish history [see BURIAL]. Burning, which was the Babylonian and Roman usage, was among the Jews a death punishment inflicted for aggravated transgressions rather than a mode of disposing of the dead (Gn 38^{24}, Lv 20^{14} 21^{9}, Jos 7^{25}, 1 K 13^{2}, 2 K 23^{20}). Even when criminals had suffered the last penalty of the law by stoning or burning, or where, as in the case of Saul and his sons, slain in battle, necessity required that their bodies should be burned (1 S $31^{12.13}$), their remains or ashes were provided with a resting-place in the bosom of the earth.[] There was great variety in the choice of a burying-place among the Jews, at least in the earliest times. Abraham buried Sarah in the cave of the field of Machpelah (Gn 23^{19}); Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried under an oak (Gn 35^{8}); Jacob buried Rachel (see, above, p. 193^{a}) by the wayside (Gn 35^{19}); they buried Joshua 'in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in Mt. Ephraim' (Jos 24^{30}); and the men of Jabesh-gilead buried the bones of Saul and his sons under a terebinth (1 Ch 10^{12}). Burial in the open street or at cross roads was expressly forbidden by the enactments of later times. There does not appear to be evidence in the Scripture history to warrant the statement that the family grave was originally in the house.[*] This belongs, so far as it appears to have been the case, to a later time, and is represented as an exceptional honour reserved for kings, prophets, and other outstanding personages (1 S 25^{1}, 1 K 2^{34}, 2 K 21^{18} 2 Ch 33^{20}). In Babylonia and Assyria, at all events, 'only members of the royal family were permitted to be buried within the precincts of the town. Their bodies might be burned and entombed in one of the many palaces of the country. We are told of one king, for instance, that he was burned or buried in the palace of Sargon; of another, that he was burned in his own palace. The practice throws light on what we read in the Books of Kings; there, too, we are told that Manasseh "was buried in the garden of his own house" (2 K 21^{18}), and Amon in the "garden of Uzza" (2 K 21^{26}). Private burial in the palaces they had inhabited when alive was a privilege reserved for the kings alone.'[†] The sepulchres set apart for the kings of Judah (קִבְרוֹת הַמְּלָכִים) are specially mentioned (2 Ch 21^{20} 24^{25} 28^{27}). Not all the kings were privileged to receive interment in the royal mausoleum. Neither Joash nor Jehoram was buried in the sepulchres of the kings (2 Ch 21^{20} 24^{25}), whilst Jehoiada was accorded the honour 'because he had done good in Israel and towards God and his house' (2 Ch 24^{16}). The remains of Uzziah were not admitted to the sepulchres of the kings, but were interred in 'the field of burial which belonged to the kings, because they said he was a leper' (2 Ch 26^{23}). It is not possible to locate 'the sepulchres of the kings' in Jerusalem. It seems to be implied in a statement of the prophet Ezekiel (43^{7-9}) that certain kings of Judah were buried close to the temple, if not actually within its precincts; and though there is no record of such a thing in the historical books, the statement is justified by the fact that the royal palaces, within which some of them were interred, and the first temple, stood virtually within the same enclosure. There were also common burying-places called 'the graves of the children of the people' (2 K 23^{6}, Jer 26^{23}), into which the dead were sometimes cast in dishonour and contempt.

To prepare for himself a tomb in his lifetime has been the custom of every right-thinking Jew from early times down to the present day. Shebna, whose Jewish origin, however, is doubtful (Is $22^{15f.}$), Asa (2 Ch 16^{14}), Joseph of Arimathæa (Mt 27^{60}), are instances in point. The custom was not confined to the Jews, for we find it followed by the Pharaohs, who built pyramids to receive their remains, by Eshmunazar, by the Caliphs, and others.

Of the sepulchres and sepulchral monuments of the ancient Hebrews and the later Jews it is possible now to give an adequate description and a fairly complete history. We owe this to the labours—often skilled labours—of residents and travellers in Palestine, and especially to the organized and persevering efforts of the Palestine Exploration Fund and the kindred German Palästina-Verein. The sepulchral remains of Western Palestine, in particular, have been in many cases carefully examined and measured and described, with plans and sketches, in the Reports and Memoirs of these societies. We can now classify the sepulchral remains according to the type which they represent, and even, with some measure of certainty, assign them to the period to which they belong,—to the Phœnician or Hebrew, Jewish, Herodian, Roman, Byzantine, Saracenic, or Crusading periods. There are three principal types of ancient tombs found in Western Palestine:[*] (i.) Rock-hewn Tombs; (ii.) Masonry Tombs; (iii.) Sarcophagi.

i. ROCK-HEWN TOMBS.—These are by far the most numerous, and they are found in many varieties. They are also the earliest in date. The soft limestone ranges of Western Palestine and Syria were honeycombed with natural caves, admitting of easy enlargement and adaptation. They had been available for the shelter of the living before being used for the reception of the dead (1 S 22^{1} 24^{3}). The usual form of Hebrew tomb in the earliest period took advantage of these caverns in the soft strata of limestone. In this the Hebrews copied the Phœnicians, whose principle of architecture, Renan tells us,[†] was the carved rock, not the column, as with the Greeks; but in point of architectural taste and skill they were far behind their masters. In striking contrast to the Egyptian sepulchral monuments,—massive pyramids and vast underground chambers,—the Hebrew tomb, whether single or more complex, was marked by extreme simplicity. In fact, simplicity of construction and absence of architectural ornament are the surest notes of the antiquity of a Hebrew sepulchre. No less remarkable is the contrast between the inscriptions and wall-paintings on Egyptian tombs—as at Beni-Hassan and elsewhere—and the plain and unadorned simplicity of Hebrew tombs, which until a late period are entirely devoid of inscriptions. In some cases tombs are found singly on the hillsides, as though individuals chose to have their last resting-place in their own vineyard, like Joseph of Arimathæa, who had his own new tomb in his garden. More often they form a regular burying-ground or cemetery. Tombs of notable personages, like the so-called Tomb of Joshua, have generally other tombs around them, the desire being strong among all Orientals to be laid near to some holy man or national hero.

(1) The simplest form of rock-hewn tomb is that in which a grave has been sunk in the surface of the rock to receive the body, and fitted with a slab, let in round the mouth, to cover it, the cover being sometimes flush with the flat surface of the rock, and sometimes raised and ornamented like the lid of a sarcophagus.

(2) Another simple form of tomb is an excavation driven into the face of a rock—called כּוֹךְ, plural כּוֹכִים—just large enough to receive a corpse, the mouth being closed by a rough stone slab.

(3) The most common description of tomb is that in which a number of kokim are grouped together in one or more chambers of the same excavation. These, again, are in three varieties: (a) A sepulchre consisting of a natural cavern in one of the softer strata of limestone, having kokim cut in its sides with their beds on a level with the floor, the mouths of these being closed by rough stone slabs, either made to fit close, or only resting against the perforated face of rock. (b) A sepulchre where a square or oblong chamber has been cut in the rock, and kokim ranged along three of its sides, their mouths closed by neatly dressed stone slabs fitting closely, the entrance to the chamber itself being by a low square opening, fitted with a slab in the same manner, or with a stone door turning on a socket hinge, and secured by bolts on the inside. In this kind of tomb there is usually a bench running in front of the kokim, and raised from 1 ft. 6 in. to 3 ft. above the floor of the excavated chamber. (c) A sepulchre in which one entrance leads into a number of chambers, each containing kokim. Such tombs generally have a sort of porch or vestibule hewn in the rock, the front of the roof being often supported by pillars of natural rock surmounted by a frieze, and bearing other kinds of ornamentation. From this porch a low door leads into an antechamber, with or without tombs, from which access is obtained to the tomb chambers, all of which have raised benches running in front of the kokim openings. Some of the chambers have, instead of kokim, arched recesses (arcosolia) cut out in their sides, in which the body was laid, or perhaps a sarcophagus placed. The so-called Tomb of Joshua at Tibneh, on the Roman road from Antipatris to Jerusalem, is of this class. It is prominent among the nine tombs that make the rock cemetery of the place, and has a portico supported on rude pieces of rock with very simple capitals. There are niches for over two hundred lamps, arranged in vertical rows, giving the appearance of an ornamental pattern, and all smoke-blacked. 'Entering the low door,' says Conder, 'we find the interior chamber to be a square with five loculi, not very perfectly cut, on their sides. The whole is quite unornamented, except by four very rough brackets supporting the flat roof. On becoming accustomed to the darkness, one perceives that the central loculus at the back forms a little passage about 7 ft. long, 2 ft. 6 in. high, and 3 ft. 4 in. broad, through which one creeps into a second but smaller chamber, 9 ft. 3 in. by 8 ft. 1 in., and 5 ft. 5 in. high. In this, opposite the entrance, a single loculus runs at right angles to the wall, and a single niche is cut on the left for a lamp.'[*]

Conder (PEFSt, 1878, p. 31) classifies the rock-cut tombs as follows:—1. Kokim tombs. 2. Loculus tombs. 3. Sunk tombs. The first two classes he believes to be of Hebrew and Jewish origin, but the third more likely to be Christian of the Byzantine period. 'The word kok and its plural kokim designate the pigeon-holes or tunnels running in from the side of a sepulchral chamber, each having room for a corpse and nothing more. The designation loculus (locus in sepulchro) is applied to the shelf, or trough, or bench receptacle for the corpse, which is of later use than the kokim. In many tombs which have been examined there is a mixture of both kokim and loculi, indicating a transition period about the Christian era or earlier. 'The kokim tombs,' Conder explains, 'are those which have parallel tunnels running in, three or four side by side, from the walls of a rectangular chamber. The bodies lay with their feet towards the chamber, and stone pillars for raising the heads are often found at the farther end. The kokim vary in number from one or two up to fifteen or twenty, and are of various lengths, from 3 or 4 to 7 ft. There is no system of orientation, and the entrance door is in the face of the cliff, the chamber within being directed according to the lie of the rock. This kind of tomb is certainly the most ancient in the country, for the kokim are sometimes destroyed in enlarging the tomb on a different system.' These tombs were used by the Jews. This is proved by a rare Hebrew inscription, by a representation of the seven-branched golden candlestick, and by the fact that some of them are sacred to modern Jews as the tombs of their ancestors, and that their measurements agree with the prescriptions in the Talmud. The kokim are not sufficiently large, as a rule, to admit of the supposition that the bodies were embalmed or swathed in bandages like those which make the Egyptian mummy so bulky when preserved untouched. There is nothing in the sepulchral remains of Palestine any more than in the Bible itself to lead us to believe that the embalming of the dead was a Hebrew custom (Conder, Syrian Stone Lore, p. 133). For another classification of tombs see Benzinger, Heb. Arch. p. 225, which follows Tobler's in SWP, Volume of Special Papers, p. 288 f.

We have seen that the simple tombs belong to the earlier period, and that the portico at the entrance, with its ornaments, is usually a note of more recent origin. It is to the Herodian Age that the ancient tombs on the east side of the Kidron Valley, Absalom's Pillar (possibly the tomb of Alexander Jannæus), the Tombs of St. James and Zechariah, and the monolith known as the Egyptian Tomb, are to be assigned. The so-called Tomb of St. James, now known as the Tomb of the Bene Hazir, with its Aramaic text, Doric pillars, and triglyphs, and inner chamber containing kokim, is perhaps the earliest of the group, and belongs to the 1st cent. B.C. The others are probably later. The fine monument to the north of Jerusalem, commonly called the Tombs of the Kings, but known to the natives as Kubûr es-Salatîn (Tombs of the Sultans), has been identified by Robinson as the tomb of Helena, queen of Adiabene. It contains that mixture of kokim and loculi which would seem to date it on the border of the Christian era. In one of the lower chambers of the tomb was found a sarcophagus with an Aramaic inscription containing the words Sara Meleka. It is not impossible that this was the native name of Helena herself, and that the remains found in the sarcophagus were her own.

ii. MASONRY TOMBS.—These are rarely found in Palestine, and they are later than the rock-hewn sepulchres. They are confined to the northern portion of the country. The most famous are described by Sir Charles Wilson (SWP 283). He mentions — (1) a building at Kedes (Kedesh-naphtali), 34 ft. 4 in. square, with a doorway on its southern side leading to a chamber containing kokim, which have been used for interments down to a late period; (2) two tombs at Tell Ḥum (one of the possible sites for Capernaum), the one of which has 26 kokim, and, being subterranean, is closed with a door of basalt, the other of which has loculi, and is built of coursed basaltic rubble; (3) a fine tomb at Malal, near Nazareth, with 4 kokim and attached semi-pillars of the Ionic order outside; (4) a square tomb at Teiâsîr with three loculi, a domed roof, and pilasters on each side; (5) the remains of a building at Ain el B'aineh, which had stone over rock-cut tombs. To these Conder has added four more, three of them at or near Jerusalem.

iii. SARCOPHAGI.—Between the 6th and the 4th cent. B.C. the Phœnicians buried in sarcophagi called anthropoid, having a human head and even an entire recumbent form on the lid, the body of the sarcophagus being shaped like a mummy case. Such is the famous tomb of Eshmunazar with the celebrated Phœnician inscription. In the great discovery of sepulchral remains made at Beyrout some years ago, sarcophagi, mummy shaped, some in white and some in black marble, were found. Among the sarcophagi discovered in the excavations was a splendid sarcophagus in black stone resembling that of Eshmunazar, and bearing an inscription purporting that it is the tomb of Tabnith, priest of Ashtoreth and king of the Sidonians, son of Eshmunazar. Some of those sarcophagi were made of pottery, recalling the slipper-shaped glazed earthen coffins found by Loftus[*] on the ancient Babylonian mounds at Warka. Although the Hebrews copied from the Phœnicians in their rock-hewn tombs, they did not follow them largely in the use of sarcophagi. We have already mentioned the sarcophagus of queen Sara found in the Tomb of the Kings. Of others found in Palestine, those discovered at Kedes are the most ornamented. The material out of which they are hewn is hard white limestone, almost like marble, and the workmanship is excellent. Some of them had been made for two bodies laid in opposite directions, and at the bottom of the loculi were small raised pillars to receive the heads. With the exception of those great anthropoid sarcophagi, there is nothing to show a very marked distinction between the Hebrew and Phœnician tombs from the earliest to the latest age. The history of the sepulchres found in Phœnicia agrees perfectly with the chronological series which has been established independently in Palestine.[†]

In the Greek age monuments erected over tombs became common, the tombs beneath being rock-cut. In such cases there is a combination of the masonry and sarcophagus type of tombs. Hiram's Tomb,[*] about three miles from modern Tyre, containing a tomb or sarcophagus formed out of a huge block and emplaced on a pedestal made of three courses of grey limestone, most probably belongs to this period; and tomb towers containing sarcophagi are to be found throughout Syria. At Palmyra those structures consist sometimes of four or five storeys. Tombstones and sculptured sepulchres have been found at Rabbath-ammon, in Eastern Palestine, belonging to the age of the Antonines, but are to be classed among pagan funerary monuments. Sometimes solid monuments were erected near tombs like the Kamm'uat el-Hirmil, east of the Jordan—a solid tower in two storeys, with pyramidal roof and bas-reliefs representing the hunting of the stag, the bear, and the wild boar, which date, it is supposed, from the 3rd or 4th cent. Of sepulchral monuments we have a notable example in the mausoleum erected at Modin by Simon the Maccabee for his father and his brother. 'Simon,' says the writer (1 Mac 13^{27-29}), 'built a monument upon the sepulchres of his father and his brethren, and raised it aloft to the sight, with polished stone behind and before. And he set up seven pyramids, one over against another, for his father and his mother and his four brethren. And for these he made cunning devices, setting about them great pillars, and upon the pillars he fashioned all manner of arms for a perpetual memory, and beside the arms ships carved, that they should be seen of all that sail on the sea.' Of this famous structure all trace has been lost since the 4th cent., and its site has not yet been identified. (See MODIN).

In this connexion we recall the stinging words of Jesus describing the Pharisees as whited sepulchres, outwardly beautiful, but inwardly full of the bones of the dead—as building the tombs of the prophets and garnishing the sepulchres of the righteous, but being of a totally different spirit from those they seemed to honour (Mt $23^{27. 29. 30}$). Whited sepulchres were evidently sepulchral erections whitewashed or plastered over to render them conspicuous, and to preserve passers-by from the ceremonial defilement they might contract by approaching them. That some such distinguishing mark was necessary we gather from a similar saying in St. Luke's Gospel, in which Jesus describes the scribes and Pharisees as 'graves which appear not' (Lk 11^{44}). The reference in this passage must be to the humbler class of graves simply dug in the earth, and with no monument of any kind to mark the spot. At the present day the whitewashed slabs covering Mohammedan graves around Jerusalem glitter in the sunshine and easily attract notice. (See for cairns or stones heaped on graves art. BURIAL).

There are two sepulchres in particular which must always have a special interest to the Bible student, and which are both alike enveloped in a certain degree of mystery—the cave of Machpelah, the burial-place of Sarah, Abraham, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah; and the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, where the body of Jesus was laid and remained for 'three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.' As regards the grave of the patriarchs, now covered by the mosque at Hebron, see art. MACHPELAH [cf. also Stanley's Sermons in the East (pp. 141–169) and PEFSt for 1882 (pp. 193–214)]. Touching the Holy Sepulchre for which Saracens and Crusaders contended, and regarding whose site heated controversies still rage, it seems impossible to attain to certainty. The tradition of more than fifteen centuries located it within the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. This tradition has been called in question since the days of Robinson. Its truth would require the site to have been without the wall of the city, for it is said that 'Jesus bearing the cross went forth unto the place called the place of a skull' (Jn $19^{17.18}$), and that 'He suffered without the gate' (He 13^{12}). But the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is not only near the very heart of the city as it is now occupied, but it must always have been within the line of the second wall. The latter contention is opposed, however, among recent authorities by Conrad Schick, who, after having resisted the traditional site for nearly forty years, has been led to accept it as the true site. He professes * to have ascertained by excavations and measurements that Calvary and the tomb in the garden where Jesus was laid were without the line of the wall though very close to it, just as we read in Jn 19^{20}. The site favoured by recent authorities is a knoll of rock of rounded form and covered with shallow soil and grass, just outside the north wall of the city, and a little distance from the Damascus Gate. Under it is the cave called 'Jeremiah's Grotto,' and there are two holes in the face of the steep and rocky bank terminating the knoll, which look like the sockets of eyes in a skull. Dr. Selah Merrill, long United States Consul in Jerusalem, the late General Gordon, the late Sir J. W. Dawson, and Colonel Conder,† have given their support to this site (see art. JERUSALEM, vol. ii. p. 596^a, and cf. Survey of Western Palestine, vol. on Jerusalem, pp. 429–438). Thomson,‡ after examining all the evidence on both sides, attained to no certainty as to the site: 'Far better,' he says, 'rest contented with the undoubted fact that somewhere without the walls of this limited platform of the Holy City the Son of Man was lifted up, "that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have eternal life."'

SERAH (שֶׂרַח).—A daughter of Asher, Gn 46^{17} (A Σάαρ, D Σάρρα), Nu $26^{46(30)}$ (B Κάρα, B^{ab} AF Σάρα, AV Sarah), 1 Ch 7^{30} (B Σόρε, A Σάραι).

SERAIAH (שְׂרָיָהוּ, שְׂרָיָה, LXX Σαραίας or Σαραιά).—1. Scribe or secretary in the reign of David, 2 S 8^{17} (B Ἀσά, A Σαραίας). In 2 S 20^{25} he is called Sheva (Ḳerê שׁוא, Keth. שׁיא), B Ἰησοῦς, A Ἰσοῦς. In 1 K 4^3 the name appears as Shisha שִׁישָׁא (B Σαβά, A Σεισά). This form or Shasha would be restored elsewhere by Thenius, Wellhausen, and Stade; while Klostermann prefers the form Shavsha שַׁוְשָׁא (B Ἰησοῦς, ℵ Σούς, A Σουσά), which is found in 1 Ch 18^{16}. 2. High priest in the reign of Zedekiah. He was put to death with other distinguished captives by order of Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, 2 K $25^{18.21}$, Jer $52^{24.27}$. He is mentioned in the list of high priests, 1 Ch 6^{14}. Ezra claimed descent from him, Ezr 7^1 (1 Es 8^1 Azaraias, 2 Es 1^1 Saraias). His name also occurs in 1 Es 5^5 Saraias. 3. One of 'the captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah after his appointment as governor by Nebuchadnezzar, 2 K 25^{23}, Jer 40^8. The text of Kings is evidently abridged from that of Jeremiah. The epithet 'the Netophathite' applied to his father in Kings really belongs to a different person. 4. Second son of Kenaz, and brother of Othniel, 1 Ch $4^{13.14}$. He was father of Joab, who was the 'father' of the Valley of Craftsmen, cf. Neh 11^{35}. 5. Grandfather of Jehu, a prince of Simeon, 1 Ch 4^{35}. 6. One of the twelve leaders who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^2. In the corresponding list, Neh 7^7, he is called Azariah (1 Es 5^8 Zaraias). 7. A priestly clan, probably named after the high priest of No. 2. This course of priests was first in order in the times of Zerubbabel (Neh 12^2, 1 Es 5^8), Joiakim (Neh 12^{12}), and Nehemiah (Neh 10^2). This family is noted as one of those that settled in Jerusalem (Neh 11^{11}). In the corresponding list, 1 Ch 9^{11}, Azariah is substituted. 'Very probably they were father and son, and the two lists have selected different names to represent the priestly house, cf. 1 Ch 7^{13}' (Ryle). 8. One of the three princes whom Jehoiakim sent to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36^{26}). 9. Son of Neriah and brother of Baruch, Jer 51^{59-64}. He held the office of שַׂר מְנוּחָה (AV 'a quiet prince,' m. 'or prince of Menucha or chief chamberlain'; RV 'chief chamberlain,' m. 'or quartermaster'). The Vulg. tr. princeps prophetiæ; the Targ. (רַב תּוּקְרָבְתָּא) and LXX (ἄρχων δώρων), followed by Grätz and Cheyne, read 'in command over (the) gifts,' i.e. שַׂר־מְנָחוֹת. In this official capacity he attended Zedekiah when that prince went to Babylon to pay homage to Nebuchadnezzar. Like his brother Baruch, he was a friend of Jeremiah; and the prophet having written in a book the denunciations against Babylon that are now contained in Jer 50–51^{58}, entrusted the volume to Seraiah, and bade him on his arrival at Babylon to read the prophecies, publicly, as it would seem, and then with the symbolic action of a prophet to cast the book into the Euphrates and proclaim, 'Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise again because of the evil that I will bring upon her.' This scene suggested to St. John the imagery of Rev 18^{21}.

SERAPHIM (שְׂרָפִים; Σεραφείμ and Σεραφείν; seraphim).—The seraphim are an order of celestial beings referred to only in Is 6^{2-7}. In his vision of J″ the prophet sees them as attendants of the heavenly court, ministers of the ideal sanctuary. They are apparently human in form—they have faces, hands, and feet (vv.$^{2.6}$); each of them has three pairs of wings (v.^{2}); they stand or hover above J″ as He sits upon His throne (v.^{2}); and they proclaim His holiness in antiphonal chant (v.^{3}).

Opinion varies as to the origin of the word and the conception. Gesenius was doubtful, but thought it best to connect the term with the Arab. شَرُفَ 'to be noble,' thus viewing the seraphim as the princes or nobles of the heavenly court. A considerable number of Jewish writers, such as Abulwalid and Kimchi, derived the word from שָׂרַף, regarding the seraphim as bright or shining angels. But שָׂרַף means 'to burn,' not 'to shine,' and accordingly others have supposed the word to denote the ardent love or burning zeal of the Divine attendants. The verbal root, however, is not intransitive, but active; it means not to glow with heat, but to consume with fire. Hence the seraphim would have rather to be regarded as agents of purification by fire. This is in accordance with Is 6^6, where one of the spirits is represented as carrying celestial fire from off the altar to purify the lips of the prophet and purge away his sin (but see Dillm.-Kittel, ad loc.).

It is now usual to bring the prophet's conception into relation with popular Hebrew mythology. The sārāph of Nu 21^6, Dt 8^{15} is a 'fiery,' i.e. venomous, serpent, which bites the Israelites in the desert (see SERPENT). In Is 14^{29} 30^6 allusion is made to a 'flying fiery serpent' (sārāph), which has its home in the desert between Palestine and Egypt. The latter is certainly a creation of popular imagination. As the analogous cherub was primarily a personification of the thundercloud, so the seraph was of the serpent-like lightning. Now just as a psalmist represents J″ as making the flaming fire His ministers (Ps 104[4]), so the prophet seizes the popular notion of the seraph and transfers it to the realm of pure spiritual ideas. Not a trace of the serpentine form is left in his conception. His seraphim are the guardians of J″'s holiness, who keep the profane and unclean at a distance, and purge from defilement that which is to be taken into J″'s service. By means of this splendid symbolism the prophet vividly expresses the truth that 'J″ is a consuming fire' (Dt 4[24], He 12[29]).

Another view has been started by Dillm.-Kittel and Marti owing to the discovery in an Egyptian tomb of the 12th dynasty at Beni-Hassan, of two winged griffin figures placed as guardians at the entrance. The griffin is represented in Demotic by the word seref, and Marti suggests that the seraphim in Isaiah's vision are to be thought of as guarding the threshold of the temple.*

The 'living creatures' of Rev 4[6-8], which are partly like Ezekiel's cherubim, resemble Isaiah's seraphim in possessing six wings and in proclaiming the Trisagion. But Cheyne has remarked that 'the popular notion of the seraphim as angels is, of course, to be rejected. They are, indeed, more like Titans than placid Gabriels or Raphaels' (Prophecies of Isaiah, i. 32).

The similarity of the word seraph to the Egyptian Serapis led Hitzig and others to identify the two. This idea has found little acceptance (cf., against it, Dillm.-Kittel, Jes. ad loc.), and still less has Knobel's suggestion that seraphim is a false reading for שָׁרְתִים, an imaginary Heb. word meaning 'ministers.'

SERJEANTS is used in Ac 16[35. 38] as an approximate English rendering of ῥαβδοῦχοι (='rod-bearers'), which represents in Greek the Latin lictores, officials whose duty it was to attend the Roman magistrates, to execute their orders, and especially to administer the punishments of scourging or beheading. For this purpose they carried, as their mark of office, the fasces, a bundle of rods with an axe inserted. At Philippi they were attached to the στρατηγοί, i.e. the duumviri, or prætores, who administered justice in that Roman colony (Marquart, i. 475 ff.); but who found on this occasion that by summarily inflicting stripes and imprisonment, without due trial, they had violated the rights of Roman citizens, and so had to undo, as best they might, the effects of the rash action for which they, rather than their instruments the lictors, were responsible.

SERON (Σήρων).—'The commander of the host of Syria' (ὁ ἄρχων τῆς δυνάμεως Συρίας), who was defeated by Judas Maccabæus at Beth-horon, 1 Mac 3[13. 23f.]; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 1.

SERPENT.—Eight Heb. words are used for serpent. One Gr. word only (ἔχιδνα, 'the viper'), which is not used in the LXX, occurs in the NT.

1. נָחָשׁ nāḥāsh, is supposed by some (identifying roots נחשׁ and לחשׁ) to mean 'the hisser.' It is generic for a serpent or snake. The Arab. equivalent ḥanash is clearly the same word, with a transposition of the first two radicals. Its meaning is, however, far more general than that of the Heb. term. The root signifies 'to hunt or capture.' Ḥanash is defined 'anything that is hunted or caught or captured, of birds or flying things, or venomous or noxious reptiles, such as scorpions and serpents, or vermin, such as hedgehogs and lizards, and the rat and mouse, and any animal the head of which resembles that of a serpent.' It even includes the common fly. But, in popular usage at the present day, it is applied to serpents only.

2. תַּנִּין tannîn, plur. תַּנִּינִים tannînîm. This, which is usually tr. 'dragon,' sometimes otherwise (see DRAGON, 4), is tr. 'serpent' in AV and RV of Ex 7[9. 10. 12] [v.[10] RVm 'Heb. tannîn, any large reptile'], and in RV of Ps 91[13] (AV 'dragon'). It is interesting to note that while P in the above passages of Exodus uses tannîn for the creature into which Moses' rod was changed, E in ch. 4[3] (cf. 7[15] [? R]) uses nāḥāsh. The LXX tr. tannîn by δράκων and nāḥāsh by ὄφις. It would have been better if our versions had preserved a similar distinction in terms.

3. אֶפְעֶה 'eph'eh. The Arab. 'af'a is defined as 'a certain serpent of a malignant kind, spotted white and black, slender in the neck, broad in the head. It is said that it will not quit its place.' There is nothing in this description which fixes the species or even genus of the serpent referred to. AV and RV tr. 'eph'eh in the three places in which it occurs (Job 20[16], Is 30[6] 59[5]) 'viper,' LXX ὄφις, ἀσπίς, βασιλίσκος. Tristram believes that this may be Echis arenicola, Boie.

4. עַכְשׁוּב 'akshûbh, ἀσπίς, aspis (Ps 140[3]), AV and RV 'adder.' St. Paul, quoting the passage in Ro 3[13] according to the LXX, gives ἀσπίς='asp.'

5. פֶּתֶן pethen. This word occurs 6 times (Dt 32[33], Job 20[14. 16], AV and RV 'asp'; Ps 58[4], AV and RV 'adder,' AVm 'asp'; 91[13] AV and RV 'adder,' AVm 'asp'; Is 11[8] AV and RV 'asp'). In all of these the LXX has ἀσπίς, except Job 20[16] where it gives δράκων, and Ps 91[13] where it has βασιλίσκος. These discrepancies of translation, ancient and modern, show the uncertainty as to the serpent intended by pethen. Ἀσπίς seems to have been the equivalent in Gr. of more than one species. The repeated mention of the venomousness of the pethen, and the allusion to its being used in the tricks of serpent charmers (Ps 58[5]), led Tristram to think that the animal intended is the Egyp. cobra, Naja haje, L., on the ground that snake charmers usually have one or more cobras. It is common to see a cobra, on each side of a winged globe, in the attitude of striking, chiselled over the doors of Egyp. temples. The Eng. 'asp' is derived from the Gr. and Lat. aspis. It is usually understood in those languages of the Vipera aspis, L.

6. צֶפַע ẓepha', צִפְעֹנִי ẓiph'ônî. These words occur 5 times (Pr 23[32] LXX κεράστης, AV and RV 'adder,' AVm 'cockatrice,' RVm 'basilisk'; Is 11[8] 14[29] ἔκγονα ἀσπίδων, AV 'cockatrice,' m. 'adder,' RV 'basilisk,' m. 'adder'; 59[5] ἀσπίς, AV 'cockatrice,' m. 'adder,' RV 'basilisk,' m. 'adder'; Jer 8[17] θανατοῦντας='deadly,' AV 'cockatrices,' RV 'basilisks,' m. 'adders'). The meaning of the root of the Heb. word is unknown, and hence gives no clue to the species intended. Both cockatrice and basilisk are fabulous. Neither the LXX nor our translators have been able to fix on any species.

7. שְׁפִיפֹן shĕphîphôn (Gn 49[17] 'adder,' AVm 'arrow-snake' [given by RV in Is 34[15] for ḳippôz, AV 'great owl'; see OWL], RVm 'horned snake,' LXX ἐνκαθήμενος = 'one in ambush'). By general consent this serpent has been identified with Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, the horned serpent, a desert species of the most venomous kind, which hides in depressions in the way, as those made by a camel's foot. This would explain the allusion to biting 'the horse's heels.' It is a foot or 18 in. long, of a sandy colour, with brown or blackish spots. It has a pair of horn-like processes above the eyes. The Arabs of the desert call it sheffûn, which, though not classical, seems to be a survival of its ancient name.

8. שָׂרָף sārāph, 'fiery serpent,' from a Heb. root signifying 'to burn,' hence poisonous from inflammation. It is usually an adjective to other words signifying serpent, as nāḥāsh (Nu 21^{8} LXX θανατοῦντας), but also appears as a substantive (Nu 21^{8}, Is 14^{29} 30^{6} LXX ὄφις, ἀσπίς?). The 'fiery serpents' (Nu $21^{6.\,8}$), which were sent to torment the Israelites in the desert, may have been any or all of the venomous species of et-Tîh, as the cobra, the cerastes or sand snake. The 'fiery flying serpent' (Is 14^{29} 30^{6}), שָׂרָף מְעוֹפֵף sārāph mĕ'ôphēph, is probably to be understood of some fabulous serpentine creature with wings, such as are sculptured on Egyptian monuments; but the expression flying may have been intended to indicate the rapid darting with which a venomous snake strikes its prey. One of the snakes of Syria, called by the Arabs 'aḳd-el-jauz, is also called eṭ-ṭayyârah, because of its arrow-like, darting motion.

9. Ἔχιδνα is used only in the NT, and is tr^{d} 'viper' (Mt 3^{7} 12^{34} 23^{33}, Lk 3^{7}, Ac 28^{3}). It is probably generic for poisonous snakes. Tristram thinks that the one which fastened on St. Paul's hand may have been Vipera aspis, L., which, although now extinct in Malta, whence venomous serpents have entirely disappeared, may have been there in the apostle's day.

A review of the above critical analysis shows (1) that the translators have been at little pains to render the Heb. terms by the same Gr. and Eng. words in different places; (2) that to only one Heb. word, shĕphîphon, is it possible to give a scientific name with any degree of certainty. Of another, pethen, the most probable but not certain equivalent is the cobra. Of the others, three, 'akshûbh, ẓepha' or ẓiph'ôni, and 'eph'eh, are wholly uncertain or indefinite; one, tannîn, had perhaps better be tr^{d}, as elsewhere, 'dragon'; one, nāḥāsh, is generic; and one, sārāph, is primarily of adjective not substantive force.

The following is a list of the principal venomous serpents in Palestine and Syria and Sinai: Daboia xanthina, Gray, a nocturnal species, large enough to swallow a hare; Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, the horned snake; Naja haje, L., the Egyp. cobra, a very deadly species; Echis arenicola, Boie, also extremely deadly; Vipera Euphratica, Martin, and V. ammodytas, L., both widely diffused and highly poisonous. Besides the above there are numerous species of non-venomous snakes, among which are Zamenis viridiflavus, Dum. et Bibr., a species of a greenish-yellow to tobacco-leaf colour, often 6 ft. long, the variety carbonarius, Bonap., being black; Z. dahlii, of a bluish colour mottled with black spots, and various species of Ablabes, Coluber, etc.; in all, 27 non-venomous kinds. It is probable that the Hebrews regarded all snakes with abhorrence, and that the common people supposed most or all of them to be venomous.

The reputation of the serpent has always been double. It was the emblem of Mercury and Æsculapius. A serpent, to this day, figures on devices and badges pertaining to the healing art. The Phœnicians worshipped the serpent, and the Chinese do so now. The Egyptians also worshipped Kneph under this form. They embalmed the bodies of serpents. The Scripture allusions to the wisdom of the serpent are two: Mt 10^{16}, which refers to its caution in avoiding danger, and Gn $3^{1.\,4.\,13}$, in which guile and malice are plainly intended (cf. 2 Co 11^{3}, Rev 12^{9}). Heathen mythology also attributed to the serpent such qualities of diabolism. And just as Israel came to worship the brazen serpent, which, according to tradition, was made to remind them of the venom and destroying properties of its prototype (2 K 18^{4}), so the heathen have come to worship the creature they most fear. This is not to be wondered at, as all heathen worship is a compound of superstition and fear. Most of the Scripture allusions to the serpent are to its evil qualities. It is treacherous (Dan is a serpent in the way, Gn 49^{17}); venomous (Ps 58^{4}); skulking (בָּרִחַ bārîaḥ, Job 26^{13}, AV 'crooked,' RV 'swift,' m. 'fleeing' or 'gliding'; Is 27^{1}, AV 'piercing,' m. 'crossing like a bar,' RV 'swift,' m. 'gliding' or 'fleeing'; the expression seems to refer to its habit of skulking noiselessly away);* crooked (עֲקַלָּתוֹן Is 27^{1}, RVm 'winding,' referring to the wavy motion with which he glides out of danger); it bites (Pr 23^{32}, Ec $10^{8.\,11}$, Am 5^{19}). Christ compares the scribes and Pharisees to serpents (Mt 23^{33} ὄφεις; cf. the remarkable phrase γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν in Mt 3^{7} 12^{34}). The power to take up and tread on serpents unharmed was promised to the disciples ('Mk' 16^{18}, Lk 10^{19}). On the whole subject of the serpent of Gn 3 and the NT reference to that narrative, see artt. FALL and SATAN. The mystery of the serpent's motion did not escape Agur (Pr 30^{19}), and only in modern times have we fully understood its solution. The fact that serpents are produced from eggs is also noted (Is 59^{5}). They were tamed (Ja 3^{7}). Sirach alludes to those bitten by serpents, presumably poisonous (12^{13}). G. E. POST.

SERPENT CHARMING.—It is said in Jer 8^{17} 'I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you'; and in Ps 58^{4} 'they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth his ear, which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.' The reference here is clearly not to any species as distinguished from other serpents, but to individuals not amenable to a general law. It need not be taken literally, as it may be that any snake, properly charmed, would be subject to the mysterious fascination of the cunning masters of the art. The object being to show the extreme malignity of the wicked, a case beyond the range of experience is invoked to point the moral. Were it a normal thing for a pethen not to be capable of being charmed, the comparison would lose its force. An uncharmable serpent is a monstrosity. The stopping of the ears is clearly wilful. To attempt to explain this literally by the fable of the snake applying one ear to the ground, and stopping the other with its tail (Rabbi Solomon), is childish. The snake has no external ear to stop, and no tympanic cavity. The only tenable explanation is that the moral monsters, so graphically described by the psalmist, are comparable to such an exception 'as a (not the) deaf adder,' etc.

The art of charming serpents is a very ancient one, and has been brought to a high state of perfection in Egypt and India. The apparatus is very simple. It consists of a shrill pipe or gang of pipes, and a basket or bags in which the snakes already trained are kept. These are of various species, some highly venomous, others harmless. The former have their fangs extracted, or else the lower jaw sewn to the upper with silk thread or silver wire. When the piper has played a shrill air, the snakes crawl out of the basket or bag, and, coiling the tail end of their bodies, erect their heads, and sway backwards and forwards. The charmer winds some of them around his body or arms or legs. Mishaps sometimes occur to the charmer with serpents which have not yet had their fangs extracted. Lane (Mod. Egyptians, 461) tells of a charmer who had a venomous snake brought to him from the desert. He put it in a basket, and kept it several days to weaken it. He then put his hand into the basket to withdraw it in order to extract its fangs, when the snake bit him on the thumb. His arm swelled and turned black, and in a few hours he died. Some serpent charmers pretend to have the faculty of discovering serpents in a house or ruin, or in the rocks or fields, and luring them by their music, so that they can catch them. Doubtless in many cases the snake is introduced into the place by the charmer or his confederates; yet it is undeniable that, in broad daylight and surrounded by keen-eyed spectators, he does cause serpents to emerge from their holes or dens, and so fascinate them by the music that they become subject to his will. Sometimes he grasps a serpent by the nape of its neck, and bites pieces out of its head and neck. G. E. POST.

i. Hired Servant.—The word employed in Hebrew for a servant who worked for hire, a hired servant, is שָׂכִיר, a term also employed in Jer 46^{21} for a mercenary soldier. Such a hired servant was, however, free to render such service or not as he pleased. There was no constraint over his activity except for the stipulated time and mode of it, for which payment or wages (שָׂכָר) was received. It is very difficult to determine what place the hired servant or workman filled in the earlier period of Israel's pre-exilian history. There are no regulations about him in the primitive compend of laws called the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21–23). The wild followers whom Abimelech hired (Jg 9^{4}) scarcely come under this category, and the same remark applies to the priest hired by Micah (Jg 18^{4}). But it is otherwise when we come to the more developed code of the Book of Deuteronomy, which reflects a more advanced state of civilization. There we find distinct provision made that the hired servant is to be paid regularly every evening (Dt 24^{15}) before sunset, and this rule is made to apply to both Hebrew and foreign labourer alike. In the post-exilian legislation contained in the Book of Leviticus (19^{13}) this instruction is maintained in full force. In fact, in post-exilian times an effort becomes clearly apparent in legislation to make the lot of the slave approximate to that of the hired servant (Lv 25^{40}). In the post-exilian literature the references to the hired servant are not infrequent. See the Lexicons, s. שָׂכִיר. The Greek equivalent is μίσθιος, μισθωτός. The former is the term employed in Lk $15^{17.19}$. The difference between the relation of the שָׂכִיר or hired servant to the Hebrew household and that of the slave (עֶבֶד), or of the stranger or resident alien (גֵּר), was that the relation of the hired servant was looser; see FAMILY.

ii. Slave.—1. NAME AND MEANING.—The ordinary Heb. equivalent of 'servant' was the word which properly designates slave, עֶבֶד, 'ebed, a word common to all Semitic languages, including Sabæan. It is, however, seldom found in Assyro-Babylonian, in which the equivalent more frequently used is ardu. The Gr. equivalent is δοῦλος (also θεράπων, παῖς, οἰκέτης). The word עֶבֶד is as common in Phœnician as in Hebrew, and enters into Phœn. proper names (compounded with the name of deity precisely as in Heb.). See Bloch, Phönicisches Glossar, pp. 47, 48, both pages being entirely filled with examples. The Tel el-Amarna tablets give us further evidence of Canaanite names of the 15th cent. (circ.), viz. 'Abd-Addi, 'Abd-Uraš, 'Abd-'Aširta, 'Abd-Milki, etc. For similar names compounded with 'Abd (fem. Amat) in Arabic, see Wellhausen, *Reste*², pp. 2–4. The verbal root of the substantive עבד connotes fundamentally the idea of working. In primitive life this meant chiefly the tilling of the soil (Gn 2^{5} 3^{23} 4^{2}, 2 S 9^{10}). Then it came to be specially associated with the conception of working for (Heb. לְ) another. Accordingly, the subst. עֶבֶד is based on this special meaning, and therefore signifies one who labours for another and remains permanently subject to this relationship.

This is, in fact, the cardinal distinction between a free man whose activity is not restricted by any compulsion to serve the interests of another, and the slave whose activity is so restricted.

2. ORIGIN OF SLAVERY.—Slavery was probably a necessary element in all ancient industrial life. Slavery arises from two main causes, viz. Want and War. Privation and famine compel a man, a family, or a clan to accept terms of service and maintenance from others to which under normal conditions they would never submit. War, a yet more potent cause, brings in its train foreign captives who are forced to enter a lot of subjection to the will of their conquerors. War, moreover, carries in its track desolation of house and home and of all means of subsistence. Whole populations are rendered destitute, and flee for protection and maintenance to some friendly but alien race, and thus voluntarily enter into the position of bond-slaves as a refuge from famine and death. 'The greatest of all divisions,' says Tylor,* 'that between freeman and slave, appears as soon as the barbaric warrior spares the life of his enemy when he has him down, and brings him home to drudge for him and till the soil. How low in civilization this begins appears by a slave-caste forbidden to bear arms forming part of several of the lower American tribes.' We shall presently see how this condition of slavery belonged to the old-world life of ancient Heb. society, where the male and female slave rank next above the ox and the ass. The terms used for both were sometimes closely similar, and indicated that they were regarded as property that had been acquired. The oxen were called by the Hebrew his מִקְנֶה, his acquired property or possessions (Lat. peculium, Gr. κτῆνος). The slave, on the other hand, was his purchased possession or מִקְנַת כֶּסֶף (Gn $17^{12.13.23}$, Ex 12^{44} 21^{21b}). Tylor (ib.) thinks that the hired labourer arose out of the more ancient slave, the hired servant out of the ancient servus. 'The master at first let out his slaves to work for his profit, and then free men found it to their advantage to work for their own profit, so that there grew up the great wage-earning class.' The reader will not fail to note that this theory is confirmed by the results of critical inquiry in the OT, for at the commencement of this article we showed good grounds for believing that the שָׂכִיר or hired servant hardly appears in the earlier stages of pre-exilian Hebrew history.

3. Slavery and ancient Civilization.—It can hardly admit of doubt that the advance of early human society in the arts of life was largely aided by the institution of slavery. Through slave labour, agriculture and industrial life progressed, wealth accumulated, and leisure was given to priests, scribes, philosophers, and literati to reflect and raise the level of human intelligence. What modern machinery accomplishes for man now, slave-labour accomplished then. In a word, early civilization rested upon slavery as a basis. Without servile toil such vast structures as the pyramids and the sphinx of Gizeh would never have been reared. This is confirmed by the tradition of Heb. bondmen employed by the Egyp. Pharaoh in the erection of his granaries (Ex $1^{11.14}$). And when we turn to the Assyr. monuments the same features of slave-labour powerfully impress us. The Assyrian empire, unlike the Babylonian, was essentially military, and the captives obtained by foreign conquest were employed in executing the laborious task of dragging colossal monuments into position. The vivid reliefs discovered at Kouyunjik, portrayed in Layard's Nineveh and Babylon (pp. 25, 27), clearly exemplify the character of those heavy tasks executed in an almost tropical climate. We see the Assyrian king superintending the removal of an enormous bull. Several hundreds of slaves, provided with a rope which passes over their shoulders, are struggling in a long succession that ascends in single file up a steep declivity, dragging into position an immense bull which has been landed from the river. By that river it has evidently been conveyed from the stone quarries where it has been hewn and probably shaped. Other slaves are portrayed carrying saws, picks, and shovels. A pair of them are dragging along by a rope, passing over the shoulder of each, a cart laden with planks or levers. At intervals a task-master can be seen wielding a stick.

But slaves were employed not only in the more laborious forms of manual exertion, but also in the arts requiring manual dexterity and artistic skill. According to Wilkinson (i. p. 457), the monuments testify that the Egyptian male and female musicians and dancers were slaves, just as we know to have been the case in ancient Greece and Rome. The maidens who formed the chorus of the Helene of Euripides were slaves brought to the Egyptian market by Phœnician traders. In Egyptian banquets the men were attended by slaves, while the women were waited upon by handmaids who were female slaves. 'An upper maidservant or a white slave had the office of handing the wine or whatever refreshment was offered to the ladies who were present at a banquet, and a black woman followed her in an inferior capacity to receive an empty cup.' Female slaves are easily recognized in Egyptian portrayals. For they were not permitted to wear the same dress as the ladies, and their hair was adjusted in a different fashion. We find it tied at the back of the head into a kind of loop or arranged in long plaits at the back, while eight or nine others hang down on either side of the neck and face. Also they wore a long tight gown tied at the neck, with short close sleeves reaching nearly to the elbow, or they wore a long loose robe thrown over it. On the other hand the lowest menials, i.e. the men-slaves who toiled in the country, wore 'rough skirts of matting which they were wont to seat with a piece of leather' (Lepsius, Wilkinson), while those who were compelled to adopt a more active mode of life wore nothing but a simple fringed girdle, like that which is still worn by many African tribes, 'a narrow strip of stuff with a few ribbons or the end of the strip itself hanging down in front.' Under the New Empire we even find that the young slaves who served wealthy nobles at feasts wore, as their only article of clothing, a strip of leather which passed between the legs, and was held up by an embroidered belt (Erman).

4. Slavery in ancient pre-exilian Israel.—In the primitive social conditions of ancient Israel the different ranks of the community moved easily and freely amongst each other and came into hourly contact. The courtesies and etiquette of life, especially in salutations and meals, were certainly not neglected; yet the gulfs created between class and class by our highly developed modern civilization were, fortunately for human happiness, then unknown. In the life presented to us in the Books of Judges and Samuel we find high and low equally engaged in pastoral or agricultural employment. We are reminded of the genial state of society in Ithaca as depicted in the Odyssey. When the deputies of Jabesh-gilead came in quest of Saul, they found the Benjamite chief and Israel's future king returning with a yoke of oxen from his field (1 S 11^5). We associate Saul with the figure of the Roman Cincinnatus summoned straight from the plough to assume the office of dictator.

Thus, in that early and simple Hebrew civilization, slavery was free from half the terrors with which the later Roman civilization and the conditions of our modern life have invested it. It cannot be said that in the earlier pre-exilian days the lot of a Hebrew bond-slave among his countrymen was oppressive or even irksome. The description given by Doughty of slavery in the remoter parts of Arabia corresponds in many particulars with the conditions of the early Hebrew bond-servant (Arabia Deserta, i. p. 554)—

> 'The condition of the slave is always tolerable and is often happy in Arabia; bred up as poor brothers of the sons of the household, they are a manner of God's wards of the pious Mohammedan householder who is ammy [properly "my uncle"] of their servitude and abûy ("my father"). . . . It is not many years "if their houselord fears Allah" before he will give them their liberty; and then he sends them not away empty; but in upland Arabia (where only substantial persons are slave-holders) the good man will marry out his free servants, male and female, endowing them with somewhat of his own substance, whether camels or palm-stems.'

We shall note the close parallel between the latter part of this extract and the details of Hebrew usage prescribed in the Book of Deuteronomy.

A slave could attain to a high position in his master's household. He might even become his heir in default of offspring (Gn $15^{2.3}$). The important place filled by the slave Eliezer, though a foreigner (Damascene), in the household of Abraham, is not without parallels in the narratives of antiquity. The Hebrew captive Joseph becomes the prime-minister of Pharaoh. In 1 Ch 2^{34} we read the interesting fact that Sheshan in default of male issue married one of his daughters to the Egyptian (?) slave Jarḥaʽ. In case of an emergency, the master of a household might seek counsel from his slave as from a trusted friend. Abigail has recourse to one of Nabal's slaves for advice in order to appease David's anger (1 S $25^{14ff.}$). A homely episode of this character occurs in the life of Saul (1 S 9^{5-10}, belonging to the older stratum of the narrative called by Budde G; cf. Richter u. Samuel, p. 169 ff.). Saul, in his baffled search for his father's lost asses, turns at length for counsel to his slave. The slave gives the right advice, and directs his master's steps to the seer Samuel. A fee is requisite for the consultation, and the slave lends his master a quarter of a shekel (about 8½d.). Saul, in response to his slave's advice, says, 'Your advice is good: come, let us go.' This vivid narrative reminds us of Gn 24 (J; according to Ball J^2, but Kuenen regards it as J^1), in which Abraham sends Eliezer on an important mission to secure a wife for his son, and exhibits in the clearest manner the confidential relations which subsisted between the head of a household or the sheikh of a clan and his slave. From the above narrative respecting Saul, in which he borrows a small sum from his slave, we gather the significant hint that slaves might even be the owners of property.

The position of a slave in a household would largely depend on his origin, viz. whether of Hebrew or of foreign nationality. In the latter case his situation would certainly not be so favourable, unless indeed, as in the case of Eliezer, he had been born and bred in the household, and thus came to be incorporated in the clan to which he was locally attached, sharing in its hospitality and protection, and taking his due part in its sacra. The position of a recently purchased slave taken captive in war would be far different. In a Roman or Greek household he would be set to do the most menial tasks of drudgery; and his place in a Hebrew family would be similar, though not so forlorn. The Canaanites, as we learn from Jg $1^{28. 30. 33. 35}$, were employed in hard task-work (מַס). These lower employments are described in Dt 29^{11} as gathering firewood and drawing water. The laws respecting warfare in Dt $20^{10\text{ff.}}$ prescribe that the inhabitants of those cities which surrendered voluntarily to Israel should be taken as slaves, while in case of resistance the male inhabitants were to be slain with the sword, and the women and children with the cattle were to be taken as a prey (cf. Nu $31^{17\text{f.}\ 26}$). In the time of David, through his numerous foreign wars, there came to be a large number of these foreign helots engaged in laborious task-work (מַס). From 2 S 20^{24} we gather that it became necessary to appoint an officer to superintend this special department of national life, viz. the מַס עֹבֵד (Gn 49^{15}) or forced service exacted from the slave-labourer. This was probably true of the reign of David's successor Solomon (1 K 9^{21}), who did not find it necessary to exact any bond-service from Hebrews (save for the special work mentioned in $5^{27(13)\text{ff.}}$), since the foreign slaves abundantly sufficed for all needs. Indeed, slaves of foreign origin were very numerous in the East, and this became especially true in the 9th and following centuries. Assyrian inscriptions and portrayals abundantly testify to the barbarous practices that prevailed in ancient Asiatic warfare when cities were stormed and sacked. We know from numerous inscriptions that a large number of the prisoners * were carried away captive. Many of these, of whom female captives constituted a considerable proportion, would inevitably find their way to foreign markets. The great mercantile Canaanite or Phœnician peoples, who had their celebrated emporia of commerce at Tyre and Sidon, shared with the Philistines the unenviable notoriety of being the chief slave-dealing race of antiquity. Thus in the middle of the 8th cent. Amos brings this accusation against the Philistines, who passed on their captive Israelites to the Edomites (Am 1^6). We may conjecture that the last-named sold them again to traders who shipped them from Elath for foreign shores and markets. It is nearly certain that these traders would be Phœnicians, for 'trader' and 'Phœnician' (Canaanite) were almost synonymous terms in those days (Hos 12^7, Is 23^8) and later (Zeph 1^{11}, Ezk 17^4, Pr 31^{24}). Hence the same prophet brings a similar charge against the Phœnicians because they forgot the covenant of 'brethren' which subsisted between Phœnicia and Israel from the days of Solomon (Am $1^{9. 10}$).* In post-exilian times Joel (3 [Heb. 4]^6) denounced both these nations for selling the captives of Jerusalem beyond seas to the sons of Javan, i.e. to the Greek populations which covered the western shores of Asia Minor.

In contrast with the forlorn, though far from hopeless, lot of a foreign slave in a Hebrew household, the condition of a home-born and Israelite slave would be far more tolerable. The Hebrew slave frequently came into his unfortunate position through the exigencies of the harsh laws of debt (see DEBT) which prevailed then and prevail still in Oriental countries. This is clearly shown in Lv $25^{25. 39}$, which exhibits the case of a man voluntarily entering the state of servitude in order to discharge the debts which his poverty and embarrassments had contracted. During the regal period Canaanite civilization had spread and had become absorbed by the Hebrew inhabitants, the population of towns had increased, and the power of the rich landowning class was seriously felt. The creditor became sometimes so harsh and exacting, that, if the father died, the sons might be sold into slavery to pay his debt (2 K 4^1).† These social evils must have been aggravated in the 9th cent. B.C., when the Syrian wars desolated the borders of both Ephraim and Judah, and the small farmers lost their crops and cattle through the ravages of the invader (cf. Is 1^7, Jer 6^{12}), and were driven to borrow at the oppressive rate of even 20 per cent.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the miserable lot of the oppressed peasantry awakened both the pity and indignation of the prophets of the 8th cent., who rebuked the overbearing avarice of the wealthy landowner. Amos upbraids the harsh creditor who sells his helpless victim into slavery for a paltry debt equivalent in value to a pair of sandals (Am 2^6 8^6). A generation later Isaiah denounces the aggravated evils of his own time, the accumulation of the smaller properties consequent on the dispossession of the smaller owner (Is 5^8). Meanwhile wealth increased with rapid strides in spite of the Assyrian invasions. In the days of Amos the nobles lived in luxury in their summer and winter houses (Am 3^{15}, cf. ch. 6). In the Northern kingdom houses were erected of hewn stone instead of the common brick, and of cedar in place of the common sycamore (Is 9^{10}). 'The land was full of silver and gold, and there was no end to the treasures' (2^7). Young foreign slaves were sold into Israel in considerable numbers.‡

5. LEGISLATION RESPECTING SLAVES. — This is

* The Assyrian term was šallatu (שׁלל) and kišittu (kišidtu, root כשד). The former term, characteristically enough, is inclusive of spoil generally (Tiglath-pileser I. Prism Insc. col. ii. 80, iii. 66, 85 [B.C. 1100]). But the meaning is only too clear in Ašurnaṣirabal's Annals, i. 108 (c. 880 B.C.), where we read that he stormed the fortress of Ḥulai, and III M šallasunu ina išati ašrup, 'I consumed with fire 3000 of their captives and left not one soul alive,'—kišittu, on the other hand, means definitely war-captives. These were employed by Esarhaddon in building temples (Prism Inscc. A and C, col. iv. 44–46). Respecting slavery in Babylonia, see Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. (1888) ii. p. 506 ff.

* For a different interpretation of the 'covenant of brothers,' see Driver, Joel and Amos, p. 137.

† 'A young family is sometimes an insupportable burden to poor parents. Hence it is not a very rare occurrence in Egypt for children to be publicly carried about for sale by their mothers or by women employed by the fathers; but this very seldom happens except in cases of great distress' (Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, p. 205).

‡ So we should probably understand the doubtful passage Is 2^{6b}, which runs in the Hebrew ו[ב] ילדי נכרים ישׂפּיקו 'and they abound in young foreign (slaves).' It is probably rendered with fair correctness by the LXX καὶ τέκνα πολλὰ ἀλλόφυλα ἐγενήθη αὐτοῖς. That the Hiph'il of שׂפק probably meant 'abound' is confirmed by the Aram. ܣܦܩ effusus est, satis fuit, and Ḳal in 1 K 20^{10}. Moreover, this meaning harmonizes with מָלְאָה and וַתִּמָּלֵא in the context.

to be found in all three codes of the Torah, viz. (a) the Book of the Covenant in Ex 21^{1-11}; (b) its subsequent development in the Deuteronomic legislation in Dt 15^{12-18}; (c) lastly, in the post-exilian Book of Leviticus (P) in Lv 25^{39-55}. All these, except Lv 25^{44-55}, deal with the conditions of a Hebrew slave in the possession of a master of the same nationality, and not with the case of a foreign slave. This must be considered separately.

A. We shall deal, first, with the pre-exilian legislation contained in the two sections (a) and (b). The period of service is fixed as six years; in the seventh there is the year of release. The question has been asked whether the six years may not be regarded as a maximum period. It is certainly quite possible that when, as in the case of debt, the sum to be earned by service could be worked out in a shorter term, the six-years' period might be abridged, but we have insufficient data in the OT to guide us on this point. The legislation appears to contemplate six years as the least period for which service could be entered. So Rabbis in their interpretations have inferred. Jacob's seven years' bondage to Laban (Gn 29^{18}) seems to point to a somewhat divergent tradition. It is evident that the six-years' period corresponds to the six days of work followed by the day of Sabbath rest. So with agricultural land, which in the seventh year is to lie fallow. Jer 34^{8-22} is interesting and significant, since it shows that these laws respecting slaves were constantly violated by the owners.

In the pre-exilian legislation the special cases are duly provided for. But this is more particularly true of the earlier compend of laws (Book of the Covenant). In Ex $21^{3.4}$ the case of a man who enters bond-service unmarried is distinguished from that of a married man. Under the latter case there are two varieties. If the marriage took place prior to the term of service, husband and wife become free together. But if the slave marries one of the slave-girls in his master's household, the wife and the children born to him by her do not accompany the husband in his year of release. This last stipulation is not mentioned in the Deuteronomic legislation. Are we to understand that the express provisions of the earlier legislation are tacitly assumed in the later? This is scarcely probable, since (1) the Deuteronomic legislation consistently repeats the earlier provisions of the Book of the Covenant, when adopted into its own code. Their omission, when tacitly understood, would have greatly abbreviated the later legislation in its written form. (2) We note a striking contrast between the express provision in Dt 15^{17b} (viz. that the ceremony described in Ex 21^6, Dt 15^{17a} should apply to women as well) and the hard injunction of Ex 21^7 that the daughter who is sold as a bondwoman shall not go free as the bondman does. It is true that the case here contemplated is that of concubinage; but, as Driver in his commentary pertinently observes, the terms in Dt $15^{12.17}$ are quite general, and we are not therefore justified in introducing exceptions out of the earlier legislation. The code of Deuteronomy is evidently separated from the Book of the Covenant by several centuries during which the Hebrew race advanced both socially and politically. The humanitarian tendency which was already conspicuous in the more primitive legislation had advanced still further. It may even be true, as Driver suggests, that Deuteronomy belongs to an age so far advanced on that of the earlier code that the case no longer practically occurred of a woman being sold into slavery for concubinage, or at all events this was not contemplated or recognized. This could hardly have been true at a date earlier than B.C. 622.

It sometimes, perhaps not infrequently, happened that a slave loved his master, or was impelled by the strong motives which the sustenance and protection of his master's home afforded, not to avail himself of the opportunity of the seventh year of release. Under the terms of the earlier legislation, a wife, married when her husband was living in bondage in his master's household, and the family reared under these conditions could not pass into freedom with the man when the seventh year of release had come. This would furnish an even stronger inducement not to avail himself of the freedom which the seventh year permitted. The master would then take the slave and bring him to God (i.e. to the local priest in the nearest sanctuary*), and bore through his ear in token of the fact that the slave was now the property of his master in perpetuity (Ex 21^6). This should not be understood to mean merely until the year of jubilee, as Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 28) and Rashi assume, since this would introduce an arbitrary qualification. The year of jubilee, as we shall have subsequent occasion to see, belongs to a later stage of national life.

The growing humanitarian tendency which is characteristic of the Deuteronomic legislation shows itself in the addition of an express stipulation (Dt $15^{13.14}$) that the master on releasing his slave was to provide him liberally from his flocks, his corn, and his wine † (cf. the modern Arabian usage cited from Doughty, above, p. 462^b).

The special case must now be considered of a father selling his daughter into slavery to another. To this the Book of the Covenant refers (Ex 21^{7-11}). This was done under the stipulation that the maiden should become the master's concubine or that of his son. If she fail to please her master (or his son) who has destined her for himself (read לֹו with Ḳĕrê in place of לֹא), she shall be redeemed [by her father or some near relative]. Under no circumstances is she to be sold into the hands of a foreigner. If she be the concubine of the master's son, she is to be treated as a daughter of the master's household. But if another woman is married, she is in no way to be defrauded of her food, dress, or conjugal rights. If any of these three rights of food, dress, etc., be not preserved intact, she may claim her freedom and depart without any redemption money being paid as compensation. As already stated, the case of a concubine-slave does not arise in the Deuteronomic code.

Budde in ZATW, 1891, p. 100 f., discusses the difficulties of Ex 21^{8-11}. After remarking that Dt $15^{12.17}$ indicates an advance in civilization, he compares Lv 19^{20}, which, however, contemplates a different set of conditions. Budde suggests an ingenious emendation of the doubtful אשר לא יעדה into אשר לא יְדָעָהּ 'provided that he has not known her (carnally).' The LXX ἡ αὐτῷ καθωμολογήσατο, 'has promised or pledged herself to him,' appears to sustain the reading of the Ḳĕrê. We might, on the other hand, also render the Heb. text (Ḳĕrê) 'to whom [one] has destined her.' W. R. Smith, however, in ZATW, 1892, p. 162, supports Budde's reading of יְדָעָהּ, and makes the further suggestion that לא did not originally stand in the text, which was simply אשר ידעה. This involved a primitive usage whereby the heir (or son) inherited marital rights (Kinship and Marriage, p. 89 f.). The story of Absalom shows that this might occur even in the lifetime of the father without shocking public feeling. But to the later Jewish ideas this was abhorrent. Hence the insertion of לֹא into the text. Subsequently another textual tradition arose through the 'יְעָדָהּ' of v.^{9}, which caused 'ידעה' to be corrected to 'יעדה', which found its way into our Massoretic text. לֹא of the Kᵉthîb thus remained unintelligible, and it was extremely easy for the Jewish scholars to assume that here as in so many passages it stands in place of לוֹ. The reading אשר ידעה is confirmed by (1) the phrase בבגדו בה, which obviously presupposes sexual intercourse, (2) best explains רעה בעיני.—If we accept W. R. Smith's emendation, it would seem to show that the Book of the Covenant arose considerably earlier than the 8th cent. For in Am 2^{7} the prophet denounces the profanation of the 'holy name' by the intercourse of father and son with the same paramour (cf. Gn 35^{22b} (P), 49^{4}). Here the נַעֲרָה may probably refer to the קְדֵשָׁה of some local high place. The sentiment which underlies the verse is unmistakable.

* This is the view taken by most commentators; אֶל־הָאֱלֹהִים does not mean 'to the judges,' as Dillm. seems disposed to understand it. For Jg 5^8, 1 S 2^{25} (see Löhr, ad loc.), and Ex $22^{7.8.28}$ are passages where אלהים should be rendered by 'God' not 'judges,' God being regarded as the fountain of true justice, who spoke through the priest and witnessed the transaction. Hence LXX πρὸς τὸ κριτήριον τοῦ θεοῦ. Nowack would understand by אלהים here the 'family ancestors' (cf. 1 S 28^{13}, Is 8^{19}). The slave was taken to the family sanctuary and adopted permanently into the possessions of the family. But this is a far-fetched theory, and the employment of אלהים in a code of legislation in a sense so exceptional is certainly improbable.

The boring of the ear (probably the right ear, Lv $8^{23f.}$ $14^{14.17}$) was also practised by other Oriental peoples, e.g. the Mesopotamians (Juven. i. 104), Arabs (Petronius, Sat. 102), Lydians (Xenoph. Anab. III. i. 31), and Carthaginians (Plautus, Pœnul. v. ii. 21). For other parallels consult Dillm. on Ex 21^6.

† This humane Deuteronomic law was fully maintained in the later Jewish usage. According to Ḳiddushîn 17, the worth of these parting gifts to the released slave must amount to 30 sclaim or 78 shillings (Hamburger).

B. The post-exilian legislation of the Book of Leviticus (25^{39-55}) was distinct, and was designed to meet the special conditions of the post-exilian times. The institution of the year of JUBILEE now takes the place of the old pre-exilian law respecting the seventh year of release. An express distinction is made between Hebrew slaves and foreigners. The latter are to be slaves for life, and do not come under the operation of the law of jubilee, whereby the Hebrew slave with his family in the fiftieth year passed out of bondage and returned to his own kindred and to his own inherited property, where he was enabled to maintain himself and his family in freedom.

The older biblical scholars attempted to reconcile the Levitical legislation with the older codes. Thus Saalschütz held the view that the legislation of Exodus and Deut. referred to the tribes related to the Hebrews, while the law of jubilee applied to Israelites only. But this distinction is an artificial 'Nothbehelf,' and the same remark applies to Dillmann's attempt to harmonize Levit. with the earlier legislation by assuming that the former was designed to secure to those who had not made use of their right of release in the seventh year through utter impoverishment, that they should not be slaves for ever, but obtain their release in the fiftieth.—But both these theories are based on a failure to recognize that the Levitical regulations were a completely new constructive effort to settle the conditions of Hebrew bond-service.

It is not by any means clear how far the slave benefited by the new conditions. Indeed the old Deuteronomic law seems more favourable, if the year of jubilee was over six years distant. The object of the new law seems to have been to fix a universally valid date of release, and thus to unite the lot of the individual to the collective life of the nation. Moreover, an express injunction was made (v.$^{47\text{ff.}}$), that Hebrew slaves should be redeemed from bondage to a foreign owner by the nearest kin (first brothers, then uncle or cousin), so that a foreign master had not the unconditional right of possession towards the Hebrew slave until the year of jubilee. The slave was, if possible, to be redeemed before that time, the price of redemption being regulated by (1) the original sum of purchase; (2) the distance of the year of jubilee. We thus find that the fundamental principle was recognized that the Hebrew slave was rather to be regarded as a hired workman, and the price of his purchase or redemption was to be considered as a kind of hire paid for in advance. The Hebrew master was, moreover, exhorted to treat him rather as a brother, or a 'hired servant' and 'sojourner' (vv.$^{39.\ 40}$).

The condition of foreign (i.e. non-Hebrew) slaves has been already referred to, and will now be considered in further detail. The captive taken in war naturally bore a somewhat heavier lot than the Hebrew slave who had passed into that condition by impoverishment or debt. But there were mitigations even in the lot of a foreign slave. A foreign captive woman taken in war and made a concubine was to be treated with a certain deference by her captor (Dt $21^{10\text{ff.}}$). The fact that the slaves of the household were circumcised meant much. They were thereby received into a religious community, and, by taking part in its sacra, shared in its protection. Thus from Dt $12^{12.\ 18}$ $16^{11.\ 14}$ we learn that they partook of the passover and other sacrificial meals, and, as we can easily infer from Ex 20^{10}, they enjoyed their Sabbath rest from toil in common with their Hebrew masters. According to Rabbinic tradition a slave could not be compulsorily circumcised, and, if he was circumcised, he was not to be sold to a foreigner, i.e. he was treated as though he were a Hebrew and not a foreign slave. But if he refused circumcision, he was to be sold after the expiration of a year. On the other hand, if before entering service he made the express stipulation that he was not to be circumcised, he might remain in bondage for an indefinite period; see Mielziner, Die Verhältnisse der Sklaven bei den alten Hebräern, p. 58.

C. Compensation for injury to slaves.—The earliest code of legislation sought to protect the Hebrew slave from maltreatment, and the rules we find on this subject (Ex $21^{20.\ 21.\ 26.\ 27}$) are very explicit on the whole. Smiting a slave so as to entail loss of eye or tooth entitled the slave to complete enfranchisement, and, in case death immediately ensued, a sure vengeance for such an act would be taken. If, however, the slave survived for a day or two before his death, the punishment of his loss by death was considered penalty enough, for the money-value of the slave was the measure of the master's loss.

We note here some vagueness as to what the 'sure vengeance' (v.^{20}), to be wreaked on the slave-owner who murdered his slave, was to be. We cannot fail to remark that the expression falls considerably short of the explicit language of v.^{12}, where the murder of a free Hebrew citizen is to receive the death penalty as its award. When we turn to the post-exilian legislation we observe the contrast. In Lv $24^{17.\ 22}$ all distinctions and special provisos are swept aside. Even the national barriers were discarded in this case by the post-exilian Jew. Bond and free came under the same law as well as the foreigner and Jew. Every murdered man's death was avenged by death.

D. Law respecting runaway slaves.—The beneficent legislation in Deuteronomy on this subject is based on the sacred rights of hospitality which we find not only among primitive Semitic nations,* but also in ancient Greece. It runs: 'Thou shalt not deliver up a slave to his master, who escapes to thee from his master. With thee shall he abide in thy midst in the place that he chooses, in any one of thy cities that he likes.' It may therefore be readily inferred that the recovery of a runaway slave in ancient Israel was far from easy. This we know to have been the case (cf. 1 K 2^{39}). This was another circumstance that tended to mitigate the slaves' lot, by making it incumbent on the owner of slaves to make the conditions of their life tolerable.

6. STATUS OF FEMALE SLAVES.—This varied considerably. As in the case of male slaves, the lot of the foreigner was not so favourable as that of a Hebrew or home-born slave. Yet, on the whole, even the foreign captive might enjoy a position of comparative comfort. The humane legislation of Dt $21^{10\text{ff.}}$ ordained that a foreign captive woman taken in war and made a concubine was to be treated with a certain chivalrous deference, the respite of a month being allowed her by her captor. Note the position of the captive Israelite maiden in the Syrian general's household, 2 K $5^{2ff.}$, the confidential relations that subsisted between her and her mistress, and the sympathy displayed by the former with her master's disease. The genial treatment of foreign slaves in pre-exilian times evidently prevailed among other Semitic races besides the Hebrews.

* Respecting this law of the GĒR see RS^{2} p. 76, 'From the earliest times of Semitic life the lawlessness of the desert, in which every stranger is an enemy, has been tempered with the principle that the guest is inviolable. A man is safe in the midst of enemies as soon as he enters a tent or even touches the tent-rope'; cf. also p. 270.

A Hebrew female slave is described by various terms, according to the position she held. If she became the concubine of her master or of his son, she was designated by the more dignified term אָמָה (Assyr. amtu, Syr. ܐܡܬܐ, Arab. أَمَةٌ, Phœn. אמת; in fact the word is common to all Semitic languages, rendered in LXX by δούλη or θεράπαινα). Under the adverse circumstances brought about by poverty, to which reference has already been made, it not infrequently happened that the daughter could not be disposed of as freeborn in ordinary marriage, because the utter poverty of the parents constituted a social barrier. But if the daughter was dowered with good looks, she could easily be sold as a slave, and the price she would obtain might not fall far short of the ordinary mōhar or purchase-money of a free woman, which in the 7th cent. amounted to 50 shekels, or nearly £7 (Dt 22^{29}). Under any circumstances the transaction in primitive Israel would not have differed essentially from that which took place when a marriage was contracted with a free woman for whom purchase-money called mōhar was paid as though she were a chattel.[*] She would thus take her place as a concubine, and, if she bore children, her position sensibly improved. But if, as in the case of Hagar, she was simply the property of her mistress, and was introduced into this relation, the rights of the mistress might impose somewhat galling restraints. Accordingly, she might be called אָמָה, as the concubine who bore children to her master, and entitled to the rights of a married woman (see above), or, by the inferior designation of a שִׁפְחָה or 'bond-slave,' called upon to do menial tasks (Gn 16^{2}, cf. on the other hand 21^{10}, where Sarah herself calls Hagar אָמָה[†]), since she still remained under the control of the freeborn and superior wife (16^{6}). אָמָה is the expression which a woman does not hesitate, in the ordinary etiquette of social intercourse, to employ respecting herself when she is addressing a superior. This corresponds to the expression עֶבֶד employed by a man under similar circumstances. This distinction in the rank and dignity of the two terms is made clear in the speech of Abigail to David in 1 S 25^{41}. With true womanly dignity and courtesy combined she calls herself אָמָה, and yet consents to become a שִׁפְחָה and do the menial task of washing the feet of David's slaves. It was to the שִׁפְחָה that the laborious duty was assigned of grinding at the mill. This is the word used to designate the slave-girl behind the millstones in Ex 11^{5}, where the term is employed to describe the lower end of the social scale. The LXX render—δούλη, θεράπαινα, and οἰκέτις.

There is another interesting word employed in Hebrew to express slave-concubine, viz. פִּלֶגֶשׁ (פִּילֶגֶשׁ). No satisfactory Semitic etymology can be found for the word, and its form strongly suggests a Greek origin παλλακίς (πάλλαξ, cf. Latin pellex). The Greek race was called יָוָן by the ancient Semites. It is found in the Race-table Gn $10^{2.4}$ (P) and in the Assyr. inscriptions of Sargon and in the Tel el-Amarna tablets. See art. JAVAN. The term therefore originally meant a foreign slave-concubine (cf. Is 2^{6b} and footnote above, p. 463). The references Gn 35^{22}, Jg 19^{1}, 2 S 15^{16} 20^{3} seem to suggest that the pillegesh was of a lower class and lax in morals.

7. PRICE OF SLAVES.—According to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21^{32}) this was 30 shekels, or about £4, 5s., which was evidently the average price in the pre-exilian period. The money-value would of course vary with the slave's age and physical condition. Joseph's brethren were content with 20 shekels when he was sold to the Midianite (Ishmaelite) traders (Gn 37^{28}). This was due to his youth. According to the post-exilian Jewish legislation (Lv 27^{2-8}), 20 silver shekels (nearly £3) was the sum fixed for the redemption of slaves between 5 and 20 years old. We find the same price ($\frac{1}{3}$ maneh) paid for a slave from Suri mentioned in a very early contract-tablet of Babylonia.[*] The ordinary price, however, for an adult slave prevailing in Western Asia during several centuries was that stated in Ex 21^{32}, viz. 30 shekels. This, according to the most probable computation of the money-value of a ḥomer and a lethech, was the price paid for his wife by the prophet Hosea (3^{2}). See Nowack, ad loc. This was nearly the amount paid by Ptolemy Philadelphus for every Jewish captive in Egypt that he redeemed, viz. 120 drachmæ (about £4).[†] In 2 Mac $8^{9.10}$ we read that Nicanor attempted to defray the Roman tribute of 2000 talents by the sale of Jews at the rate of 90 per talent. This shows that the same value prevailed in the 2nd cent. B.C. Nor can we forget that for 30 shekels our Lord was sold by His traitor-disciple to the Jewish authorities (cf. Zec 11^{12}).

When we turn to the clay documents of Babylonia we find like sums and even lower paid for a slave. The values also range in special cases much higher. Thus in the time of Nebuchadnezzar we hear of a woman, Sakinna, and her daughter, a little girl of 3 years of age, being sold for 35 shekels [or nearly £5]. In another case a husband and his wife fetch 55 shekels [or about £7, 10s.] (Sayce). Mr. Pinches has transcribed a contract-tablet, in which a slave is sold for $2\frac{2}{3}$ manehs of silver, or more than £22;[‡] while, according to Tiele, a slave might even cost as much as £95.[§] In both these last instances the slave must have been particularly valuable, probably owing to his possession of skilled qualifications.

8. SUBSEQUENT HISTORY OF SLAVERY FROM THE DAYS OF JEREMIAH.—In Jer $34^{8f.}$ we read of the unsuccessful attempt which was made in the reign of Zedekiah to carry out the provisions of the Deuteronomic code respecting the seventh year of release, the philanthropic efforts of the king being thwarted by the avarice of the owners. On the other hand, Nehemiah's strenuous endeavours in the years that followed the return from exile were crowned with better success. Acting in the spirit of the new Levitical legislation (Lv $25^{47f.}$), the Jewish slaves of foreign masters were redeemed, and the rich were persuaded to forego at least a portion of their rights of usury through which the whole trouble of bondage to a foreigner was brought about. 'We have borrowed money to pay the royal tribute upon our fields and our vineyards . . . and, lo! we reduce our sons and our daughters to slavery, and it is not in our power to help it; for other men have our fields and our vineyards' (Neh 5^{1-13}). Nehemiah's request, that the fields, vineyards, oliveyards, and houses should be restored, was complied with. Doubtless in later times there was full scope for the operation of this injunction to redeem the Israelite slave from bondage to a foreign master, for we read that in the wars of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ large numbers of Jewish captives were taken (1 Mac 3^{41}, 2 Mac 8^{11}).

[†] Similarly in Gn 30 Bilhah is called by Rachel in her conversation with Jacob 'my 'āmāh,' while in the narrative she is described as her shiphḥah. This chapter is an intricate complex of J and E. It is impossible to say that either document shows a preference for one expression over the other, though in ch. 21 E prefers the title אָמָה for Hagar.

It would be an interesting object of investigation to endeavour to determine how far the philanthropic tendencies of Nehemiah and of the post-exilian legislation were influenced by the humane civilization of Babylonia. That that civilization was humane is clearly attested in the OT. Jeremiah's advice to the Jewish captives in Babylonia, 'Build ye houses, and dwell in them; plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them; take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters' . . . (Jer $29^{5.6}$), would have been impracticable under any other than an enlightened and humane polity. And the fact that large numbers of Jewish residents preferred to remain in the land of exile instead of availing themselves of the edict of Cyrus to return to their own land, is a significant hint in the same direction. Babylonia, as Sayce has pointed out, was a land where agricultural pursuits were carried on, as in Egypt, by industrious, peace-loving freedmen (not by slaves, as in Assyria, where the pursuits preferred by the conquering race were trade and war). In many instances we learn from the clay documents of purchase or sale that mother and child were sold together. Indeed, rights were accorded to women in possessing property superior to those of their Hebrew sisters in pre-exilian Canaan. 'The ancient Accadian law ordered, that if children had been born to slaves whom the former owner had sold while still keeping a claim upon them, he should, in buying them back, take the children as well at the rate of 1½ shekels each' (Sayce, Social Life among the Assyrians and Babylonians, p. 79).

The number of slaves in Palestine at any time down to the 1st cent. A.D. was probably small in comparison with that which was to be found in ancient Greece or in Rome in the later days of the Republic. From the report of a census made in B.C. 309, the male citizens of Athens numbered 45,000, and the slaves 350,000. It must be confessed, however, that the accuracy of this computation might be questioned. That the number was very considerable cannot be denied. For even the poorest citizen had a slave for his household, and a great number were employed in the occupations of baking, cooking, tailoring, etc. The father of Demosthenes possessed 50 slaves. Others owned many more (cf. Xenoph. Vect. 4. §§ 14, 15). They were employed in workshops or mines.—In ancient Rome large portions of the ager publicus began to be held by patricians as the Roman State extended its confines. These land-possessions were cultivated to a large extent by slaves (cf. Liv. vi. 12). Thus slaves increased in number, displaced the poorer class of freemen and peasant proprietors, and in the Licinian Rogations (B.C. 367) a provision became necessary that a certain number of freemen should be employed on every estate. In the later days of the Republic, and under the first emperors, the number of household slaves increased greatly (cf. Juv. Sat. iii. 141). Horace seems to regard ten slaves as a moderate number for a person in comfortable circumstances to keep (Sat. I. iii. 12, vi. 7). These would be largely supplied from the vast number of captives taken in war. From Cæs. BG iii. 16 we gather that slave-dealers followed in the track of an army, and after a victory, when a sale of slaves took place (sub corona vendidit), purchased at a cheap rate.

The treatment of slaves became more inhuman both in Greece and Rome as their number increased. In some respects their position in Athens was worse than it was in Rome. For in Athens the manumission of slaves did not take place so frequently as in Rome. Moreover, their position as manumitted slaves (ἀπελεύθεροι) was inferior to that which they enjoyed in Rome; for instead of becoming citizens they passed into the condition of mere μέτοικοι, and were obliged to honour their former master as their patron (προστάτης), and, if they neglected certain duties which they owed towards him, might even forfeit their modified condition of freedom. Even Aristotle regards a slave as a mere possession or chattel (κτῆμα), or an ἔμψυχον ὄργανον, an instrument endowed with life (Eth. Nic. viii. 13, Pol. i. 4). The bad treatment of Greek slaves is evidenced by the fact that they often mutinied (Plato, Legg. vi. 777 C). The insurrections under the Republic in Italy and Sicily attained formidable proportions. The two servile revolts in Sicily in B.C. 135 and 102 taxed all the resources of Rome, and were with difficulty suppressed, while the rebellion under Spartacus carried devastation through the Italian peninsula (B.C. 73–71). Nor are we in any degree surprised when we take account of the harsh penalties inflicted on slaves by their Roman masters, e.g. working in chains and fetters (Plautus, Most. I. i. 18; Terence, Phorm. II. i. 10), suspension by the hands while heavy weights were tied to the feet (Plautus, Asin. II. ii. 31). We read also of hard labour in the ergastulum, and of such harsh penalties as the furca, crux, and notatio (or branding inflicted on runaway slaves). Even ladies treated their slave attendants harshly in the days of the Empire, as Martial and Juvenal testify (Juven. Sat. vi. 219 ff., 492; Mart. Epig. ii. 66; cf. Ovid, Am. i. 14, 15). Varro, in his de Re Rustica (i. 71), expressly classes slaves with beasts of burden; and even the gentle and refined Cicero feels constrained to apologize to his friend Atticus for feeling 'more than a becoming grief' for the death of his slave Sositheus[*] (Ep. ad Attic. i. 12).

But as we enter Jewish society we pass into a new and happier world. In the first place, the number of slaves was far smaller in relative proportion. At the return of the exiles there were 42,360 Hebrew freemen, and only 7337 slaves, or one slave to 5·72 freemen. The teachers of the Talmud looked with disfavour on the ownership of many slaves. The more slaves, so much the more thieving; the more female slaves, so much the more unchastity (cf. Babâ mezîʽâ 60*b*). The Essenes and Therapeutæ did not tolerate slavery, as being contrary to man's dignity (Philo, ii. 458, 482). The later literature of the OT reveals the humane attitude of Judaism towards the slave, and the religious basis on which it rested. The latter is vividly expressed in Job 31^{13-15}. Humane and gentle treatment of a slave from his early youth will engender a filial feeling in him towards his master (Pr $29^{19.21}$). On the other hand, it was clearly realized that there were dangers from undue laxity.

> 'Set thy servant to work, and thou shalt find rest;
> Leave his hands idle, and he will seek liberty . . .
> Send him to labour, that he be not idle;
> For idleness teacheth much mischief' (Sir $33^{25.27}$).

And the same writer advises even severe disciplinary measures—

> 'Yoke and thong will bow the weak:
> And for an evil servant there are racks and tortures' (v.^{26}).

It is necessary to bear the last passage in mind if we are to gain a true and complete picture of this aspect of Jewish social life (cf. Mt 25^{30}, Lk 12^{46}, the latter passage showing that very severe corporal chastisement, falling short of loss of limb or life, might be meted out to an 'evil servant').[†] According to the Mishna (Yadaim iv. 7), it was a subject of discussion among Pharisees and Sadducees as to whether a slave who had committed an injury on another was himself responsible or his master. According to the contention of the Pharisees, the master was not responsible, though he was responsible if the injury were committed by his ox. Thus the Pharisees (in contrast with the Roman Varro above cited) emphasized the distinction between an unreasoning brute and a slave. They argued, moreover, that a slave might otherwise easily wreak his spite on his master by committing an injury on another which the master had to pay. According to Babâ ḳammâ (viii. 4), the slave, if he committed an injury on another, was liable to make compensation when he obtained his release.

Respecting the conditions of release of Gentile slaves owned by a Jewish master we have not many data to guide us; see above, under 5 B, ad fin. Every facility was afforded for the manumission of

[†] We are led to suspect that these sterner traits of Jewish treatment reflect Græco-Roman influence.

Gentile slaves. According to the prescriptions of the Talmud, the Gentile slave received release through (1) redemption purchase (Maimonides, 'Abadin, v. 2), (2) letters of manumission (ib. 3), (3) testamentary disposition, (4) silent recognition of his freedom (Peah, iii. 8), (5) by becoming a Jew (i.e. a proselyte), (6) by marriage with a free woman, etc. (Hamburger).

In Schürer, GJV^{3} (iii. p. 53), interesting details are furnished respecting the influence of Greek legal procedure on Jewish practice in the release of slaves. The act of release took place ἐπὶ τῆς προσευχῆς, i.e. in the synagogue before the assembled congregation (probably with some reference to Ex 21^6; see above). Full freedom was granted to the slave, χωρὶς ἰς [=εἰς] τὴν προσευχὴν θωπείας τε καὶ προσκαρτερήσεως [cf. προσκαρτερεῖν in Ac 2$^{42.46}$ 1^{14} 6^4, Ro 12^{12}, Col 4^2], i.e. with the exception of regular worship in the synagogue to which the slave was bound. Accordingly, this mode of release in a sacred place involved a definite pledge on the part of the released slave to honour its religious usages. We have a parallel in Hellenic custom, whereby the procedure took place in a temple, and consisted in a fictitious sale of the slave by the master to the deity, the slave himself bringing the purchase-money. This did not in reality make the emancipated slave into a temple servant. He became actually free, and only morally appropriated by the deity. These facts are certified by documents discovered at Panticapæum and Gorgippia (cf. Schürer, ib. p. 18). The same tradition passed into the Christian Church in the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, and was called manumissio in ecclesia; see Schürer, p. 53, footn. 53.

The treatment of slaves in the Jewish household was not only humane, but under a good and pious master it would be even brotherly. Of the most distinguished personages it is related that they readily feasted their slaves with the same food of which they themselves partook, addressed old slaves as 'father' or 'mother,' and regarded their death as that of a beloved relative (Berakhôth 16*b*; Kethubôth 61; Jerus. Babâ ḳammâ 6).* Acc. to Berakhôth, passim, slaves are placed with women and children in exemption from shema' and wearing phylacteries, though bound in other matters of ritual.

9. THE CHRISTIAN ATTITUDE TO SLAVERY.—This may best be described as the religious attitude of Judaism expanded to the dimensions of Christ's gospel of universal redemptive love to man. With its advent new powers had entered into the world—new conceptions of human duties and relationships. All these lie implicit in Christ's Gospel of the Kingdom. 'To the poor the gospel is preached' (Mt 11^5). St. Paul expressed the new consciousness in the words: 'All are sons by faith in Christ Jesus . . . As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. . . . There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free . . . for ye are all one in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3$^{26-28}$, cf. Col 3$^{10.11}$). And so the doors were thrown open wide to a world that yearned for salvation.

'The kingdom of God with its sublime universalism offers its invitation to all men as children of a heavenly Father, and binds those who follow His call into a society. . . . In the Christian Church the poor man found the civic rights of the Divine kingdom accorded to him without reserve as God's own child. . . . To the slaves, that lowest and most unhappy class of Græco-Roman society, the rights of man were restored. In the Church they heard the magic tones of the words: "Ye are men for whom also Christ has died; redeemed, to whom the same position belongs in the kingdom of God as to your masters." Masters also heard in the Church the solemn admonition that they were the brethren of their slaves, since both had taken upon themselves by voluntary choice the yoke of obedience to Christ (1 Co 7$^{21ff.}$, Eph 6$^{5ff.}$). When Paul uttered thoughts like these in his letter to Philemon, in which he interceded for the runaway slave of the latter, he was writing the charter of emancipation for the many millions of slaves who were held down by a minority in a degrading bondage.' †

Nevertheless, the Church issued no authoritative mandate that masters were to liberate their slaves. On the contrary, obedience to masters was inculcated (Eph 6^5, cf. parallels), as well as forbearance to slaves (v.^{9}).* The leaven was to work slowly and surely, without external compulsion by ecclesiastical authority, through eighteen centuries, until in the 19th cent. slavery was abolished in all the territories of Christian European peoples. In the 20th the leaven will work its course in society to yet larger issues!

10. RELIGIOUS USE OF THE TERM 'SLAVE' ('SERVANT').—The word 'servant' or 'slave' is constantly employed in the etiquette of daily intercourse in ancient Semitic society and among Arab populations at the present day. 'Thy servant' (or if a woman, 'thy handmaid') is the language of ordinary courtesy employed by an individual, when he speaks of himself, in addressing a superior or even an equal. In relation to God, this term is universally used by the worshipper. The root עבד expresses the dependent relation of subordination and obedience on the part of the individual to his Divine patron and Lord. And it has been shown, under ii. 1, how constantly this expression enters into proper names compounded with the name of deity, whether Canaanite or Hebrew. That collective and idealized Israel was so designated is especially apparent in Deutero-Isaiah. The term had been already employed in Ezk 28^{25} 37^{25}, and also in Jer 30$^{10ff.}$ 46$^{27ff.}$.† The passages in which the expression occurs in its most characteristic form within the collection designated by the term Deutero-Isaiah (chs. 40–56) are specially called the 'servant' passages, and are regarded by most critics as distinct in authorship,‡ viz. 42$^{1-4}$ 49$^{1-6}$ 50$^{4-9}$ 52^{13}–53^{12}.

The portrayal of the servant in these four sections is distinct from that which prevails in the rest of Deutero-Isaiah. In the former the servant is idealized, personal and sinless. He is Jehovah's disciple, chosen to minister to the heathen as well as to his own people (49^6), going about his own mission with quietness (42$^{2.3}$ 53^7), suffering like Jeremiah and Job through the scorn of the unfaithful, and so offering a propitiation for the guilt of his race (53$^{4-6}$). On the other hand, in the rest of Deutero-Isaiah, the 'servant Jacob' is blind, deaf, a prisoner plundered, despised, full of sin, though chosen by God, protected and destined for a glorious future. Yet these two portrayals have their essential features in common. Accordingly, 'servant (or slave) of Jehovah,' as a religious term applied to Israel, is a name of honour. Israel is chosen as God's messenger as well as servant. In fact the difference between Jacob as God's מַלְאָךְ and as His own personal slave, called to a high and honourable mission, is very slight. The two expressions stand in parallelism in 42^{19}. The servant is the chosen one in whom God takes pleasure. We are reminded of the relationship of Abraham to God as the 'friend of God' (2 Ch 20^7, Ja 2^{23}, cf. Korân, sur. 4^{124}). See, further, art. ISAIAH, and Smend, ATliche Religiongesch.^{2} p. 352 ff. In fact the expression is constantly employed in the OT as a name for God's messengers, especially the prophets (Am 3^7, Jer 7^{25} 25^4 26^5 etc.), cf. Rev 10^7 11^{18}. It is used of Moses (Dt 34^5, Jos 1^1), of Isaiah (Is 20^3). Furthermore, it is used of the Messiah in Zec 3^8, and of the angels in Job 4^{18} (on the other hand, in Ps 103^{21} 104^4 the term employed is מְשָׁרְתִים, which properly expresses honourable, voluntary, and, moreover, priestly service to God).

* On the humane treatment of slaves by Moslems see Lane's Arabian Nights, vol. i. p. 64 ff. (ch. i. note 13). Nevertheless, we are told that 'a master may even kill his own slave with impunity for any offence, and he incurs but a slight punishment (as imprisonment for a period at the discretion of the judge) if he kills him wantonly' (p. 63).

† Mangold, Humanität und Christenthum, Rede beim Antritt des Rectorats der Rheinischen Friederich Wilhelms Universität, am 18 October 1876. Bonn, Adolph Marcus.

* It should not be forgotten that the distinction between bond and free is cancelled, according to St. Paul's conception, only in Christ, i.e. within the confines of the redeemed society—the Church. Outside the Church the distinction might still prevail, and even be regarded as valid. St. Paul hardly contemplates any reorganization of society that does not rest on redemption and sanctification of individual life as a basis. In that outside world St. Paul might conceivably still regard Roman law as a quasi παιδαγωγός, and hold that slavery, as a human institution, under certain guarantees, might be under temporary Divine sanction. Modern missionaries of the Cross in heathendom, with its more primitive social conditions, have been compelled to adopt this view.

† It can scarcely be held that either of these latter passages is genuine. In Cornill's text (SBOT) they are relegated to the foot of the page.

‡ But see Budde, Die sogenannten Ebed-Jahwe-Lieder, 1900. Marti also argues against separating the conceptions in the Servant-passages from the rest of Deutero-Isaiah; see his commentary, p. 289 f.; so also Cornill in Theolog. Rundschau, Nov. 1900.

The transition from this OT use to the NT application of the corresponding term δοῦλος is very slight. It is applied to himself by Symeon (Lk 2^{29}) in his prayer to God (Nunc Dimittis), Who is consistently addressed as δεσπότης (a master of slaves, cf. Ac 4^{24}, Rev 6^{10}), and similarly the Virgin Mary speaks of herself as God's δούλη (אָמָה), Lk 1^{38}.

This term St. Paul, in the introduction to his Epistles, not infrequently uses with reference to himself (Ro 1^{1}, Ph 1^{1}); and that it is employed as an honourable designation, like the עֶבֶד of Ezekiel and Deutero-Isaiah, is evident from the corresponding use of ἀπόστολος in 1 Cor., 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., and Col. (equivalent to מַלְאָךְ, see above).

The relation of service to God is one of freedom and sonship (υἱοθεσία), as we learn from Ro 8^{21}. We have been emancipated from the older relationship to the law, which was one of fear and constraint, summed up in Ro 8^{15}, in the phrase πνεῦμα δουλείας . . . εἰς φόβον. These two contrasted states of relationship, belonging respectively to the new covenant of freedom and to the old covenant of bondage to the law, are compared by way of allegory to Isaac, son of the freewoman Sarah, and Ishmael, son of the bond-slave (παιδίσκη) Hagar. The one is represented by the heavenly Jerusalem and the other by Mount Sinai (Gal 4^{21}–5^{1}). By His death Christ has freed us from subjection to bondage throughout our life through fear of death (He 2^{15}). Obviously, such a relationship of free, loving service to Christ is not adequately expressed by δουλεία. The slave has no proper cognizance of his master's thoughts, but Christ has confided all His Father's purposes of love to His disciples. 'Henceforth I do not call you servants (slaves), but I have called you friends' (Jn 15^{15}).

SET.—The Eng. verb to 'set' is properly a causative form of 'sit,' but it has been confused with 'sit' (partly through spelling both 'set'), and, like other monosyl. verbs, has come to be used very freely. 1. Observe the foll. passages: Gn 30^{36} 'And he set three days' journey betwixt himself and Jacob' (Wyc. 'And putte a space of thre daies weye betwixt,' 1388 'settide the space of weie of thre daies betwixt'); Ex 19^{12} 'And thou shalt set bounds unto the people round about' (Wyc. 'ordeyn termes,' 1388 'sette termes'; Tind. 'sett marks rounde aboute the people'); Ps 73^{18} 'Surely thou didst set them in slippery places'; Sir 10^{9} 'Such an one setteth his own soul to sale' (τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχὴν ἔκπρακτον ποιεῖ); Lk 7^{8} 'I also am a man set under authority' (τασσόμενος); He 12^{1} 'the race that is set before us' (τὸν προκείμενον ἡμῖν ἀγῶνα); 12^{2} 'for the joy that was set before him' (ἀντὶ τῆς προκειμένης αὐτῷ χαρᾶς).

2. To 'be set' is sometimes used as an equivalent for to 'sit,' like Scot. 'be seated,' as Lk 7^{37} Rhem. 'As she knew that he was set downe in the Pharisees house.' So Dn 7^{10} 'The judgment was set' (דִּינָא יְתִב, LXX κριτήριον ἐκάθισε, Vulg. judicium sedit, Wyc. 'the dom sate'); Sir 38^{29} 'Who is alway carefully set at his work'; Mt 5^{1} 'When he was set, his disciples came unto him'; 27^{19}; Lk 2^{34} 'This child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel' (κεῖται); Jn 13^{12} 'So after he had washed their feet . . . and was set down again'; Ph 1^{17} 'I am set for the defence of the gospel' (κεῖμαι); He 8^{1}; Rev 3^{21} 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit (καθίσαι) with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down (ἐκάθισα) with my father in his throne.'

3. To set means to arrange in proper order, in 2 Ch 20^{17} 'Set yourselves, stand ye still,' Ps 2^{2} 'The kings of the earth set themselves' (יִתְיַצְּבוּ, Driver [Par. Psalt.], 'take their stand'), Ca 5^{12} 'His eyes are . . . fitly set,' Is 3^{24} 'Instead of well set hair, baldness.' Cf. Ex 25^{7} Tindale, 'Onix stones and sett stones for the Ephod'; Chaucer, Duchesse, 828—

> 'So had she
> Surmounted hem alle of beaute,
> Of maner and of comlinesse,
> Of stature and wel set gladnesse.'

4. The sense of 'fix,' 'determine,' arises naturally from the original idea of 'cause to stand.' Thus Neh 2^{6} 'It pleased the king to send me; and I set him a time'; so Gn 17^{21} 'At this set time in the next year' (cf. 21^{2}, Ex 9^{5}); 'set office' (אֱמוּנָה), 1 Ch 9$^{22.26.31}$, 2 Ch 31$^{15.18}$; and esp. 'set feast' (as the tr. of מוֹעֵד, lit. 'appointed time' [of sacred seasons]) Lv 13$^{2\text{ff.}}$ RV (7 such are enumerated in this ch.), Nu 10^{10} (RV) 29^{29} al. Cf. Judgement of the Synode at Dort, p. 4, 'Hee hath chosen in Christ unto salvation a set number of certaine men, neither better nor more worthy then others.'

5. The following phrases are mostly biblical: (1) Set one's hand to, Dt 23^{20} 'In all that thou settest thine hand to' (RV 'puttest thine hand unto'), 28^{8}. Cf. Ac 12^{1} Rhem. 'And at the same time Herod the king set his handes, to afflicte certaine of the Church.' (2) Set one's heart to, Ex 7^{23} 'Neither did he set his heart to this also' (RV 'lay even this to heart,' RVm 'Heb. set his heart even to this'); Dt 32^{46} 'Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day'; 1 Ch 22^{19} 'Now set your heart and your soul to seek the Lord your God'; Job 7^{17} 'What is man . . . that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him?'; Ps 78^{8} 'A generation that set not their heart aright'; Jer 31^{21} 'Set thine heart toward the highway'; Dn 6^{14} 'Then the king . . . set his heart on Daniel to deliver him.' Cf. 1 Ch 29^{3} 'I have set my affection to the house of my God.' (3) Set one's face. This is one of the many Hebraisms in which the 'face' plays its part. It has two meanings: (a) Turn towards with a purpose or resolution, determine, Nu 24^{1} 'But he set his face toward the wilderness'; 2 K 12^{17} 'And Hazael set his face to go up to Jerusalem'; Ezk 21^{16} 'Go thee one way or other . . . whithersoever thy face is set'; Jer 42^{15} 'If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt,' 42^{17}; Lk 9^{51} 'He stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (τὸ πρόσωπον ἐστήρισεν). (b) To take up an antagonistic position, Lv 17^{10} 'I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood,' 20$^{3.5.6}$; Jer 21^{10} 'For I have set my face against this city for evil'; Ezk 6^{2} 'Son of man, set thy face toward the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them,' 13^{17} 15^{7} 20^{46} 21^{2} 25^{2} 28^{21} 29^{2} 35^{2} 38^{2}. (4) To set eyes on, Ac 13^{9}, is not as now 'to catch a glimpse of,' but to 'fix one's eyes upon': 'Then Saul (who is also called Paul), filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him' (ἀτενίσας εἰς αὐτόν, RV 'fastened his eyes on him').

6. The verb to 'set' is used with certain adverbs in a sense that is antiquated or Hebraistic: (1) Set at, that is, 'valued at,' 2 K 12^{4} 'The money that every man is set at' (RV 'the money of the persons for whom each man is rated,' RVm 'Heb. each man the money of the souls of his estimation'). Cf. Lv 27^{2} Tind. 'Yf any man will geve a synguler vowe unto the Lorde acordynge to the value of his soule, then shall the male from xx. yere unto lx. be set at fyftie sycles of sylver'; and Shaks. Hamlet, I. iv. 67—'I do not set my life at a pin's fee.' (2) Set at nought, i.e. despise, treat with contempt or mockery, Pr 1^{25} 'But ye have set at nought all my counsel,' Mk 9^{12}, Lk 23^{11}, Ac 4^{11} 19^{27}, Ro 14^{10}. (3) Set by, i.e. esteem, 2 Mac 4^{15} 'Not setting by the honours of their fathers, but liking the glory of the [Grecians] best of all' (ἐν οὐδενὶ τιθέμενοι, RV 'making of no account'). Cf. Ps 15^{4} Pr. Bk. 'He that setteth not by hym selfe, but maketh moche of them that fear the Lorde'; Ridley, Works, 27, 'Lest I should seem to set by mine own conceit, more than is meet'; Babees Book, p. 72—

> 'He that good manners seemes to lack,
> No wyse man doth set by:
> Wythout condicions vertuous,
> Thou art not worth a flye.'

So set much by, 1 S 18^{30} 'His name was much set by,' $26^{24\,bis}$: cf. 1 P 3^{4} Tind. 'With a meke and a quyet sprete, which sprete is before God a thinge moche set by.' So also set little by or set light by, Dt 27^{16} 'Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother'; Ezk 22^{7}, Jth 11^{2}. Cf. Jer 50^{12} Cov. 'She shall be the least set by amonge the nacions'; Tindale, Expos. p. 229, 'Called the least, that is to say, shall be little set by and despised: called great, that is to say, shall be much set by and had in reverence.' Even set at light is found in the margin of 2 S 19^{43}. Cf. Fisher, A Spiritual Consolation (in Morley's Eng. Religion, p. 140), 'Such as we set but at light, full greatly shall be weighed in the presence of his most high Majesty'; Knox, Hist. 49, 'Perchance this hand of God will make them now to magnifie and reverence that word which before (for the fear of men) they set at light price.' (4) Set forth. This phrase has various meanings: (a) Begin a journey, Nu 2^{9} 'These shall first set forth'; Ac 21^{2} 'We went aboard, and set forth' (ἀνήχθημεν, RV 'set sail'). Cf. Bunyan, Holy War, 68, 'The time, therefore, of his setting forth being now expired, he addressed himself for his march'; Melvill, Diary, 172, 'Sa, parting from Berwik, hartlie recommendit to the blessing and grace of God, be manie godlie men and women, and be sum sett and convoyet a guid way on our jorney, we cam that night to Anweik.' (b) Bring forward or cause to be seen, Ps 141^{2} 'Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense' (תִּכּוֹן, LXX κατευθυνθήτω, Vulg. dirigatur); Ezk 27^{10} 'They hanged the shield and helmet in thee; they set forth thy comeliness' (נָתְנוּ, LXX ἔδωκαν); Dn $11^{11.\,13}$ 'And he shall set forth a great multitude' (וְהֶעֱמִיד); Am 8^{5} 'When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?' (וְנִפְתְּחָה־בָּר, AVm and RVm 'open'); Lk 1^{1} 'To set forth in order a declaration of those things' (ἀνατάξασθαι); Ro 3^{25} 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation' (ὃν προέθετο ὁ θεός, AVm 'foreordained,' RVm 'purposed'); 1 Co 4^{9} 'For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last' (ἀπέδειξεν); Gal 3^{1} 'Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth' (προεγράφη, RV 'was openly set forth'); Jude ^{7} 'Even as Sodom and Gomorrha . . . are set forth for an example' (πρόκεινται δεῖγμα). Cf. Pr. Bk. Exhort. to Confession, 'When we assemble and meet together . . . to set forth His most worthy praise, to hear His most holy word'; Shaks. King John, II. i. 295—

> 'Up higher to the plain, where we'll set forth
> In best appointment all our regiments.'

The same phrase is used technically of placing food before one, Jn 2^{10} 'Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine' (τίθησιν). (c) Praise, Sir 11 $^{\text{heading}}$ 'We may not vaunt or set forth ourselves.' Cf. Pr. Bk. 1549 (Canticle foll. Te Deum), 'Speak good of the Lord; praise him, and set him up for ever'; and Shaks. Lucrece, 34—

> Beauty itself doth of itself persuade
> The eyes of men without an orator:
> What needeth then apologies be made
> To set forth that which is so singular?'

(5) Set forward. See FORWARD in vol. ii. p. 60. (6) Set on means: (a) Place on table, Gn $43^{31.\,32}$ 'And he washed his face . . . and said, Set on bread'; Bel ^{11} 'Set on the meat, and make ready the wine.' (b) Incite or urge to some course of action, Jer 38^{22} 'Thy friends have set thee on, and have prevailed against thee' (הִסִּיתוּךָ); 43^{3} 'But Baruch the son of Neriah setteth thee on against us' (מַסִּית). (c) As a ptcp. bent on, Ex 32^{22} 'They are set on mischief.' (d) To attack, Ac 18^{10} 'No man shall set on thee to hurt thee' (ἐπιθήσεταί σοι). (7) Set to, meaning affix, of a seal, Jn 3^{33} 'He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true' (ἐσφράγισεν). Cf. Ex 21^{30} Tind. 'Yf he be sette to a summe of money, then he shall geve for the delyveraunce off his lyfe, accordynge to all that is put unto him'; Adams, Works, i. 18, 'In testimony whereof I have set to my hand, and sent it you as a token of the gratitude of my heart.' (8) Set up, meaning establish, Mal 3^{15} 'They that work wickedness are set up.'

J. HASTINGS.

SETH (שֵׁת, i.e. Shēth; LXX and NT Σήθ [in 1 Ch 1^{1} A has Σής]).—The third son of Adam, Gn 4^{25} (J) 5^{3} (P), 1 Ch 1^{1}, Lk 3^{38}. In the first of these passages J assigns a characteristic etymology for the name, Eve being made to say 'God hath set (shāth) for me another seed instead of Abel,' for which reason she called him Shēth (i.e. 'setting' or 'slip,' Dillm.). In Sir 49^{16} Seth is coupled with Shem as 'glorified among men.' A heretical Jewish sect, whose tenets afterwards found acceptance in Christian Gnostic circles, derived its name from Seth. These Sethians or Sethites held (like other Gnostics, Jewish and Christian) that the material universe was the creation of angels and not of the supreme Dynamis, to whom Seth owed his birth. Theodoret (Hær. Fab. i. 14) appears to identify them with the Ophites: Σηθιανοὶ οὓς Ὀφιανοὺς ἢ Ὀφίτας τινες ὀνομάζουσι. Some of the Jewish Sethites believed Seth to have been the Messiah, and later Gnostics held that Jesus Christ was a re-incarnation of Seth. For further information as to this sect and its relations to the Ophites and Cainites (a subject beyond the scope of this art.), see Friedländer, Der vorchristliche jüdische Gnosticismus, 1898, p. 18 ff.; Preuschen, Die apokr. gnost. Adamschriften, 1900, passim; and cf. Epiphanius (adv. Hær. xxxix.), pseudo-Tertull. (viii.), and Philast. (iii.).

SEVENEH (סְוֵנֵה; Gr. Συήνη, Syene; Egyp. Swn, Dem. Swne, Copt. ⲥⲟⲩⲁⲛ [Swan]; Arab. اسوان [Aswân]).—A city on the east bank of the Nile immediately above the First Cataract, the southern frontier post of Egypt. For some distance north of Aswan the cultivable portion of the Nile Valley is extremely narrow. At Aswan the hills draw in rapidly on either side, and the town is built against a rocky barrier of sandstone supported by a dyke of granite that crosses the Nile and forms the cataract. Here there is no cultivation on either bank beyond that of a few palm trees and tiny patches of garden; but the little island of Elephantine in the middle of the stream opposite Aswan is almost clothed with vegetation, and formed the ancient capital of the first nome of Upper Egypt. West of the river are cliffs, shrouded with sand, but pierced by countless tombs of the former inhabitants of the island. Elephantine-Syene must have formed an almost ideal frontier fortress. Immediately above this point the narrow passage of the Nile was rendered dangerous and very tedious for boats by the rocks and islands and rushing currents of the cataract. On the west bank there is not even a path; the adventurous sightseer must clamber over the rocks; on the east bank there was only one clear road, and this led through a long narrow defile parallel to the river into the open ground opposite Philæ. Elephantine, the island, was the secure metropolis of the district, the residence of the governor, and the centre of the local cult of the cataract gods. Its name in Egyptian was 'bw, 'elephant,' demotic yb (Ιηβ), a name which seems to have been applied not only to the island but also to the surrounding district, including the quarries of granite. Syene itself was probably considered as only a mainland suburb of Elephantine. 'Wine of swn' is mentioned in very early inscriptions, but it is doubtful whether the reference is to Syene. In the Egyptian inscriptions the name of the town is known only at a very late date; its temple is of Ptolemaic age. Gradually the importance of Elephantine waned, and that of Syene grew; with the fall of paganism even the name Yêb (Elephantine) was given up and that of Swan took its place. It is remarkable that Ezekiel employs the name Sweneh and not Yêb for the southern frontier; the references are Ezk 29^{10} 30^{6}; the reading of RVm 'from Migdol to Syene' is the best. (See MIGDOL). Herodotus often refers to Ἐλεφαντίνη. In ii. 30 he speaks of Elephantine, Daphnæ near Pelusium, and Marea as the garrison cities respectively against the Ethiopians, against the Syrians and Arabs, and against Libya. His only reference to Syene is in ii. 28, where he mentions 'hills between (sic) Syene and Elephantine' in a fantastic passage which is no guide to facts; his geography in Upper Egypt is always faulty. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

SEVER.—The verbs to 'sever' and to 'separate' both come from Lat. separare, the former through Old Fr. sevrer, the latter directly. The form 'sever' now expresses a sharper stroke than 'separate,' but in older Eng. no distinction was observed between them. All the verbs tr^{d} 'sever' in AV are also tr^{d} 'separate.' Cf. Bacon, Adv. of Learn. ii. 367, 'We see the chaff may and ought to be severed from the corn in the ear'; and Rhem. NT (note on Ac 10^{26}), 'But when Heretikes began to rise from among the Christians, who professed Christ's name and sundry Articles of faith as true believers doe, the name Christian was to common to sever the Heretikes from true faithful men: and thereupon the Apostles by the holy Ghost imposed this name Catholike upon the Beleevers which in al points were obedient to the Churches doctrine.' J. HASTINGS.

SEVERAL.—Just as 'sever' in AV means to separate, so 'several' means separate, distinct, as 2 K 15^{5} 'He was a leper unto the day of his death, and dwelt in a several house'; Mt 25^{15} 'to every man according to his several ability.' So severally, 1 Co 12^{11} 'dividing to every man severally as he will.' Cf. Dt 7^{6} Tind. 'The Lorde thy God hath chosen the to be a severall people unto him silf'; Tymme, Calvin's Genesis, 882 (Gn 49^{28}), 'Every one of them blessed he, with a severall blessing'; Ridley, Works, 390, 'Our own servants were taken from us before and . . . we each one appointed to be kept in several places'; Calderwood, Hist. 107, 'Their [elders] office is as well severally, as conjunctly, to watch diligently over the flock committed to their charge.' J. HASTINGS.

SHAALABBIN (שַׁעֲלַבִּין; B Σαλαβείν, A Σαλαμείν; Vulg. Selebin).—A town of Dan mentioned between Irshemesh (Beth-shemesh) and Aijalon (Jos 19^{42}). It is apparently the same place as SHAALBIM. C. W. WILSON.

SHAALBIM (שַׁעַלְבִים; in Joshua LXX BA have Θαλαβείν, in 1 Kings B has Βηθαλαμεί, A Σαλαβείμ; Vulg. Salabim, Salebim).—A town mentioned with Mt. Heres and Aijalon as being occupied by the Amorites who had driven the Danites into the hills (Jg 1^{35}). It was, with Makaz and Beth-shemesh, in the district of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4^{9}); and if it be the same place as Shaalabbin, it is mentioned with Aijalon and Beth-shemesh in Jos 19^{42}. It is probably identical with Shaalbon, the home of one of David's heroes. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σαλαβείν, Salabim) identify it with Salaba, a large village in the territory of Sebaste; but this is too far north of Aijalon. Elsewhere (Com. ad Ezek. 48) Jerome mentions 'the towers of Aijalon, and Selebi, and Emmaus' in connexion with Joppa and the territory of Dan. From this Conder (PEF Mem. iii. 52) identifies Shaalbim with Selbît, about 8 miles N. of Beth-shemesh, 3 miles N.W. of Aijalon, and 2 miles N. of Emmaus. Possibly (see Driver, Text. of Sam. 54) Shaalbim should be read for Shaalim in 1 S 9^{4}. C. W. WILSON.

SHAALBONITE, THE (הַשַּׁעַלְבֹנִי; in 2 S ὁ Σαλαβωνείτης; in 1 Ch B ὁ Ὁμεί, A ο Σαλαβωνί; de Salboni).—Eliahba, the Shaalbonite, one of David's heroes (2 S 23^{32}, 1 Ch 11^{33}), was a native of Shaalbon,—a place not mentioned elsewhere. See SHAALBIM. C. W. WILSON.

SHAALIM, THE LAND OF (אֶרֶץ־שַׁעֲלִים; B τῆς γῆς Ἐασακέμ, A τ. γ. Σααλείμ; terra Salim).—Saul, when searching for his father's asses, passed through the land of Shaalim (1 S 9^{4}) after he had traversed the hill-country of Ephraim, and the land of Shalishah, and before he reached the 'land of Jemini' (RV and AV 'land of the Benjamites')—probably part of the territory of Benjamin. If Saul started from Gibeah, and Shalishah was, as seems probable, in the western hills (see SHALISHAH), the land of Shaalim must have been a portion of the hill-country east of Lydda, and not far from the boundary of Benjamin. It is possible, however, that Shaalim is a textual error for Shaalbim of Jg 1^{35}, Jos 19^{42}. See Driver, Text of Sam. p. 54. C. W. WILSON.

SHAAPH (שַׁעַף).—1. The son of Jahdai, a Calebite, 1 Ch 2^{47}. 2. A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah, 1 Ch 2^{49}. In both passages B has Σάγαε, A Σάγαφ.

SHAARAIM (שַׁעֲרַיִם; Σακαρείμ; Saraim, Saarim).—1. A town of Judah, in the Shephēlah (lowland), mentioned (Jos 15^{36}) in the same group with Adullam, Socoh, and Azekah. It was unknown to Eusebius (Onom. s. Σαραείν). Conder (PEF Mem. iii. 194) suggests Khurbet S'aîreh, west of Beit 'Atâb; others identify it with Zakarîya (Riehm, HWB). Shaaraim is perhaps mentioned again in the pursuit of the Philistines after the death of Goliath (1 S 17^{52}), when 'the wounded Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim (RVm 'the two gates'), even unto Gath and Ekron.' The meaning of the word is 'two gates,' and the LXX takes it in this passage to mean the gates of Gath and Ekron. See, further, art. GAI, and Wellh. Sam. ad loc.

2. A town of Simeon (1 Ch 4^{31}) which appears as Sharuhen in Jos 19^{6}, and as Shilhim in Jos 15^{32}. It was situated in the Negeb, and was possibly the same place as the Canaanite 'fortress of the land of Sharuana,' mentioned in the annals of Thothmes III. (RP ii. 38). This indicates that the form Sharuhen is correct. C. W. WILSON.

SHAASHGAZ (שַׁעַשְׁגַז).—A chamberlain of king Ahasuerus, Est 2^{14}. The LXX reads Γαί, the same name as it gives to the official referred to in vv.$^{8, 15}$. See HEGAI.

SHABBETHAI (שַׁבְּתַי). — A Levite who opposed the action of Ezra in the matter of the foreign marriages, Ezr 10^{15} (B Σαβαθαί, A Καββαθαί) = SABBATEUS of 1 Es 9^{14}. He is mentioned also, along with other Levites, in Neh 8^{7} (LXX om.), as explaining the law to the people (in 1 Es 9^{48} SABATEUS); and in 11^{16} (BAℵ* om., ℵ$^{c.a}$ Σοββαθαῖος) as one of 'the chiefs of the Levites who had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God.'

SHACHIA (שָׂכְיָה, so Baer; the MSS show the variants שָׂבְיָה, שַׂכְיָה, שַׂכְיָא, שְׂבְיָה, the last being supported by the Syr. and the LXX [B Σαβιά, A Σεβιά, but Luc. Σεχιά], while the forms in ב instead of כ can claim the support of the Vulg. Sechia).—A son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{10}.

SHADDAI.—See art. GOD, vol. ii. p. 199^{a}.

SHADRACH (שַׁדְרַךְ, Σεδράχ).—The name given to Hananiah, one of Daniel's companions, by the prince of the eunuchs, Dn 1^{7}. It is related in Dn 3 how Shadrach, along with Meshach (Mishael) and Abed-nego (Azariah), all of whom had been advanced to high offices (2^{49}), resisted the command to pay homage to Nebuchadnezzar's golden image, how all three were in consequence cast into a fiery furnace, and how they were miraculously delivered. See HANANIAH, No. 2, and THREE CHILDREN (SONG OF THE).

The etymology of the name Shadrach is uncertain. Frd. Delitzsch (Lib. Dan. xii.) suggests that it is a variation of the Bab. Šudur-Aku, 'command of the moon-god,' comparing the Assyr. Têm-ilu = מעם־אל, and the Heb. אֲמַרְיָהוּ. This view is pronounced by Schrader (KAT^{2} 429 [COT ii. 125]) to have 'considerable probability.'

J. A. SELBIE.

SHAGE (שָׁגֵא; B Σωλά, A Σαγή).—The father of Jonathan, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{34}. See AGEE and SHAMMAH, No. 3.

SHAHARAIM (שַׁחֲרַיִם; B Σααρήλ, A Σααρήμ).—A Benjamite who is said to have begotten children in the 'field of Moab' after he had sent away two wives, Hushim and Baara, 1 Ch 8^{8} (RVm). The passage is obscure.

SHAHAZUMAH (שַׁחֲצוּמָה Kethibh; AV Shahazimah, after Ḳerê שַׁחֲצִימָה; B Σαλεὶμ κατὰ θάλασσαν, A Σασειμάθ, Sehesima).—A town allotted to Issachar, which was apparently between Mt. Tabor and the Jordan (Jos 19^{22}). Its site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σασιμά, Sasima), and it has not yet been identified.

C. W. WILSON.

SHALEM (שָׁלֵם; εἰς Σαλήμ; in Salem).—According to AV (cf. Luther's translation), which follows the LXX, the Pesh., and the Vulg., 'Shalem' (Gn 33^{18}) is a proper name, and considered to be a town near Shechem. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) believed Shalem and Shechem to be the same place. But if Shalem was a town, it must have been Sâlim, 4 miles east of Nâblus (Shechem). In Gn 28^{21} בְּשָׁלֵם bĕ-shālēm is translated 'in peace,' and in Gn 33^{18} we should probably translate 'in peace to the city of Shechem,' as in RV which follows the Targums of Onḳelos and pseudo-Jonathan, the Samaritan Codex, the Arabic Version, and the great Jewish and other commentators of modern times. See Dillm. ad loc. C. W. WILSON.

SHALISHAH, THE LAND OF (אֶרֶץ־שָׁלִשָׁה; B ἡ γῆ Σελχά, A ἡ γῆ Σαλισσά; terra Salisa).—Saul, when searching for his father's asses, passed through the 'land of Shalishah' (1 S 9^{4}) after crossing the 'hill-country of Ephraim,' and before reaching the 'land of Shaalim.' Leaving Gibeah he must have crossed Mt. Ephraim in a northerly direction, and the 'land of Shalishah' must consequently have been in the western hills. Baal-shalishah (2 K 4^{42}), which was very probably in the land of Shalishah, is said by Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Βαιθσαρισάθ, Bethsalisa) to have been in the Thamnitic toparchy, 15 M.P. north of Lydda. This points to Khurbet Sirîsia, or, according to Conder (PEF Mem. ii. 285), to Khurbet Kefr Thilth. See SHAALIM. C. W. WILSON.

SHALLECHETH, THE GATE (שַׁעַר שַׁלֶּכֶת; ἡ πύλη παστοφορίου; porta quæ ducit).—One of the gates of the 'house of Jehovah' which Solomon was to build after the death of David (1 Ch 22). It is mentioned only in 1 Ch 26^{16}, in a list of the gatekeepers (AV 'porters') of the sacred enclosure as settled by David. The gate was on the west side of the outer court, behind the temple buildings, and apparently at, or near, the head of the ramp or causeway (מְסִלָּה) which led up to the sanctuary from the ravine which Josephus calls the Tyropœon Valley. It has been suggested (cf. Smith's DB, s.v.) that the causeway was at 'Wilson's Arch'; but, in the uncertainty which still exists with regard to the site of the temple, and the condition of the hill in the time of Solomon, this can only be regarded as speculation. Some authorities (e.g. Riehm [HWB], Speaker's Com.), from the meaning of the word Shallecheth, 'casting forth,' consider the gate to be that by which the ashes and the offal of the victims were thrown out. It is, however, probable that the refuse of the temple was carried out on the east or south side, and burned, or otherwise disposed of, in the Kidron Valley. The LXX rendering, 'Gate of the Pastophorion,' appears to point to a building with chambers, of which there were several round the outer enclosure of the temple. C. W. WILSON.

SHALLUM (שַׁלּוּם and שַׁלֻּם).—1. One of the kings of Israel, 2 K 15$^{10-16}$ (Σελλούμ). He headed a conspiracy against Zechariah, the last king of Jehu's dynasty, murdered him, and usurped his throne (c. 740 B.C.). After the short period of a month, he himself fell a victim to MENAHEM (see vol. iii. p. 340^{a}). 2. It is not improbable that in Jer 22^{11} (Σελλήμ) שַׁלֻּם (AV and RV 'Shallum') is meant to be an epithet, 'the requited one,' applied to Jehoahaz, or it may be that Shallum was the original name of the latter (see JEHOAHAZ, No. 2). The Chronicler takes (perhaps from this passage) Shallum as a proper name, and makes him the fourth son of Josiah, 1 Ch 3^{15} (B Σαλούμ, A Σαλλούμ). 3. The husband (or son, LXX in 2 Kings) of HULDAH the prophetess, 2 K 22^{14} (B Σελλήμ, A Σελλούμ), 2 Ch 34^{22} (BA Σελλήμ). 4. A Judahite, 1 Ch 2$^{40f.}$ (B Σαλούμ, A in v.^{40} Σαλλούμ). 5. A descendant of Simeon, 1 Ch 4^{25} (Σαλέμ). 6. A high priest, son of Zadok, 1 Ch 6$^{12.13}$ (B Σαλώμ, A Σελλούμ), Ezr 7^{2} (B Σελούμ, A Σελλούμ)=SALEM of 1 Es 8^{1} and SALEMAS of 2 Es 1^{1}. 7. A son of Naphtali, 1 Ch 7^{13} (B Σαλωμών, A Σελλούμ), called in Gn 46^{24} and Nu 26^{49} Shillem (שִׁלֵּם; in former passage A Συλλήμ, in latter B Σελλή, A Σελλήμ), with the gentilic name Shillemites (הַשִּׁלֵּמִי; B ὁ Σελλημεί, A ὁ Σελλημί), Nu 26^{49}. 8. The eponym of a family of gatekeepers, 1 Ch 9$^{17\,bis}$ (B Σαλώμ, A first time Σαλλώμ), Ezr 2^{42}=Neh 7^{45} (B Σαλούμ, A Σελλούμ), called in 1 Es 5^{28} SALUM, and (possibly) in Neh 12^{25} MESHULLAM. 9. A Korahite gatekeeper, 1 Ch 9^{19} (B Σαλωμών, A Σαλώμ) ^{31} (BA Σαλώμ), called in 26$^{1.2.9}$ MESHELEMIAH and in 26^{14} SHELEMIAH. It is not at all unlikely that this name should be identified with the preceding. 10. Father of Jehizkiah, an Ephraimite chief, 2 Ch 28^{12} (Σελλήμ). 11. One of the porters who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{24} (B Γελλήμ, ℵ Γαιλλείμ, A Σολλήμ). 12. One of the sons of Bani who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10^{42} (B Σαλούμ, A Σελλούμ). 13. The son of Hallohesh, ruler of a district of Jerusalem. He and his daughters are recorded to have assisted in the repairing of the wall, Neh 3^{12} (B Σαλούμ, A Σαλλούμ, ℵ Οάλούμ). 14. The uncle of Jeremiah, Jer 32 [Gr. 39]^{7} (Σαλώμ). 15. Father of Maaseiah, the keeper of the threshold, Jer 35 [Gr. 42]^{4} (Σελώμ). J. A. SELBIE.

SHALLUN (שַׁלּוּן).—The son of Col-hozeh, the ruler of the district of Mizpah, who took part in the repair of the wall and gates of Jerusalem, Neh 3^{15} (LXX om.).

SHALMAI.—See SALMAI.

SHALMAN (שַׁלְמַן).—Hos 10^{14} (only) 'as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle.' The identity of Shalman and of BETH-ARBEL (which see) are both doubtful. The former name may be a contraction of Shalmaneser, although the prophet's language, implying some event fresh in the memory of his hearers, does not suit the reign of Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 860–825) or even Shalmaneser III. (783–773). If Shalmaneser IV. (727–722) be referred to, the words must be a later gloss (so Wellhausen, Kl. Proph. ad loc.). To the suggestion of Schrader (KAT^{2} 441 [COT ii. 140]) that the reference may be to an incursion (cf. 2 K 15^{20}) of the Moabite king Salamanu, mentioned in Tiglath-pileser's great triumphal inscription (II Rawl. 67, line 60), both Wellh. and Nowack object that such an occurrence would have been too insignificant to supply material for the prophet's comparison. The versions give us no help, the LXX B reproducing כְּשֹׁד שַׁלְמַן בֵּית אַרְבֵּאל by ὡς ἄρχων [i.e. שַׂר for שׁד] Σαλαμὰν ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου Ἰεροβοάμ (A Ἰεροβάαλ), while the Vulg. has sicut vastatus est Salmana a domo ejus qui judicavit Baal, thinking apparently of the slaughter of Zalmunna by Gideon (Jerubbaal), Jg 8. J. A. SELBIE.

SHALMANESER (שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר, Σαλαμανασσάρ, Salmanasar).—The name is abbreviated from Assyr. Sulman-asaridu, 'the god Sulman (of peace) is chief.' In 2 K 17^{3} it is said that 'Shalmaneser, king of Assyria,' came up against Hoshea of Samaria, who submitted at first, but afterwards, being detected in a conspiracy to revolt with the aid of the Egyptians, was deposed and imprisoned. Shalmaneser then besieged Samaria, B.C. 725. This was Shalmaneser IV. of the Assyr. monuments, whose original name was Ululâ, which he changed to Shalmaneser when he seized the throne (on the 25th day of Tebet, B.C. 727) after the death of Tiglath-pileser III. He seems to have been a successful general, and to have had no hereditary rights to the crown. Josephus (Ant. IX. xiv. 2), quoting from Menander, states that he attacked Elulæus of Tyre, and, though the Assyrian fleet of 60 vessels was destroyed by the Tyrian fleet of 12, the city was closely invested on the land side. Shalmaneser died at the beginning of the month Ṭebeth during the siege of Samaria, B.C. 722, after a reign of only 5 years. See, also, art. SHALMAN. A. H. SAYCE.

SHAMA (שָׁמָע; B Σαμαθά, A Σαμμά).—One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{44}.

SHAMBLES.—1 Co 10^{25} 'Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat' (Gr. μάκελλον, from Lat. macellum, a provision market). The word 'shambles' is now used of the slaughter-house, but formerly, according to its origin, denoted the place where the meat was sold. It is the Anglo-Sax. scamel, a stool, from Lat. scamellum, a little stool or bench. Cf. Congreve, Juvenal's Satires, xi.—

> 'Many there are of the same wretched Kind,
> Whom their despairing Creditors may find
> Lurking in Shambles; where with borrowed Coin
> They buy choice Meats.'

J. HASTINGS.

SHAME (Heb. בּוֹשׁ 'to be ashamed,' בֹּשֶׁת 'shame,' also other words; Gr. αἰσχύνη, ἀτιμία, etc.).—In the biblical use of the word 'shame' there is a blending of several meanings: besides the sense of shame proper, felt for oneself (Job 11^{3}, Lk 14^{9}, 2 Th 3^{14}) or for another (Ezr 9^{6}, Pr 10^{5} 17^{2}, 2 Co 9^{4}), there is included the feeling of disappointment (Job 6^{20}, Ps 35^{4}, Jer 14^{3} 22^{22}; cf. Ro 5^{5}) or deception (Ps 14^{6}, Jer 2^{36}), the experience of disaster (Job 8^{22}, Ps 40^{15}) or disgrace (including reproach, rebuke, or insult) (Jg 18^{7}, Ru 2^{15}, Job 16^{10} 19^{3}, Ps 22^{6} 35^{4} 69^{7}, Pr 25^{10}, Ph 3^{19}); and thus are combined the subjective sense, the inward feeling, and the objective, its outward cause. This feeling is ascribed figuratively to a fountain (Hos 13^{15}), Lebanon (Is 33^{9}), the sun (Is 24^{23}), and a vessel (Ro 9^{21}, 2 Ti 2^{20}). Shame is awakened by the exposure of some parts of the body uncovered literally (compare Gn 2^{25} with 3^{7} 9$^{20-27}$, Ex 32^{25}, 2 S 6^{20} 10^{5}, Is 20^{4}, Mic 1^{11}), or figuratively (Is 47^{3}, Jer 13^{26}, Nah 3^{5}, Rev 3^{18} 16^{15}), by outrage on a woman's person (2 S 13^{13}), by dishonouring treatment of the body (Is 50^{6}, Mk 12^{4}, Lk 20^{11}, 1 Th 2^{2}), as crucifixion (He 6^{6} 12^{2}), and even by the appearance of a corpse (1 Co 15^{43}). Poverty may make ashamed (Pr 13^{18}, 1 Co 11^{22}), so beggary (Lk 16^{3}), defeat in battle (2 Ch 32^{21}, Ps 44^{9} 89^{45}), or even disease (Nu 12^{14}). A wicked wife (Pr 12^{4}), or a bad child (Pr 10^{5} 29^{15}), may cause shame. Shame arises from any breach of acknowledged rules of propriety, as a woman's being shaven (1 Co 11^{5}), or speaking in church (1 Co 14^{35}), or a man's having long hair (1 Co 11^{14}). Sins so unseemly are found among men, that not only the practice of them awakens shame (Ro 1$^{26.27}$ 6^{21}, Jude ^{13}), but even the very sight or mention of them (Ezk 16^{27}, Eph 5^{12}). Among the sins mentioned as bringing shame are folly (Pr 3^{35} 14^{35} 18^{13}), refusal of instruction (Pr 13^{18}), ignorance of truth of God (1 Co 15^{34}), quarrelsomeness (Pr 25^{8}, 1 Co 6^{5}), haste in speech (Pr 18^{13}), riot (Pr 28^{7}), idleness (Pr 10^{5}), wilfulness (Pr 29^{15}), lying (Pr 13^{5}), dishonesty (2 Co 4^{2}; cf. RV and AV), theft (Jer 2^{26}), disrespect to parents (Pr 19^{26}), ingratitude (1 Co 4^{14}), pride (Pr 11^{2}).

Shame in one or other of its senses is regarded as the Divine punishment of sin, which God threatens (Ps 132^{18}, Jer 23^{40} 46^{12}), and which the pious in OT are sure will, in answer to prayer, fall on His and their enemies (Ps 6^{10} 44^{7} 53^{5} 70^{2} 86^{17}). On the other hand, God promises (Ps 37^{19}), and the pious are assured, that this experience will either not be theirs at all (Ps 25^{3} 31^{17} 34^{5} 69^{6} 119^{31}), or if ever theirs, that they will be delivered from it (Is 29^{22} 54^{4} 61^{7}, Jl 2^{26}). Even God's chosen people may be exposed to disgrace and disaster, making them first of all ashamed of their state (2 Ch 30^{15}, Jer 12^{13} 14^{3}), and then truly ashamed of the sin that has brought it on them (Ezr 9^{6}, Jer 31^{19}, Ezk 16^{61}, Hos 10^{6}); but sometimes it is long before this feeling is aroused (Jer 3^{3} 6^{15} $8^{9.12}$). Fidelity to God's cause may, however, also bring shame (Ps 44^{15} 69^{7}). The sin that most surely is followed by shame is idolatry (Is 1^{29} 42^{17} 44^{9} 45^{16}, Jer 17^{13} 48^{13}, Hos 4^{7} 10^{6}), or alliance with idolators (Gn 34^{14}, Ezr 9^{6}). The idol itself is shameful (Jer 3^{24} 11^{13}, Hos 9^{10}; perhaps Hos 4^{7} reading with Targ. Pesh. 'they have exchanged their glory for infamy'; cf. Jer 2^{11} and Ps 106^{20}), and its worship shameful, perhaps because often licentious (see Cheyne on Hos 4^{7} and 9^{10}). Worthy of note in this connexion is the change of the names Eshbaal (1 Ch 8^{33}), Meribbaal (1 Ch 8^{34}), Jerubbaal (Jg 6^{32}), to Ish-bosheth (2 S 2^{8}), Mephibosheth (2 S 4^{4}), and Jerubbesheth (2 S 11^{21}). Although the alterations show the prophetic editor's aversion to idolatry, yet the names in their original form are not necessarily a proof of idolatry, as the name Baal may be used as a title of J″ (Hos 2^{16}). Akin to the sin of idolatry was trust in any foreign alliances for safety instead of in J″, and this too brings 'shame,' i.e. disappointment (Is 20^{5} $30^{3.5}$, Jer 2^{36}; cf. Ezr 8^{22}). See, further, Driver, Par. Psalt. (Glossary. s. 'abashed,' 'ashamed').

In NT the sense of shame is often mentioned by St. Paul. He is not ashamed of the gospel (Ro 1^{16}), of his converts (2 Co 7^{14}; cf. 9^{4}), of his hope (Ro 5^{5}), of his faith (Ro 9^{33} 10^{11}), of his trials (Ph 1^{20}, 2 Ti 1^{12}), of his boasting (2 Co 10^{8}). Onesiphorus was not ashamed of Paul's chain (2 Ti 1^{16}), and Timothy is called on not to be ashamed of the witness of the Lord, or of Paul His prisoner (2 Ti 1^{8}). The unruly are to be brought to shame by exclusion from the church (2 Th 3^{14}). While the enemies of Christ are put to shame (Lk 13^{17}), and the false accusers of His disciples (Tit 2^{8}, 1 P 3^{16}), they, although slandered and ill-treated (2 Co 6^{8}), need not be ashamed to suffer for His name (1 P 4^{16}); for, if they are ashamed of Him now, He will be ashamed of them in the day of judgment (Mk 8^{38}, Lk 9^{26}); but if they are faithful they need not fear shame in that day (1 Jn 2^{28}), for Christ is not ashamed to call the sanctified brethren (He 2^{11}), and God is not ashamed to be called the God of those who seek a better country (He 11^{16}); but the wicked and unbelieving shall awake to shame (Dn 12^{2}; cf. Jn 5^{29}).

SHAMEFACEDNESS.—The adj. 'shamefaced' occurs in Sir $26^{15.25}$ 32^{10} $41^{16.24}$, and the subst. 'shamefacedness' in Sir 41^{16}, 1 Ti 2^{9}. But in the 1611 editions, and for some time after, the spelling is always 'shamefast' and 'shamefastness.' Davies says he has not found 'shamefaced,' 'shamefacedness' earlier than 1661.

Trench (On AV of NT, p. 66) says: 'Shamefastness is formed upon shamefast, that is, fast or established in honourable shame. To change this into shamefacedness is to allow all the meaning and force of the word to run to the surface, to leave it ethically a far inferior word,—and marks an unfaithful guardianship of the text, both on their part who first introduced, and theirs who have so long allowed, the change.' And Davies (Bible English, p. 12), after describing 'shamefastness' as 'that modesty which is fast or rooted in the character,' adds, 'The change is the more to be regretted because shamefacedness is seldom employed now in a very good sense; it has come rather to describe an awkward diffidence, such as we sometimes call sheepishness.' But the confusion between 'shamefastness' and 'shamefacedness' is as old as 1611. Shaks. does not use the subst., but he has the adj. twice: in III Henry VI. IV. viii. 53, 'shamefaced' is the only spelling; in Rich. III. I. iv. 142, the folio has 'shamefaced,' the quartos 'shamefast.' In the Rhemish NT (note on Lk 24^{50}) we read, 'S. Augustine saith that Christ him self not without cause would have his sign to be fixed in our foreheads as in the seat of shamefastnes, that a Christian man should not be ashamed of the reproach of Christ,' which shows how the confusion could arise. And James Melvill (Diary, 79) uses the word 'shamefastness' practically in the modern sense of 'shamefacedness,' 'Yit my guid God, of his free grace, and love towards me, a vean, vyll, corrupt youthe; partlie by his fear wrought in my heart, partlie by necessar occupation in my calling, and partlie be a certean schamfastnes of a bashfull nature, quhilk he pat in me, sa keipit me that I was nocht overcome nor miscaried be na woman offensivlie to his kirk, nor grievuslie to my conscience, in blotting of my bodie.' For the proper sense of 'shamefastness,' cf. Chaucer, Doctor's Tale, 55—

> 'Shamefast she was in mayden's shamefastnesse';

Spenser, FQ II. ix. 43—

> 'She is the fountain of your modestee:
> You shamefast are, but Shamefastnes it selfe is shee';

Elyot, Governour, i. 51—'The moste necessary thinges to be observed by a master in his disciples or scholars . . . is shamfastnes and praise. By shamfastnes, as it were with a bridell, they rule as well theyr dedes as their appetites.'

SHAMGAR (שַׁמְגַּר, Σαμεγάρ).—Son of Anath, and judge in the south of Israel between Ehud and Deborah. He slew 600 Philistines with an ox-goad (Jg 3^{31} 5^{6}). The name is Assyr. like Samgar-nebo (Jer 39^{3}), and is a shortened form of some such name as Sumgir-Bel, 'be gracious, O Bel,' with the divine name omitted. Anath is also the Assyr.-Bab. Anatu, the wife of the god Anu (see, however, BABYLONIA, vol. i. p. 215^{b}), unless we are to read Ben-anath, 'the son of Anatu,' which is the name of a Canaanite in one of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. The names show that Bab. influence lingered in the south of Palestine for some time after the period of the Tel el-Amarna tablets, when Bab. names were not uncommon there (see Moore's Judges, p. 106).

A. H. SAYCE.

SHAMHUTH (שַׁמְהוּת; B Σαλαώθ, A Σαμαώθ).—The fifth captain for the fifth month, 1 Ch 27^{8}. He is called the IZRAHITE (B ὁ Ἐσρᾶε, A ὁ Ἰεζραέλ), and is the same as Shammoth the Harorite (a scribal error for Harodite) of 1 Ch 11^{27} and Shammah the HARODITE of 2 S 23^{25}.

SHAMIR (שָׁמִיר, Σαμήρ).—A Kohathite, son of Micah, 1 Ch 24^{24}.

SHAMIR (שָׁמִיר; Σαμείρ; Samir).—The name of two places in Palestine.

1. (A Σαφείρ) A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48}), which is mentioned in the same group with Jattir and Socoh. Eusebius and Jerome from the reading of A alter the name to Shaphir (see Nowack, Kl. Proph. on Mic 1^{11}). Conder (PEF Mem. iii. 262) identifies it with Khurbet Sômerah, which lies west of Debîr, and in this agrees with Guérin (Judée, iii. 364, 'Sumra').

2. (A Σαμάρεια) The home and burial-place of Tola, a man of Issachar, who judged Israel for twenty-three years (Jg $10^{1.2}$). Shamir was in Mt. Ephraim, and Schwarz (151) identifies it with Sanûr, a picturesquely situated village between Samaria and En-gannim (Jenîn).

SHAMLAI.—See SALMAI.

SHAMMA (שַׁמָּא; B Σεμά, A Σαμμά).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{37}.

SHAMMAH (שַׁמָּה).—1. The son of Reuel the son of Esau, and a tribal chief (אַלּוּף) of Edom (Gn $36^{13.17}$ [Σομέ, in v.^{17} D Σομαί], 1 Ch 1^{37} [B Σομέ, A Σομμέ]). 2. (B in 1 S 16^{9}, 2 S 13^{32} Σαμά, 2 S 13^{3}, 1 Ch 2^{13} 20^{7} Σαμαά, 2 S 21^{21} Σεμεεί; A in 1 S 16^{9} 17^{13} Σαμμά, 1 Ch 2^{13} Σαμαιά, 1 Ch 20^{7} Σαμαάς) The third son of Jesse and brother of David. Like his two elder brothers, he joined Saul's forces in the campaign against the Philistines, and was with the Israelite army in the valley of Elah when David overcame Goliath (1 S $17^{13f.}$). According to a later writer, he was present at the anointing of David by Samuel (1 S 16^{1-13}). He was the father of Jonadab, the friend and adviser of Amnon (2 S $13^{3f.}$), and also of that Jonathan whose exploit against a Philistine giant is recorded in 2 S $21^{20f.}$. His name is variously given as Shammah (שַׁמָּה 1 S 16^{9} 17^{13}), Shimeah (שִׁמְעָה 2 S $13^{3.32}$), Shimei (שִׁמְעִי, Ḳĕrē שִׁמְעָא 2 S 21^{21}), and Shimea (שִׁמְעָא 1 Ch 2^{13} 20^{7}).

3. (2 S 23^{11} B Σαμαιά, A Σαμμεάς; 23^{33} B Σαμνάν, A Σαμνάς; 1 Ch 11^{34} B Σωλά, A Σαγή) The son of AGEE, a Hararite (read הַהֲרָרִי in 2 S 23^{11}, see v.^{33}, 1 Ch 11^{34}), one of David's famous 'Three.' The special act of bravery to which he owed his position is briefly recorded in 2 S $23^{11.12}$. The Philistines, in the course of a foray, had driven the Israelites from a field of lentils (1 Ch 11^{13} barley) at Lehi (read לֶחֱיָה to Leḥi (Jg 15^{9-20}) for לַחַיָּה to the troop (?), so most moderns; see Driver, ad loc.). The Israelites fled before the enemy, but Shammah held his ground, and by his courageous stand brought about a victory for Israel. The succeeding incident which is narrated in 2 S $23^{13f.}$, viz. the well-known exploit of David's three mighty men, who broke through the hosts of the Philistines and brought him water from the well of Bethlehem, has been frequently ascribed to Shammah and the two other members of 'the Three'; but the three heroes who performed this feat are clearly stated in v.^{13} to belong to 'the Thirty.' Since no previous mention has been made of 'the Thirty,' it is probable that vv.$^{13-17a}$ are not in their original place, and that v.^{17b} really forms the continuation of vv.$^{8-12}$ (so Wellh., Driver). In the parallel narrative (1 Ch $11^{10f.}$) Shammah is not mentioned by name, and the exploit which made his name famous is wrongly ascribed to Eleazar the son of Dodo. Klostermann plausibly suggests that the incorrect reading in v.^{11} 'into a troop' (לַחַיָּה) represents an original 'to battle' (לַמִּלְחָמָה), and that the Chronicler accidentally passed from this phrase in v.^{9} to the same phrase in v.^{11}, omitting the intervening narrative.

According to the most probable reading of 2 S $23^{32.33}$ Shammah was the father of Jonathan, one of David's 'Thirty.' In this passage the word son has been accidentally omitted, and we must restore 'Jonathan the son of Shammah' (יְהוֹנָתָן בֶּן־שַׁמָּה, so Driver, Budde, Kittel, Klost., Löhr); the parallel passage (1 Ch 11^{34}) gives 'Jonathan the son of Shage' (יוֹנָתָן בֶּן־שָׁגֵי), but the reading 'Shammah' (for Shage) is confirmed by Lucian (Σαμαιά). Possibly Shāgē (שָׁגֵי) has arisen from a confusion with 'Āgē (אָגֵא) in 2 S 23^{11}. Wellhausen (Text d. B. Sam. p. 216) prefers the reading of the Chronicler (שָׁגֵא or בֶּן־שָׁגֵי), and supposes that Jonathan the Hararite was the son of Shage (which he would restore in v.^{11} for Agee) and brother of Shammah. Klostermann, adopting the reading of Lucian in 2 S 23^{11} ('Ηλά=אֵלָה), identifies Shammah with Shimei the son of Elah, one of Solomon's twelve monthly officers (1 K 4^{18}).

4. (2 S 23^{25} B Σαιμά, A Σαμμαί; 1 Ch 11^{27} B Σαμαώθ, A Σαμώθ; 27^{8} B Σαλαώθ, A Σαμαώθ) A Harodite, i.e. probably a native of 'Ain-ḥarod (see HAROD), one of 'the Thirty,' and captain of Solomon's fifth monthly course. In the parallel lists he is called 'Shammoth the Harorite' (1 Ch 11^{27} שַׁמּוֹת הַהֲרוֹרִי; read הַחֲרֹדִי the Harodite) and 'Shamhuth the Izrahite' (1 Ch 27^{8} שַׁמְהוּת הַיִּזְרָח).

Since the lists of heroes given in 2 S 23 and 1 Ch 11 are admittedly in confusion, it is possible that (3) and (4) are identical, and that the obscure 'Hararite' (2 S $23^{11.33}$) is a mistake for 'Harodite.'

J. F. STENNING.

SHAMMAI (שַׁמַּי).—1. A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2^{28} (B Σαμαί, A Σαμμαί). In v.^{32} the LXX runs the Heb. אֲחִי שַׁמַּי ('brother of Shammai') together as 'Αχεισάμας (B) or 'Αχισαμμά (A). 2. The 'son' of Rekem and 'father' of Maon, 1 Ch $2^{44f.}$ (B Σαμαί, A Σαμμαί). 3. A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^{17} (B Σεμέν, A Σεμμαί). See GENEALOGY, IV. 54.

SHAMMOTH.—See SHAMHUTH, and SHAMMAH No. 4.

SHAMMUA (שַׁמּוּעַ).—1. The Reubenite spy, Nu 13^{4} (B Σαμουήλ, A Σαμαλιήλ). 2. One of David's sons, 2 S 5^{14} (B Σαμμοῦς, A Σαμμοῦε), 1 Ch 14^{4} (B Σαμάα, A Σαμμαοῦ, ℵ Σαμαιά); called in 1 Ch 3^{5} Shimea (שִׁמְעָא; B Σάμαν, A Σαμαά). 3. A Levite, Neh 11^{17} (Σαμουεί) = SHEMAIAH, No. 6. 4. The head of a priestly family, Neh 12^{18} (BAℵ* om., $ℵ^{c.a}$ Σναμοῦε).

SHAMSHERAI (שַׁמְשְׁרַי; B 'Ισμασαριά, A Σαμσαριά).—A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{26}.

SHAPE.—In AV, as in earlier English generally, 'shape' is less definite and less material than now. In Wis 18^{1} the mod. meaning is nearly approached, 'Not seeing their shape' (μορφή, Vulg. figura), but even there it is 'outward form' generally. In Lk 3^{22} 'The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him,' the meaning is simply 'appearance' (Gr. σωματικῷ εἴδει, RV 'in a bodily form'); so Jn 5^{37} (εἶδος, RV 'form'). The only other occurrence is Rev 9^{7} 'The shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle' (τὰ ὁμοιώματα, RVm 'the likenesses'). Cf. Shaks. Hamlet, I. ii. 80—'All forms, moods, shapes of grief' (folios 'shews'); Jul. Cæs. II. i. 253—

> 'It will not let you eat, nor talk, nor sleep:
> And, could it work so much upon your shape
> As it hath much prevailed on your condition,
> I should not know you, Brutus.'

In Rhem. NT Mk 16^{12} is tr^{d} 'And after this he appeared in another shape to two of them walking,' and on this word there is a note, 'Christ though he have but one corporal shape, natural to his person, yet by his omnipotencie he may be in whatsoever forme, and appears in the likenesse of any other man or creature, as he list. Therefore let no man think it strange, that he may be under the forme of bread in the B. Sacrament.'

The old pass. ptcp. of the verb, 'shapen,' is found in Ps 51^{5}. So Tind. uses the old past tense 'shope' in Gn 2^{7} 'Then the Lorde God shope man, even of the moulde of the erth.'

J. HASTINGS.

SHAPHAM (שָׁפָם; B Σαβάτ, A Σαφάμ).—A Gadite, 1 Ch 5^{12}.

SHAPHAN (שָׁפָן 'coney or rock-badger'; LXX Σαφάν, Σαφφάν, Σεφφάν; Vulg. Saphan: on this name as evidence that 'superstition of the totem kind had still a hold on Israelites in the last years of the independence of the kingdom of Judah,' see W. R. Smith in the Journal of Philology, 1880, p. 75, and Gray, HPN p. 103).—1. Scribe or finance minister (Ewald) in the reign of Josiah. He is brought prominently before us in the story of the discovery of 'the book of the law' in the temple, 2 K $22^{3ff.}$, 2 Ch 34^{8-28}. The system of raising money for the repairs of the temple which had been instituted by Jehoash (2 K 12), seems from this narrative to have been in regular operation since that time. The money chest which had been set up by Jehoiada was emptied periodically under the supervision of the high priest and of the king's scribe. It was on one of these occasions that HILKIAH communicated to Shaphan his great discovery of 'the book of the law.' The Chronicler

(2 Ch 34^{8}) represents Shaphan as having been accompanied by two other officials. In any case it was to Shaphan that Hilkiah entrusted the precious volume, and it was from Shaphan's lips that Josiah heard the words that so deeply moved him. Shaphan also formed one of the deputation that subsequently visited the prophetess HULDAH. Assuming that this was the Shaphan who was father of Ahikam (2 K 22^{12}, 2 Ch 34^{20}, Jer 26^{24}), he was grandfather of Gedaliah (2 K 25^{22}, Jer 39^{14} $40^{5.\ 9.\ 11}$ 41^{2} 43^{6}). The only objection to this supposition lies in the fact that Ahikam seems to take precedence of his father. It is, of course, possible that he may have filled a higher office. Whatever the truth may be concerning Shaphan's connexion with the discovery of 'the book of the law,' it is at least certain that he belonged to the party of reform whose inspiration was derived from that book, and who were friendly to Jeremiah. One of his sons, Ahikam, protected the prophet from the fury of the hostile priests and prophets (Jer 26^{24}). Another, Elasah, was one of the two whom Jeremiah employed to carry his letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer 29^{3}). From the windows of the chamber of yet another son, Gemariah, Baruch read 'the words of the LORD in the ears of the people' (Jer 36^{10}), words which were given still further publicity by the action of Gemariah's son, Micaiah (vv.$^{11.\ 12}$). And when the last agony of Jerusalem was over, it was with Shaphan's grandson, Gedaliah, that the aged prophet found an honoured asylum (Jer 39^{14}).

2. Father of Jaazaniah, who was ringleader in idolatry of the seventy ancients of the house of Israel, as seen by Ezekiel (8^{11}).

N. J. D. WHITE.

SHAPHAT (שָׁפָט).—1. The Simeonite spy, Nu 13^{5} (BA Σαφάτ, F Σαφάν). 2. The father of the prophet Elisha, 1 K $19^{16.}$ (B Σαφάθ, A Σαφάτ) ^{19} (BA Σαφάτ), 2 K 3^{11} (B Ἰωσαφάθ, A Σαφάτ) 6^{31} (B om., A Σαφάτ). 3. A name in the royal genealogy of Judah, 1 Ch 3^{22} (B Σαφάθ, A Σαφάτ). 4. A Gadite, 1 Ch 5^{12} (LXX [? confusing with ספר] ὁ γραμματεύς). 5. One of David's herdmen, 1 Ch 27^{29} (B Σωφάν, A Σωφάτ).

SHAPHIR (שָׁפִיר; LXX καλῶς; Vulg. pulchra).—One of the towns or villages—none of them very far from Eleutheropolis—which the prophet Micah addressed (Mic 1^{11}). According to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. Σαφείρ, Saphir), it was a village of Judah in the hill-country between Eleutheropolis and Ascalon. Robinson (BRP^{2} ii. 34, note), van de Velde (S. and P. 159), and Conder, doubtfully (PEF Mem. ii. 413), identify Shaphir with one of three mud villages, called es-Sûâfir, which stand near each other about 3½ miles S.E. of Esdûd, Ashdod. This appears to be the place referred to in the Onomasticon, but the identification is uncertain. On the possible identity of Shaphir with Shamir of Jos 15^{48} see Nowack on Mic 1^{11}.

SHARAI (שָׁרַי; B Σαριού, A Ἀρού, ℵ Σαροῦε).—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{40}.

SHARAR.—See SACAR.

SHAREZER (שַׂרְאֶצֶר [see Baer, ad loc.]; Σαράσαρ, BA in 2 K 19^{37} and Zec 7^{2}, B in Is 37^{38}; Σαράσα, Luc. in 2 Kings, ℵAQ in Isaiah. In its original Assyrian form the name is probably=šar-uṣur, 'protect the prince'; in meaning, a prayer addressed to some god whose name is omitted. Bel-sharuṣur, Marduk-sharuṣur, and similar Assyrian names are then unabbreviated parallels. It has been suggested that the full name of the Sharezer of 2 K 19 [=Is 37] was Nergal-sharuṣur, a Babylonian name which occurs in Jer 39^{3} [NERGAL-SHAREZER]. The origin of the conjecture is an untenable identification of Sharezer with the Nergilus of the historian Abydenus [see below]. In Zec 7^{2} the complete name is very probably Bel-sharezer).

1. In conjunction with a brother, ADRAMMELECH, named as the assassin of the Assyrian king Sennacherib (2 K 19^{37}=Is 37^{38}). The murderers are described as Sen.'s sons, and the scene of the assassination is given as the temple of NISROCH. According to the Babylonian Chronicle, Sen. was killed during an insurrection, and the date was towards the close of the year 681 (20th Ṭebeth). The other records of the assassination are an inscription of Nabuna'id, an extract from Polyhistor (Berosus) in Eusebius, and another from Abydenus. These agree with the Chronicle in stating that Sen. was killed by one of his sons. They contain no reference to the complicity of two sons. Even Abydenus is explicit in saying that one son was the murderer.* Of the two names given by the Hebrew narrative, that of Sharezer is most affected by this preponderance of negative testimony. Adrammelech has the support of the names Adramelus and Ardumuzanus (Ardumusanus), which are given by Abydenus and Polyhistor respectively. One of Sen.'s sons, also, has a name (Aššur-šum-ušabšî) which is said to be capable of readings approximately the same as these variants (Scheil in ZA xi. 425–27). There is nothing of a definite character to be said on the other side in favour of Sharezer.† Yet the negative argument is so much e silentio that an explanation of the appearance of the name in the Hebrew text is pressingly required before an error can be granted. W. M. Müller imagines too improbable a history. He supposes that Adrammelech was 'Assyrianized' into Sharezer by some archæologist. Adrammelech was regarded as a translation, Sharezer was a retranslation put alongside of it in the text (ZATW xvii. 332). It can only be said, meantime, that Sharezer's name, his part in the assassination of Sen., and his relationship to the king, all rest on the authority of the Hebrew narrative.

The revolt, in which Sen.'s murder was an incident, was obviously designed to secure the throne for the rebel(s), and to prevent the accession of the designated heir Esarhaddon. In this it failed. Esarhaddon triumphed within six weeks, by the second of Adar, although for an unknown reason he did not formally assume the crown until three and a half months later (18th Sivan). The murderers fled to Armenia, according to the OT narrative. There was likely to be a welcome for such exiles there. The fragment of Abydenus says that Esarhaddon put Adramelus to death.

* 'Qui a filio Adramelo est interemptus.' By a transposition of this sentence and the preceding, an attempt has been made to bring a certain Nergilus there mentioned into some connexion with the assassination of Sennacherib. But even then he is neither Sen.'s son nor his assassin. It is inadmissible to read the statement regarding him in the light of the weaker rather than of the stronger testimony. The supposition that Nergilus is Sharezer is a conjecture from an emended text (supporters of the hypothesis are named in Schrader, COT ii. 16). Equally possible, and even more probable, is the suggestion that the sentence 'deinceps autem post eum Nergilus regnavit' is a reference to the Babylonian king Nergal-ushezib. This identification is made by Winckler (ZA ii. 392 ff.). But it is easier to suppose that the context is imperfect than to adopt his combination with another context.

† Šar-eṭir-Aššur is a son of Sen. whose name might be identified with Sharezer (Winckler, Altor. Forsch., 2nd Series [1898], i. 59). It can also be urged that Polyhistor and Abydenus may have got their names of the assassin from the Heb. Adrammelech. Moses of Chorene gives more positive testimony, but is not sufficiently reliable. He names two assassins. In the Whistons' Latin version (London, 1736) the forms are Adramelus or Argamozanus and Sanasarus (i. 22). Their settlement in Armenia is the occasion of their being mentioned. Boscawen's recent identification (Bab. and Or. Record, viii. 259 ff.) seems to depend too much on a resemblance to the conjectural form Nergal-sharezer.

2. One who consulted the spiritual heads of the Jewish community on the question whether the fast observed on the anniversary of the burning of the pre-exilic temple was appropriate after its restoration (Zec $7^{2ff.}$).

The grammatical construction of v.^{3}, and consequently the purport of the verse, is very uncertain. RV makes 'Bethel' subject and Sharezer and the others messengers from Bethel. Such a personification seems without parallel in prose. AV follows Vulg. in making 'Bethel' accusative of direction and tr. 'to the house of God.' But the temple is never called bêth-'êl. The difficulty is removed by finding in these letters the Divine name which, according to analogy, is required to complete the compound šar-uṣur. The text may originally have read Bel-Sharezer (Siegfried-Stade, HWB). The ת may be accounted for as a dittography of א in the early Hebrew character.* After this correction has been made, v.^{3} suggests that the author of the inquiry is one individual, namely (Bel-) Sharezer. Regem-melech and the others are then messengers whom he sent.

Sharezer's question is explained by the new situation which the restoration of the temple created. Since Zechariah addresses his reply to the 'people of the land,' it may be argued that Sharezer was spokesman on their behalf. But v.^{3} more naturally expresses individual perplexity. V.^{2} implies that the inquiry came from outside the community in Jerusalem. The question itself comes naturally from one who is not in touch with movements in the capital; it is artificial and unlikely when regarded as an attempt to bring local discussions to an issue (Nowack's view). Zechariah addresses the priests and the whole Jewish community ('people of the land,' as Hag 2^4). The priests are doubtless named because 'instruction' (tôrāh) had been asked of them, and formally they have yet to reply (in v.^{3} the words 'and to the prophets' may be an insertion, anticipating the fact that actually Zechariah comes forward to reply). The people also are addressed, to secure for the prophet's words a wider currency.

Babylon is more likely to have been Sharezer's home than any part of Judah. His Babylonian name, Bel-sharuṣur, is one argument; the formality of his deputation another. The hypothesis accounts most simply for the purpose and motive of the inquiry. It does justice also to all the points of the narrative. The primary object of Sharezer's deputation (v.^{2}) was to offer sacrifices at the restored sanctuary ('to entreat the favour of the Lord'). The question to the priests was incidental to this main purpose, although prompted by the same good news. Thus early the spiritual authority of Jerusalem was acknowledged by the diaspora. The incident is dated in the year 518 (v.^{1}). The temple was completed in 516 (Ezr 6^{15}); its restoration had commenced in 520 (Hag 1^{15}). Either the news which reached Babylon anticipated the complete restoration midway (assuming the dates to be correct); or the rebuilding was so far advanced as to justify Sharezer in taking action.

It is noteworthy that Zechariah's prophecy (vv.$^{5-7}$) has no special application to the circumstances of the time. It depreciates or disavows the practice of fasting as such. Zec $8^{18.19}$ seems more appropriate as a reply to Sharezer's envoys.

SHARON.—1. (הַשָּׁרוֹן [with art.], prob. for הַיְשָׁרוֹן 'the level,' 'the plain,' from ישר to be level; LXX in 1 Ch 27^{29}, Ca 2^1 τὸ πεδίον, but in Is 33^9 35^2 65^{10} ὁ δρυμός [see below]) the name applied in Scripture to that part of the Maritime Plain which stretches from Joppa to Mt. Carmel (55 miles). It is of an undulating character, none of its hills exceeding 250–300 feet in height. The following streams cross it in their course to the Mediterranean: Nahr es-Zerḳâ (the Crocodile River), Nahr Mefjîr (the Dead River of the Crusaders), Nahr Iskanderûneh (their Salt River), Nahr el-Fâlik (their Rochetaille). The plain proper, between the Crocodile River and Joppa, varies in breadth from 8 to 12 miles.

The LXX, as above noted, reproduces הַשָּׁרוֹן in three passages by ὁ δρυμός, a term which is applied to Sharon also by Josephus (BJ I. xiii. 2; in Ant. XIV. xiii. 3, plur. οἱ δρυμοί) and Strabo (xvi.: δρυμὸς μέγας τις). This designation is very appropriate to a district which has still a large oak wood at its northern extremity, and which, even so late as Crusading times, would have appeared from the top of Mt. Ebal as a vast forest of oaks from coast to mountain (HGHL^{1} 122).* The Crusaders called it the Forest of Assur (Vinsauf, Itin. Ricardi, iv. 16); it is the enchanted forest of Tasso (Gerus. Liberata, ii and xiii); it was called by Napoleon the Forest of Miksi (from the modern village of Miksieh). The southern half of the plain is, and must always have been, far more cultivated than its northern portion. Throughout its whole extent it is gay with myriads of brightly coloured flowers.

The beauty and the fertility of Sharon give point to Is 35^2, where the 'glory of Lebanon' is coupled with the 'excellency (הדר 'splendour' [see Driver, Daniel, p. 33]) of Carmel and Sharon,' the special allusion perhaps being to the magnificence of its oak forests. We have the opposite picture in Is 33^9, where 'Lebanon is ashamed and withereth away, Sharon is like the (waste) Arabah, and Bashan and Carmel shake off their leaves.' Again, in Is 65^{10} the description of the restoration of Israel contains this feature: 'Sharon shall be a pasturage for flocks.' In 1 Ch 27^{29} we read of Shitrai the Sharonite (הַשָּׁרֹנִי, ὁ Σαρων(ε)ίτης), who was over king David's flocks that fed in Sharon. The excellence of the pasturage, the superiority of the cattle and the wine of Sharon, are celebrated by Jerome (Comm. on Is 33 and 65) and the Talmud (Bab. Menahoth 87*a*, Shabbath 70*a*). Its pottery and the bricks used for building are repeatedly referred to in the Mishna as of very inferior quality, the instability of the houses in Sharon being proverbial (see references in Neubauer, Geog. du Talm. 48 f.).

Neubauer appears to be right (against Graetz, Gesch. d. Juden^{2}, iii. 182) in contending that it is the inhabitants of the maritime Sharon and not of the Galilæan Saronas [see below], on whose behalf a special petition is said to have been introduced into the high priest's prayer for the people on the Day of Atonement. This petition ran: 'May God watch over the inhabitants of Sharon, that they be not buried in the ruins of their houses.'

The Shulammite compares herself to the 'rose [an unfortunate rendering; חֲבַצֶּלֶת is the white narcissus, see Cheyne on Is 35^1 and cf. art. ROSE above] of Sharon' and the 'lily [prob. some flower of a red colour] of the (Jordan) valleys' (עמקים), Ca 2^1.

There is some doubt as to the identity of the Sharon of Jos 12^{18} [where read מֶלֶךְ אֲפֵק לַשָּׁרוֹן 'king of Apheḳ in Sharon'; see LASSHARON]. It has been proposed (e.g. by Dillm. ad loc.) to find here the Saronas which Eusebius (Onomast. 296. 6) says was the name given to the region between Mt. Tabor and Tiberias—a statement confirmed by the name Sarôna still attaching to a ruin on this plateau (PEF Mem. vol. i. sheet vi.). This proposal appears, however, to be unnecessary, especially in view of the evidence (see G. A. Smith, HGHL^{4} 350, 401 f., and s.v. 'Aphek' in Encyc. Bibl.) in favour of the existence of an Apheḳ in the maritime Sharon (cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 273, 435, and s.v. 'Aphek' in Encyc. Bibl.; H. P. Smith, Samuel, 31. Buhl, GAP 212 f., 218, leaves it undecided whether it is the maritime or the Galilæan Sharon that is meant in Jos 12^{18}).

* Marti simply detaches 'êl from bêth and joins it to Sharezer: 'the family of El-Sharezer' (SK, 1892, p. 732). G. A. Smith adopts El-Sharezer, but supposes 'J″' to be wanting after bêth: 'to the temple of J″' (Twelve Prophets).

* It is not at all likely that the title ὁ δρυμός is due to any connexion, real or supposed, between the Heb. shārôn and the Gr. σαρωνίς, a very rare term for an oak (Pliny, HN iv. 5, quoted by Reland, Pal. 190).

The only NT reference to Sharon is Ac 9^{35} (ὁ Σαρών, whence AV Saron), in connexion with St. Peter's stay at Lydda. For further details regarding Sharon see Buhl, GAP 103 ff.; and G. A. Smith, HGHL^{1} 147 ff., where a full account is given of its strategic importance and the part it played in post-biblical history.

2. (שָׁרוֹן [without art.]; B Γεριάμ, A Σαρών) 1 Ch 5^{16}. This Sharon (∥ Gilead and Bashan) is probably the same as the Mishôr (also from root ישר), or elevated plateau between the Arnon and the Jabboḳ (Dt 3^{10} 4^{43}, Jos $13^{9.16.17.21}$ 20^8, Jer $48^{8.21}$, 2 Ch 26^{10}). See vol. iii. p. 309^b, footnote, and p. 893^b, s. 5.

SHARONITE.—See preceding article.

SHARUHEN (שָׁרוּחֶן; οἱ ἀγροὶ αὐτῶν; Sareon).—A town in Judah which was allotted to Simeon (Jos 19^6). It appears as Shilhim in 15^{36} and as Shaaraim in 1 Ch 4^{31}; see SHAARAIM (2).

SHASHAI (שָׁשַׁי; BA Σεσεί, Luc. Σενσείρ).—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{40}=SESIS of 1 Es 9^{34}.

SHASHAK (שָׁשַׁק).—The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch $8^{14.}$ (B Σωκήλ) ^{25} (B Σωιήκ; in both passages A has Σωσήκ, Luc. Σισάχ).

SHAUL (שָׁאוּל, Σαούλ).—1. A king of Edom, Gn $36^{37f.}$ [JE]=1 Ch $1^{48f.}$ He belonged to 'Rehoboth by the River.' See REHOBOTH. 2. A son of Simeon, Gn 46^{10} [R] (A Σαμουήλ, D^{sil} Σαούλ, B deest), Ex 6^{15}, Nu 26^{13} [both P], 1 Ch 4^{24}. The clan of which he is the eponym was of mixed Isr. and Can. descent, hence Shaul is called in Gn 46^{10} and Ex 6^{15} 'the son of the Canaanitess.' See GENEALOGY, II. 2. In Nu 26^{13} the patronymic Shaulites (הַשָּׁאוּלִי, δῆμος ὁ Σαουλεί) occurs. 3. An ancestor of Samuel, 1 Ch $6^{24\,(9)}$ (called in v.$^{36\,(21)}$ Joel. See JOEL, No. 3).

SHAVEH, THE VALE OF (עֵמֶק שָׁוֵה; A τὴν κοιλάδα τὴν Σαύην, D τ. κ. τ. Σαυή; vallis Save).—A broad valley ('ēmeḳ), known also as 'the king's vale' (Gn 14^{17}), which was near Salem. It is apparently the same place as 'the king's dale' (עֵמֶק הַמֶּלֶךְ 2 S 18^{18}), in which Absalom set up a pillar or monument. According to Josephus (Ant. VII. x. 3), this monument was two stadia from Jerusalem. If the view that Salem was Jerusalem be correct, the valley of Shaveh was possibly the broad open head of the valley of Hinnom which, lower down, contracts to a ravine. See SALEM.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (שָׁוֵה קִרְיָתַיִם; ἐν Σαυὴ τῇ πόλει; Save Cariathaim).—A place in which Chedorlaomer smote the Emim (Gn 14^5). If the reading in AVm and RVm 'the plain of Kiriathaim' be correct, the spot must have been near Kiriathaim (Jer $48^{1.23}$, Ezk 25^9) in Moab, which has been identified with el-Kureiyât between Dibon and Medeba.

SHAVING.—Two Heb. words are used with this meaning, גָּזַז 'cut off,' 'shear' (wool, 1 S 25^4), 'shave' (one's head, Job 1^{20}, Mic 1^{16}); גִּלַּח to make smooth or bald, to shave or shear (Nu $6^{9.18}$, Dt 21^{12} etc.). The ancient Egyptians, according to Wilkinson (Anc. Egyp.), considered shaving the hair, not of the head only but of the whole body, necessary to cleanliness. Joseph, when summoned to the presence of Pharaoh, 'shaved himself and changed his raiment,' Gn 41^{14}. The same custom is observed by many Hindu sects at the present time. In cases of mourning the hair was allowed to grow. Among the Israelites the custom was different. The hair seems to have been allowed to grow to a moderate length, and to have been cut at intervals. Absalom, we are told (2 S 14^{26}), polled his head every year. The beard was held sacred among the Israelites, as it is to this day among the Arabs; and the insult that Hanun, king of the Ammonites, offered to the ambassadors of David, by shaving half of their beards (2 S 10^4), could be atoned for only by the conquest and slavery of the Ammonites. The Nazirites were commanded to let no razor pass upon their heads, but to allow the hair to grow. When the time fixed by their vow had expired, or if they were accidentally defiled, then they were commanded to shave the whole head (Nu $6^{5.9.18f.}$). In Syria the priests and monks of the Greek Orthodox and Greek Catholic Churches never allow the hair of the head or beard to be cut even in sickness. Many Christian parents dedicate a child to a particular saint for a certain period of time, and during that period the hair of the child is never cut. These children are distinguished from others by their black clothes as well as their long hair. Among the Israelites and Arabs shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Job 1^{20}, Dt 21^{12}, Ezk 44^{20}), and with the neighbouring nations it was the custom to shave the 'corners' of the beard, which the Israelites were expressly forbidden to do (Lv 21^5). (See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, vol. i. p. 537^a; and for shaving of the head as a sacrificial act, W. R. Smith, RS 306).

SHAVSHA (שַׁוְשָׁא. In 2 S 20^{25} Kĕthib שיא, Kĕrê שְׁוָא, EV Sheva, are proved to be in error by LXX. Similar to the Ḳĕrê, however, are B Σαβά of 1 K 4^3 and BA Σουβά of 1 K 2^{46h}. Of LXX forms given below, 'Ιησοῦς='Ισοῦς is a familiar name read for one unfamiliar, perhaps under the influence of a dittography from the preceding καί).—Royal or State secretary in king David's reign (1 Ch 18^{16} B 'Ιησοῦς, A and Luc. Σουσά, ℵ Σοῦς; 2 S 20^{25} B 'Ιησοῦς, A 'Ισοῦς, Luc. Σουσά).

2 S 8^{15-18} is a third passage containing a list of David's officers of State. In MT Seraiah now stands in place of Shavsha. But the list of 1 Chron. is dependent on that of 2 Sam., is identical with it except in this one particular, and most probably has preserved the original reading. B 'Ασά seems to be a trace of the older text. 1 K 4^3 and 2^{46h} may be counted against Seraiah (see below). This name seems to have obtained currency in the 7th century. It may be supposed that the familiar שריה is a misreading of the possibly foreign name שושא.

The office held by Shavsha is one of a group created by the monarchy in Israel. It dates, however, from the time of David, like others of a similar character, for Saul's 'kingdom' was not an organized State. It was David who made it so. When he ranged himself among the princes of southern Syria his position forced on him the creation of certain offices of State. The occasions, for instance, of communication and correspondence with neighbouring States multiplied. The example of contemporary princes suggested the appointment of a State secretary. Other prospects of usefulness must have commended the precedent. In these circumstances Shavsha was appointed first holder of the office, as it seems. It is noteworthy that of all those who are named in the best list of David's officers of State (1 Ch 18^{14-17}=2 S 8^{15-18}) he is the only one whose father is unmentioned. Possibly he did not belong to a family of standing in the country, like the others. Possibly he was a foreigner. If foreign correspondence were in a foreign language it may not have been easy to find a Hebrew with the necessary qualifications. David was not indisposed to have foreigners round his person (see art. FOREIGNER, vol. ii. p. 50^b). Shavsha's name may be Aramæan. Foreign extraction would account for the name of one of his sons being Elihoreph (1 K 4^3). It seems to indicate his worship of a god other than J″.

In Solomon's reign there were two secretaries of State, Elihoreph and Ahijah. They are called sons* of Shisha (1 K 4^3). Although the evidence for the correct form of this name is very divergent (B Σαβά, A Σεισά, Luc. Σαφάτ), it may be identified with Shavsha. Others of Solomon's chief officers of State were sons of those who held similar office under David. If Shavsha was chosen secretary because Aramaic was his native tongue, it is specially likely that his children would inherit this qualification and be chosen for a similar reason. There is a second list of Solomon's officers in the LXX (B) text of 1 K 2^{46h}. In it Shavsha (BA Σουβά, Luc. Σουσά) is given as Solomon's secretary. Benzinger (on 1 K 4) has made the attractive suggestion that this list names those in office during the earlier part of Solomon's reign. It would then be evidence that Shavsha continued for a time Solomon's secretary, died during Solomon's reign, and was then succeeded by his sons. But there does not seem to be evidence to establish this view of the two lists. It is probable that they are duplicates, and that in 1 K 2^{46h} the names of the sons have dropped out before the word Shavsha. W. B. STEVENSON.

SHEAL (שְׁאָל, B Σαλουιά, A Σαάλ), Ezr 10^{29}.—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a 'strange' wife; called Jasaelus in 1 Es 9^{30}.

SHEALTIEL (שְׁאַלְתִּיאֵל; in Hag $1^{12.\,14}$ 2^2 שַׁלְתִּיאֵל; LXX and NT always Σαλαθιήλ, hence Salathiel of 1 Es $5^{5.\,48.\,56}$ 6^2, AV of Mt 1^{12} and Lk 3^{27}).—The father of ZERUBBABEL, Ezr $3^{2.\,8}$ 5^2, Neh 12^1, Hag $1^{1.\,12.\,14}$ $2^{2.\,23}$. According to 1 Ch 3^{17} Shealtiel was the eldest son of king Jeconiah. In v.^{19} the MT makes Pedaiah (a brother of Shealtiel) the father of Zerubbabel; but BA of LXX read here also Σαλαθιήλ, although Lucian has Φαδαιά.

SHEARIAH (שְׁעַרְיָה).—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8^{38} (BA Σαραιά, Luc. Σεριά) 9^{44} (BA Σαριά, Luc. Σααριά).

SHEARING-HOUSE, THE (בֵּית עֵקֶד הָרֹעִים; B Βαιθάκαθ τῶν ποιμένων, A Βαιθάκαδ τ. π.; Vulg. camera pastorum; RV tr. 'shearing-house [lit. binding-house,' cf. Gn 22^9] of the shepherds,' RVm 'house of gathering [so Targ. but improbable] of the shepherds').—A place at which Jehu, on his way from Jezreel to Samaria, met and slew the brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K $10^{12.\,14}$). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Βαιθακάθ) place the shearing-house in the Great Plain (Esdraelon), 15 M.P. from Legio; and in this position, 3 m. east of Jenîn, is the village of Beit Kâd (Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 316). This is possibly the site of the shearing-house (Conder, PEF Mem. ii. 83). C. W. WILSON.

SHEAR-JASHUB (שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב 'a remnant shall return,' LXX ὁ καταλειφθεὶς Ἰασούβ, Is 7^3).—A symbolical name given to a son of Isaiah to signify the return of the remnant to God after the punishment at the hands of the Assyrians. See 8^{18} $10^{20.\,21}$, and cf. 7^{14} $8^{1\text{-}4}$.

SHEBA (שֶׁבַע).—1. A Benjamite who headed a new revolt against David immediately after the suppression of Absalom's rebellion. He was besieged by Joab in Abel-beth-maacah, whose inhabitants were persuaded to procure their own safety by casting the head of the rebel from the battlements of the city (2 S $20^{1f.\,6f.\,10.\,13.\,21f.}$; B uniformly Σάβεε, A occasionally Ἄβεε). See, further, art. DAVID, vol. i. p. 570^b. 2. A Gadite, 1 Ch 5^{13} (B Σέβεε, A Σόβαθε, Luc. Σάβεε).

SHEBA (שְׁבָא), more correctly Saba (LXX Σαβά, Jos. Σάβας), the name of a race (the Sabæans) several times mentioned in the OT. In the genealogical tables it is given three pedigrees (Gn 10^7 son of Ra'mah, cf. Ezk 27^{22}, where these two names are juxtaposed; Gn 10^{28} son of Yokṭan, and juxtaposed with Ḥaẓarmaveth [Ḥaḍramaut]; Gn 25^3 son of Yokshan). Ezekiel (27^{23}) mentions Eden (Aden), Ḥaran (Ḥirran), and Canneh (Kanneh) as connected with it; and of these places the first two are known to be in S. Arabia. At the time of Israel's highest prosperity, Solomon was visited by the queen of Saba (1 K $10^{1\text{-}13}$), an event which gave rise to a number of legends, none of them perhaps of high antiquity in the form wherein we possess them. The Sabæans were known to the Israelites as exporters of gold (Is 60^6, Ps 72^{15}), precious stones (Ezk l.c.), perfumes (Jer 6^{20}, Isaiah and Ezekiel), and perhaps slaves (Jl $4(3)^8$). In the Bk. of Job (6^{19}) there is an allusion to their trading caravans, with at least a suggestion that their capital was Tema (Tayma); and also to their raiding other Arab tribes (1^{15}).

Till the attention of Orientalists was called by Wellsted and Cruttenden to certain inscriptions discovered by them in S. Arabia, our knowledge of Saba was confined to the meagre and often unintelligible matter collected by the Greek geographers and Pliny. But since the middle of the century large finds of inscriptions have been made in various parts of Arabia, in the old Arabic character (of which a copy was given by the Arabic bibliographer Al-Nadim, in his Fihrist, A.D. 978), and dealing with Saba and various institutions connected with it. The attempt made in England to decipher these inscriptions was utterly incompetent; but German scholars were more successful, and the honour of having founded the study of Sabæan is shared by Rödiger and Osiander, whose papers in the ZDMG, vols. xx. and xxi., laid the basis for the right understanding of these texts. A full and accurate account of the literature of the subject down to 1891 was given by Fr. Hommel in his Süd-Arabische Chrestomathie, Munich, 1893. Next in importance to the collection published by Osiander was that brought back by Halévy, and edited by him in the Journal Asiatique, Série 6, vol. ix.; since then great finds have been made by Glaser in his various journeys in S. Arabia, not many of which have as yet been given to the public. In the fourth part of the CIS, edited by J. and H. Derenbourg, of which three fasciculi (containing 308 inscriptions) have as yet appeared (1889–1900), the material for the study will be eventually recorded in the most trustworthy form; at present the works of the eight or nine scholars who pursue it (esp. Derenbourg, Glaser, Halévy, Hommel, Mordtmann, D. H. Müller, Prætorius, Winckler) are all indispensable.

Besides inscriptions, considerable finds of coins have also been made. The first Sabæan coin ever interpreted was described in the Revue Numismatique, 1868, pp. 169–176; but for this part of the subject the most important stage was marked by the work of Schlumberger (Le trésor de San'a, Paris, 1880), who gave an account of some 200 coins that had been discovered at Sana'a, and purchased by him of a dealer in Constantinople. Many of these coins contained the monograms of kings whose names also figure in inscriptions; whence, though these signs were puzzling at first, they have all since been interpreted: a list of the monograms, with their interpretations, is given by D. H. Müller in his Burgen u. Schlösser, ii. p. 995.

* LXX 'son,' applying to Ahijah only.

The date of the coins described by Schlumberger was fixed by him, on numismatic grounds (i.e. the evolution of the style from Attic, Seleucid, and Roman models), at from about B.C. 150 to A.D. 150, and, while he derived the style of the art from the sources named, he regarded the weight as fixed by Persian models. The purity of the silver and the accuracy of the weight were greatly admired by this numismatist; other coins that have been discovered are described by Mordtmann, Wiener Numismatische Zeitschrift, 1880, pp. 289–320. The researches of Glaser and others were also rewarded by the discovery of a variety of other objects, illustrative of Sabæan civilization, of which descriptions have been given by Mordtmann (Himyarische Inschriften in den königlichen Museen zu Berlin, 1893) and others (e.g. Derenbourg, Les Monuments Sabéens du Musée d'Archéologie de Marseille, 1899; D. H. Müller, Südarabische Alterthümer im Kunsthistorischen Hofmuseum, Wien, 1899; Hommel, 'Die südarab. Altertümer des Wiener Hofmuseums,' in Aufsätze u. Abhandlungen, ii., 1900).

Finally, the works of the S. Arabian geographer and archæologer Hamdani (Abu Muhammad Al-Hasan) have been brought to Europe, his Description of the Arabic Peninsula in a number of copies, and his Iklil in portions; both these works have been edited by D. H. Müller, the former at Leiden, 1891, the latter in the Sitzungsberichte der Wiener Akademie, Ph.-Hist. Kl. xciv., xcvii., and in Müller's Südarab. Alterthümer, p. 8 ff. The lexicon of Neshwan the Himyarite, which is of some value for the interpretation of the texts, is as yet unpublished. In the following paragraphs a few of the chief results of the study will be collected.

i. HISTORY. — On this subject an authentic chronicle of a few pages could give us more information than all the inscriptions together; it is, however, clear that they cover an enormous length of time—it can scarcely be made less than 1300 years. The dated inscriptions of the mound at Marib (published by Glaser, MVAS, No. 6) are of the 5th and 6th cents. A.D., one of them being Christian and another perhaps Jewish; and the final destruction of the Sabæan State is known to have taken place in the 6th cent. A.D. On the other hand, the name of Ithamara the Sabæan, occurring in the inscriptions of Sargon of B.C. 715 (ed. Winckler, p. 97), was identified with justice by Lenormant with the Yetha'amara of the Sabæan inscriptions. That name belongs to no fewer than six Sabæan potentates (Glaser, AA p. 29); and there seems no probability that Sargon's contemporary is the first of these. The inscriptions, however, are not divided equally over this vast expanse of time; so far as they are at present accessible, it is only for the period just before and just after the commencement of our era that they render the writing of a continuous chronicle possible; an attempt of this sort has been made by H. Winckler, 'Die Inschriften des Alhan Nahfan' (MVAS, No. 5), perhaps without conspicuous success. The greater number of the texts published are devoid of political interest, and indeed emanate from members of two families or clans, the Bakilites of ʽAmran, and their leaders the Banu Marthad, and the Hashidites of Naʽit, and their leaders the Banu Hamdan. These great families are said to exist still in S. Arabia in the neighbourhood of their ancestral seats (Mordtmann in MM p 9).

Saba is the name of a nation or political unit, not of a city, though the classical writers speak repeatedly of a city Saba. The Arabic etymologists derive its name from sabā, 'to take captive'; but they might with greater probability have derived it from the Sabæan verb saba'a, 'he raided'; and indeed in CIS 84. 3, the Sabæans are mentioned as normal raiders, somewhat as in Job 1^{15}. The Sabæan name for 'nation' is khums, 'a fifth,' and it is applied by them to other nations as well as to their own, e.g. 'the two Khums, Saba and Himyar' (MM 5). These nations or 'fifths' were divided into 'tribes'* (shiʽb), which again were sometimes divided into 'thirds' (CIS 187, where Derenbourg gives us the names of two 'thirds' of the tribe Samaʽi), and sometimes perhaps 'tenths' (CIS 128). There might be some ground for suspecting that the word fifth implies the original existence of five nations who shared S. Arabia between them; at the latest period of the inscriptions, Saba has swallowed the others up. In these the kings style themselves kings of Saba, Dhu Raidan, Ḥaḍramaut, and Yamanet. The earliest king who assumed this title was, according to Glaser (AA p. 31), Shammir Yuharʽish, about A.D. 281 (others would place him some 200 years before). Before this he and his predecessors called themselves kings of Saba and Dhu Raidan, a title which implies the conquest of Raidan, which the combinations of Glaser and H. Winckler place about B.C. 70. Prior to this last date the kings style themselves sometimes malik ('king'), sometimes mukarrib, a word of uncertain meaning, but of a root which forms an element in many proper names, and is the source of Makorabah, the old name for Mecca. It is customary to place the Mukarrib period before the Maliḳ period, and it is certainly noticeable that Sargon does not bestow the title 'king' on his Sabæan contemporary, though the Assyrians are ordinarily rather lavish with the title. Naturally, such a point could not be settled without better documents than are at our disposal. The residence of the king was at Maryab or Marib (in Beled Al-Jihaf), and sometimes at Ghaiman. But Marib had also a king of its own, probably dependent on the kings of Saba, since in CIS 37. 7 the two are mentioned simultaneously; and kings of Kamna (SA 12) and other places are mentioned.

In the time of Eratosthenes (B.C. 240) Saba was one of four nations which shared S. Arabia between them—Minæans with capital Karna, Sabæans with capital Maryab, Kattabanians with capital Tamna, and Ḥaḍramaut with capital Katabanon. The Greek writer adds that these were all monarchies, but that they were not hereditary, the succession falling to the first male born to one of the leading families after a king's accession. How such a system would work it is impossible to conjecture; but a study of the texts makes it certain that Eratosthenes' account contains some truth, though he may have omitted important details. So about the time of the Aelius Gallus expedition (B.C. 24) we find kings of the Hamdanide family preceded and followed by kings of another family. Alhan Nahfan seems to disclaim the title 'king of Saba' himself, while giving it to his two sons (AA 42. 1), though he allows it to be given him by others (ib. 24), and in another inscription (HI 2698) appears as a subject of the then king of Saba, and in yet another (CIS 2, 10) is called simply Hamdanite and Bataʽite by the men who put up a votive tablet for help received in his service. Quite similarly Il-Sharh (Elisaros), who in some inscriptions figures as king of Saba and son of a king of Saba, in others is called Kabir of Aḳyan, a title of which the import is not known, but which seems to have been combined with something like royal functions (AA 82 and 105). What we should infer from these facts is that the kingship was held by the leading families in some sort of rotation. This inference is further supported by the nature of the kings' names, which do not appear to differ in form from those of other eminent men; they are ordinarily, though not always, double, consisting apparently of a name and an epithet (rarely of a name and two epithets), and are ordinarily retained unaltered by those persons who figure in different inscriptions as kings and in some other capacity. Finally, the fact that the inscriptions often speak of 'the kings of Saba,' and that as many as three appear as kings simultaneously, implies that the sense which attached to the word 'king' in this community was different from that which attached to it elsewhere. And this not only explains the great number of the kings who figure in the inscriptions, — Müller (Burgen, ii. pp. 982–986) counted 33, and some have since been added to the number,—but harmonizes with the fact that Sargon does not give the Sabæan the title 'king.'

* This name (tribe) is also sometimes applied to Saba (SA p. 17). The term 'fifth' is also found in other divisions (ib. p. 39).

Besides the kings, there were eponymous magistrates, after whom the years were named, till the adoption of an era, which Glaser fixes at B.C. 115 (AA p. 29; Gesch. i. 3), whereas others regard it as the Seleucid era (see CIS p. 18); the text CIS 46 seems to date 'in the year 386 from the year of Mubiḥ son of Abu-Ḥubb,' an era of which nothing is at present known. The tribes of which the Sabæan community consisted had sometimes their kings (as the Samʿai, CIS 37), but more often chieftains called ḳaul (in Arabic ḳail); another title is kabir ('great'), which in one case appears to be given to the eponymous magistrate (CIS 80), but is also held by the king Il-Sharḥ, probably before his accession (CIS 46). Since, however, this personage has a 'minister' (muḳtawi, AA p. 105), while he is still kabir, we clearly cannot yet settle the precise meaning of these terms. A distinction which pervades the inscriptions is that between 'lords' and 'men,' analogous to that between 'royalties' and 'men' which is found in the Phœnician inscriptions: probably the former were what Eratosthenes calls 'distinguished,' i.e. qualified to participate in the sovereignty. In most of the votive tablets the author prays the god for the favour of his lords, who sometimes are the whole of a family, sometimes one or more members of it. A difficult constitutional term is that rendered 'heirs' or 'co-heirs' (CIS 95. 5) in the same context in which 'lords' usually figures; and indeed the number of terms which imply some unknown status or caste is very considerable.

The state of society seems in general to have borne some resemblance to that of feudal Europe. The great families possessed towers and castles, the building of which is commemorated in many inscriptions; and the word bait, which in ordinary Semitic means 'house,' would seem with this community to have meant 'tower.' The Iklil of the archæologer Hamdani contains a description of these feudal dwellings, portions of which are still to be seen. The right to build a castle was sometimes given by the head of a family (CIS 145, 153), sometimes by a king (CIS 172); in some of the texts ample details (not as a rule intelligible) are given of the manner in which the building was carried out (CIS 17, 29, 40), and these seem to have involved measurements of land and technical distributions of it. In each case the building is put under the protection of a deity. Many of the texts also commemorate renewals, repairs, the digging of wells and other domestic operations, in all of which the deity had some share.

Owing to a far larger portion of S. Arabia being under cultivation in ancient times than now, the extent of territory covered by these feudal estates was very great, and, as we have seen, ere the final extinction of the Sabæan State by the Abyssinians in the 6th cent. it had swallowed up the other States in its neighbourhood. Hence the inscriptions which tell of its former glories are found all over South Arabia, except perhaps in Ḥadramaut, and some even in the far north of the peninsula. Many indeed have been transplanted from the buildings which they originally adorned to distant towns, but of the vast extent of the country which at certain times was subject to the Sabæans there can be no doubt. Certain episodes of the reign of Alhan Nahfan, as mentioned above, have been enucleated from his inscriptions by Glaser (AA) and Winckler (l.c.); but even in these results there is much that is problematic, and little that is sharply defined; while for the rest of Sabæan history the inscriptions which have as yet been published contain far less material. Arabic writers have only vague recollections of certain events of great importance, such as the bursting of the dam at Marib, which they strangely fancy led to the ruin of the State, and of a few names and words of the old language; even the well-informed Hamdani has only fables and fictions. Hence for a history of Saba the materials are still wanting.

ii. CIVILIZATION.—The list of goods said to come from Saba in Is 60^6 bears a striking likeness to that given by Sargon (l.c.): 'Gold, precious stones, ivory, perfumes of all sorts, horses, camels,' and the gold and perfumes were associated with Saba by classical writers also. It is remarkable that gold and perfume were called by the same name in Saba; for the suggestion of D. H. Müller, that dhahab meant perfume as well as gold, has been confirmed by a document brought to light by Count Landberg (SA p. 30). The inscriptions reveal a lavish use of gold, if indeed the precious metal be meant thereby. Alhan Nahfan offers thirty statues of gold at once (AA p. 42), and numerous inscriptions commemorate the employment of this metal for images of gods and of animals (e.g. camels and gazelles, MM 1). Other gifts were of silver, called, in this language, ṣirf; and a variety of objects used for devotional purposes is enumerated by Alhan Nahfan (l.c.), not many of which can at present be identified with certainty. Perfumes are also mentioned with considerable frequency, and various sorts are enumerated. D. H. Müller has devoted many pages to the description of them (Burgen, ii. 975; MM 26; SA 48). The greater number of the texts deal not with the commercial side of the Sabæans' life (though there may be allusions to that), but with the agricultural and military sides. Prayers for crops and vegetables are mixed with supplications for male children. The sorts of fruits which they desire to thrive are sometimes enumerated. In some we learn a little of the artificial system of irrigation whereby the fertility of the fields was maintained. But more commemorate successful raids, or successful repulses of raids by other tribes; and once it would seem a disaster consequent on delay in the fulfilment of a vow is commemorated (CIS 81). The position of women would appear to have been little inferior to that of men, if we may judge by the number of texts in which they figure as authors or joint-authors of inscriptions. One woman (CIS 179) appears to be called mistress of a castle; and, though a queen of Saba has not apparently been discovered in the inscriptions, queens of other Arabian tribes occur, both in Arabian and Assyrian texts (D. H. Müller, Epigraphische Denkmäler aus Arabien, p. 3). The honourable title 'consort,' by which they are often called, confirms this. There are, however, texts which imply the practice of concubinage, though not, apparently, of polygamy. It is observable that the women make offerings to the same gods as the men, describe themselves by similar family names, and profess to have received similar benefits.

The Sabæan art, which in some respects is highly praised by experts, appears to have been greatly affected at different times by contemporaneous civilizations, i.e. those of Assyria, Persia, Greece, Rome, and Parthia; and the formulæ of the inscriptions appear here and there to exhibit Assyrian influence. The caligraphy of the inscriptions, especially those first brought to Europe, has won much admiration; the alphabet in which they are written varies somewhat in different places (see especially D. H. Müller, Epigraphische Denkmäler, ad fin.), but the present writer sees no reason to doubt that it represents the earliest form of the Semitic alphabet, whence the others are derived, partly by the suppression of a number of unnecessary signs. The excessive vigour with which the consonants are pronounced in S. Arabia, on which several writers have commented, would make that the likeliest country for the invention of a system of writing in which the consonant was the element.

iii. Religion.—The greater number of the tablets at present accessible are dedicated to two deities, Il-Maḳḳih and Ta'lab. The latter appears to have been a specially Hamdanite deity, and is ordinarily described as Ta'lab of Riyam. He is called not 'god,' but shayyām, 'patron' or 'protector,' a title which is also given to Wadd (HI 7), who is sometimes ascribed to Kibab (ib. also in CIS 30) and Khaṭban (CIS 293), and Ḥajar ('stone'; CIS 49–69). The former of these 'patrons' also figures in pre-Islamic antiquity. If we may judge by the honours lavished on Ta'lab, the position of 'patron' can have been little inferior to that of god. The god of the Bakil was Il-Maḳḳih, probably 'the hearing god,' whose name seems connected with a verb WKH, which figures often in the votive tablets. Different forms of Il-Maḳḳih were worshipped in different sanctuaries. The places with which he is most frequently associated are Awam in Alwa (on which see especially AA p. 16 ff.), Ḥirran, and 'Irran. Next in importance to him was probably Athtar, the male form of Ashtoreth, often called Sharḳan, which is thought to mean 'Oriental.' He had a divided personality: in CIS 293 no fewer than four forms of him are mentioned simultaneously—Athtar lord of Thanain, Athtar lord of Ta'alluḳ (?), Athtar lord of Jumdan, and Athtar Sharḳan. Two other deities whose names are of interest are Sami' (CIS 282) and Ḳawim (CIS 194), which seem to be perpetuated in the epithets 'the Hearing' and 'the Sustaining,' which the Koran gives to Allah. Considerable popularity was also enjoyed by Ramman (who figures in the Bible as Rimmon), sometimes called lord of 'Alam of Ashkur (CIS 140, by a Ḥimyarite). The sun was also much worshipped, and is ascribed to a number of places (e.g. Barrat, CIS 293. 2; other places 40, 132, 294), and also to particular tribes and persons, e.g. 'Il-Maḳḳih and their sun' (CIS 143. 5), and indeed the plural 'their suns' is of occasional occurrence, implying that the sun was regarded as of divided personality, like Athtar. The Sabæan worship of the sun was sufficiently famous to be known to the author of the Koran (xxvii. 24). A similar deity is Dhu Samai, 'lord of Heaven,' ascribed to Bakir (MM 1); and there are some goddesses whose names are similarly formed—Dhat Ḥima, Dhat Ba'dan (CIS 41 etc.). Other gods are called Bashir ('bringer of good tidings,' CIS 41. 3), Haubas (172, etc.), Raḥman ('merciful,' perhaps of monotheistic times, CIS 6), Ḳainan (8) and others whose name is thought to signify water-nymphs (153, etc.).

This pantheon appears to resemble that of the Italians before Greek influence: the gods were to some extent hypostases of operations or objects, and there was supposed to be some special merit in enumerating them. Of this last process the terminations of many inscriptions offer illustrations. The more important of their temples had names, after which the god was often called. The offerings to them consisted, as we have seen, of lavish gifts to the temples; but sacrifices of the ordinary sort (CIS 290) and offerings of incense (194) also form the subject of allusions. Sometimes it took the form of self-presentation on the part of the worshipper, whatever may have been the import of that act. The earliest instance is said to be in a bustrophedon inscription (ZDMG xxii. 425), and the most elaborate, that contained in the inscription of Hadakan (CIS 37), in which the author declares that he puts the god in possession of himself, his family, his and their property, and all the property belonging to his clan. If the inscription HI 2678 (p. 26) be rightly interpreted by Mordtmann, this act could be performed repeatedly; and the inscr. CIS 126 would probably explain it more clearly, if we knew the meaning of the words. The plan of erecting stones in honour of the gods also finds illustration (CIS 100); and most of the texts we have are musnads, or tablets dedicated to the gods, sometimes with other offerings. The office of priest (ארשו) seems sometimes to have been united with that of tribal head (CIS 41. 1), but at other times was probably delegated to humbler individuals. That pilgrimages were made in honour of the gods appears from the month Dhu Ḥijjat or Maḥajjat; the former of which is the only month-name which the Sabæans share with the Moslems (the Sabæan twelve are enumerated by Müller in MM 51). Prayers are ordinarily designated by the common Semitic word for petition, but the other word (amlā), which occurs often, perhaps implies stereotyped formulæ. From the inscr. CIS 126 it would appear that the gods were also appeased by certain forms of personal abstinence, and from one of those edited by Winckler (l.c.) it might appear that they had some share in the administration of justice. The Sabæans also had certain ideas of ceremonial purity, violation of which had to be atoned for by public acknowledgment on tablets placed in temples: some curious specimens of these are given in SA pp. 20–25.

iv. Language.—Of the S. Arabian inscriptions, a few are couched in a dialect scarcely distinguishable from classical Arabic. This is the case with the texts dealing with ceremonial purity, to which reference has been made. The Sabæan texts seem to resemble most closely the dialect known as Ethiopic; and indeed Ethiopic may be regarded as the form of Sabæan first given literary shape by Christian missionaries, although, unless the dates on the Marib inscriptions (Glaser, MVAS 6) are absolutely misleading, Sabæan must have continued in use for a century or two after the commencement of Ethiopic literature. Owing to the absence of vowels, we know little of the pronunciation or the grammatical finesse of Sabæan; but it clearly differed from the classical Arabic idiom in many particulars; in some of which it preserved what classical Arabic lost, while more often it seems to represent a later stage of development than the latter. Its alphabet retains a sibilant lost to Arabic; and in certain cases the weak letters have still consonantal value in Sabæan (as in Ethiopic) where they have lost it in Arabic. Instead of the prefixed article which governs Arabic syntax, Sabæan has an affix, similar to that in use in Aramaic; both of which bear a curious likeness to the Armenian system. For the nunation which in Arabic supplies, to some extent, the place of an indefinite article, Sabæan has mimation. Probably in this matter Arabic retains the older termination, whereas the two languages may have developed or borrowed their definite articles independently. The employment of the dual would appear to have been as regular in Sabæan as in Arabic, though the mode of expressing it differed somewhat. The Sabæan syntax has also some remarkable peculiarities, to which nothing in Arabic corresponds, though they might be illustrated from Hebrew. We have already seen (in art. LANGUAGE OF THE OT) that, like Ethiopic, Sabæan occasionally agrees in its vocabulary with Canaanitish against Arabic; and there are also cases in which it agrees remarkably with the Aramaic vocabulary, although in the most striking of these (see CIS 79) the common words are perhaps borrowed from Aramaic, since the inscription shows signs of having been written by a foreigner. Though there is still much about both grammar and vocabulary that is obscure, the progress made in the study since Osiander's time compares favourably with that achieved in other regions of epigraphy.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

SHEBA (שֶׁבַע; B Σάμαα, A Σάβεε; Sabee).—A town, according to AV, which was allotted to Simeon (Jos 19^{2}), and is mentioned between Beersheba and Moladah. This was apparently the view of Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σαβέ). RV, however, and the edition of 1611, read 'Beersheba or Sheba'; and this is in agreement with the number of towns (13) said to have been allotted to Simeon (Jos 19$^{2-6}$), and with the omission of Sheba from the list in 1 Ch 4^{28}. It is not unlikely that וְשֶׁבַע is due to dittography from באר שבע, or it may be a corruption of ושמע (cf. LXX B) of Jos 15^{26}. So Dillm. ad loc.

SHEBANIAH (שְׁבַנְיָה; in 1 Ch 15^{24} שְׁבַנְיָהוּ).—1. The name of a Levite or a Levitical family that took part in the religious services which followed the reading of the Law, Neh 9$^{4.}$ (B Σαραβιά, A Σαχανιά, ℵ Σαραδιά)^{5} (LXX om.). The name appears in Neh 10^{10} amongst those who sealed the covenant (B Σαβανιά, ℵA Σεβανιά, Luc. [in both verses] Σεχενίας). 2. A priest or Levite who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{4} (B Ἐβανεί, A Σεβανί, Luc. Βαναίας) 12^{14} (Bℵ*A om., ℵ$^{c.a}$ Σεχελιού, Luc. Σεχενίας). See SHECANIAH, No. 8. 3. Another Levite who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{12} (BA Σεβανιά, Luc. Σαβανίας). 4. A priest in David's time, 1 Ch 15^{24} (B Σομνιά, ℵ Σοβνειά, A Σωβενιά, Luc. Σαβανιά).

SHEBARIM (הַשְּׁבָרִים, with art.; καὶ [Luc. ἕως] συνέτριψαν αὐτούς; Sabarim).—A place mentioned (Jos 7^{5}) in the description of the pursuit of the Israelites by the men of Ai. RVm (so also Keil, Josua) tr. hash-shĕbārîm by 'the quarries,' a rendering which Steuernagel (in Nowack's Hdkomm.) is also inclined to accept. The place was on the descent from Ai to the Jordan Valley, but the name has not been recovered. The LXX (cf. Pesh. and Targ. עַד־הַשְּׁבָרִם) does not recognize a proper name, but takes the meaning to be '[they pursued them] till they were broken,' i.e. completely routed and mostly destroyed. See, further, Dillm. ad loc.

SHEBAT.—Zec 1^{7}. See SEBAT and TIME.

SHEBER (שֶׁבֶר; B Σάβερ, A Σέβερ, Luc. Σάβαρ).—A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah, 1 Ch 2^{48}.

SHEBNA (שֶׁבְנָא, in 2 K 18$^{18.26}$ שֶׁבְנָה SHEBNAH; LXX Σόμνας [in Is 36^{3} B Σόβνας, and so Q^{mg} in 36^{11}]).—A major-domo or palace-governor of king Hezekiah, against whom is directed one of the recorded utterances of Isaiah (Is 22$^{15-25}$). The prophet's language implies that Shebna possessed wealth and high position. His chariots and their splendour drew remark (v.^{18}). He had begun the construction of a tomb such as princes made for themselves (v.^{16}). The office he held was domestic in origin, but had become one of the highest in the State. Control of the royal household and management of the affairs of the palace brought the holder of the office into intimate relations with the king, and placed in his hands the dispensing of much favour and patronage. The palace guards were probably under his control, so that the important element of a certain military power was added to his position. Isaiah refers to the supremacy of his authority in the palace (v.^{22}). He also implies that the office (אָב as in Gn 45^{8}) had duties beyond the palace precincts, in Jerusalem and even in Judah (v.^{21}). When Jerusalem was threatened by the Assyrian king, the holder of this office was one of three chosen by Hezekiah to negotiate for him (2 K 18 f.). The palace-governor, in short, was one of the principal ministers of State.

The full significance of Isaiah's prediction regarding Shebna is apparent only if it be remembered, firstly, that he was a foreigner, and, secondly, that he was just then constructing for himself a tomb which should be his monument and resting-place. It was probably on a day when he was viewing complacently the progress of this work that the prophet came to him with his disturbing, disconcerting message. He will not rest in the sepulchre he is making. He has not even found, as he had thought, an adopted country. He will be cast out from the land of Judah, and die and be buried far away from the tomb he is preparing.

The simplest way of regarding Isaiah's message is to take it as a special case of the warning, 'He putteth down the mighty from their seat, he exalteth them of low degree.' Shebna's pride, his arrogant splendour, and his confidence in the future are marked features in his character as it is presented to us. His fate is not represented as retribution for what he has done. Rather, it is the contrast between his present haughty independence and his future humiliation which exposes him to rebuke and brings upon him the prophet's warning. It might be argued that the application of the words 'my servant' to his successor (v.^{20}), and the evidence of v.^{18}, imply that he had transgressed J''s law. It is certainly probable that a man of Shebna's spirit would in his position be guilty of conduct which Isaiah elsewhere resents. But the prophecy does not denounce judgment on him for this reason. It has been suggested that Shebna's policy was not in accordance with Isaiah's, that he was one of those who instigated the king to a breach with Assyria. This also is possible, but is merely conjecture. Even the interpretation of the 'large country' of v.^{18} as Assyria is no support.

The date of the prophecy may be inferred from 2 K 18 f. (=Is 36 f.), where Eliakim appears as holder of the office of major-domo. That was in the year B.C. 701. Some time before this, accordingly, Shebna had been removed from his office. The prophecy was delivered still earlier. The argument implies, in accordance with Is 22$^{20-23}$, that Eliakim's tenure of office followed Shebna's (see ELIAKIM). But this same narrative mentions also a certain 'Shebna the scribe' (2 K 18$^{18.26.37}$ 19^{2}=Is 36$^{3.11.22}$ 37^{2}). It is unlikely that there was more than one Shebna among Hezekiah's officers of State. The subject of Isaiah's prophecy appears, accordingly, to have held, later on, the office of royal secretary. One of two conclusions may be drawn: either the prophecy was unfulfilled in 701, or there is a mistake in describing it as directed against Shebna.

A third view has been maintained, to the effect that change of office from major-domo to secretary is degradation equivalent to fulfilment of the prediction. There is not, however, sufficient proof that the office of State secretary was lower than that of governor of the palace. But, besides, Isaiah foretells as Shebna's fate much more than loss of office. That, indeed, is merely part of the implication of a sentence of exile and banishment. Loss of office, or rather transference to another office, is by no means the same as exile. Isaiah mentions it as a part of Shebna's misfortune. It is less easy to decide between the alternatives which remain. If the spirit and essence of Isaiah's prophecy be considered, Shebna's change of office was not in the slightest degree its fulfilment. This conclusion may be declared impossible on theological grounds. But Shebna's history did not end with the year 701. His exile may have come after that date. Delay in the fulfilment of the prediction or premature anticipation of its fulfilment is all that need be assumed. The alternative conclusion is that the governor of the palace in Is 22 is wrongly named Shebna. In support of this it may be argued (Duhm, ad loc., and others) that the last clause of v.^{15} is in its wrong place, was originally an editorial heading to the section, and may be in error. The words 'against (עַל) Shebna the palace-governor' certainly read like a heading and leave an improved text when removed from their present position. But the suggestion that an editor took the name from 2 K 18 is improbable, since, (1) Shebna is secretary there, and (2) the identification creates evidence against the fulfilment of the prediction. The difficulty, therefore, that Shebna was royal secretary in 701 remains the only reason for eliminating the name from Is 22^{15}.

The designation סֹכֵן in Is 22^{15} has not been referred to. The title occurs only here in the OT.* In 1 K 1$^{2.4}$ the feminine is used (AVm 'cherisher'). In a Phœnician inscription about 30 years older than Isaiah's prophecy (?) (CIS i. p. 25) it is used possibly in the sense of city-governor.† This may be its meaning here. It harmonizes sufficiently with the designation of Shebna as palace-governor. The domestic office may have included the other (cf. v.^{21}). The cognate in Assyr. denotes 'governor' (Del. HWB s. שׂכן). W. B. STEVENSON.

SHEBUEL (שְׁבוּאֵל).—1. A son of Gershom and grandson of Moses, 1 Ch 23^{16} (BA Σουβαήλ, Luc. Σουβιήλ). He was 'ruler over the treasuries,' 26^{24} (B Ἰωήλ, A Σουβαήλ, Luc. Σωβιήλ). He is called in 24^{20} Shubael (שׁוּבָאֵל; B Ἰωβαήλ, A Σουβαήλ, Luc. Σουβιήλ), which is prob. the original form of the name (see Gray, HPN 310). 2. A son of Heman, 1 Ch 25^{4} (BA Σουβαήλ, Luc. Σουβιήλ), called in v.^{20} Shubael (LXX as in v.^{4}).

SHECANIAH (שְׁכַנְיָה; in 1 Ch 24^{11}, 2 Ch 31^{15} שְׁכַנְיָהוּ).—1. A descendant of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3$^{21.22}$ (B Σεχενιά, A and Luc. Σεχενίας, which is the reading of Luc. also in all the following passages). It is probably the same Shecaniah who is named in Ezr 8^{3} (B Σαναχιά, A Σαχανιά); see Ryle, ad loc. 2. According to the MT of Ezr 8^{5}, 'the sons of Shecaniah' were amongst those who returned with Ezra; but a name appears to have dropped out of the text, and we should read 'of the sons of Zattu, Shecaniah the son of Jahaziel' (cf. 1 Es 8^{32} 'of the sons of Zathoes, Sechenias the son of Jezelus'). Ezr 8^{5} is wanting in B; A has ἀπὸ υἱῶν Ζαθοῆς Σεχονίας. 3. Chief of the tenth course of priests, 1 Ch 24^{11} (B Ἰσχανιά, A Σεκενιά). 4. A priest in the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Ch 31^{15} (BA Σεχονίας). 5. A contemporary of Ezra, who supported him in his action in connexion with the foreign marriages, Ezr 10^{2} (Σεχενίας). 6. The father of Shemaiah, 'the keeper of the east gate,' Neh 3^{29} (B Ἐχενιά, ℵA Σεχενιά). It is possible that he and No. 1 are identical. 7. The father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite, Neh 6^{18} (Σεχενιά). 8. The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12^{3} (Σεχενιά). It is the same name which, by interchange of ב and כ, appears as Shebaniah (see SHEBANIAH, No. 2) in Neh 10^{4} 12^{14}.

SHECHEM.—1. (שְׁכֶם) Gn 33^{19} 34$^{2.4}$ etc. See HAMOR. 2. (שֶׁכֶם, Σύχεμ) the name of a Manassite clan, Nu 26$^{31\,(35)}$ (the Shechemites הַשִּׁכְמִי, δημὸς ὁ Συχεμ(εε)ί), Jos 17^{2}, 1 Ch 7^{19}. The various conflicting schemes by which these three passages (P, J, and the Chronicler) connect Shechem with Manasseh are discussed in art. MANASSEH, vol. iii. p. 231 f.

SHECHEM (שְׁכֶם 'shoulder'; Συχέμ, ἡ Σίκιμα (1 K 12^{25}), τὰ Σίκιμα (Jos 24^{32}), Σήκιμα, Σήλω (Jos 24$^{1.25}$), Σίκιμον, Σίκιμα (Joseph.); Sichem, Sicima (Jerome, Onom.)).—There are two views with regard to the name. One, held by Eusebius (Onom. s. Συχέμ), is that Shechem, the son of Hamor, 'the Hivite, the prince of the land' (Gn 33$^{18.19}$), gave his name to the town. In this case the name is used in Gn 12^{6} by anticipation. The other view is that Shechem received his name from the town, which was so called from the shĕchĕm, 'saddle,' or 'shoulder' (cf. Gn 48^{22}), between Ebal and Gerizim, which separates the waters of the Mediterranean from those of the Dead Sea. The latter supposition is the more probable. The name occurs in the 'Travels of a Mohar,' if Max Müller's reading, 'Mountain of Sakama,'—the mountain of Sichem, i.e. Ebal or Gerizim,—be correct (Asien u. Europ. p. 394). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) held the view that Shechem was formerly called Salem; but this opinion is apparently based on a wrong interpretation of Gn 33^{18} (see SHALEM).

The position of Shechem is clearly indicated in the Bible. It was west of Jordan; in the territory allotted to Joseph (see Gn 48^{22}, where 'portion' is the translation of shĕchĕm); in the hill-country of Ephraim (AV Mount Ephraim), within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim (Jos 20^{7} 21^{21}, 1 K 12^{25}, 1 Ch 6^{67} 7^{28}, cf. Jos 17^{7}), and immediately below Gerizim (Jg 9^{7}). It was beyond Shiloh on the high road from Jerus. to the north (Jg 21^{19}), to the west of Michmethath (Jos 17^{7}), and not very far from Dothan (Gn 37$^{12-17}$). The evidence outside the Bible is decisive: Josephus distinctly says (Ant. IV. viii. 44) that Shechem was between Ebal and Gerizim. Eusebius (Onom. s. Συχέμ, Λουζά, Τερέβινθος) places it in the suburbs of, or close to, Neapolis; whilst Jerome (Ep.Pau. xvi.), Epiphanius (adv. Hær. iii. 1055), and later writers identify it with Neapolis, the present Nâblus. Shechem is supposed to have been destroyed during the Jewish War, and to have been rebuilt by Vespasian, who named it Flavia Neapolis. It is so called on coins (Eckhel, Doc.|Num. iii. 433), and by Justin Martyr, who was a native. Josephus says (BJ IV. viii. 1) that Neapolis was anciently called Mabortha, or Mabartha—a name which Pliny gives (HN v. 13) in the form Mamortha. This word has been variously explained. Reland conjectures (Dis. Mis. i. 138–140) that the readings should be corrected from coins which have Morthia—the classical form, according to his view, of Moreh. Tomkins (Abraham and his Age, p. 90) connects Mabortha, Morthia, with Martu, the Sumerian form of the name Amorite, and takes it as evidence of a pre-Semitic occupation of the site. He quotes the view of Sayce, who sees Martu in 'the terebinth of Moreh.' Ritter (Pal. 646) considers that the name refers to the 'pass' or valley in which the town is situated. Olshausen, Ritter (as above), Guérin (Samarie, i. 420), and Riehm (HWB) take it to mean a 'thoroughfare,' or place of 'passage' or 'crossing' (מַעֲבַרְתָּא ma'ăbartā)—a name very applicable to a town situated in the natural passage or valley from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, or on the caravan road from Judæa to Galilee. Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 169) sees in the word a corruption of the Aramæan מברכתא (mabărakhta), 'blessed town,' and supports his view by the statement in the Talmud that the Samaritans called their mountains 'the mountains of blessing.'

When Abram entered the land of Canaan, he camped by the oak (AV 'plain,' RVm 'terebinth') of Moreh, at or near 'the place of Shechem' (AV Sichem), and there built 'an altar unto the LORD' (Gn 12$^{6.7}$). Some authorities maintain, from the expression 'place of Shechem,' that the city did not then exist; but the word 'place' (Gesen. Lex.) is applied to inhabited towns in Gn 18^{24} 19^{12} and 29^{22}. It is also most unlikely that the Canaanites, who were 'then in the land,' would have overlooked or neglected to occupy a well-watered site which possessed so many natural advantages. The oak of Moreh, or a successor, is apparently mentioned as 'the oak which was by Shechem' (Gn 35^{4}), 'the oak that was in the sanctuary of the Lord' (Jos 24^{26}), 'the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem' (Jg 9^{6}). 'The oak of Meonenim' (Jg 9^{37} 'the diviners' tree') is possibly also the tree of Gn 12^{6}, but, Moore thinks, not of Jg 9^{6}.

* Cheyne (Expositor, ix. [1899] p. 454) would read this word also in 2 S 8^{18} 20^{26}, 1 K 4^{5} (1 Ch 18^{17}), but see art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES, p. 73^{b}.

† Quoted and so translated by Winckler, Geschichte Israels, i. 120.

When Jacob 'came from Paddan-aram,' Shechem was a Hivite city under the rule of Hamor the father of Shechem. The patriarch pitched his tent to the east of the city on ground which he afterwards purchased from Hamor, and bequeathed to the children of Joseph. Here Jacob erected an altar, and sunk a well for his family and cattle; and here Joseph was buried (Gn 33^{18-20} 34^{2} 48^{22}, Jos 24^{32}, Jn $4^{5.6.12}$, Ac 7^{16}). The size of the 'parcel' is unknown, but it possibly included the oak beneath which Jacob concealed the gods and trinkets of his household before moving to Bethel (Gn 35^{4}). From the account of the capture and pillage of Shechem, perhaps alluded to in Gn 48^{22}, and of the events which followed the defilement of Dinah, it would appear that the Shechemites were a peaceful, uncircumcised people, who possessed sheep, oxen, and other wealth (Gn $34^{10.21.23.26-29}$; Jos. Ant. I. xxi. 1). The massacre of the Shechemites (if indeed it belongs to the patriarchal period, but see arts. HAMOR, SIMEON) does not seem to have aroused the ill-will of the surrounding tribes, for, whilst Jacob lived at Hebron, his sons pastured his flocks at Shechem in peace (Gn 37^{12-14}).

Shechem acquired additional importance and sanctity from the promulgation of the Law in its immediate neighbourhood (Dt 27^{12-14}, Jos 8^{33-35}); and from the renewal of the covenant with God when Joshua, towards the close of his life, gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem and set up a great stone, as a witness, under 'the oak that was in (AV by) the sanctuary of the LORD' (Jos $24^{1.25-27}$). Joshua made Shechem a city of refuge, and gave it to the Levites (Jos 20^{7} 21^{21}, 1 Ch 6^{67}; cf. Hos 6^{9} (RV); Jos. Ant. V. i. 24). Yet under the Judges we find a temple of Baal-berith in or near the town (Jg $9^{4.46}$), and the population is plainly Canaanite.

After Gideon's death, the men of Shechem made Abimelech, his son by a Shechemite concubine, king by the oak (RV 'plain') of 'the pillar that was in Shechem'; and it was during, or immediately after, the ceremony that Jotham delivered his parable of the trees from Mount Gerizim (Jg 8^{31} $9^{1-3.6-20}$). When Abimelech had reigned three years the Shechemites rose against him, but he soon retook the city, and, after destroying it, sowed the site with salt. He also set fire to and burned the temple of Baal-berith, in which a portion of the garrison had taken refuge (Jg 9^{23-57}; Jos. Ant. V. vii. 4). In consequence of its central position and sacred associations, all Israel assembled at Shechem to make Rehoboam king (1 K 12^{1}, 2 Ch 10^{1}); but the great disruption followed, and the ten tribes revolted, and made Jeroboam their king. Jeroboam rebuilt or fortified the town, and built himself a palace there (1 K 12^{25}; Jos. Ant. VIII. viii. 4). The position, however, was not a strong one, and the capital of the new kingdom was first moved to Tirzah and then to Samaria—sites more capable of defence against the attack of an enemy. When Samaria became the political and religious centre of the Northern Kingdom, Shechem lost its importance, and it is not once mentioned during the monarchy. The town was, however, inhabited after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 41^{5}), and became the chief town of the Samaritans (Sir 50^{26}; Jos. Ant. XI. viii. 6). About B.C. 132 it was taken by John Hyrcanus, and the temple on Mt. Gerizim destroyed (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1; BJ I. ii. 6).

Shechem was probably destroyed during the Jewish War, and its place taken by Flavia Neapolis, built by Vespasian a short distance to the west of the ancient site. Coins struck at Neapolis during the reign of Antoninus Pius represent Gerizim with a large temple on its summit, approached by many steps cut or built in the side of the mountain. This temple, according to the Samaritan Chronicle, Dion Cassius (xv. 12), and Damascius (Phot. Bibl. p. 1055), was built by Hadrian, and dedicated to Jupiter. In the reign of Zeno the Samaritans attacked (A.D. 474) the Christians at Pentecost, and wounded the bishop, Terebinthus, whose name was perhaps taken from the terebinth or oak of Moreh. In consequence of this, the emperor deprived the Samaritans of Gerizim and gave the mountain to the Christians, who built a church on it which they dedicated to the Virgin. Justinian afterwards surrounded the church with a strong wall, and rebuilt five churches in Neapolis which the Samaritans had destroyed (Procop. De Ædif. v. 7). The only known bishops of Neapolis are Germanus, who attended the Councils of Ancyra and Nicæa, Terebinthus, Procopius, Ammonas, and Joannes, who was present at the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 536). In 1184 Nâblus was pillaged by Saladin, and in 1834 by the soldiers of Ibrahim Pasha. In 1202 and again in 1837 the town suffered greatly from severe earthquakes.

Near the centre of Palestine the range of hills which traverses the country from north to south is pierced by a remarkable pass—the only one conspicuous from the sea. The pass, which lies between Ebal and Gerizim, is the Vale of Shechem. The valley rises gradually eastward to a grand natural amphitheatre, with its southern end recessed in Gerizim and its northern in Ebal. Here the gently swelling ground of the arena separates the waters of the Mediterranean from those of the Dead Sea; and here, in all probability, was held 'the great inaugural service of all Israel on taking possession of the country.' Eastward of the waterparting, the ground falls gradually between Ebal and Gerizim to the rich level plain of el-Mukhna; and near the spot where the valley merges into the plain are the traditional sites of Jacob's Well and Joseph's Tomb. The beauty of the Vale of Shechem and its exuberant fertility have often been described. The soft colouring of the landscape, the fresh green of the gardens that slope down on either side, the grey olive trees, the joyous notes of the numerous birds of song, and the 'mighty burst of waters from the flank of Gerizim,' make the vale the most beautiful spot in Central and Southern Palestine. Amidst this wealth of verdure, clinging as it were to the lower slopes of Gerizim, lies Nâblus (Neapolis), the 'little Damascus' of the old Arab writers, and a little to the east, between the modern town and the waterparting, probably lay Shechem. The natural attractiveness of the locality, its central position on the highland road from north to south, and the facilities for communication on the one hand with Sharon and the Mediterranean, and on the other with the Jordan Valley and the trans-Jordanic regions, marked it out as a place of importance from the remotest period. A trade route, to which allusion is made in Hos 6^{9}, and which the Psalmist may have had in his mind when he connected Shechem with the valley of Succoth (Ps 60^{6} 108^{7}), ran at a very early date from the coast districts, past Shechem to Gilead. The connexion with the districts east of Jordan remained almost to the present day, for, until recently, Gilead was governed from Nâblus, which is still the connecting link between the telegraph system east and west of Jordan. The modern town contains three churches built by the Crusaders which are now mosques, the synagogue of the Samaritans, and a few fragments of the Roman city. Immediately outside the town, on the S.W., there is a small mosque on the traditional site of Jacob's mourning when Joseph's coat was brought to him. In the minaret close by there is a stone with a Samaritan inscription containing the Ten Commandments.

Environs.—There are three spots in the neighbourhood of Shechem which require some notice: the Well of Jacob, the Tomb of Joseph, and the site of the 'oak' of Moreh. A tradition that goes back to the early part of the 4th cent., and in which Jews, Samaritans, Christians, and Moslems agree, identifies Jacob's Well with Bîr Y'akûb. This well, sometimes called Bîr es-Samarîeh, 'well of the Samaritan' (woman), is situated in the level plain of el-Mukhna, about 1½ m. from Nâblus on the road to Jerus., and a little beyond the village of Balâta. The well is sunk to a great depth, partly through alluvial soil and partly through limestone, so as to secure, even in exceptionally dry seasons, a supply of water. By its construction in his own 'parcel' of ground, the patriarch, with great prudence and forethought, made himself independent of the springs which probably belonged to the Shechemite villagers, and avoided those quarrels about water which are so common in a country where the population is partly sedentary and partly nomadic. Eusebius (Onom.) and the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) mention the well in connexion with Sychar, a place which they distinguish from Sichem and Neapolis. Jerome (Onom.) adds that there was a church at the well which was visited by St. Paula (Ep. Paul. xvi.). Antoninus Martyr (A.D. 570), Arculfus (A.D. 670), and Willibald (A.D. 754), mention the well and church, and Arculfus adds that the church was cruciform, the well being in the centre. The church was apparently destroyed before the arrival of the Crusaders and rebuilt in the 12th cent. It was again destroyed after the battle of Hattin, and remained a heap of rubbish until a few years ago, when it became the property of the Greek Church, and its foundations were uncovered by excavation. The stone on which our Lord sat is said to have been taken to Constantinople in the reign of Justinian (see SYCHAR).

Jewish, Samaritan, and Christian tradition identifies the Tomb of Joseph with a modern building, called Kabr Yûsuf, situated in the plain about ¼ m. north of Jacob's Well. Moslem traditions vary —one accepting the Kabr Yûsuf, another placing the tomb in the cemetery Rijal el-'Amûd at the foot of Gerizim. The latter place was apparently shown to Maundrell (A.D. 1697). Eusebius, the Bordeaux Pilgrim, and Jerome (Onom.) place the tomb to the east of Neapolis and close to Sichem. Jerome elsewhere (Ep. Paul. xvi.) says that St. Paula, after leaving Jacob's Well, visited the 'tombs of the twelve patriarchs.' The tradition that the twelve sons of Jacob were buried at Shechem rests on the words of St. Stephen (Ac 7$^{15.16}$). Josephus (Ant. II. viii. 2) says they were buried at Hebron. Nearly all later writers refer to the tomb without distinctly indicating its position; but all Jewish travellers place it in the immediate neighbourhood of the village of Balâta.

Two sites have been suggested for the 'oak' of Moreh. At the foot of Gerizim, in the recess which forms part of the natural amphitheatre already described, there is a small, well-kept cemetery, with a mosque, a courtyard, a well, and several tombs of which one is the tomb of Sheikh Yûsuf. The place is called Rijal el-'Amûd, 'the men of the column,' or simply el-'Amûd, 'the column.' Here, according to one tradition, Joseph and his brethren were buried, or, according to another, several Jewish prophets. A third tradition finds in it the spot where Jacob buried the idols of his household, whilst the Samaritans believe it to be the place where Joshua set up a great stone under the 'oak' that was in the sanctuary of the LORD (Jos 24^{26}). The other site is Balâta, a small hamlet with a beautiful spring, not far from Jacob's Well. The village is mentioned in the Samaritan Book of Joshua under its present name, which contains the radicals of the Aramaic word for 'oak.' The place is also, apparently, that mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) as Balanus (translated by them 'oak') near Joseph's Tomb, and identified by them with the oak of Shechem.

SHEDEUR (שְׁדֵיאוּר; the first part of the word is probably שַׁדַּי Shaddai, cf. Gray, HPN 169, 197). —The father of Elizur, the chief of Reuben, Nu 1^5 2^{10} (B and Luc. in both Σεδιούρ, A 'Εδιούρ) 7^{30} (B 'Εδισουρ, B^{ab}AF Σεδισούρ) 10^{18} (Σεδιούρ).

SHEEP.—The generic name for 'sheep' is צֹאן ẓôn (properly 'small cattle'). The unit is expressed by שֶׂה seh, which also applies to goats. אַיִל 'ayîl signifies 'a ram'; רָחֵל rāḥēl, 'a ewe'; כֶּבֶשׂ kebhes (fem. kibhsah and kabhsah), or by transposition כֶּשֶׂב kesebh (Lv 3^7, fem. kisbah), 'a (yearling) lamb'; טָלֶה ṭāleh (1 S 7^9), and כַּר kar (Ps 37^{20}), 'a young lamb.' See, further, LAMB.

The sheep, as supplying most of the wants of a pastoral people, was their chief possession, and a measure of their wealth and prosperity. Job had 7000 head of sheep at first, then 14,000 (Job 1^3 42^{12}). Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Esau had vast flocks of them. Sheep furnished their owners with clothing, milk, butter, cheese, meat, and a medium of exchange. The king of Moab (see art. MESHA) paid an annual tribute of 100,000 lambs and the same number of rams to the king of Israel (2 K 3^4). Reuben took from the sons of Ishmael 250,000 sheep (1 Ch 5^{21}). Solomon sacrificed 120,000 sheep at the dedication of the temple (1 K 8^{63}). His household consumed 100 sheep a day (1 K 4^{23}). The Israelites entered Egypt as shepherds (Gn 47$^{1-6}$), and left it with much cattle (Ex 12^{38}). The same regions which furnished the vast flocks in ancient times are still noted for their sheep. All the plateaus east of the Jordan, and the mountains of Palestine and Syria, are pasture-grounds for innumerable flocks and herds. In the spring, when the ewes bring forth their young, the succulent grasses furnish suitable nourishment. Later on, when the rain has ceased, the sheep still nibble the dried herbage and stubble, and flourish where to a Western eye all is barren desert. They require water but once a day, and, where they cannot get it from perennial streams as the Leontes, the Orontes, the Jordan, the Yermuk, the Zerḳa (Jabboḳ), the Zerḳa-Ma'în, the Mu'jib (Arnon), etc., they find it in the innumerable wells, fountains, and cisterns known to the Arabs. The descendants of the same shepherds who tended flocks in Bible days, still occupy the great sheep-walks of Palestine.

The male of sheep, as of other animals, was usually chosen for sacrifice, as being the representative sex, and because the female was reserved for breeding. The leper, however, offered two he-lambs and one ewe (Lv 14^{10}). Similarly, while the sin-offering of a ruler was a male kid, that of one of the common people was a female kid or lamb (Lv $4^{23.28.32}$). The idea of sacrifice has not disappeared wholly, even from Islâm. On important occasions, as the opening of a new road, or the erection of an important building, sheep are sacrificed, and their flesh given to the poor. There is a 'Feast of the Sacrifice' at Mecca every year, in connexion with the ḥaj, when many thousands of sheep and other animals are killed, and their flesh distributed among the poor. The milk of sheep is especially mentioned (Dt 32^{14}, 1 Co 9^{7}). Wool was and is a staple of commerce (2 K 3^{4}, Ezk 27^{18}). It is very frequently mentioned. The priests had the first of the clip (Dt 18^{4}). Good housewives spun it and wove it (Pr 31^{13}). Sheep-shearing was a festival (Gn 31^{19} 38^{12}, 1 S 25, 2 S 13^{23-27}). The ram has long recurved horns, which were used for trumpets (Jos 6^{4}) and oil-flasks (1 S 16^{1}). They are now used as powder-horns. Rams' skins, dyed red, were used in the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 26^{14}). Sheep skins were and are fashioned into a baggy kind of coat (He 11^{37}). Such a garment is the protection of every Syrian shepherd against the wind and rain.

The broad-tailed breed of sheep, now universal in Palestine and Syria, was prob. there from ancient times. The immense tail is a great desideratum. It is the 'rump' of Ex 29^{22}, Lv 3^{9} (RV 'fat tail'). It furnishes as much as 10 pounds of pure fat. This is tried out, usually mixed with fine morsels of lean, about as large as a white bean, and packed away in earthen jars for winter use. This mixture is the main reliance of the peasants of Lebanon in the way of animal food for several months of each year. It is called ḳauramah. To increase the amount of adipose matter in the tail, the sheep is fattened by forced feeding with mulberry leaves. A bolus of these leaves is made up by the woman or girl in charge, and crammed between the teeth of the animal, which is then compelled to masticate and swallow it. Towards the middle of October the sheep become so fat that they are often unable to stand.

The care of sheep is a subject of frequent allusion in Scripture. They are exposed to the vicissitudes of weather, winter and summer, frost and drought, in the immense treeless plains where they are most raised (Gn 31^{40}); to the attacks of beasts and robbers (v.^{39}, 1 S 17^{34}, Jn $10^{1.10.11}$). The shepherd leads (not drives) them to pasture and water (Ps 23. 77^{20} 78^{52} 80^{1}); protects them at the risk of his life (Jn 10^{15}). To keep them from the cold and rain and beasts, he collects them in caves (1 S 24^{3}) or enclosures built of rough stones (Nu 32^{16}, Jg 5^{16}, Zeph 2^{6}, Jn 10^{1}). The sheep know the shepherd, and heed his voice (Jn 10^{4}). It is one of the most interesting spectacles to see a number of flocks of thirsty sheep brought by their several shepherds to be watered at a fountain. Each flock, in obedience to the call of its own shepherd, lies down, awaiting its turn. The shepherd of one flock calls his sheep in squads, draws water for them, pours it into the troughs, and, when the squad has done, orders it away by sounds which the sheep perfectly understand, and calls up another squad. When the whole of one flock is watered, its shepherd signals to it, and the sheep rise, and move leisurely away, while another flock comes in a similar manner to the troughs, and so on, until all the flocks are watered. The sheep never make any mistake as to who whistles to them or calls them. 'They know not the voice of strangers' (Jn 10^{5}). Sometimes they are called by names (v.^{3}). It was such a scene that greeted Jacob's eyes when he fell in love with Rachel at first sight (Gn $29^{10.11}$). Moses met his wife and her sisters at the watering troughs (Ex 2^{16-21}). The shepherd often carries the smaller lambs in his bosom, or under his arm, or in the folds of his cloak (Is 40^{11}). Dogs are indispensable to shepherds (Job 30^{1}). They protect the flock from wild animals and robbers. They are the unkempt, savage, shaggy originals of the city dogs of the East. They help to keep the sheep together like the Scotch collies. Syrian sheep are usually white (Ps 147^{16}, Is 1^{18}, Dn 7^{9}), but some are brown (Gn 30^{32-42}, RV 'black').

No animal mentioned in Scripture compares in symbolical interest and importance with the sheep. It is alluded to about 500 times. The people of God are His sheep (Ps 95^{7} 100^{3}, Jn 21^{15-17}), and His ministers pastors,* i.e. shepherds (Jer 23^{1}, Eph 4^{11}; cf. our Lord's charge to St. Peter Jn $21^{15ff.}$; see art. PETER, vol. iii. p. 761). Christ is the Good Shepherd (Jn 10^{11}), and 'the Lamb (ὁ ἀμνός) of God, which taketh away the sins of the world' (Jn 1^{29}). The song of the redeemed is 'the song of Moses and the Lamb' (Rev 15^{3}), of the law and the gospel. Satan and his hosts 'made war with the Lamb,' and the Lamb overcame (17^{14}). The last act of the drama of redemption is 'the marriage of the Lamb' (Rev 19^{9} $21^{9.14}$), and thereafter 'God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple' (v.^{22}), and 'the Lamb is the light thereof' (v.^{23}). Those who are written in 'the Lamb's book of life' (v.^{27}) enter into His rest. The last vision of Revelation is 'the throne of God and the Lamb' (τὸ ἀρνίον, 22^{1}). G. E. POST.

SHEERAH (שֶׁאֱרָה).—A 'daughter' of Ephraim, who, according to the MT of 1 Ch 7^{24}, built the two Beth-horons and a place of doubtful identity † called Uzzen-sheerah (אֻזֵּן־שֶׁאֱרָה = 'portion [? lit. something weighed] of Sheerah'). In v.^{24a}, while A and Luc. recognize a proper name in שֶׁאֱרָה, B, reading apparently וּבִשְׁאֵרָה instead of וּבִתּוֹ שֶׁאֱרָה (A καὶ ἡ θυγατὴρ αὐτοῦ Σααρά, Luc. Σαραά), renders καὶ ἐν ἐκείνοις τοῖς καταλοίποις, and makes Ephraim himself the builder of the upper and the lower Beth-horon. In v.^{24b} the LXX gives quite a different turn to the passage. Instead of the place-name Uzzen-sheerah, it reads καὶ υἱοὶ Ὀζάν· Σεηρά (= וּבְנֵי אֻזֵּן שֶׁאֱרָה).

SHEKINAH (Heb. שְׁכִינָה 'that which dwells or resides').—The word, as well as the conception, originated after the close of the Hebrew Canon, and is characteristic of Judaistic theology, though the conception occurs also, with deeper connotation, in NT writings. The word is never used except of God; and implies what we should designate 'the Divine Presence,' or 'the Divine Manifestation.' The two most remarkable features of Judaistic theology were its development of the doctrine of Divine 'aloofness,' and the way in which it then sought to bridge the chasm which it had created between God and man. It was felt to be an indignity to God that He should be supposed to have direct contact with inert matter, and immediate intercourse with sinful man; and He was gradually pushed further away from His world. The transcendence of God, and His exemption from all limitations, was insisted on with increasing vigour, until it reached the ne plus ultra in Philo, who maintains that to assign any quality to God would be to limit Him; and that He is the absolutely unlimited, since He is eternal, unchangeable, simple substance. 'Of God, we can only say that He is, not what He is' (Drummond, Philo Jud. ii. 23–30). Having thus undeified God, in their endeavour to dehumanize Him, the object of philosophic Jews was to posit some one or more intermediary Hypostases, who might occupy the place which had previously been assigned to God, in the world of matter and of mind. Of these the most prominent were the Metatron, the Word, the Spirit, Wisdom, and the Shekinah. It is the last of these which now calls for investigation.

* The same misleading tr. occurs also in Jer 2^{8} 3^{15} 10^{21} 17^{16} 22^{22} $23^{2.4}$, in all of which RV alters to 'shepherd.'

† It is identified in Bartholomew-Smith's map of Palestine (1901) with Beit Sira, a little to the S.W. of the lower Beth-horon.

In the Hebrew religion, even in its least developed form, Jehovah is always the God of heaven as well as of earth. In times of storm, God was very near and very real to the Hebrews. They conceived of Jehovah as sitting on the storm-cloud, which they designated כְּרוּב: 'He rode upon a cherub and did fly. He flew swiftly on the wings of the wind' (Ps 18^{10}): and the brilliance gleaming forth behind and through the black cloud was conceived to be due to the very presence of God: the light being the body or garment of God. When 'the Lord of (the heavenly) hosts' was described as dwelling in the midst of the earthly 'hosts' of His favoured people, we are told that cherubim overlaid with gold were prepared for His throne; and that a brilliance shining behind and through clouds was His mundane manifestation, as He is also seen in the clouds of heaven (Ex 40^{34-38}). On the summit of Sinai a cloud rested six days, amid which the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire, and Moses entered into the midst of the cloud (Ex 24^{16-18}). And when the tabernacle was finished, 'the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle' (Ex 40^{34}). 'By day the cloud was upon the tabernacle, and there was fire therein by night' (Ex 40^{38}).

It was these celestial and terrestrial phenomena which suggested to the Jew the conception of the Shekinah. The desideratum was to find something which is Divine but is not God. God was very far away; literally 'beyond all knowledge and all thought': yet He rules the world mediately, if not immediately; and being a monotheist the Jew could not let go his belief—that only that which is Divine can rule the world. This, then, was the problem: to discover a mediator, or mediators, Divine, but not God. How can this be made thinkable? Well, the wind (rûaḥ) is the breath of God, whether in the zephyr or the storm; and if so, it is Divine. So thought the Jew; and in course of time the rûaḥ, which first meant 'breath' or 'wind,' was supposed to be endowed with the attributes of God—power, wisdom, holiness—and then 'spirit' becomes its more appropriate rendering. God's rûaḥ is thus Divine—an effluence from Deity—and is thus fitted to be intermediary between God and the world of nature and man. Further, there was the Divine Word. The sacred Hebrew books assigned great importance to Divine utterances or words. 'God said, "Let light be"; and light was' (Gn 1^{3}). It was a peculiarity of the ancient world to ascribe causal efficiency to an uttered word, as is seen in the potency ascribed to magical formulæ. When later Judaism expounded such passages as the one we have just quoted, it assigned to the uttered word a causal efficacy in the physical realm. The very words 'Let there be light' were to them a vera causa in the natural sphere, and were instrumental in causing the light to come into being; as Zec 5^{4} speaks of an uttered 'curse' entering a house and 'consuming its timbers and its stones.' An utterance of God is something Divine: as potent as God Himself, and therefore 'Word' lends itself to Jewish philosophy as a suitable expression for a Divine intermediary between God and the world. This helps us to understand how Judaism came to its conception of the Shekinah. The glory in the storm-cloud, in and over the tabernacle, is a manifestation of God. The brilliance is not God; for it was a matter of fixed Jewish belief that God is invisible, and yet the brilliance is an effluence from Deity. When the Jew had banished God from his universe, the recorded manifestation of the Divine Presence in the ark and elsewhere seemed to him a tertium quid between God and Nature: Divine, but separable in thought from God.

The word Shekinah is used very often in the Jewish Targums. It does not indicate the radiance or brilliance, but the central cause of the radiance. This centre was conceived to be Divine. The Heb. Scriptures often speak of 'the glory' of the Lord, but, with one exception (Zec 2^{9}), the Targumists never use the word Shekinah to translate the Heb. word for 'glory.' They understood כָּבוֹד to be the effulgence of the substantial glory, i.e. of the Shekinah. The Shekinah is used in the Targums as the equivalent for the Divine Being, not for His glory. A good illustration of this occurs in Is 60^{2}, where the Heb. reads, 'The LORD shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee,' and the Targ. renders, 'In thee the Shekinah of the LORD shall dwell, and his glory shall be revealed upon thee.' Whenever the Heb. text would seem to impose any limitations of space upon God, the Targ. substitutes for 'God,' 'his Shekinah.' In every instance where God is said to dwell in a place, the Targ. renders that God 'causes his Shekinah to dwell' there (Gn 9^{27}, Ex 25^{8} 29^{45}, 1 K 6^{13} 8^{12}, Zec 8^{3}). Every expression which would in any sense localize God, is scrupulously altered by all the Targumists, who believed that the Shekinah can be localized, but not the omnipresent God. When Jacob says (Gn 28^{16}), 'God is in this place,' Targ. renders, 'The glory of the Shekinah of J″ is in this place.' So Hab 2^{20} 'The Lord is in his holy temple,' becomes 'J″ was pleased to cause his Shekinah to dwell,' etc. When J″ is said to 'sit upon the cherubim' (1 S 4^{4}, 2 S 6^{2}) the Targ. must needs read, 'the Shekinah of J″' for 'J″': and Jerusalem is the place where J″ causes His Shekinah to dwell (1 K $8^{12.13}$ 14^{21}, Ps 74^{2}). Similarly, when the Heb. text says that any one saw God, or that God appeared to any one, the Targ. can only permit the glory of the Shekinah of J″ to be visible to mortal man (Is 6^{5} 'My eyes have seen the glory of the Shekinah of the King of the world'; cf. Ex 3^{6}, Ezk 1^{1}, Lv 9^{4}).

The Targumist even shrinks from saying that J″ is or dwells in heaven. The Heaven of Heavens cannot contain God; and therefore it is not God, but His Shekinah, which can be localized, even in heaven. Is 33^{5} 'He dwelleth on high,' becomes in Targ. 'He has placed his Shekinah in the lofty heaven' (cf. Is 32^{15} 38^{14}). In Dt 4^{39} 'J″ is God in heaven above and on earth beneath,' Onk. renders 'God, whose Shekinah is (Targ. Jerus. 'dwells') in heaven above, and who rules on earth beneath'; so Dt 3^{24}.

If a rigorous conception of God's ubiquity forbade His dwelling in a place, so also must it preclude His removal from a place. When Hos 5^{6} says, 'J″ has withdrawn himself from them,' Targ. reads 'J″ has removed his Shekinah from them.' This phrase is also used of God's 'hiding his face' (Is 8^{17} 57^{17} 59^{2}, Jer 33^{5}), and 'hiding his eyes' (Is 1^{15}). The words 'Thou art a God that hidest thyself' (Is 45^{15}) are rendered, 'Thou hast placed thy Shekinah in the lofty fastness.' Cf. Hab 3^4.

It was the belief of the Jews that the glory of the LORD did not dwell in the Most Holy Place in the second Temple. The Talmud (Yoma 9*b*) explains this on the ground that God only dwells in the tents of Shem; not of Japheth, of whom Cyrus was a descendant. This was deplored, and the promises of more intimate fellowship to be enjoyed by the Church in the Messianic age are in the Targ. all made to predict the presence of the Shekinah (Jl 3 $(4)^{17}$ 'I will place my Shekinah in Zion'; so Ezk $43^{7.9}$, Hag 1^8 2^9, Zec 2^{10}).

It would be difficult among all these passages from the Targum to point to one in which activity or personality is assigned to the Shekinah. Under the conception that 'God is Light,' the Skekinah is God's mere 'manifestation-form.' When we pass, however, from the Targ. to the Midrash and Talmud, the Shekinah ceases to be inactive, and has functions assigned to it which belong rather to the Logos or the Spirit. Lv 26^{12} 'I will walk among you, and be your God,' becomes in Targ. 'I will place the glory of my Shekinah among you, and my Memra (word) shall be with you.' Dt 12^5 Targ. Jerus. 'The place which the Memra of J″ shall choose to place his Shekinah there'; but in Midr. and Talm. the Memra almost disappears, and His functions are assigned to the Shekinah. We find in Pesachim 73 that it was the Shekinah which spoke to Amos and the prophets; and the expression מומור לדוד ('a Psalm of David') means that the Shekinah came down upon David, and he then spake forth the Psalm (Pes. 114). The Shekinah is, in the Talmud, regularly the source of inspiration. The reason why Eli mistook Hannah's grief for inebriety was that the Shekinah had departed from him. The Mishna was given through Moses under the auspices of the Shekinah. Pirḳe Aboth iii. 3 uses Shekinah in the Christian sense of the word Spirit: 'Whenever two men sit together and are occupied with words of the Torah, the Shekinah is with them.' In the Talmud (Berakhoth 6*a*) the number is raised to 'ten.' The Shekinah is always present in synagogues, in schools, and in the homes of the pious (Sota 17*a*). 'He that eats with the Wise enjoys the Shekinah' (Weber, 182 [^{2}188]).

We have seen that it was usually taught that the Shekinah was not visible in the second Temple. Yoma 1 mentions the Shekinah in a list of things absent from it. But others teach that the Shekinah is inseparable from Israel. When Israel was in Babylon the Shekinah was there. The Shekinah was under the yoke, when Israel so suffered. Wherever Israel is scattered, the Shekinah dwells. When Titus destroyed the Temple, the Shekinah could not desert it, and it is still there behind the remaining western wall (Weber, 60 [^{2}62]).

The activity of the Shekinah was conceived to extend not only to earth, but to Sheol. There were some of the Rabbis who held the doctrine now known as 'final restoration.' R. Joshua ben Levi was one of these. He believed that the bound in Gehinnom will one day see the Messiah, and all who bear the mark of the covenant will loose their chains and ascend from the darkness. But in Bereshith Rabba to Gn 44^8 the Shekinah is the deliverer. It affirms that the wicked Jews now 'bound in Gehinnom will ascend out of hell, with the Shekinah at their head' (Weber, 351 [^{2}368]).

We turn now to the NT where the word שְׁכִינָה occurs both transliterated and translated. There can be no reasonable doubt that the Greek word σκηνή (='tabernacle') was from its resemblance in sound and meaning used by bilingual Jews for the Heb. Shekinah; e.g. in Rev 21^3 'Behold the σκηνή of God is with men, and he will tabernacle (σκηνώσει) with them.' The allusion is equally clear in Jn 1^{14} 'The Logos . . . tabernacled (ἐσκήνωσεν) among us, and we beheld his glory.'—The conception of the Shekinah appears in Greek dress under the word δόξα. In several instances δόξα is used of Deity or a manifestation-form of Deity, and thus shows itself to be the equivalent of Shekinah. We will first cite one or two passages from the Apocrypha. In Enoch 14^{20} we read, 'And the Great Glory sat thereon, and his raiment shone more brightly than the sun'; Enoch 102^3 'The angels will seek to hide themselves from the presence of the Great Glory'; To 3^{16} 'The prayer of both was heard before the glory of the Great One,' ἐνώπιον τῆς δόξης τοῦ μεγάλου [Query: Since Tobit was translated from a Semitic source, is it not likely, with Enoch before us, that the Greek ought to be ἐνώπιον τῆς δόξης τῆς μεγάλης: 'before the Great Glory'?]; Sir 17^{13} 'Their eyes saw the majesty of the glory.' In the NT there are several instances in which δόξα is used as more or less the equivalent of Shekinah. In Ro 9^4, where St. Paul is enumerating, with patriotic fervour, the privileges of the Jew, and amongst others mentions 'the giving of the law' and 'the glory,' he evidently means 'the Shekinah-glory'; as in He 9^5 'the cherubim of glory' means 'the cherubim on which the Shekinah was enthroned.' So in He 1^3 when the Son of God is said to be 'the effulgence of the glory' (not 'of his glory') it seems probable that the Shekinah was intended, in the sense of 'the manifested Deity.' The personality of the Shekinah is implied in 2 P 1^{17}, where we read (translating literally), 'when such a voice was borne in to him by (ὑπό) the majestic glory.' The word ὑπό denotes the agent. 'The glory' is the speaker: as in Targ. Jerus. of Gn 28^{13} the glory of J″ says, 'I am the God of Abraham'; and as is possibly implied in Mt 17^5 'A bright cloud overshadowed them, and there came a voice out of the cloud.' 2 Mac 2^8, in anticipating the fulfilment of OT prophecy, says, 'The glory of the LORD shall be sun and the cloud.'

There are three other NT passages where an allusion to the Shekinah is probable, though exegetes are divided on the matter. Ro 6^4 'Christ was raised from the dead by means of (διά) the glory of the Father.' 'Glory' may of course here mean 'glorious power,' as commentators say; but, with the passage from the Midrash before us, in which the Shekinah is said to release captives from Sheol, it seems to the present writer probable that St. Paul was thinking of the Shekinah piercing with its radiance the gloom of Sheol, and co-operating with God to release the Divine captive from the power of Satan and 'the gates of Sheol.' The second disputed passage is 1 P 4^{14} τὸ τῆς δόξης καὶ τὸ τοῦ θεοῦ πνεῦμα, which RV renders, 'The (Spirit) of glory and the Spirit of God,' where Bengel is probably correct in regarding δόξης as an appellation of Christ. If this be so, it helps to elucidate our third passage, viz. Ja 2^1 τὴν πίστιν τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆς δόξης, which Mayor correctly renders, 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Shekinah.' The context refers to an assembly of Christians, where the Shekinah was believed to be present. Thus interpreted, the passage blends together Mt 18^{20} and the words cited above from Pirḳe Aboth, identifying Jesus with the Shekinah.

SHELAH (שֵׁלָה).—1. The youngest son of Judah by Shua, Gn $38^{5.\ 11.\ 14.\ 26}$ 46^{12} (A Σηλώμ, Luc. Σιλώμ), Nu $26^{20\ (16)}$ (BA and Luc. Σηλών, F Σηλώμ), 1 Ch 2^{3} (Σηλών) 4^{21} (BA Σηλώμ, Luc. Σηλών). He gave his name to the family of the Shelanites (הַשֵּׁלָנִי, δῆμος ὁ Σηλων(ε)ί), Nu $26^{20\ (16)}$. Probably 'the Shelanite' should be read also for 'the Shilonite' (הַשִּׁלֹנִי or הַשִּׁילֹנִי) of Neh 11^{5} (Luc. Σηλωνεί, B Δηλωνέ, ℵ Δηλωνεί, A 'Ηλωνί) and 1 Ch 9^{5} (Σηλων(ε)ί). 2. (שֶׁלַח) the son or (LXX) grandson of Arpachshad and father of Eber, Gn $10^{24\ bis}$ $11^{13\ (12).\ 14.\ 15}$, 1 Ch $1^{18.\ 24}$ (Σαλά, Luc. in Gn 10^{24} in second occurrence Σαλᾶς), Lk 3^{35} (Σαλά).

SHELAH, THE POOL OF (בְּרֵכַת הַשֶּׁלַח; B κολυμβήθρα τῶν κωδίων, ℵ + τοῦ Σιλωάμ, Luc. ἡ κρήνη τοῦ Σιλωάμ; Piscina Siloe).—This name occurs only in Neh 3^{15}, where it is given in AV as 'Siloah.' 'Shelaḥ' is probably a corrupt form of Siloam, the modern Silwân. See SILOAM, POOL OF. Perhaps in Neh 3^{15} we should punctuate הַשִּׁלֹחַ as in Is 8^{6}.

SHELANITES.—See SHELAH.

SHELEMIAH (שֶׁלֶמְיָה).—1. (B Σελεμιά, A Σελεμίας) One of the sons of Bani, who married a 'strange' wife in the time of Ezra, Ezr 10^{39}; called Selemias in 1 Es 9^{34}. 2. (B Τελεμιά, ℵ Τελεμίας) Father of Hananiah, who restored part of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh 3^{30}. His son is perhaps 'Hananiah, one of the apothecaries' (Neh 3^{8}, AV 'son of one of the apoth.'), i.e. makers of perfumes, who restored another portion of the wall. 3. A priest who was appointed by Nehemiah to be one of the treasurers over the treasuries, to distribute the Levitical tithes, Neh 13^{13}. 4. The father of Jehucal or Jucal in the time of Zedekiah, Jer 37^{3}, 38^{1}; in the latter passage his name appears in the longer form שֶׁלֶמְיָהוּ. 5. The father of Irijah, the captain of the ward who arrested Jeremiah as a deserter to the Chaldæans, Jer 37^{13}. 6. (שֶׁלֶמְיָהוּ, B Σαλαμειά, A Σελεμιά) 1 Ch 26^{14} = Meshelemiah, Meshullam, or Shallum, the head of a family of porters. 7. Another of the sons of Bani who married a 'strange' wife in the time of Ezra, Ezr 10^{41}. 8. Ancestor of the Jehudi who lived in the time of Jehoiakim, Jer 36^{14}. 9. (LXX om.) Son of Abdeel, and one of those sent by Jehoiakim to take Baruch and Jeremiah, Jer 36^{26}.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

SHELEPH (שָׁלֶף [pause]; LXX A Σαλέφ).—Son of Joktan, Gn 10^{26}, 1 Ch 1^{20}. The word is evidently identical with the Arabic salaf, salif, etc., which figure as the names of several places in Arabia; Yakut mentions a place called 'the two Salafs,' quoting for it a verse of a pre-Mohammedan poet; places called Salf, Salif, and Salafah are noticed in the S. Arabian geography of Hamdani; and a province called Salif is mentioned by Muḳaddasi among those of Yemen (p. 90). The Arabic genealogists further discovered a subdivision of the Himyarites which had the name Sulaf, and which they identified with the son of Joktan (Taj al-'arus, vi. 143). The Arabic salaf means simply 'ancestor,' while salif or silf means 'a sister's husband'; there would therefore be no improbability in the name in the text being not geographical but personal. Some further guesses are recorded by Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.).

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

SHELESH (שֵׁלֶשׁ; B Σεμή, A Σελλής, Luc. Σέλεμ).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{35}.

SHELOMI (שְׁלֹמִי; B Σελεμεί [λεμ sup ras B^{a}], AF Σελεμί).—Father of an Asherite prince, Nu 34^{27}.

SHELOMITH (שְׁלֹמִית; in Ezr 8^{10} שְׁלוֹמִית).—1. The mother of the man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed 'the Name,' Lv 24^{11} (B*AF Σαλωμείθ, Luc. Σαλμίθ). 2. Daughter of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{19} (B Σαλωμεθεί, A Σαλωμεθί, Luc. Σαλωμίθ). 3. One of the 'sons of Izhar,' 1 Ch 23^{18} (B Σαλωμώθ, A Σαλουμώθ, Luc. Σαλωμίθ), called in 24^{22} Shelomoth. 4. The name of a family whose representatives returned with Ezra, Ezr 8^{10} (B Σαλειμούθ, Luc. Σαλιμώθ). It is probable that a name has dropped out of the MT, and that we should read 'of the sons of Bani, Shelomith the son of Josiphiah' (cf. A^{vid} ἀπὸ υἱῶν Βααυὶ Σελειμμούθ, and 1 Es 8^{36} 'of the sons of Banias, Salimoth son of Josaphias').

SHELOMOTH (שְׁלֹמוֹת).—1. An Izharite, 1 Ch 24^{22} (BA Σαλωμώθ, Luc. Σαλωμίθ) = Shelomith of 23^{18}. 2. A descendant of Moses, 1 Ch 26^{25} [Ḳerê שְׁלֹמִית] $^{26.\ 28}$ (in the last Heb. שְׁלֹמִית, BA in all Σαλωμώθ, Luc. in first two Σαλαμίθ, in last Σαλωμίθ). 3. A Gershonite, 1 Ch 23^{9} (Ḳerê שְׁלֹמִית; B 'Αλωμείθ, A Σαλωμείθ, Luc. Σαλωμίθ).

SHELUMIEL (שְׁלֻמִיאֵל, a name exhibiting a late and artificial formation [Gray, HPN 200]; LXX Σαλαμιήλ).—Prince of the tribe of Simeon, Nu 1^{6} 2^{12} $7^{36.\ 41}$ 10^{19} (cf. Jth 8^{1}). See also SHEMUEL.

SHEM.—See HAM and JAPHETH.

SHEMA (שֶׁמַע).—1. A Reubenite, 1 Ch 5^{8} (BA Σάμα, Luc. Σεμεεί). See SHIMEI, No. 8. 2. One of the heads of 'fathers' houses' in Aijalon who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath, 1 Ch 8^{13} (BA Σάμα, Luc. Σαμαά). He is called in v.^{21} Shimei. 3. One of those who stood at Ezra's right hand, at the reading of the law, Neh 8^{4} (Σαμαίας). He is called in 1 Es 9^{43} SAMMUS.

SHEMA (שְׁמָע; A Σαμαά, Luc. Σομά).—A town of Judah, situated in the Negeb or South, and mentioned between Amam and Moladah (Jos 15^{26}). Some authorities suppose it to be the same place as Sheba (Jos 19^{2}), being a corruption of that name. On the other hand, if Sheba and Beersheba be identical (see SHEBA), this cannot be the case, for Shema and Beersheba are both found in the list of towns in Jos 15. The site is unknown. It is probably this Shema which appears in 1 Ch 2^{43} as a 'son' of Hebron.

SHEMAAH (הַשְּׁמָעָה; B 'Αμά, A Σαμαά, Luc. 'Ασμά).—A Benjamite, father, according to MT, of Ahiezer and Joash, but, according to the LXX (υἱός = בֶּן־ instead of בְּנֵי), of Joash alone, 1 Ch 12^{3}.

SHEMAIAH (שְׁמַעְיָה; in 2 Ch 11^{2} 17^{8} 31^{15} 35^{9}, Jer 26^{20} 29^{24} 36^{12} שְׁמַעְיָהוּ; 'J″ has heard').—Of the twenty-four persons who bore this name, only four can be certainly said to have belonged to other than prophetical or priestly families.

1. B Σαμμαίας, A Σαμαίας (2 Ch $12^{5.\ 7}$). A prophet who with AHIJAH guided the revolution which deprived Rehoboam of the ten tribes. According to the MT, he does not come on the scene until Rehoboam was on the point of leading a vast army against the revolters. He then appears (1 K 12^{22-24}, 2 Ch 11^{2-4}) to give the Divine sanction to the rebellion. 'Thus saith the LORD . . . this thing is from me.' But the second Greek account, which omits all mention of Ahijah in this connexion, introduces Shemaiah at the assembly at Shechem, before the people entered into negotiations with Rehoboam. 'The word of the Lord came to Shemaiah the Enlamite (cf. Jer 29^{24} LXX), saying, Take to thee a new cloke which hath not gone into water, and rend it into twelve pieces; and thou shalt give it to Jeroboam, and shalt say unto him, Thus saith the Lord, take to thee twelve pieces to cover thee. And Jeroboam took them, and Shemaiah said, Thus saith the LORD concerning the ten tribes of Israel' (1 K $12^{24^{\circ}}$). This is evidently another version of the story told of Ahijah, 1 K $11^{29\text{ff.}}$. There is another mention of Shemaiah in 2 Ch 12^{5-8}, in which he points the moral of the invasion of Shishak, and at the same time announces the mitigation of it in view of the repentance of Rehoboam. The Chronicler also cites 'the history of Shemaiah the prophet' as an authority for the reign of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 12^{15}.

2. Son of Shecaniah (1 Ch 3^{22} Σαμαιά); apparently a descendant of Zerubbabel. It is tempting to identify him with 'the keeper of the east gate,' who helped to repair the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3^{29} BA Σαμαιά, ℵ Σεμειά). On the other hand, Ryle conjectures that the latter was a Levite, and that 'the east gate was the eastern approach to the temple precincts.' Lord A. Hervey (Geneal. p. 107) would remove the opening words of 1 Ch 3^{22}, and read Shimei for the second Shemaiah, see v.^{19}.

3. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4^{37} B Συμεών, A Σαμαίας), perhaps identical with the Shimei of 1 Ch $4^{26.\ 27}$. 4. A Reubenite (1 Ch 5^{4} B Σεμεεί, A Σεμεΐν), called Shema in v.^{8}. 5. A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 9^{14}, Neh 11^{15} Σαμαιά), one of those who dwelt in Jerusalem. 6. A Levite of the family of Jeduthun, father of Obadiah or Abda (1 Ch 9^{16} B Σαμειά, A Σαμίας, called Shammua in Neh 11^{17}). 7. Head of the Levitical Kohathite clan of Elizaphan in the time of David (1 Ch 15^{8} B Σαμαίας, A Σεμαιά, ℵ Σαμέας; v.^{11} B Σαμαίας, A Σεμείας, ℵ Σαμαί). He is possibly identical with—8. The scribe (1 Ch 24^{6} B Σαμαίας, A Σαμμαίας), the son of Nethanel, who registered the names of the priestly courses. 9. A Korahite Levite, eldest son of Obed-edom (1 Ch $26^{4.\ 6}$ B Σαμαίας, A Σαμείας; v.^{7} B Σαμαί, A Σεμειά). 10. A Levite (2 Ch 17^{8} B Σαμούας, A Σαμουίας), one of the commission employed by Jehoshaphat to teach the book of the law in Judah. 11. A Levite of the family of Jeduthun in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29^{14} B Σαμαιάς, A Σαμείας), one of those who took a leading part in the purifying of the temple. He is possibly identical with 12, one of those who were 'over the freewill offerings of God' (2 Ch 31^{15} Σεμεεί). 13. One of 'the chiefs of the Levites' (2 Ch 35^{9} Σαμαίας; 'captains over thousands,' 1 Es 1^{9} where he is called Samaias). 14. One of the 'chief men' sent by Ezra to fetch Levites and Nethinim (Ezr 8^{16} Σαμαιά, A Σεμειά; Maasmas, Samaias, 1 Es $8^{43.\ 44}$); possibly the same as—15. A member of the family of Adonikam, (Ezr 8^{13} B Σαμαιά, A Σαμαειά; Samaias, 1 Es 8^{39}). 16. 17. Two of those who had married foreign wives, a priest and a layman respectively (Ezr 10^{21} Σαμαιά, v.^{31} B Σαμαιά, ℵ Σεμεά, A Σαμαίας; Sameus, Sabbeus, 1 Es $9^{21.\ 32}$). 18. A prophet (Neh 6^{10-14} B Σεμεεί, A Σεμεΐ) who had been hired by Sanballat and Tobiah 'to put Nehemiah in fear.' His father's name, Delaiah (see 1 Ch 24^{18}), would suggest that he belonged to a priestly house. The circumstance is evidently mentioned by Nehemiah as a typical one. The governor's answer to Shemaiah's suggestion indicates that his design was at once to bring Nehemiah into contempt as a coward, and also to expose him to the charge of sacrilege, which would be certainly raised if he, a layman, were to intrude where priests alone might tread. 19. One of the 24 courses of priests, 16th under Zerubbabel (Neh 12^{6} ℵA Σεμείας), 15th under Joiakim (Neh 12^{18} ℵA Σεμειά), and 21st under Nehemiah (Neh 10^{8} Σαμαιά). It is probably this clan, and not an individual, that is mentioned as taking part in the ceremonies at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12^{34} Bℵ Σαραιά, A Σαμαίας). 20. Probably a Levite, descendant of Asaph (Neh 12^{35} Σαμαιά). 21. Probably a Levitical clan of singers that took part in the dedication ceremonies (Neh 12^{36} Σαμαιά; v.^{42} ℵ$^{\text{c. a. mg}}$ Σεμείας). We may suppose that half of it went in one procession and half in the other. 22. Father of the prophet Urijah (Jer 26 [Gr. 33]^{20} BA Σαμαίας, ℵ Μασέας). 23. A prophet at Babylon, one of those who had been brought into captivity with Jehoiachin (Jer 29 [Gr. 36]$^{24-32}$ Σαμαιάς, ℵ Σαμεάς). He is called 'the NEHELAMITE' (which see). He belonged to the party opposed to Jeremiah, and it is evident that, like HANANIAH (Jer 28), he had predicted a speedy termination to the Captivity. Enraged at the letter of Jeremiah, in which the exiles had been counselled to acquiesce cheerfully in a prolonged stay in Babylon, Shemaiah sent letters to Jerusalem taxing Zephaniah the second priest and the other ecclesiastical authorities with supineness, in that they did not visit Jeremiah with the punishment due to a false prophet. It would seem from this that it was the special duty of the 'second priest' to enforce order in the temple (see art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES, p. 74^{a}). 'Jehoiada the priest' may possibly be the name of Zephaniah's predecessor in the office of 'second priest,' or more probably he may be the great high priest of that name whose zeal in God's service Shemaiah bids Zephaniah emulate. The punishment denounced against Shemaiah for this action was even more severe, according to Hebrew ideas, than that awarded to Hananiah. The latter was visited in his own person with premature death, but Shemaiah was punished not only with exclusion by death from such blessings as might fall to the lot of the exiles in Babylon, but with the complete excision of his family. 24. Father of Delaiah, who was one of the princes in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 36 [Gr. 43]^{12} BA Σελεμίας, ℵ Σεδεκίας).

N. J. D. WHITE.

SHEMARIAH (שְׁמַרְיָה and שְׁמַרְיָהוּ).—1. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{5} (B Σαμαραιά, ℵA Σαμαριά, Luc. Σαμαρίας). 2. A son of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 11^{19} (Σαμαρίας). 3. One of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{32} (B Σαμαρειά, ℵA Σαμαριά, Luc. Σαμαρίας). 4. One of the sons of Bani who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10^{41} (B Σαμαρειά, A Σαμαρείας, Luc. Σαμαρίας).

SHEMEBER (שֶׁמְאֵבֶר).—King of ZEBOIIM, one of the five kings defeated by Chedorlaomer, Gn 14^{2} (A Συμόβορ, Luc. Συμόρ, Syr. ܫܡܐܒܪ, Josephus Συμμόβορος). The Samaritan has שמאבד, which may have arisen from a confusion between ד and ר, or may be due to an attempt to play upon the name. It has even been suggested (cf. Ball in SBOT) that the name in the text may have originated from a marginal gloss שם אבד ('name lost').

SHEMED.—See SHEMER, No. 4.

SHEMER (שֶׁמֶר).—1. The owner of the hill purchased by Omri, upon which SAMARIA was afterwards built, 1 K 16^{24} (Σέμηρ, Luc. Σέμμηρ). Difficulties both etymological and historical attach to the statement in the same passage that the name Samaria (שֹׁמְרוֹן) was derived from an individual instead of a clan name (but see Kittel, Könige, ad loc.), and that it was first given to the place by Omri (see Stade in ZATW v. (1885) 160 ff.). 2. A Merarite, 1 Ch $6^{31\,(46)}$ (Σέμμηρ). 3. An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{34} (B Σέμμηρ, A and Luc. Σώμηρ), called in v.^{32} Shomer (cf. the names 'Ebed and 'Obed). 4. A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{12} (B Σήμηρ, A Σέμμηρ, Luc. Σαμαιήλ). The Heb. MSS show here some confusion between ר and ד as the final letter of the name. The AV (Shamed) and RV

(Shemed) retain the reading of the Geneva version, which is based on the Vulg. Samad.

SHEMIDA (שְׁמִידָע).—A 'son' of Gilead, according to Nu 26^{32} [P] (Συμαέρ); called in Jos 17^{2} [JE] a 'son' of Manasseh (B Συμαρείμ, A Σεμιραέ, Luc. Σαμιδαέ); his descendants are enumerated in 1 Ch 7^{19} (Σεμ(ε)ιρά, Luc. Σαμειδά). The gentilic name Shemidaites (הַשְּׁמִידָעִי, ὁ Συμαερ(ε)ί) occurs in Nu 26^{32}. See, further, art. MANASSEH, vol. iii. p. 231 f.

SHEMINITH.—See art. PSALMS, p. 154^{b}.

SHEMIRAMOTH (שְׁמִירָמוֹת; in 2 Ch 17^{8} Kĕthîbh שמרימות; Σεμ(ε)ιραμώθ).—The name of a Levitical family. In 1 Ch $15^{18.\,20}$ 16^{5} Shemiramoth appears in the list of the members of David's choirs, while in 2 Ch 17^{8} the same name occurs amongst the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah. In both cases a guild or family rather than an individual is probably to be thought of.

SHEMUEL (שְׁמוּאֵל, the name which, following the LXX and Vulg., is, in the case of the prophet, transliterated in EV Samuel [AV has Shemuel in 1 Ch 6^{33}; on the derivation and meaning of the name see art. SAMUEL, and Gray, HPN 200, n. 3]).—1. The Simeonite appointed to assist in the dividing of the land, Nu 34^{20}. It is not improbable that the MT should be corrected to שְׁלֻמִיאֵל (Shelumiel), the form in 1^{6} 2^{12} $7^{36.\,41}$ 10^{19}. The LXX in all the six passages has Σαλαμιήλ. 2. Grandson of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{2} (B Ἰσαμουήλ, A and Luc. Σαμουήλ).

SHEN (הַשֵּׁן hash-shēn, the 'tooth' or 'crag'; τῆς παλαιᾶς; Sen).—A well-known place, 'the Shen,' named with Mizpah to indicate the position of the stone, called Ebenezer, which was set up by Samuel to commemorate the defeat of the Philistines (1 S 7^{12}). The site is unknown. It is not improbable, however, that the LXX τῆς παλαιᾶς puts us on the track of the original reading, הַיְשָׁנָה or יְשָׁנָה (Jeshanah, 2 Ch 13^{19}). So Wellh., Driver, Budde, et al.; cf. art. EBENEZER.

C. W. WILSON.

SHENAZZAR (שֶׁנְאַצַּר; BA Σανεσάρ, Luc. Σανασάρ).—A son of Jeconiah, 1 Ch 3^{18}. See, further, SHESHBAZZAR.

SHEOL.—See ESCHATOLOGY, HADES, and HELL.

SHEPHAM (שְׁפָם; Σεπφάμαρ; Sephama).—A place on the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Nu $34^{10.\,11}$), and apparently to the north of Riblah, now Ribleh, between Ba'albek and Homs. The site has not yet been identified. In the Targum of pseudo-Jonathan the name is rendered by Apameia, but this place is much too far to the north. Perhaps Zabdi, the Shiphmite,—one of David's household who was 'over the increase of the vineyards for the wine-cellars' (1 Ch 27^{27}),—was a native of Shepham. So Siegfried-Stade, who would vocalize שְׁפָמִי instead of שִׁפְמִי. But see SIPHMOTH.

C. W. WILSON.

SHEPHATIAH (שְׁפַטְיָה and שְׁפַטְיָהוּ 'Jah has judged').—1. One of David's sons, 2 S 3^{4} (B Σαβατειά, A Σαφαθιά, Luc. Σαφατίας) = 1 Ch 3^{3} (B and Luc. as before, A Σαφατίας). 2. A family of which 372 representatives returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{4} (B Ἀσάφ, A and Luc. Σαφατιά) = Neh 7^{9} (Σαφατιά), and 84 besides their head with Ezra, Ezr 8^{8} (Σαφατ(ε)ιά). The name appears in 1 Es 5^{9} as SAPHAT and in 8^{34} as SAPHATIAS. 3. A family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants,' Ezr 2^{57} = Neh 7^{59} (Σαφατ(ε)ιά). 4. The eponym of a Judahite family, Neh 11^{4} (BA Σαφατιά, Luc. Σαφατίας). 5. The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 9^{8} (Σαφατιά). Either this or the preceding should perhaps be identified with No. 2 above. 6. A contemporary of Jeremiah, Jer 38 [Gr. 45]^{1} (BA$\aleph$ Σαφανίας, Q* Σαφάτ, Q^{mg} Σαφατίας). 7. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{5} (Σαφατιά, Luc. Σαφατίας). 8. A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 27^{16} (Σαφατίας). 9. A son of king Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 21^{2} (Σαφατ(ε)ίας).

SHEPHELAH.—See PLAIN, vol. iii. p. 893 f.

SHEPHER.—Mount Shepher (הַר שֶׁפֶר) is a station in the journeyings of the children of Israel, mentioned only Nu $33^{23.\,24}$. Nothing is known about its position.

In both verses שפר being in pause is pointed Shapher, the form that appears in AV. The LXX in B Luc. has Σάφαρ, taking no account of 'mount,' which is represented in A by Ἀρσάφαρ and Σαρσάφαρ, and in F by Ἀρσάφαθ; Vulg. has Sepher. The word (which means 'beauty') occurs (as a noun) only in Gn 49^{21} 'giving goodly words' (words of beauty or elegance); but see Dillmann or Spurrell, ad loc., for an alternative rendering of this verse.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

SHEPHERD.—See SHEEP.

SHEPHI (שְׁפִי; B Σώβ, A Σωφάρ, Luc. Σαπφεί), 1 Ch 1^{40}; or SHEPHO (שְׁפוֹ; A Σώφ, D Σωφάν, E Σώρ, Luc. Σωφάν), Gn 36^{23}.—A Horite chief.

SHEPHUPHAM (שְׁפוּפָם; BA Σωφάν, Luc. Σοφάν), Nu $26^{39\,(43)}$; or SHEPHUPHAN (שְׁפוּפָן; B Σωφαρφάκ, A Σωφάν, Luc. Σεπφάμ), 1 Ch 8^{5}.—The eponym of a Benjamite family. The name appears in Gn 46^{21} as MUPPIM and in 1 Ch $7^{12.\,15}$ 26^{16} as Shuppim. The proper form of the name must remain doubtful. The gentilic Shuphamites (הַשּׁוּפָמִי, BA ὁ Σωφαν(ε)ί, Luc. ὁ Σοφανί) appears in Nu $26^{39\,(43)}$.

SHERD.—See POTSHERD.

SHEREBIAH (שֵׁרֵבְיָה).—One of the Levites who joined Ezra at the river Ahava, Ezr 8^{18} (LXX om.). Along with eleven others, he was put in charge of the silver and gold and the vessels for the temple, v.^{24} (BA Σαραιά, Luc. Σαραβίας). He assisted Ezra in the exposition of the law, Neh 8^{7}; took part in the public confession and thanksgiving, 9^{4}; and sealed the covenant, $10^{12\,(13)}$ (B Ζαραβιά). He is named also in $12^{8.\,24}$. In all these last passages except $10^{12\,(13)}$ BA have Σαραβία, Luc. Σαραβίας. The name appears in 1 Es 8^{47} as ASEBEBIAS, v.^{54} ESEREBIAS, and 9^{48} SARABIAS.

SHERESH (שֶׁרֶשׁ; B Σοῦρος, A Σόρος, Luc. Φάρες, Φόρος).—The name of a Manassite clan, 1 Ch 7^{16}. See MANASSEH, vol. iii. p. 232^{b}.

SHERIFF.—In Dn $3^{2.\,3}$ 'sheriffs' is the EV tr. of Aram. תִּפְתָּיֵא, a word of quite uncertain meaning. Bevan and Driver regard it as improbable that it has any connexion with the Arab. 'afta 'to notify a decision of the law' (ptcp. muftī, 'a jurisconsult'). This supposed connexion probably underlies the RVm 'lawyers.' Bevan thinks it possible that the word may be a mutilated form of some Persian title ending in pat 'chief.' For an account of other conjectures see Driver or Prince, ad loc. Perhaps Theod. and LXX render by οἱ ἐπ' ἐξουσιῶν, but it is impossible to be certain, as their text contains only seven names of officials as against eight in the Aramaic text.

J. A. SELBIE.

SHESHACH (שֵׁשַׁךְ).—This name, which occurs only in Jer 25 (32) ^{26} 51 (28) ^{41} (LXX om. in both passages), is generally taken to be a designation of Babylon (cf. the parallelism in the latter passage: 'How is Sheshach taken, and the praise of all the earth surprised! How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations!'). It is probable, in fact, that Sheshach is simply a cryptical way of writing Babel. By the device known as Atbash (אתבש) whereby א=ת, ב=ש, and so on, the last letter of the Heb. alphabet being substituted for the first, the second last for the second, etc., ששך would be written for בבל. An example of the same thing should probably be discovered in לב קמי of Jer 51 (28) 1, which apparently has been substituted for an original כשׂדים (LXX Χαλδαίους). See, further, A. Berliner, Beiträge zur Heb. Gramm. aus Talmud und Midrasch, pp. 12–14. It is right to add that Frd. Delitzsch (Paradies, 214 ff.) rejects this explanation of Sheshach, holding that it represents Šiš-kû-KI of an ancient Bab. regal register, which may have stood for a quarter or division (perhaps Borsippa) of the city of Babylon (cf. Lauth in PSBA, 1881, p. 47 f.). Schrader (KAT^{2} 415 [COT ii. 108 f.]) objects that the name quoted by Delitzsch is not found in the later Bab. literature (dating from the time of Nebuchadnezzar), and that even the reading of the name is by no means settled.

J. A. SELBIE.

SHESHAI (שֵׁשַׁי).—A clan, possibly of Aramaic origin, resident in Hebron at the time of the Hebrew conquest and driven thence by Caleb (Nu 13^{22} B Σεσσεί, A Σεμεί; Jos 15^{14} B Σουσεί, A Σουσαί; Jg 1^{10} B Σεσσεί, A Γεθθί). See, further, AHIMAN, No. 1.

SHESHAN (שֵׁשָׁן).—A Jerahmeelite, who, having no sons, gave his daughter in marriage to his Egyptian slave Jarha, 1 Ch 2$^{31.\ 34.\ 35}$ (A has Σωσάν, Luc. Σισάν, throughout; B has Σωσάμ in v.$^{34\ bis}$, elsewhere Σωσάν).

SHESHBAZZAR (שֵׁשְׁבַּצַּר).—There is some uncertainty as to the correct form of this name, and still more as to the identity of the man who bears it in the MT.

Josephus exhibits a similar variety: 'Αβάσσαρος, Σαβάσηρος, Σαναβάσσαρος, Σαβανάσσαρος.

The above variations (apart from Βαγασάρ and Σαρβαγάρ) may be reduced to two types: (1) Sheshbaẓẓar or Sasab(al)aẓẓar, (2) Sanabaẓẓar. If we adopt the first of these, the name may stand for Bab. Samaš-bil [or -bal] -uẓur, 'O sun-god protect the lord [or the son]'; so van Hoonacker (Zorobabel, 43; Nouvelles études, 30; cf. Academy, 30th Jan. 1892), followed by Wellhausen (IJG^{3} 158 n.), Cheyne (Academy, 6th Feb. 1892), Ryle (Ezra and Nehemiah in Camb. Bible, 32), Sayce (HCM 539), et al. The Sanabaẓẓar type, again, may represent an original Sin-bal-uẓur, 'O moon-god protect the son'; so esp. Ed. Meyer (Entstehung des Judenthums, 77), cf. also Sayce (l.c.).

Sheshbaẓẓar is mentioned in Ezr 1$^{8.\ 11}$ (the work of the Chronicler, who has just quoted what purports to be an edict of Cyrus authorizing the return of the Jews and the rebuilding of the temple) as entrusted by Cyrus with the vessels of the house of the LORD which had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, and which were now to be restored. These vessels are said to have been brought up by Sheshbaẓẓar 'when they of the captivity were brought up from Babylon unto Jerusalem' (cf. 1 Es 2$^{12.\ 15}$). The same particulars regarding him are repeated in 5$^{14.\ 16}$ (where the Chronicler uses an Aramaic source, which professes to contain a transcript of the letter of Tattenai and others to Darius), in which he bears the familiar Bab.-Assyr. title peḥah ('governor'), and is said, further, to have laid the foundations of the temple (cf. 1 Es 6$^{18.\ 20}$). It is probably* Sheshbaẓẓar also that is called in Ezr 2^{63} (=Neh 7^{65}), Neh 7^{70} by the Persian title tirshāthā.

It is a very difficult question whether Sheshbaẓẓar is to be identified with Zerubbabel. Their identity was commonly accepted till lately, and has still the support of weighty names,† but the tendency of modern scholars ‡ is to deny it.

In favour of the identification (which appears to be made by Jos. Ant. XI. i. 3) the two strongest arguments are (a) the occurrence elsewhere (e.g. 2 K 23^{34} 24^{17}, Dn 1^{7}) of double names, and (b) the fact that the laying of the foundation of the temple which in Ezr 3^{8} is ascribed to Zerubbabel is in 5^{16} ascribed to Sheshbaẓẓar.

But in answer to (a) it may be urged that the case of Daniel and his companions is not strictly parallel, for there we have native names (Daniel, Hananiah, etc.) and foreign names (Belteshaẓẓar, Shadrach, etc.), whereas Zerubbabel (which see) and Sheshbaẓẓar are in all probability both foreign (sc. Babylonian) names. The names in 2 K 23^{34} 24^{17} really furnish an argument against identifying Sheshb. with Zerubbabel. It is true that in Eliakim - Jehoiakim and Mattaniah-Zedekiah we have two couples of Hebrew names, but the author of these passages at least takes care to let us know that Eliakim is identical with Jehoiakim, and Mattaniah with Zedekiah, just as in Jg 7^{1} we read 'Jerubbaal which is Gideon,' and in Dn 2^{26} 4^{19} 'Daniel whose name was Belteshaẓẓar.' In view of the usage elsewhere, it is surely strange (and van Hoonacker's argument, with all its skill and ingenuity, does not, to our mind, remove the strangeness) that in Ezr 3^{2} there is not a hint by the Chronicler that Zerubbabel, who then comes upon the scene for the first time, is identical with Sheshbaẓẓar, who had been mentioned in 1^{8}. Moreover, it is hard to believe (and here again van Hoonacker's argument appears to us unconvincing) that Zerubbabel could be spoken of in 5^{2} and Sheshbaẓẓar in 5$^{14.\ 16}$ in the way they are, if the two names stood for one and the same person.§

As to (b), reason will be shown in art. ZERUBBABEL for suspecting that Ezr 3^{8} and 5^{16} both antedate the laying of the foundation of the temple, transferring it from the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 520) to the second year of Cyrus (537). But whatever view be held as to that, the identity of Sheshb. with Zerub. does not appear to us to follow from a comparison of 3^{8} with 5^{16}. All that we need to assume is that the two returned from Babylon at the same time, and that Sheshb. was the official head (peḥah) of the community, while Zerub. was the moving spirit in the rebuilding of the temple, whatever may have been the date when this work was undertaken. If Ezr 3^{8} (the Chronicler's own account) and 5^{16} (a professedly official account) be historical, they contain the names, respectively, of the actual (Zerubbabel) and the official (Sheshbaẓẓar) founders of the temple.

Assuming, now, that the two names designate two different men, was Sheshbaẓẓar a foreigner or

* Unless one holds with Kosters that the list of names in this passage really belongs to Nehemiah's time, and that the tirshāthā is Nehemiah himself.

† Notably van Hoonacker (Zorobabel et le second temple, 29 ff.; cf. his Nouvelles études sur la restauration Juive, 30, also 'Notes sur l'hist. de la restauration Juive' in RB, Jan. 1901, p. 7 ff.) and Ryle (Ezra and Nehemiah, xxxi. 12 f.). Kuenen (Onderzoek^{2} [1887], 437, 468, 503) was also at one time disposed to favour the identification, although latterly he abandoned it. See next note.

‡ Stade (GVI ii. 98 ff.), Kuenen (Gesam. Abhandl. 218 ff.), Renan (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, iii. 519 f.), Smend (Listen, etc., 19), Kosters (Het herstel van Israël, 32 ff.), Wellh. (IJG^{3} 158), Sayce (HCM 539), and many others.

§ We refrain from citing, as an argument against the identification, the occurrence of the two names together in 1 Es 6^{18} (17) (Ζοροβάβελ καὶ Σαναβασσάρῳ), because it is probable that the first of these names is interpolated (note the following sing pronoun αὐτῷ).

a Jew? It has been contended (by de Saulcy, Stade, et al.) that he was a Persian. But his Babylonian name does not increase the probability of this view, and the appointment of a Jew to head the return and to act as peḥah of Judah would be quite in harmony with the policy of Cyrus towards the conquered races of the empire he had overthrown. Hence the view has lately been gaining ground that he was a Jew (Ed. Meyer, Wellh., Cheyne, et al.). It is a tempting suggestion, although of course it has not been made out, that Sheshbaẓẓar is the SHENAẒẒAR of 1 Ch 3^{18}, one of Jehoiachin's sons and uncle of Zerubbabel (Imbert, Renan, Kosters, Ed. Meyer, et al.).* If this were so, it would justify the epithet 'prince of Judah' (הַנָּשִׂיא לִיהוּדָה) applied to him in Ezr 1^{8}, a title which those who take him to be a foreigner have to explain as due to a mistake (Kuenen) or an intentional transformation on the part of the Chronicler. The nephew rather than the uncle appears from the first to have played the leading rôle, and his services, especially in connexion with the rebuilding of the temple, gave him such a place in the memories of his countrymen that in Ezr 2^{2} (=Neh 7^{7}) Zerubbabel stands at the head of the list, while Sheshbaẓẓar [may the heathenish character of his name have also given offence to the puritan zealots who compiled the list?] is not mentioned at all.

How long Sheshbaẓẓar held office is uncertain, but at all events in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 520) he had given place to Zerubbabel, who is known from contemporary evidence (Hag 1$^{1.14}$ 2^{2}) to have been then peḥah of Judah. See, further, ZERUBBABEL, and the Literature cited at end of that article. J. A. SELBIE.

SHETH.—In Nu 24^{17} (only) AV and RVm tr. בְּנֵי שֵׁת 'children (sons) of Sheth' (LXX Σήθ, Vulg. Seth), but there can be little doubt that the correct tr. is that of RV, 'sons of tumult.' In that case שֵׁת would stand for שְׁאֵת (from root שׁאה), and would be=שָׁאוֹן of the parallel passage Jer 48^{45} (AV and RV 'tumultuous ones'). G. Hoffmann (ZATW iii. 97) takes שֵׁת to be a textual error for שְׁאוֹן, which he supposes in both these passages as well as in Am 2^{2} (וּמֵת בְּשָׁאוֹן מוֹאָב) to be a Moabite place-name, perhaps that of the acropolis of Ar. See, further, Dillm. on Nu 24^{17}.

SHETHAR (שֵׁתָר, Bℵ Luc. Σαρσαθαῖος, A Σαρέσθεος).—One of the seven princes who 'sat first in the kingdom' and had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1^{14}, cf. ADMATHA). The derivation and meaning of the name, which is presumably Persian, cannot be determined.

SHETHAR-BOZENAI (שְׁתַר בּוֹזְנַי [meaning doubtful]).—Named along with TATTENAI and others in connexion with the correspondence with Darius about the rebuilding of the temple, Ezr 5$^{3.6}$ 6$^{6.13}$ (B Σαθαρβουζανά except in 6^{13} Σαθαρβουζάν; A Σαθαρβουζαναί in 5^{3} 6^{13}, Σαθαρβουζάνης in 5^{6}, Σαθαρβουζανέ in 6^{6}; Luc. throughout Θαρβουζαναῖος), called in 1 Es 6$^{3.7.27}$ 7^{1} SATHRABUZANES.

SHEVA.—1. (שְׁוָא; B Σαού, A Σαούλ, Luc. Σουέ) A son of Caleb by his concubine, Maacah, 1 Ch 2^{49}. See Wellh. de Gentibus, 18, note 1. 2. See SHAVSHA.

SHEW.—Both verb and subst. (always spelt 'shew,' the modern spelling 'show' had not yet come in; both are found in early copies of Hooker, though 'shew' is even then most frequent) are used in AV with greater freedom than now.

For the verb we find: 1. Make to see (or of things make to be seen), literally, as now. Thus Ex 33^{18} 'I beseech thee, shew me thy glory'; Jn 14^{8} 'Lord, shew us the Father.' So Bacon, Essays, 'Of Death' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 6), 'Groanes and Convulsions, and a discoloured Face, and Friends weeping, and Blackes, and Obsequies, and the like, shew Death terrible.' 2. Make to be seen figuratively, declare, reveal (cf. Driver, Daniel, pp. 18 f., 47; Par. Psalt. 481). Thus 1 S 22^{17} 'They knew when he fled, and did not shew it to me' (וְלֹא גָלוּ אֶת־אָזְנִי, LXX οὐκ ἀπεκάλυψαν τὸ ὠτίον μου; Vulg. non indicaverunt mihi; RV 'did not disclose it to me'); Job 32^{10} 'Hearken to me; I also will shew mine opinion'; Ps 19^{2} 'Night unto night sheweth knowledge'; Sir 37^{20} 'There is one that sheweth wisdom in words, and is hated'; 1 Co 11^{26} 'Ye do shew (καταγγέλλετε, RV 'ye proclaim') the Lord's death till he come'; 15^{51} 'I shew you a mystery' (λέγω, RV 'I tell'). Cf. Shaks. All's Well, IV. i. 93—

'O, let me live!
And all the secrets of our camp I'll show.'

3. To give or do something to one—a natural extension of the general sense cause to appear. Thus Ac 4^{22} 'The man was above forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was shewed' (Gr. ἐγεγόνει, edd. γεγόνει, RV 'was wrought'); 24^{27} 'Felix, willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound' (θέλων τε χάριτας [edd. χάριτα] καταθέσθαι, RV 'desiring to gain favour with'). Cf. Babees Book, 2—

'And eke, o lady myn, Facecia!
My penne thow guyde, and helpe unto me shewe.'

The subst. means: 1. Outward appearance, Is 3^{9} 'The shew of their countenance doth witness against them' (הַכָּרַת פְּנֵיהֶם, RVm 'their respecting of persons'); Sir 43^{1} 'The beauty of heaven, with his glorious shew' (ἐν ὁράματι δόξης, RV 'in the spectacle of its glory'); Gal 6^{12} 'As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh' (εὐπροσωπῆσαι). Cf. Pref. to AV, 'Some peradventure would have no varietie of sences to be set in the margine, lest the authoritie of the Scriptures for deciding of controversies by that shew of uncertaintie, should somewhat be shaken'; and Drayton, Sol. Song, ch. 5—

'His eies he like to doves'
On rivers' banks below,
Ywasht with milk, whose collours are Most gallant to the shew.'

2. Spectacle, Col 2^{15} 'He made a shew of them openly' (ἐδειγμάτισεν ἐν παρρησίᾳ). Cf. Ezk 12^{6} Cov., 'Hyde thy face that thou see not the earth, for I have made the a shewtoken unto the house of Israel.'

3. Semblance, Ps 39^{6} 'Surely every man walketh in a vain shew' (בְּצֶלֶם, RVm [implying false etym. connexion] 'as a shadow'); Col 2^{23} 'which things have indeed a shew of wisdom' (λόγον σοφίας). Cf. Fuller, Holy State, 158, 'Travell not too early before thy judgement be risen, lest thou observest rather shews than substance, marking alone pageants, pictures, beautifull buildings,' etc.

4. Pretence, Lk 20^{47} 'Which devour widows' houses, and for a shew make long prayers' (προφάσει, RV 'for a pretence'). Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 386, 'In shew to keepe the straits, in deed to expect the event'; and Paraph. 25^{10}—

'Who can his generation tell?
From prison see him led!
With impious shew of law condemn'd
And number'd with the dead.'

Shewing is used as a subst. in Lk 1^{80} 'Till the day of his shewing unto Israel' (ἕως ἡμέρας ἀναδείξεως αὐτοῦ). The Eng. word is quite unusual, and is simply a literal tr. (after Vulg. ostensio and Wyclif's 'schewynge') of the Gr. ἀνάδειξις, which does not occur elsewhere in NT. On comparing Lk 10^{1} 'The Lord appointed (ἀνέδειξεν) other seventy also,' and Ac 1^{24} 'Shew (ἀνάδειξον) whether of these two thou hast chosen,' we see that the reference is to the entrance of John on his public ministry. J. HASTINGS.

---

* It is scarcely worth mentioning that a Jewish tradition (Jalkut on Ezr 1) identifies Sheshbaẓẓar with Daniel.

SHEWBREAD.—'Shewbread,' formed apparently on the pattern of Luther's Schaubrot, is the tr., first adopted by Tindale, of the Heb. לֶחֶם (הַ)פָּנִים 'bread of the presence [of J″],' of which, accordingly, the more correct tr. is that proposed by RVm, viz. 'presence-bread.'

It has been usual hitherto to assign the introduction of the term 'shewbread' to Coverdale (see, e.g., Plummer's Luke, 167). But it is found as early as 1526 in Tindale's New Testament, He 9^2 'and the shewe breed which is called wholy' (Offor's reprint). Curiously enough, Tindale not only uses other renderings in the Gospels ('the halowed loves,' Mt 12^4, Mk 2^{26}; 'loves of halowed breed,' Lk 6^4), but retains the same inconsistency in his revised edition of 1534, after he had adopted 'shewbred' in his Pentateuch of 1530. In the latter on its first occurrence (Ex 25^{30}) he adds the marginal note: 'Shewbred, because it was alway in the presence and sight of the Lorde' (see Mombert's reprint, in loc.). Wyclif had naturally followed the Vulgate (see below) with 'breed of proposicioun.' The Protestant translators and revisers who succeeded Tindale give 'shewbread' in OT, 'shewe loves,' 'shewbreads,' and 'shewbread' in NT, the last by the end of the 16th cent. being firmly established in both Testaments (the Rheims version, however, retaining 'loaves of proposition').

i. NOMENCLATURE.—On the occasion of the earliest historical mention of the presence-bread (לֶחֶם הַפָּנִים 1 S $21^{6\ [\text{Heb.}\ 7]}$) it is also termed 'holy bread' (לֶחֶם קֹדֶשׁ ib. $^{5.\ 6.\ [6.\ 7]}$ RV; AV 'hallowed bread'). The former term is that used throughout the Priests' Code (P) of the Pentateuch, with the addition of the name 'continual bread' (ל״ תָּמִיד Nu 4^{7b}; cf. 'bread' only Ex 40^{23}). In the post-exilic period we meet with another designation, viz. 'the pile-bread' (לֶחֶם הַמַּעֲרֶכֶת 1 Ch 9^{32} 23^{29}, Neh 10^{33}, but with the terms reversed 2 Ch 13^{11}, cf. He 9^2; also מערכת alone 2 Ch 2^4). This name is due to the fact that the loaves were arranged upon the table in two piles (מַעֲרָכוֹת Lv 24^6; this, the rendering of RVm, suits the facts better than the 'rows' of the text of EV). The tr. varies considerably in the Gr. versions, the most literal rendering of the older designation is ἄρτοι τοῦ προσώπου 1 S 21^6, 2 Es 20^{33} (but cf. Aquila's ἄρ. προσώπων), ἄρ. ἐνώπιοι Ex 25^{30}, οἱ ἄρ. οἱ προκείμενοι Ex 39^{18}; elsewhere most frequently ἄρ. τῆς προθέσεως, 'loaves of the setting forth.' This, the term used in the Gospels (Mt 12^4, Mk 2^{26}, Lk 6^4), reflects the later Hebrew designation above mentioned (cf. προτιθέναι in LXX to render עָרַךְ 'to set in order,' 'set forth' [a meal upon a table]).* The variant ἡ πρόθεσις τ. ἄρτων (He 9^2) follows 2 Ch 13^{11}, 2 Mac 10^3. Still another rendering, οἱ ἄρ. τῆς προσφορᾶς, is confined to some MSS of the Greek of 1 K 7^{48} (Lucian has προθέσεως). The Vulgate also reflects both the Hebrew designations with panis facierum (cf. Aquila, above) and panis propositionis.

The table of shewbread has likewise in Hebrew a twofold nomenclature: in P שֻׁלְחַן הַפָּנִים 'the presence-table' (Nu 4^7), but in Chronicles ש״ הַמַּעֲרֶכֶת (2 Ch 29^{18}); in both we also find ש״ הַטָּהוֹר 'the pure table' (Lv 24^6, 2 Ch 13^{11}), probably because overlaid with pure gold. For other designations now disguised in MT see next section.

ii. THE SHEWBREAD IN THE PRE-EXILIC PERIOD.—The earliest historical mention of the shewbread occurs in the account of David's flight from Saul, in which he secures for his young men, under conditions that are somewhat obscure, the use of the shewbread from the sanctuary at NOB (1 S $21^{2\text{ff.}}$). It is here described, as we have seen, both as 'presence-bread' (v.$^{6\ [7]}$) and as 'holy' or 'sacred bread' (vv.$^{4.\ 6\ [5.\ 7]}$), in opposition to ordinary or unconsecrated bread (חוֹל). The incident appears to have happened on the day on which the loaves were removed to be replaced by fresh or 'hot bread' (לֶחֶם חֹם v.$^{6\ [7]}$).

It must not be inferred from this narrative that the regulation of the Priests' Code, by which the stale shewbread was the exclusive perquisite of the priests, was already in force, although this, naturally, is the standpoint of NT times (see Mt 12^4 and paralls.). Ahimelech, in requiring and receiving the assurance that David's young men were ceremonially 'clean' (see art. UNCLEANNESS), seems to have taken all the precautions then deemed necessary. The narrative is further of value as giving us a clear indication of the meaning originally attaching to the expression 'presence-bread,' for the loaves are here expressly said to have been 'removed from the presence of J″' (הַמּוּסָרִים מִלִּפְנֵי י״ MT, v.^{7}; cf. the similar expression Ex 25^{30}).

We next meet with the rite in connexion with Solomon's temple, among the furniture of which is mentioned in our present text 'the table whereupon the shewbread was' (1 K 7^{48} RV). This table is here further said to have been 'of gold,' by which we are to understand from the context 'of solid gold' (cf. Ex 25^{24} in LXX, and Josephus' [Ant. VIII. iii. 7] description of the temple). But it is well known that in this section of the Book of Kings the original narrative has been overlaid with accretions of all sorts, mostly, if not entirely, post-exilic; these are due to the idea of this later time, that the interior decoration of Solomon's temple, and the materials of its furniture, could in no respect have been inferior to those of the tabernacle of P. See Stade's classical essay, 'Der Text des Berichtes ueber Salomo's Bauten,' in ZATW, 1883, 129–177, reproduced in his Akad. Reden u. Abhandlungen (1899), 143 ff. Stade's results have been accepted in the main by all recent scholars. Thus he shows that the original of 1 K $6^{20b.\ 21}$ probably read somewhat as is still given in the middle clause of the better Gr. text of A (ἐποίησεν θυσιαστήριον κέδρου . . . κατὰ πρόσωπον τοῦ δαβίρ), viz. וַיַּעַשׂ מִזְבַּח אֶרֶז לִפְנֵי הַדְּבִיר 'and he [Solomon] made an altar of cedar-wood (to stand) in front of the sanctuary (the 'Holy of Holies' of P).' Whether we should retain or discard the words 'and overlaid it with gold,' is of minor importance.*

The altar, therefore, of v.^{20b} is not to be understood of the altar of incense, which first appears in the latest stratum of P (see TABERNACLE), but, as in the passage of Ezekiel presently to be considered, of the table of shewbread. The express mention of the latter by name in 1 K 7^{48b} is also part of an admittedly late addition to the original text (see authorities cited in footnote). The same desire to enhance the glory of the Solomonic temple is usually assigned as the ground for the tradition followed by the Chronicler, who states that Solomon provided the necessary gold for ten tables of shewbread (1 Ch 28^{16}; cf. 2 Ch $4^{8.\ 19}$). This writer, however, is not consistent, for elsewhere we read of 'the ordering of the shewbread upon the pure table (2 Ch 13^{11}).' In his account, further, of the cleansing of the temple under Hezekiah, only 'the table of shewbread, with all the vessels thereof' is mentioned (ib. 29^{18}),—a view of the case which is undoubtedly to be regarded as alone in accordance with the facts of history.

This table fell a prey to the flames which consumed the temple in the 19th year of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 25^8, Jer 52^{13}). The tale related by the Byzantine chronicler (Syncellus, 409), that it was among the furniture concealed by Jeremiah on Mount Pisgah, is but a later addition to the earlier form of the same fable, which we already find in 2 Mac $2^{1\text{ff.}}$. Notwithstanding these uncertainties, the continuance of the rite under the monarchy is sufficiently assured.

iii. THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD.—Ezekiel in his sketch of the ideal sanctuary likewise contemplates the perpetuation of the rite, for in a passage of his book, which on all hands is regarded as corrupt, but capable with the help of the LXX of easy emendation, we read thus (as emended): 'In front of the sanctuary [this also = P's 'Holy of Holies'] was something like an altar of wood, three cubits in height, and the length thereof two cubits, and the breadth two cubits; and it had corners, and its base and its sides were of wood. And he said unto me: This is the table that is before J″' (Ezk 41$^{21.\ 22}$; so substantially Cornill and all recent commentators). Here, then, we have not the altar of incense, but once more the table of shewbread. The twofold circumstance that it is here expressly termed an altar, and is of plain wood without a gold covering, is a strong argument in favour of Stade's restoration of the text of 1 K, discussed above. Ezekiel's table of shewbread resembled in its general outline the similar altar-tables so often seen on the Assyrian monuments (see last section); its height was half as much again as its length, and in section it formed a square of at least 3 ft. in the side. The projections or 'horns' were, no doubt, similar to those of the Assyrian altars (see, e.g., Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Chaldea and Assyria, i. pp. 143, 255, etc.).

KINGS in the present work, vol. ii. 863^b, and his Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings, in loc.

In the temple of Zerubbabel, consecrated in the 6th year of Darius (B.C. 516), the table of shewbread, we may safely infer, had its place in the outer sanctuary, although we have no information as to whether or not it was modelled on Ezekiel's altar-table. After the introduction of the Priests' Code it may have been remodelled according to the instructions there given (Ex 25$^{23\text{ff.}}$); we may at least, with some measure of certainty, suppose that it was then overlaid with gold, since Antiochus Epiphanes, when he carried off the spoils of the temple (1 Mac 1^{22}), would scarcely have taken the trouble to remove a plain wooden altar. The well-informed author of 1 Maccabees, in the passage cited, includes among the spoils not only the table itself, but 'the flagons and chalices and censers of gold' used in the ritual of the table (see for these art. TABERNACLE, section on Table of Shewbread). The provision of the shewbread, it should be added, was one of the objects to which were devoted the proceeds of the tax of one-third of a shekel instituted by Nehemiah (10^{32}, cf. Jos. Ant. III. x. 7, § 255).

Here attention may be called to two non-canonical Jewish writers who allude to the subject of this article. The earlier of the two is pseudo-Hecatæus, whose date is usually assumed to be the 3rd cent. B.C. (Schürer, GJV^{3} iii. 465; but Willrich, Juden u. Griechen, etc., 20 f., argues for a date in the Maccabæan period). This writer, in a passage preserved for us by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 22), describes the second temple as 'a large edifice wherein is an altar (βωμός), and a candelabrum (λυχνίον), both of gold, two talents in weight.' The former term, in the light of what has been said above with regard to the altar-tables of Solomon and Ezekiel, we must identify with the table of shewbread. The other writer referred to is pseudo-Aristeas, whose date falls within the century 200–100 B.C. In his famous letter, purporting to give an account of the origin of the Alexandrian version of the OT, he gives the rein to a lively imagination in his description of a shewbread table of unexampled magnificence—all of gold and precious gems, and of unsurpassed artistic workmanship—which Ptolemy Philadelphus is said to have presented to the temple at Jerusalem (see Wendland's or Thackeray's edition of Aristeas' letter—tr. by the former in Kautzsch's Apokryphen u. Pseudepigraphen, ii. 6 ff.). This table is admitted to have had no existence outside the pages of Aristeas.

To resume the thread of our narrative, we find that on the re-dedication of the temple (B.C. 165) Judas Maccabæus had new furniture made, including the shewbread table (1 Mac 4^{49}),—now, we may be sure, constructed in entire conformity to the requirements of Ex 25$^{23\text{ff.}}$,—upon which the loaves were duly set forth (v.^{51}). This table continued in use till the destruction of the temple by Titus in A.D. 70. Rescued from the blazing pile, it figured along with the golden candlestick and a roll of the law in the triumph awarded to the victorious general (Jos. BJ VII. v. 3–7, esp. 5, § 148). Thereafter, these were all deposited by Vespasian in his newly built temple of Peace (ib. v. 7), while a representation of the triumph formed a conspicuous part of the decoration on the Arch of Titus, erected subsequently. Few remains of classical antiquity have been so frequently reproduced as the panel of the arch on which are depicted the table and the candlestick, borne aloft on the shoulders of the Roman veterans (see illustration under MUSIC, vol. iii. p. 462). Both seem to have remained in Rome till the sack of the city by Genseric, king of the Vandals, in 455, by whom they were transferred to Carthage, the site of the new Vandal capital in Africa. From Carthage they were transferred to Constantinople by Belisarius, in whose triumph they again figured. On this occasion a Jew, it is said, working on the superstitious awe felt by Justinian for these sacred relics, induced the emperor to send them back to Jerusalem. They probably perished finally in the sack of Jerusalem by Chosroes, the Persian, in 614 (see Reinach, 'L'Arc de Titus,' in REJ 20, p. lxxxv f., in book form, 1890; Knight, The Arch of Titus, 112 ff.).

iv. PREPARATION OF THE SHEWBREAD.—According to the express testimony of Josephus (Ant. III. vi. 6), the Mishna, and later Jewish writers, the shewbread was unleavened. Nor does there seem to be any valid ground for the assertion, frequently made by recent writers, that it was otherwise in more primitive times. The absence of leaven best suits the undoubted antiquity of the rite, and, moreover, is confirmed by the Babylonian practice of offering 'sweet' (i.e. unleavened) bread on the tables of the gods (see below). The material in all periods was of the finest of the flour (Lv 24^5), which was obtained, according to Menahoth (vi. 7), by sifting the flour eleven times. The kneading and firing of the loaves in the time of the Chronicler was the duty of the 'sons of the Kohathites,' a Levitical guild (1 Ch 9^{32}); in the closing days of the second temple their preparation fell to the house or family of Garmu (Yōma iii. 11, Sheḳal. viii. 1). The quantity of flour prescribed by the Priests' Code for each loaf (חַלָּה ḥallā) was 'two tenth-parts of an ephah' (Lv 24^5 RV), which—reckoning the ephah roughly at a bushel—represents about $\frac{4}{5}$ths of a peck (c. 7$\frac{1}{4}$ litres), a quantity sufficient to produce a loaf of considerable dimensions, recalling the loaves which gave their name to the Delian festival of the Μεγαλάρτια.

In the earlier period, at least, the loaves were laid upon the table while still hot (1 S 21^6). The later regulations required that they should be arranged in two piles (מַעֲרָכוֹת, see sect. i. above). On the top of each pile, apparently,—on the table between the piles, according to another tradition,—stood a censer containing 'pure frankincense for a memorial (אַזְכָּרָה, for which see comm. on Lv 24^7), even an offering by fire unto the LORD.' Alexandrian writers give salt in addition (Lv l.c. in LXX; hence, doubtless, Philo, Vit. Mos. ii. 151). The stale loaves, by the same regulations, were removed and fresh loaves substituted every Sabbath. According to Sukka (v. 7 f.), one half went to the outgoing division of priests, the other to the incoming division, by whom they were consumed within the sacred precincts.* In order to avoid repetition, further examination of the details given by post-biblical Jewish writers—many of them clearly wide of the mark—regarding the shape and size of the loaves and their arrangement on the table, as well as regarding the nature and purpose of the vessels mentioned, Ex 25^{29}, Nu 4^7, is reserved for the section on P's table of shewbread and its vessels in the general article TABERNACLE.

* It is a mere conjecture that the shewbread was originally burned (Stade, Akadem. Reden, etc., 180, note 15).

v. SIGNIFICANCE OF THE RITE.—The rite of 'the presence-bread' is one of the fairly numerous survivals from the pre-Mosaic stage of the religion of the Hebrews, and goes back ultimately to the naïve conception that the god, like his worshippers, required and actually partook of material nourishment. No doubt, as W. R. Smith has pointed out, this idea 'is too crude to subsist without modification beyond the savage state of society' (*RS*¹ 212). In the case of the shewbread, it may be suggested that the odour of the 'hot bread' (לֶחֶם חֹם 1 S 21⁶ ⁽⁷⁾) was regarded in ancient times as a 'sweet savour,' like the smell of the sacrifice to J″ (Gn 8²¹, Lv 23¹³). In any case the custom of presenting solid food on a table as an oblation to a god is too widespread among the peoples of antiquity to permit of doubt as to the origin of the rite among the Hebrews.

The lectisternia, which the Romans borrowed from the Greeks, afford the most familiar illustration of this practice (see Smith's *Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiqs.*³ s.v.). In the OT itself we hear of Jeremiah's contemporaries kneading cakes for the queen of heaven (Jer 7¹⁸), and, at a later date, of the table which even Jews spread to Fortune (GAD, Is 65¹¹ RV). In the religious literature of the ancient Babylonians, again, particularly in the ritual tablets to which the attention of scholars has lately been turned, we find numerous references to the various items of food and drink to be presented to the deities of the Babylonian pantheon. The tables or altars, also, on which the food was set out are frequently represented on the monuments (see, e.g., Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 387; Riehm's *HWB*² i. 143, etc.). And not only so, but, as Zimmern has recently shown, the loaves of sweet or unleavened bread thus presented are, frequently at least, of the number of 12, 24, or even as many as 36 (see the reff. in Zimmern's Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Babylon. Religion, 1901, p. 94 f.). These numbers, we can hardly doubt, have an astronomical significance, 12 being the number of the signs of the Zodiac, 24 the stations of the moon, and 36 those of the planets (see 2 K 23⁵ RVm, Job 38³², and art. BABYLONIA in vol. i. p. 218ᵃ). The knowledge of this ancient practice of offering food on the tables of the gods survived to a late period; see Epist. of Jeremy, v.²⁶ᶠᶠ·, and the fragment of Bel and the Dragon (esp. v.¹¹; note also that the food of Bel comprised 'twelve great measures of fine flour'). Hence, if the loaves of the presence-bread were 12 in number from the earliest times,—though of this we have no early testimony,—we should have another of the rapidly increasing instances of early Babylonian influence in the West (cf. Josephus' association of the 12 loaves with the 12 months, Ant. III. vii. 7).

While, however, it must be admitted that the rite of the presence-bread had its origin in the circle of ideas just set forth, it is not less evident that, as taken up and preserved by the religious guides of Israel, the rite acquired a new and higher significance. The bread was no longer thought of as J″'s food (לֶחֶם י״) in the sense attached to it in an earlier age, but as a concrete expression of the fact that J″ was the source of every material blessing. As the 'continual bread' (לֶחֶם תָּמִיד Nu 4⁷), it became the standing expression of the nation's gratitude to the Giver of all for the bounties of His providence. The number twelve was later brought into connexion with the number of the tribes of Israel (cf. Lv 24⁸), and thus, Sabbath by Sabbath, the priestly representatives of the nation renewed this outward and visible acknowledgment of man's continual dependence upon God. The presence of the shewbread in the developed ritual, therefore, was not without a real and worthy significance. It may here be added, in a word, that the explanation of the shewbread hitherto in vogue among the disciples of Bähr, according to which the 'bread of the face' was so named because it is through partaking thereof that man attains to the sight of God, accords neither with the true signification of the term, nor with the history of the rite.

SHIBAH (שִׁבְעָה; LXX ὅρκος [O.L. iuramentum]; Aq. Symm. πλησμονῆς [Vulg. abundantia]).—The well dug by Isaac, from which Beer-sheba took its name, Gn 26³³ (J, who apparently makes שִׁבְעָה = שְׁבֻעָה 'oath'). The well, according to this view, derived its name from the 'swearing' (v.³¹) of the oath by which Isaac, on the one part, and Abimelech, with his friend Ahuzzath, and his chief captain Phicol, on the other, ratified the covenant they had made (vv.²⁶⁻³³). According to another account, Gn 21²²⁻³¹ (E), the well was dug by Abraham, and Beer-sheba was so called because it was there that he and Abimelech 'sware both of them.' In the latter passage there is also manifestly a play upon the word שֶׁבַע 'seven,' seven lambs having been used (v.²⁸ᶠᶠ·) in the ceremony. For a description of the existing wells see BEER-SHEBA, and add to Literature: Gautier, Expos. Times, 1899, pp. 328 f., 478 f.; and esp. G. L. Robinson, *Bibl. SHIBBOLETH (שִׁבֹּלֶת), Jg 12⁶.—The Ephraimite fugitives at the Jordan-fords betrayed themselves by pronouncing this word ṣibbōleth (סִבֹּלֶת)—an interesting proof of the difference in dialect which distinguished the western tribes from those on the east of Jordan. By confusion of sounds shibbōleth (שבלת) would become sibbōleth (שׂבלת), and so ṣibbōleth (סבלת); see Wright, Comp. Gram. p. 58. Etymologically ס (ṣ) is quite distinct from שׂ (s),* but the two are not infrequently confounded in Heb., e.g. כַּעַשׂ and כַּעַס, נָסוֹג Ps 44¹⁴ and נָשׂוֹג 2 S 1²², שִׂכְלוּת for סִכְלוּת Ec 1¹⁷ etc.; by using ס (ṣ) rather than שׂ (s), the author of Jg 12⁶ simply wished to make the sound as distinct from שׁ (sh) as possible. In illustration of this peculiarity of the Ephraimite speech, it may be noted that the Heb. שׁ (sh) as a rule = the Arab. س (s), e.g. שֶׁבַע, سَبَعَ; and vice versa, the Heb. שׂ (s) = Arab. ش (sh), e.g. שָׂנֵא, شَنِئَ. Ḳimḥi, in his commentary, in loc., mentions another local peculiarity in the pronunciation of the sibilant: the people of Sarepta sounded שׁ (sh) as ת (th); so frequently Heb. שׁ (sh) = Arab. ث (th) = Aram. ܬ (th).

The Gr. versions of the passage are interesting: B εἰπὸν δὴ Στάχυς. καὶ οὐ κατεύθυνεν τοῦ λαλῆσαι οὕτως; A εἴπατε δὴ σύνθημα. καὶ κατηύθυναν κ.τ.λ. In both, the Ephraimites' reply is omitted. 'Lucian' (ed. Lagarde): εἴπατε δὴ σύνθημα. καὶ εἶπον Στάχυς κ.τ.λ. Codd. 54, 59, 75, 82 (Moore, M): εἴπατε δὴ σύνθημα καὶ λέγοντες σύνθημα οὐ κατηύθυναν κ.τ.λ. By σύνθημα is meant 'watchword,' 'countersign'; see 2 Mac 8²³ 13¹⁵. The Gr. versions, of course, could not imitate the change of the Heb. sibilants, as the Targ. and Syr. do. Vulg. Dic ergo: Scibboleth, quod interpretatur spica. Qui respondebat: Sibboleth, eadem littera spicam exprimere non valens.

The meaning of the word is unimportant; it may be either 'ear of wheat' (Assyr. šubultu), Gn 41⁵ᶠᶠ·, Is 17⁵ etc., or 'flood,' 'stream,' Is 27¹², Ps 69²·¹⁵. In the latter sense, which is suitable to the context, the word appears only in late passages; in this ancient story it would probably be understood 'ear.'

Marquart (ZATW, 1888, 151 ff.) attempts to prove that the Ephraimites did not pronounce שׁ (sh) as שׂ (s) (cf. the name of their chief town שמרון Shōmerôn, Samaria), and that שׂ (s) could not pass into ס (ṣ) in old Hebrew. He thinks that the Gileadites said שבלת (shibbōleth) and meant 'flood,' but the Ephraimites said תבלת (thibbōleth) and meant 'ear' (cf. תובלא Jerus. Targ. Gn 41⁵ᶠᶠ·). This ת (th) was represented by ס (cf. ׳ן and Bibl. Aram. ׳ך) for want of a closer equivalent. But Marquart's arguments are not convincing, and have not generally been accepted. We have no means of knowing what the Ephraimite dialect was.

SHIELD (or BUCKLER) is EV tr. in OT of the following Heb. words. 1. (Most commonly) מָגֵן māgēn, a small round shield, a buckler; the Gr.

ἀσπίς and Lat. clipeus. 2. צִנָּה ẓinnāh, a large oval or rectangular shield. 3. סֹחֵרָה ṣoḥērāh, 'buckler,' only in Ps 91 [90]^4; the word, however, is probably a participle (LXX κυκλώσει); tr. with a slight emendation, 'His truth is an encompassing shield.' 4. כִּידוֹן kīdōn, 'shield,' 1 S 17^{45} AV, 'target' v.^{6} AV, similarly LXX; RV correctly 'javelin.' 5. שְׁלָטִים shĕlāṭīm, 'shields,' 2 S 8^7=1 Ch 18^7, 2 K 11^{10}= 2 Ch 23^9, Ca 4^4, Jer 51^{11}, Ezk 27^{11} (only in these places, and only in the plur.), more correctly 'suits of armour,' Jer 51^{11} RVm (see Expository Times, x. (1898) 43 ff.). עֲגָלָה 'ăgālāh, usually tr. 'wagon,' means in Ps 46^9 [Heb.^{10}] perhaps 'shield' (so LXX, Vulg., Targ.); EV, Jerome (Psalter. iuxta Heb.), Peshiṭta, 'chariots.' In the NT 'shield' occurs once, Eph 6^{16}, as tr. of θυρεός, the large Rom. shield.

1. Material and Construction.—The material of which the shields known to the Hebrews were commonly made can only be inferred. Solomon prepared 200 'targets' (צִנָּה, i.e. large shields) and 300 'shields' (מָגֵן, i.e. bucklers), which were either made of gold or else heavily overlaid with gold (1 K $10^{16.17}$). When these were carried off by Shishak, Rehoboam made 'brazen' (bronze) shields to take their place (ib. $14^{26.27}$). The 'shields' found among the treasures of Hezekiah were also probably made of one of the precious metals, or at least adorned with it (2 Ch 32^{27}).* Both the golden shields and the bronze were probably used only for state ceremonial: the war shield was doubtless either like the Roman scutum of leather stretched over a wooden frame, or like the Persian γέρρον of wickerwork. That shields were largely composed of some inflammable substance may be inferred from such passages as Ezk 39^9, Ps 46^9 [45^{10}] LXX (cf. Is 9^5 RV). A shield was overlaid with plates, perhaps of bronze (cf. Job 41^{15} RVm, where the scales of the crocodile are compared with the plates of a shield); it was also furnished with a boss (cf. Job 15^{26}), such as is shown on the Assyr. reliefs, passim. The Assyr. shields were highly convex and sometimes round, sometimes irregular in shape, i.e. rectangular at the foot (for planting firmly against the ground) but pointed at the top.

2. Use.—The shield was kept in a case when not in use (Is 22^6; cf. Aristophanes, Ach. 574, and Euripides, Andr. 617). It was anointed before battle to make its surface slippery (Is 21^5; cf. Driver on 2 S 1^{21}, who quotes Vergil, Æn. vii. 626). In battle it sometimes had a 'red' appearance (Nah $2^{3\,[4]}$), either because it was dyed red (A. B. Davidson, ad loc.), or because it was overlaid with burnished copper (Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. 364), or again because the leather itself might be described as 'red,' אָדֹם 'ādôm being applied to the colour of the human skin (La 4^7). The large shield was much used in sieges as a stationary screen, from behind which the garrison on the walls might be assailed with arrows (2 K 19^{32}=Is 37^{33}, Sir 37^5 Heb.). A large shield was sometimes carried in battle by an attendant in front of his master (1 S 17^{41} Heb., LXX [A and Luc.], Peshiṭta, a verse om. in LXX B, but probably genuine). In times of peace shields were hung in armouries, to the admiration of beholders (Ca 4^4, Ezk 27^{10}).

3. Metaphorical use of the term 'shield.'—In the OT God's favour (Ps $5^{12\,[13]}$) and His faithfulness (Ps 91^4 [90^4]) are compared to a shield, cf. 'the shield of thy salvation' (Ps 18^{35} [17^{36}]). By a still bolder metaphor in several other places God Himself is called the 'shield' (מָגֵן) of His people or of His saints: Gn 15^1, Dt 33^{29}, Ps $3^{3\,[4]}$ $18^{2.30}$ [$17^{3.31}$] 33 [32]^{20} 59^{11} [58^{12}] $84^{9.11}$ [$83^{10.12}$] 115^{9-11} [113^{17-19}], Pr 2^7 30^5 [24^{28}]. In all these passages the LXX tr. מָגֵן either by ὑπερασπιστής (once Ps 3^4 by ἀντιλήμπτωρ) or by some form of the verb ὑπερασπίζω. The Peshiṭta follows a similar course. It is true that מָגֵן taken as Hiphil partic. of גנן is a possible nomen agentis, but it is probable that the Heb. metaphor was too bold for the Gr. and Syr. translators. Thus in Ps 84^{11} [83^{12}] the Heb. and Aq. give 'The LORD is a sun and shield,' while the LXX (followed by the Vulg.) timidly paraphrases ἔλεον καὶ ἀλήθειαν ἀγαπᾷ Κύριος. Symm. (if rightly given in Field) is also timid, ἥλιον γὰρ καὶ ὑπερασπισμὸν Κύριος (a transitive verb, probably δώσει from the next clause, being understood). Jerome (Psalter. iuxta Heb.) gives 'Sol et scutum Dominus' here, and 'clipeus' in some other places quoted above, but in Ps $59^{11\,(12)}$ $115^{9-11\,(17-19)}$ he has 'protector' (=ὑπερασπιστής). Ben Sira ($51^{12c\,(10)}$ Heb.) writes, 'Give thanks to the Shield of Abraham' (in allusion to Gn 15^1).

In the one passage of the NT in which 'shield' occurs, the word is metaphorically applied to Christian faith (Eph 6^{16} ἀναλαβόντες τὸν θυρεὸν τῆς πίστεως, sumentes scutum fidei). In 1 Th 5^8 the apostle had urged his converts to put on θώρακα πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης, 'a coat of mail of faith and love' (see BREASTPLATE); but during his Roman imprisonment his imagination was struck with the great Roman shield, and he changed his metaphor, without, however, abandoning the thought that faith is the Christian's vital defence. In the OT (Ps 91 [90]^4) God's faithfulness is man's shield; in the NT the identification of faith with the shield gives us the necessary complementary thought that on man's side faith is needed in order that God's proffered protection may be embraced.

SHIHOR (שִׁיחוֹר, שִׁחוֹר, שִׁחֹר). — A word meaning 'black' or 'turbid,' from שָׁחַר to be black (Ca 1^5).

1. In 1 Ch 13^5 Shihor of Egypt (ὅρια Αἰγύπτου; Sihor Ægypti) and the entering in of Hamath are mentioned as the southern and northern limits of the kingdom of Israel in the time of David. The same (or similar) limits recur in 1 K 8^{65}, where 'the wâdy (naḥal) of Egypt' takes the place of 'Shihor of Egypt.' In Jos 13^3 (ἡ ἀοίκητος ἡ κατὰ πρόσωπον Αἰγύπτου, fluvius turbidus) the southern limit of the land that had not been conquered when Joshua was grown old is said to have been 'the Shihor which is before Egypt,' and the northern one was the entering in of Hamath (v.^{5}). Elsewhere the S.W. limit of the Promised Land is 'the wâdy of Egypt': Nu $34^{5.8}$; cf. Ezk $47^{19.20}$ $48^{1.2.8}$, and see EGYPT (RIVER OF). The southern boundary of Judah, also, which corresponded with that of the Promised Land, 'went out at the wâdy (naḥal) of Egypt, and the goings out of the border were at the sea' (Jos 15^4). In the same chapter (v.^{47}) the territory of Judah is said to have extended 'unto the wâdy of Egypt and the great sea.' In each of the above passages the naḥal referred to as forming the southern boundary of the Promised Land is the same, and it must have been a well-known and well-defined feature. Such a feature is found in the Wâdy el-'Arîsh, which, with its many branches, drains nearly the whole of the desert et-Tîh. The 'naḥal of Egypt' (2 K 24^7, Is 27^{12}) and the 'ποταμός of Egypt' (Jth 1^9) are also of course the Wâdy el-'Arîsh. In Isaiah the LXX reads Ῥινοκορούρων, now el-'Arîsh. Whether, however, this is the same as the Shihor is disputed. It is so taken by some (e.g. Knobel, Keil, König [Fünf neue arab. Landschaftsnamen im AT, 1902, p. 37]), but Del. (Parad. 311) and Dillm. regard it as the easternmost or Pelusiac arm of the Nile; while, according to Brugsch [Steininschrift u. Bibelwort, 153], it is Shi-Hor, or the 'Horus canal,' mentioned in lists of the Ptolemaic period as flowing by the border-city of Thiru or Ṭar (see under SHUR).

* But see note ad loc. in the Camb. Bible.

2. Shihor is certainly the Nile in 'the seed of Shihor' (Is 23^{3} σπέρμα μεταβόλων [שׁחר confused with סחר; see vv.$^{2.\ 3b}$], Nilus); and in 'the waters of Shihor' (Jer 2^{18} ὕδωρ Γηών (aqua turbida)).

SHIHOR-LIBNATH (שִׁיחוֹר לִבְנָת; B τῷ Σειὼν καὶ Λαβανάθ, A Σειὼρ κ. Λ.; Sichor et Labanath).—A natural feature near, and apparently to the south of, Carmel, to which the territory of Asher extended (Jos 19^{26}). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) take Shihor and Libnath to be two distinct places; but modern commentators consider Shihor-libnath to be a river. The meaning of Libnath is 'white,' and some authorities have taken the words to mean 'the glass river,' which they identify with the Belus (Plin. v. 19),—now the Nahr Na'mân,—a little south of Acre. The Belus, however, is to the north of Carmel, whilst the boundary of Asher included Dor (Jos 17^{11}), which lay to the south. The Shihor-libnath was most probably the Nahr ez-Zerḳa, which has been identified with the river Crocodeilon (of Ptolemy, v. xv. 5, xvi. 2; Pliny, v. 19)—the southern boundary, according to Pliny, of Phœnicia (so Keil, Dillmann, et al.). Shihor, one of the names of the Nile (Is 23^{3}, Jer 2^{18}), may have been given to this river because there were crocodiles in it;—they are still found in the Nahr ez-Zerḳa.

SHIKKERON (שִׁכְּרוֹן; B Σοκχώθ, A 'Ακκαρωνά; Sechrona).—A place on the northern boundary of Judah, mentioned between Ekron and Mount Baalah, the next place westward being Jabneel (Jos 15^{11}). The Targum has the form Shicaron, Eusebius (Onom.) Σαχωράν, Jerome (Onom.) Sachorona. The site is unknown (so Dillm.). Tobler (Drit. Wand. p. 25) identified it with Khurbet Sukereir; but this place lies between Jabneel (Yebnah) and Ashdod (Esdûd), and is about 4 miles south-west of Jabneel. C. W. Wilson.

SHILHI (שִׁלְחִי; BA in 2 Chron. Σαλεί, B in 1 Kings Σεμεεί, A in 1 Kings Σαλαλά, Luc. in both Σελεεί).—Father of king Asa's wife Azubah, who was queen-mother in the reign of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22^{42}, 2 Ch 20^{31}). It is unusual for the queen-mother's father to be named in the summaries of the earliest reigns. Besides Shilhi, Absalom (1 K 15, Abishalom) and (2 K 8$^{18.\ 26}$) Ahab (or Omri) are the only certain cases.

SHILHIM (שִׁלְחִים; LXX B Σαλή, A Σελεεὶμ; Vulg. Silim).—A town of Judah, in the Negeb, or South, which is mentioned between Lebaoth and Ain (Jos 15^{32}). The site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σαλεεί, Selci), and has not yet been recovered. In the list of towns allotted to Simeon (Jos 19^{6}) its place is taken by Sharuhen, and in 1 Ch 4^{31} by Shaaraim (see Shaaraim, No. 2).

From the reading of the LXX, it has been erroneously supposed that Shilhim and Ain are the Salim and Aenon of Jn 3^{23}. See Salim.

SHILOH (usually שִׁלֹה, 8 times שִׁלוֹ, thrice שִׁילוֹ, Gn 49^{10} [see the next art.] שִׁילֹה; originally, as the gentilic שִׁלֹנִי 'Shilonite' shows, שִׁלוֹן; LXX Σηλω, Σηλωμ, Jg 21$^{12.\ 19.\ 21}$ B Σηλων).—The situation of Shiloh is, in Jg 21^{19}, described with unusual minuteness: it is said to lie 'on the north of Beth-el, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebōnāh.' The position of the modern Seilûn corresponds exactly with this description: as the traveller now journeys along the great north road which leads to Nâblus (the ancient Shechem), he passes Beitîn (Beth-el) at 10 miles from Jerus.; at about 8 miles N. of Beitîn (near Sinjil), if he turns to the right for about a mile, and then, at Turmus'Âya, turns northwards and crosses a small plain, he will see rising before him, at 9½ miles N.N.E of Beitîn, the large rounded Tell, on the summit of which is the ruined site of Seilûn; N. of the Tell runs the Wādy Seilûn, and going down this to the W. he will rejoin the high road at a point 10 miles N. of Beitîn, and a little E. of el-Lubbān, evidently the Lebōnāh of Jg 21^{19}, 3 miles N.N.W. of Seilûn. The most noticeable feature in the natural situation of Seilûn is its seclusion. 'On the E. and N. it is shut in by bare and lofty hills of grey limestone, dotted over with a few fig-trees;' only on the S. is it open towards the plain just mentioned. The Tell on which Seilûn stands is some 1800 ft. in length from N. to S., and 900 ft. from E. to W.; the Wādy on the N. is a deep valley, in the sides of which are many rock-cut sepulchres; at the head of the valley on the E., about ¾ mile from the Tell, there is a fine spring of water. The site consists of nothing more than 'the ruined houses of a modern village, with here and there fragments of masonry which may date back to Crusading times, especially one sloping scarp.' The vineyards (Jg 21$^{20.\ 21}$) of Shiloh have disappeared; but the traces of terraces, still visible on the sides of the Tell, show that once it was actively cultivated. Below the top of the hill, on the N. of the ruins, a kind of irregular quadrangle, some 400 ft. from E. to W., and 80 ft. from N. to S., has been hewn roughly out of the rock; it has been conjectured that this was the site of the ancient sanctuary (see below). Leaving the Tell on the S.E., traces of an ancient road, about 10 ft. wide, are visible. At the S.E. foot of the Tell there is a small disused mosque, shaded by a fine oak tree; and, some 500 yds. S.E. of this, a building which seems to have been once a synagogue, 37 ft. square, built of good masonry (see further particulars in Guérin, Samarie, ii. (1875) 21–23; PEF Mem. ii. 367–370, with a plan of the Tell; Conder, Tent Work^{3}, 44–46).

Shiloh is mentioned frequently in the earlier history of Israel. It lay in the territory of Ephraim, 12 miles S. of Shechem. It was the spot at which, after leaving Gilgal, the ark and tent of meeting were stationed, and where also, according to tradition, Joshua divided the land by lot between the tribes (Jos 18$^{8.\ 9.\ 10}$ JE; 18^{1} 19^{51} 21^{2} 22$^{9.\ 12}$ P). It continued to be the principal Isr. sanctuary throughout the period of the Judges (cf. Jg 18^{31} 'all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh') till the age of Samuel (1 S 1–4). The narrative of Jg 21$^{19-22}$—which, whatever may be the case with some other parts of Jg 19–21, is certainly ancient—introduces us to a primitive stage of religious feeling and practice in Israel: we hear of 'Jahweh's pilgrimage,' held annually in Shiloh, and of the maidens of Shiloh coming out to dance in the choruses (cf. Ex 15^{20} 32^{19}); the feast, to judge from the terms in which it is spoken of, seems (like that of Shechem, Jg 9^{27}) to have been at this time hardly more than a local village festival, though it may have already been attended by pilgrims from the neighbourhood, and in 1 S 1–2 appears to have developed into an early form of what is called in JE the 'pilgrimage of Ingathering' (Ex 23^{16} 34^{22}), or (D, P, and later) the 'pilgrimage of Booths' (cf. Wellh. Hist. 94): on the particular occasion referred to, the Benjamites, laying wait for the women in the vineyards, captured them, and carried them home as wives. In 1 S 1–4 (cf. 14^{3}, 1 K 2^{27}) Eli and his two sons are priests at Shiloh; the ark is still there, till it is carried off (4$^{3ff.}$) to be a protection to the Israelites in their battles with the Philistines; a pilgrimage is made to it 'from year to year' (מִיָּמִים יָמִימָה 1^{3} 2^{19} [cf. 1^{21}]: so Ex 13^{10}, Jg 11^{40} 21^{19}), for purposes of sacrifice, at the 'coming round of the days' (1^{20}, cf. Ex 34^{22}), i.e. at the arrival of the new year, when the pilgrimage of Ingathering (חַג הָאָסִיף Ex. l.c.) was held; Elkanah and his household go up to it regularly (1^{21} 2^{19b}) from their home—probably (see RAMAH, 6) either at Râm-allah, 12 miles to the S.W., or at Beit Rima, 12 miles to the W.; and the youthful Samuel is presented there to Jahweh, to minister before Him (1$^{22-28}$ 2^{11} etc.). The sanctuary in which the ark is, is however no longer, as in the Pent., a 'tabernacle' or 'tent' (אֹהֶל); it is a fixed structure, a 'temple' (הֵיכָל 1^{9} 3^{3}) or 'house' (1$^{7. 24}$), with a 'door-post' (מְזוּזָה 1^{9}) and 'doors' (דַּלְתוֹת 3^{15}): see, further, TABERNACLE. The representation in 1 S 1–4, taken as a whole, points to the existence of a more considerable religious centre, and a more fully organized system of religious observances, than appear to be implied by the terms of Jg 21$^{19-21}$. The sanctuary of Shiloh is not, however, after 1 S 1–4, again referred to in the history; and it seems in fact that, shortly after the events narrated in these chapters, it was destroyed, probably by the Philistines; in ch. 22 (v.^{11} cf. with 14^{3}), it may be observed, the priesthood settled formerly at Shiloh appears at Nob. The recollection of this disaster was so vividly impressed upon the people's memory that long afterwards Jeremiah could refer to it as a token of what J" might do then to His temple in Jerusalem (Jer 7^{12} 'But go ye now to my place [i.e. my sacred place], which was in Shiloh, where I caused my name to dwell at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel,' v.^{14}; 26^{6} 'I will make this house like Shiloh,' v.^{9}); and it is alluded to also by a late psalmist (Ps 78^{60} 'He forsook the dwelling-place of Shiloh, the tent he had caused to dwell among men'). It is indeed very possible that the narrative of this disaster formed the original sequel of 1 S 4^{1b}–7^{1}, and that when the Book of Samuel assumed its present form it was omitted to make room for 7^{2}–8. Shiloh itself, however, continued to be inhabited; for the prophet Ahijah, who promised Jeroboam the kingdom of the ten tribes, was a native of it (1 K 11^{29} 12^{15} [=2 Ch 10^{15}] 15^{29}; cf. 2 Ch 9^{29}); and Jeroboam's wife went there to consult him when her husband was ill (1 K 14$^{2. 4}$): see also Jer 41^{5}.

Though a few mediæval writers were acquainted with the site of Shiloh (Moore, Judges, p. 451 n.), it was practically unknown from the time of Jerome till it was rediscovered by Robinson, BRP ii. 268–270. Cf. Stanley, SP 231–3. Jerome speaks of the remains of an altar as just visible there: Epitaph. Paulæ (iv. 2, p. 676, ed. Bened.), 'Quid narrem Silo, in qua altare dirutum hodieque monstratur?'; Comm. on Zeph 1^{14} (iii. 1655), 'vix altaris fundamenta monstrantur.'

S. R. DRIVER.

SHILOH (שִׁילֹה, Sam. שִׁלֹה), Gn 49^{10}.—i. In examining the various interpretations that have been given of this passage, it will be convenient to take first those adopted by AV and RV, or admitted into RVm. There are four of them.

(1) 'Until Shiloh come.'—This rendering did not appear in any translation of the Bible before the 16th cent., though some authority for it might have been found in a fanciful Talm. passage. The Wyclif VSS followed the Vulg. (qui mittendus est, reading apparently שָׁלֻחַ): 'till he come that shall be (or is to be) sent.' Coverdale's Bible of 1535 has 'till the worthye come.' Seb. Münster's version (1534) was the first to treat the word as a name: quousque veniat Silo. John Rogers (1537) has 'until Sylo come.' Matthew, Taverner, the Great Bible, and the Bishops' Bible all adopt it: 'till Shiloh come.'

The difficulty in the way of this rendering is to find a meaning for Shiloh as a designation of the Messiah. The only indication of a desire to make it a proper name appears in the Talm. passage alluded to above, Sanh. 98*b*: 'Rab said, The world was created only for the sake of David; Samuel said, It was for the sake of Moses; R. Yochanan said, It was only for the sake of the Messiah. What is his name? Those of the school of R. Shila say, Shiloh is his name, as it is said "Until Shiloh come." Those of the school of R. Yannai say, Yinnon is his name, as it is said (Ps 72^{1}), Before the sun let his name be propagated (yinnōn). Those of the school of R. Chaninah say, Chaninah is his name, as it is said (Jer 16^{13}), For I will give you no favour (ḥanīna).' This attempt to connect the Messiah's name with that of some favourite teacher, of course renders the passage worthless as an authority.

Even as a title Shiloh cannot be legitimately supported. It has been taken as an abstract noun put for a concrete, 'till rest (or a rest- or peace-giver) come.' This interpretation has been adopted by Vater, Justi, Rosenmüller, Winer, Baumgarten-Crusius, Hengstenberg, Reinke, Gesenius (Lex.), Murphy, and others, though many of these writers understand by the peace-giver Solomon or some other earthly ruler, not the Messiah. But the philological difficulties in its way are very great. The form שִׁלֹה presupposes a verb שׁוּל or שִׁיל which does not exist. It cannot be legitimately derived from שָׁלָה. Besides, this verb is so often associated with the idea of careless, worldly ease, that a title of the Messiah is not very likely to have been derived from it.

A different justification of Shiloh = Messiah is attempted in the Targum pseudo-Jonathan, and the MT שִׁילֹה may rest on it. It makes it mean 'his son.' But there is no Heb. word שִׁיל.

Even could these difficulties be surmounted, a greater one remains in the way of the AV and RV rendering. The announcement of the Messiah by name or title is out of place in a patriarchal blessing. Even a late editor would not so glaringly have violated the proprieties of time. The absence of NT reference is also strongly against such an interpretation.

(2) 'Until he come to Shiloh.' This has much in its favour. Shiloh, wherever else it occurs, denotes the Ephraimite town. It is natural to take it so here. The construction of the sentence and the parallelism both suggest this rendering. In 1 S 4^{12} the very phrase occurs, וַיָּבֹא שִׁלֹה.

Taken so, the clause is understood to refer to the assembling of Israel as a nation at Shiloh (Jos 18^{1}), when Judah may be supposed to have lost the pre-eminence or tribe-leadership held by it in the wanderings (Nu 10^{14}, Jg 1$^{2. 10}$, Jos 15). This interpretation does not necessarily affect the Messianic character of the whole passage, though it no longer attaches the thought to the word Shiloh. The view is undoubtedly an attractive one. We see Judah, the honoured of his brethren, marching in triumphal progress to the national sanctuary, and there laying down the emblems of authority in order to enjoy the fruits of peace, while the nations around bow submissive to his sway. And if, as seems not unlikely, an effort was made to constitute Shiloh a political as well as a religious centre, thus anticipating Jerus., this interpretation becomes still more attractive.

The objections to it are twofold. First, שֵׁבֶט and מְחֹקֵק seem to suggest sovereignty rather than mere tribal pre-eminence (see art. LAWGIVER, vol. iii. p. 83^{a}). The historical difficulty is still greater. No particular place is assigned to Judah in the histories in connexion with Shiloh. Indeed its rôle took it, not to Shiloh, but to Hebron and its neighbourhood. To obviate this difficulty some commentators supply a general subject to the verb, 'till one or the people come.' But, even so, an objection remains. It is out of keeping with the spirit of the patriarchal blessings to affix a limit to the prosperity of a tribe. In the case of Judah especially, we should expect a further outlook, and it seems too violent to explain 'Judah will lead till Canaan is subdued and after.' [Cf., however, the use of עַד in Ps 110^1 112^8; see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s עַד, II. 1*b*].

Many good names, however, support the rendering just discussed. Among them are Eichhorn, Herder, Ewald, Bleek, Delitzsch, Dillmann [provisionally; but thinking (so also Holz.) that a really satisfactory explanation is not to be found], S. Davidson, Strack (and Rödiger, Thes., giving prominence to the idea of peace or rest in Shiloh). Influenced by the objections stated above, Hitzig, Tuch, and G. Baur would translate עַד־כִּי as long as, on the analogy of Hor. Od. iii. 30. (7–9); cf. Verg. Æn. ix. 446–449. But Shiloh had been destroyed long before Judah obtained real supremacy. It is as a fallen rival to Jerusalem that prophets allude to the place.

(3) 'Until that which is his shall come.' This follows the reading שֶׁלֹּה, a poetical equivalent of אֲשֶׁר לוֹ. It was presumably the reading of the LXX (and Theod.), who render ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, 'till the things reserved for him come.' This is adopted, with some hesitation, by Driver. But, as Dillm. says, שׁ for the relative in an apparently Judæan text would be very strange. The indeterminate expression of the Messianic hope is in its favour.

(4) 'Until he come whose it is.' This follows a variant reading of LXX ᾧ ἀπόκειται, a reading lending itself so readily to Christian exegesis that we do not wonder at its adoption by the Fathers, e.g. Justin, Ap. i. 32 (supplying shortly after τὸ βασίλειον), Ignat. Phil. (longer form), Iren. IV. x. 2, Origen (frequently). It was adopted also by Onḳelos ('the Messiah, whose is the kingdom'), the Peshiṭta, and Sa'adya (10th cent.). The rendering is, however, a doubtful one, though it is adopted by Gunkel; for the subject 'it' (הוּא) is missing: Onḳelos' version is a paraphrase which may or may not be legitimate. Ezk 21^{32} (Heb.) presents a somewhat similar phrase עַד בֹּא אֲשֶׁר לוֹ הַמִּשְׁפָּט; but the subject in the relative clause is here expressed. Still, whether original or not, this reading seems to express a right sense; cf. (6) below.

ii. Other suggestions are—(1) 'Till tranquillity come.' This assumes the existence of a very possible שֶׁלֶה or שַׁלָה = peace. But it leaves the sentence without an explanation of וְלוֹ, and the parallelism suffers. It has the support of Reuss, Knobel, Friedländer.

(2) 'Till he comes to peacefulness or a place of rest' (also שֶׁלָה). So Kurtz, Oehler, and Perowne.

(3) 'Till he comes to that which is his own.' So Orelli (Alttest. Weiss. von d. Vollendung des Gottesreiches, 1882, p. 137 ff. [=OT Proph. 117 ff.]), comparing Dt 33^7; and apparently Ball.

(4) Lagarde (Onom. Sacra, 1870, ii. 96), comparing Mal 3^1, conjectures, as Matthew Hiller had done before him, שְׁאִילֹה=his desired one. This is accepted by Bickell (Carm. VT Metrice, 1882, p. 188). Driver objects that the word savours of Syr. rather than Heb., and that the sense asked is not suitable here.

(5) Wellhausen, in his Geschichte, p. 375 (1878), threw out the suggestion that וְלוֹ was a gloss explanatory of שֶׁלֹּה. 'Till he come to whom is the obedience,' etc. But this destroys the parallelism and the symmetry of the verse.

(6) Wellh. (Comp. 321), abandoning (5), thinks that the verse denotes in some way an ideal limit of time, the coming of the Messiah, and presupposes (as in fact the terms of vv.$^{8, 9}$ do likewise) the Davidic monarchy [he does not say clearly how he understands שילה]. This view of the passage certainly seems correct. In spite of the difficulties connected with שילה, the words do seem to refer to the transition of the power of Judah into the hands of an ideal ruler.

(7) Cheyne (Isaiah, ii. [1884] Essay iv.) thinks the text was once fuller, and would read יוּשַׁת לֹה or יוּשַׂם.

(8) Neubauer, Athenæum, May 30th, 1885, proposes to read שלם, i.e. Jerusalem, 'until he come to Salem' (cf. Ball), with allusion to the establishment of the Davidic kingdom. This, of course, implies that שבט has the meaning 'leader's staff,' not 'sceptre' (cf. p. 500^b bottom).

It may be noticed that the Messianic tone of the passage is independent of the reading of this clause, being conveyed by the clause succeeding it.

SHILONITE (שִׁילֹנִי; in 2 Ch 9^{29} שִׁילוֹנִי; 10^{15}, Neh 11^5 שִׁלֹנִי).—Gentilic name from SHILOH (which see ad init. p. 449^a). It is applied in the OT to 1. AHIJAH (see vol. i. p. 56^a). 2. A Judahite family, settled at Jerusalem after the Exile, Neh 11^5 (AV wrongly Shiloni), 1 Ch 9^5. In these last two passages we should prob. read שֵׁלָנִי Shelanite (cf. Nu 26^{20}), i.e. descendant of SHELAH, one of the sons of Judah. The LXX readings are: B Σηλωνείτης (1 K 11^{29} 12^{15} 15^{29}, 2 Ch 9^{29} 10^{15}), Σηλωνει (1 Ch 9^5), Δηλωνέ (Neh 11^5); A (in the same three groups of passages, respectively) Σηλωνίτης, Σηλωνί, Ἡλωνί; Luc. (in Neh 11^5) Σηλωνεί.

SHILSHAH (שִׁלְשָׁה; BA Σαλεισά, Luc. Σελεμσάν).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{37}.

SHIMEA (שִׁמְעָא).—1. See SHAMMUA, No. 2. 2. A Merarite, 1 Ch $6^{30\,(15)}$ (B Σομεά, A Σαμά, Luc. Σαμαά). 3. A Gershonite, 1 Ch $6^{39\,(24)}$ (Σεμαά). 4. See SHAMMAH, No. 2.

SHIMEAH (שִׁמְאָה; B Σεμαά, A Σαμεά, Luc. Σαμαά).—A descendant of Jehiel the 'father' of Gibeon, 1 Ch 8^{32}, called in 9^{38} Shimeam (שִׁמְאָם; Bא Luc. Σαμαά, A Σαμά).

SHIMEAM.—See SHIMEAH.

SHIMEATH (שִׁמְעָת or שִׁמְעַת; LXX in 2 Kings Ἰεμουάθ, B in 2 Chron. Σαμά, A Σαμάθ, Luc. Σαμαάθ).—One of the murderers of king Joash of Judah is called son of Shimeath (2 K 12^{21} (Heb. ^{22}), 2 Ch 24^{26}). His own name in 1 Kings is given as Jozacar. But the evidence of 2 Chron., and in a less degree the witness of Heb. MSS, suggest that the name was originally Jehozabad (see JOZACAR). This is the name of the second assassin also. It is therefore significant that in the text of 2 Chron. the one is בן־שמעת and the other בן־שמרית. It becomes highly probable that the historian named one assassin only, and that a second has been created by dittography and textual corruption. If so, Shimeath is probably the original of the variants Shomer, Shimrith, and Shimeath. In the present text of 2 Chron. Shimeath is plainly a woman, an Ammonitess. But in the light of the hypothesis here maintained there is equal reason to adopt the alternative 'Moabite' from the following clause, and the one throws doubt on the other. Probably Shimeath's Ammonite nationality belongs to a later amplification of the narrative. It is then most natural to suppose that the father of Jozacar (Jehozabad) was named Shimeath, and not his mother. שמע 'to hear' is the root of a number of proper names both in Hebrew and the cognate languages (Shimea, Shimei, etc.).

SHIMEATHITES (שִׁמְעָתִים; BA Σαμαθιείμ, Luc. Σαμαθεὶν).—A minor subdivision of the Calebites (1 Ch 2^{55}). They are represented as belonging to that section or generation which inhabited districts near Jerusalem. They appear to be a dependency of Bethlehem as the text stands (cf. v.^{54}). Possibly they are named as one of the 'families of the scribes which dwelt at Jabez.' In that case it is unlikely that the name is derived from the name of a place. The Vulgate does not transcribe, it translates resonantes. Wellh. (de Gentibus, 1870) implicitly suggests the meaning 'traditionists' (p. 30). This would no doubt stamp the record as a description of the post-exilic distribution of the population of Judah (vv.$^{50b-55}$ according to Wellh.'s conjecture). Similarly, but in appearance less logically, the statement: canentes (Vulg. tr. of 'Tirathites') et resonantes ideo scribuntur eo quod assidue in Lege Dei et in Prophetis versabantur (Jerome, Opera, ed. Vallar.^{2} iii. 855). But the Shimeathites may be distinct from the 'families of the scribes,' and the name may denote the inhabitants of a locality other than Jabez. The state of the text even suggests that they were a dependency of some other town than Bethlehem, now unnamed. It is not clear who are designated 'Kenites' by the last clause of v.^{55}. The Kenites were closely allied to the Calebites. See, further, Wellh. de Gentibus; also art. GENEALOGY, § IV. 39.

SHIMEI (שִׁמְעִי; B Σεμεεὶ always, A Σεμεὶ always except in Samuel and Kings).—1. Second son of Gershon, Ex 6^{17}, Nu $3^{18.21}$, 1 Ch 6^{17} $23^{7.10}$. In Zec 12^{13} 'the family of the Shimeites' (φυλὴ τοῦ Συμεών) is specified merely as a typical instance of a division of the tribe of Levi, which would mourn apart from the other divisions. In 1 Ch 23^9 Shimei must be a mistake for one of the sons of Libni or Ladan mentioned in the previous verse. 2. 'A man of the family of the house of Saul,' 2 S 16^{5-14} 19^{16-23}, 1 K $2^{8.9.36ff.}$. He is called son of Gera, by which it is probably meant that he was descended from Gera, son or grandson of Benjamin (Gn 46^{21}, 1 Ch $8^{3.5}$). The incident so graphically described in 2 S $16^{5ff.}$ must not be regarded as an isolated outrage committed by an individual acting on a momentary impulse. Its true significance will be seen when it is taken in connexion with the rebellion of SHEBA a Benjamite (2 S 20), which occurred very shortly afterwards. The Benjamites never quite forgave David for his having prevailed over the house of Saul; and later on, when the great schism took place, the most important of the Benjamite towns, such as Bethel and Jericho, sided against the Davidic dynasty. David certainly was not directly responsible for the death either of Abner or of Ishbosheth (2 S 3^{37} 4^{11}), but his complicity in their murders may very possibly have been suspected by Saul's adherents. It would be remembered, too, that David's men had originally formed a division of the Philistine army (1 S 28^1 29^2) that killed Saul and his three sons, and more recently seven of Saul's sons had been sacrificed by the Gibeonites with David's sanction (2 S 21^6).

When the king was returning in triumph, Shimei was among the first to greet him, 'the first of all the house of Joseph.' Josephus (Ant. VII. xi. 2) says that he assisted Ziba and the men of Judah in laying a bridge of boats over the river Jordan. In any case he poured forth an abject apology for his past misconduct, and obtained a promise that his life would not be forfeited for it. As David's strong sense of submission to God's will had previously made him restrain Abishai from taking summary vengeance on the insulter, so now, realizing that by the mercy of God he was beginning his reign afresh, he felt that it was fitting that the occasion should be marked by the customary exhibition of royal clemency (cf. 1 S 11^{13}, 2 K 25^{27}). Perhaps David never forgot that 'grievous curse,' every letter of which was significant, as was afterwards said (Jerome, Qu. Heb.), or forgave the utterer of it; and a late (?) writer in 1 K 2 records that years afterwards he recalled it in his dying charge to Solomon, and bade him devise some means whereby Shimei's hoar head might be brought down to the grave with blood.

This narrative, if taken as historical (which Wellh., Stade, and others deny it to be), has given rise to much discussion. It has often been urged that, in acting as he did, David 'kept the word of promise to the ear, and broke it to the hope.' Let it at once be acknowledged that the spirit of David, if he gave the charge ascribed to him, was not that of Christ. Is there not an anachronism involved in the supposition that it should be? But, even apart from that, it does not seem likely that David's promise, as recorded by the historian, 'Thou shalt not die,' or, as recollected by himself, 'I will not put thee to death with the sword' ('non te interficiam gladio sed lingua,' Jerome, Qu. Heb.), could have been understood by Shimei as an unconditional one; and in fact, however strongly we may condemn David's unforgiving spirit, it cannot be denied that Shimei's execution was solely due to his own folly. 'His blood was upon his own head.' It should be noted that, in the agreement that Solomon made with him, 'the brook Kidron' (1 K 2^{37}) is to be understood as meaning the city boundaries in any direction. Shimei would not cross the Kidron when going to Gath.

3. An eminent man who remained loyal to David when Adonijah rebelled (1 K 1^8). It is very uncertain who he was. Jos. (Ant. VII. xiv. 4) vaguely calls him 'David's friend.' Jerome (Qu. Heb. in loc.) identifies him with No. 2. Other conjectures are that he was the same as No. 4 or No. 5.

4. A brother of David (2 S 21^{21}), otherwise known as SHAMMAH (1 S 16^9 17^{13}), Shimeah (2 S 13^3), and Shimea (1 Ch 2^{13} 20^7). 5. The son of Ela, one of Solomon's commissariat officers. His district was Benjamin (1 K 4^{18}). 6. Brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3^{19}, B om.). 7. Apparently grandson of Simeon (1 Ch $4^{26.27}$). He had sixteen sons and six daughters, and is specially noted as having been the most prolific of all his tribe. 8. A Reubenite, son of Joel (1 Ch 5^4. A has Σεμεὶν in the first occurrence of the name); possibly the same as Shema in v.^{8} 9. B Σομεὶ, a Levite, son of Merari (1 Ch 6^{29}). 10. A Levite, in the pedigree of Asaph, David's precentor (1 Ch 6^{42}). He is omitted in v.^{20}. 11. A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8^{21}. See SHEMA, No. 2. 12. B 'Εμεεὶ, son of Jeduthun, who gave his name to the tenth course of Levites (1 Ch 25^{17}). His name is omitted in MT of v.^{3}, but the LXX has it there after 'Jeshaiah.' 13. The Ramathite (1 Ch 27^{27}), one of David's officers. He was 'over the vineyards.' 14. A Levite 'of the sons of Heman,' in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29^{14}); one of those who took a leading part in the purification of the temple. Perhaps the same person is meant in 2 Ch $31^{12.13}$, where he is the second Levitical superintendent over the 'oblations and tithes' which were stored in the house of the Lord. 15. A Levite (Ezr 10^{23} BA Σαμού, ℵ Σαμούδ; 1 Es 9^{23} Semeis). 16. A layman 'of the sons of Hashum' (Ezr 10^{33}, 1 Es 9^{33} Semei). 17. A layman 'of the sons of Bani' (Ezr 10^{38}, 1 Es 9^{34} Someis). These last three are in the list of those who married foreign wives. 18. A Benjamite in the pedigree of Mordecai (Est 2^5), called in Ad. Est 11^2 Semeias.

SHIMEON (שִׁמְעוֹן, the name that appears elsewhere as Simeon).—One of the sons of Harim, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{31}; BA Σεμεών, Luc. Συμεών.

SHIMON (שִׁימוֹן; B Σεμιών, A Σεμειών, Luc. Σαμίλ).—The eponym of a Judahite family, 1 Ch 4^{20}.

SHIMRATH (שִׁמְרָת; BA Σαμαράθ, Luc. Σαμαρεί).—A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{21}.

SHIMRI (שִׁמְרִי).—1. A Simeonite, 1 Ch 4^{37} (B Σαμάρ, A Σαμαρίας, Luc. Σαμαρεί). 2. The father of one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{45} (B Σαμερί, A and Luc. Σαμαρί). 3. The eponym of a family of gatekeepers, 1 Ch 26^{10} (BA φυλάσσοντες [translating, as if שֹׁמְרֵי], Luc. Σαμαρί). 4. A Levite, 2 Ch 29^{13} (B Σαμβρεί, A and Luc. Σαμβρί).

SHIMRITH.—See SHIMEATH.

SHIMRON (שִׁמְרוֹן).—The fourth son of Issachar, Gn 46^{13} (A Σαμβράμ, D Σαμβράν, Luc. Σαμβρὰ καὶ Σαμβρίν), Nu $26^{24\,(20)}$ (B* Σαμαράμ, B^{a}F Σαμράμ, A 'Αμβράν, Luc. 'Αμβράμ), 1 Ch 7^{1} (B Σεμερών, A Σαμράμ, Luc. Σομβράν). The gentilic name Shimronites (הַשִּׁמְרֹנִי; B* Σαμαρανεί, B^{ab} Σαμραμεί, A 'Αμβραμεί, Luc. 'Αμβραμί) occurs in Nu $26^{24\,(20)}$.

SHIMRON (שִׁמְרוֹן 'watch-height'; B Συμοών, A Σεμρών (Jos 19^{15}), A Σομερών (11^{1}), A Σαμρών (12^{20}); Semeron, Semron).—One of the towns whose kings Jabin, king of Hazor, called to his assistance when he heard of Joshua's conquest of Southern Palestine (Jos 11^{1}). It was afterwards allotted to the tribe of Zebulun (Jos 19^{15}). Its site is unknown; Dillm. enumerates various conjectures. Neubauer (Géog. du Talmud, p. 189) identifies it, very improbably, with the Simonia (סימוניא) of the Talmud, the Simonias of Josephus (Vit. § 24), now Semûnieh, a small village, 5 miles west of Nazareth, and not far from Bethlehem (Beit Lahm), which is mentioned with it in Jos 19^{15} (PEF Mem. i. 339). Riehm (HWB) considers a site so far south in Lower Galilee unlikely, and would identify it with es-Semeirîyeh, a village about 3 miles north of Acre, and not far from Kefr Yasîf. C. W. WILSON.

SHIMRON-MERON (שִׁמְרוֹן מְראוֹן; B Συμοών . . . Μαμρώθ, A Σαμρών . . . Φασγά . . . Μαρών; Simeron Maron).—A Canaanite town, west of Jordan, whose king was amongst those whom Joshua smote (Jos 12^{20}). Comparing its position in the list with that of Shimron in the list given in Jos 11^{1}, it seems probable that the two places are identical. The LXX treat Shimron and Meron as two places, and in this they are followed by Eusebius (Onom.). Possibly Shimron-meron was the full name of Shimron. Schrader (KAT^{2} p. 163; cf. Del. Paradies, 286 f.) identifies it with Samsimuruna, a Canaanite royal city mentioned in inscriptions of Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Assurbanipal, and places it at es-Semeirîyeh, following Socin (in Baedeker's Pal.). See also SHIMRON. C. W. WILSON.

SHIMSHAI (שִׁמְשַׁי).—The scribe or secretary of Rehum, Ezr $4^{8.\,9.\,17.\,23}$ (B Σαμασά, Σαμαέ, Σαμεαίς, Σαμεσά; A has Σαμσαί and Luc. Σαμαίας throughout). He is called in 1 Es 2^{16} SAMELLIUS.

SHIN (שׁ) and SIN (שׂ).—The twenty-first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 21st part, each verse of which in Heb. begins with this letter in one or other of its two forms. These are transliterated in this Dictionary by sh and s respectively. On the question when the two forms of the letter began to be distinguished by the so-called diacritical point, and for a strong plea in favour of the order shin-sin, instead of the customary sin-shin, in Heb. Grammars and Dictionaries, see Nestle in Transactions of the IXth and XIth International Congress of Orientalists (Semitic section).

SHINAB (שִׁנְאָב, Σενναάρ, Sennaab).—The king of Admah who was attacked by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gn 14^{2}). The name has been supposed (cf. Frd. Delitzsch, Paradies, 294) to be the same as that of Sanibu who is mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III. as king of Ammon. The reading, however, is quite uncertain, the LXX form having the support also of the Sam. שנאר.

SHINAR (שִׁנְעָר; LXX Σενναάρ, E Σεναάρ Gn 14^{1}; γῆ Σεναάρ [Theod. Σενναάρ] Dn 1^{2}; Sennaar).—The name given, in the OT, to the country known as Babylonia, elsewhere called Babel or land of Babel ('éreẓ Bābel), from the name of its chief city. In Gn 10^{10} it is described as the district in which were situated the four great cities of Babylonia, namely, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, which were the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom, and in Gn 11^{2} it is spoken of as a place where there was a plain, wherein early migrants in the east settled, founded the city Babel or Babylon, and built a tower, afterwards known as 'the Tower of Babel.' In Is 11^{11} the Heb. Shin'ar is rendered by the LXX as 'Babylonia,' and in Zec 5^{11} by 'the land of Babylon,' thus showing that the two terms were practically synonymous. To all appearance Ellasar or Larsa, and the district of which it was capital, does not seem to have been included in this term (Gn $14^{1.\,9}$). In Syriac Sen'ar was used of the country around Baghdad (Ges. s.v.).

The most common explanation of the word Shinar is, that it is derived from an earlier form of the Babylonian Šumer, a dialectic form of an as yet unfound non-Semitic Šenger, just as dimmer is the dialectic form of the non-Semitic dingir, 'god.' It cannot be said, however, that this explanation, plausible as it seems to be, is entirely satisfactory. Jensen objects (ZKSF ii. 419) that Šumer stands for south Babylonia, whilst Shinar, on the contrary, indicates the north, and he puts forward for consideration, whether Tindir, the name of the city of Babylon as the 'Seat of Life,' may not go back to an original form Šingar (Šingir), comparing, for the interchange between d and g, agar and its dialectic form adar. Like most of Jensen's proposals, this is suggestive, but at the same time hardly convincing. Hommel, in the art. BABYLONIA (vol. i. p. 224^{b}), derives Shinar from Ki-Imgir through the intermediate forms Shingar, Shumir (=Šumer), and Shimir, Ki-Imgir being an older form of Ḳi-Ingi, 'the region of Ingi,' which was rendered Šumer by the Semitic Babylonians. It will thus be seen that he does not recognize the force of Jensen's objection with regard to the geographical position.

One thing, however, is certain, and that is, that the Heb. Šhin'ar to all appearance represents the whole of Babylonia, excepting the district of which Larsa was the capital (see above). This being the case, it corresponds with the Kingi-Ura of the non-Semitic texts, which is translated in the bilingual inscriptions by the expression 'Šumer and Akkad'—that is to say, not only N. Babylonia, but S. Babylonia also. The question, therefore, naturally arises, whether a modification of Hommel's theory would not furnish the best explanation. That k changed, in the non-Semitic idiom, into ś, is proved by the post-position for 'to,' which was pronounced either ku or śu. This would produce the form Śingi-Ura, from which the Heb. Shin'ar (Śin'ār) might easily have been derived.* It is noteworthy that, from the geographical point of view, such an explanation of the word would leave nothing to be desired.

The latest or one of the latest identifications of Shinar is with Šanḫar of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (Winckler 25=London

---

* At least one compound group indicates the possible value of ši for the character KI, whilst two others suggest that of ešše.

No. 5). This, however, requires much further light before it can be admitted into the bounds of likely theories. The only statement with regard to Šanḫar made by the letter in question is a reference to gifts which the king of Ḫatti (Heth, the Hittites) and the king of Šanḫar had made to the writer, the king of Alašia. W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 279) identifies Šanḫar with Σίγγαρα, the modern Sinjar.

Šumer, generally regarded as the Babylonian original of Shinar, is usually found coupled with the name of the sister-province Akkad, of which the Accad of Gn 10^{10} was the capital. As stated above, the two provinces together are called Kingi-Ura in the non-Semitic inscriptions, rendered, in the bilingual texts, by the words mât Šu-me-ri u Ak-ka-di-i, 'the land of Šumer and Akkad.' The first component of the non-Semitic equivalent, Kingi (also written Kengi), is explained as mâtu, 'country,' and Ura as Akkadū or Akkad. Kingi therefore meant 'country' par excellence—in fact, in the bilingual inscription of Šamaš-šum-ukîn (5 R. 62, 40a b), kingi-Ura is translated by the words mât Akkadī, 'the land of Akkad.'

The original language of the country of Shinar was to all appearance non-Semitic, and it is very likely that, as already indicated, the Heb. word in question may be derived from that idiom. It is true that several Assyriologists (notably Halévy, the leader of the school) regard this language as being more or less artificial (see art. ACCAD); but that it should be so is hardly likely, the idiom in question (often called Akkadian in England, and generally called Sumerian on the Continent) differing considerably from Semitic Babylonian, not only in words, but also in grammatical forms. Among the chief differences may be cited the use of suffixes instead of prefixes to express the prepositions (êa-ni-šu or êa-ni-ku, 'to his house,' lit. 'house-his-to'), the use of long strings of verbal prefixes, suffixes, or infixes (innan-lal for inna-in-lal, 'it he weighed,' gab-indaria, 'he opposed,' lit. 'breast-him-with-(he)-set'), the use of compound words (ki-dur, 'seat,' lit. 'place-(of)-sitting,' (lu)-gubba-igi, 'attendant,' lit. '(man)-standing-before,' ša-bat, 'sabbath,' lit. 'heart-rest,' ša-ḫula, 'heart-joy,' and many others), and the numerical system, which goes up to 5, and then begins a new series, combining the numbers of the first (âš for ia-aš, 'five-one'='six,' îmina for ia-mina, 'five-two'='seven,' etc.). The objection that this ancient idiom cannot be a real language, but only a system of writing, because the same or similar words occur in it and in Semitic Babylonian, is easily explained away by the fact that, when two nationalities live together, in close intercourse, words and phrases are extensively borrowed on both sides: and this was certainly the case here.

In support of the contention that there was another race and another language in the land of Shinar than the Semitic, may be cited the fact that the oldest sculptures give, to all appearance, examples of a race not possessing the Semitic type of the later Babylonians, but one differing considerably from it. The Semitic inhabitants of Shinar were thick-set and muscular, as the cylinder-seals of Semitic work and the later monuments, such as the boundary-stone with the bas-relief of king Marduk-nadin-aḫi, show. The type of at least one section of the non-Semitic inhabitants, on the other hand, was slim and spare, and is illustrated by the bronze statuettes of the time of king Gudea (c. 2700 B.C.), representing a kneeling figure holding what is generally regarded as a fire-stick; the human figures found in bas-reliefs from Lagaš; and those on a large number of cylinder-seals. It would, moreover, seem that the ancient inhabitants of Shinar were accustomed to do a thing which the Semites do only under foreign influence, namely, shave the hair from the face and head. This is shown not only by the heads of statues and statuettes from Tel-loh (the ancient Lagaš), but also from numerous cylinder-seals and impressions of cylinder-seals of the later Akkadian (or Sumerian) period, in which an official is represented being introduced to the god whom he worshipped. The god himself, however, generally wears a beard. Whether they regarded the heads of their divinities as being shaved or not is uncertain, as they are commonly represented wearing hats.

In connexion with this may be mentioned, that the great majority of the names of the deities of the Babylonian pantheon are non-Semitic, and this shows what a preponderating influence that part of the population must have had. Indeed the religious system of the Assyro-Babylonians was probably to a great extent alien, and the comparatively few Semitic divine names which are found are to all appearance often applied to deities which were at first non-Semitic.

As to the order of precedence of the two races—the non-Semites and the Semites—in occupying the country, we have no certain information. It is worthy of note, however, that Nimrod, the founder of the great cities of the land of Shinar, is represented as a son of Cush (Gn 10^{8}), and that in Gn 11^{2} the name Shinar is spoken of as if it existed before the foundation of Babylon and its tower,—in other words, both passages suggest that the non-Semitic occupation of Shinar preceded that of the Semites. This seems also to be confirmed by the indications of the ancient monuments of the country. The figures of non-Semitic type, for the most part, precede those of the Semitic period in chronological order; the earliest inscriptions are in the language which the majority of Assyriologists regard as the non-Semitic (Šumerian or Akkadian) idiom; the contract-tablets of the dynasty of Ur, called by Radau the fourth, are written in it, as are also, wholly or partly, numbers of tablets of the dynasty of Babylon (that to which Ḫammurabi belonged), though Semitic Babylonian at this period begins to take its place. The Semitic renderings of the early non-Semitic texts are sometimes as much of the nature of glosses as of real translations, for they are written, where possible, in the blank spaces left for that purpose between the beginning and the end of the lines of the original text.* When not arranged thus, the non-Semitic text of these bilingual tablets occupies the first, third, and remaining alternate lines of the inscription, or the left-hand (or first) column.

The early languages of Shinar (Sumerian or Akkadian) are mentioned more than once in the inscriptions of Babylonia and Assyria. Thus the tablet S. 1190 is described as containing 'two Sumerian incantations used (seemingly) for the stilling of a weeping child'; another fragment says 'the tongue of Šumer (? assumed) the likeness (of the tongue) of Ak(kad)'; whilst a third informs us that 'Akkad is above, Šu(mer below),' but what this refers to is doubtful,—perhaps the position of the tablets of each dialect on the library shelves, or in the rooms. The tablet K. 11,856, a fragment which refers to 'the great tablet-house,' states that 'the tongue of Akkad is in the third . . .' (? room, space, division). What these disconnected statements refer to in reality will probably for some time be a matter for discussion, but the existence of other languages than Semitic Babylonian in Shinar or ancient Babylonia can no longer be doubted. To the above indications that this was the case may be added the fact that Šumer was called also kura Eme-laḫa, 'the land of the noble (or pure) tongue,' as well as Kingi.

The bilingual lists of Babylonia and Assyria distinguish the two dialects, but do not mention by what name the standard idiom (probably the older of the two) was known. The other, generally called by modern scholars 'the dialect,' is distinguished in the bilingual lists by the term eme-sala, generally translated 'tongue (of) the woman,' or 'women's tongue,' perhaps so called because it was softer, being more affected by phonetic decay. The possibility that this refers to women of a conquered race taken as wives by the conquerors has been suggested, but seems unlikely.

To all appearance the non-Semitic idiom and its dialect gave way to Semitic Babylonian about the time of the dynasty to which Ḫammurabi belonged, but when it finally ceased to be spoken is not known. Compositions were probably made in it from time to time until a very late date. This is shown by the existence of a bilingual hymn containing the name of Aššur-bani-âpli or Assurbanipal, though the text bears the appearance of an ancient composition into which that king's name has been introduced. His brother Šamaš-šum-ukîn (Saosduchinos), king of Babylonia, however, seems to have had original compositions in this old language made for him, as in the case of the text referred to above (5 R. pl. 62). It is noteworthy that all these late inscriptions, made when the non-Semitic idiom was a dead language, are in the 'dialect.' There is not much doubt that Semitic Babylonian was the language of the country from about B.C. 2000 onwards, and continued in use until about the Christian era.

* The tablet inscribed with the bilingual story of the Creation is written almost wholly in this way, and has therefore the appearance of a text in three columns.

Besides the archaic historical inscriptions, of which the best examples come from the French excavations at Tel-loh; the brick-inscriptions, of which most really ancient Babylonian sites furnish many examples; and numerous short inscriptions on cylinder-seals, the bulk of the non-Semitic literature of Shinar consists of incantations, hymns, and penitential psalms. Several interesting but fragmentary historical inscriptions exist (accompanied by translations into the Semitic idiom), together with the remains of a chronological text supposed to be that made use of by Berosus in his history. It is also worthy of note that several fragments of a glossary of the Semitic story of the Creation (art. BABYLONIA, vol. i. p. 220^{b}, and NIMROD, vol. iii. p. 523^{a}), or the story of Bel and the Dragon, imply that that composition existed in the old language of Shinar, and that it was a 'dialectic' text. Classified lists of words, without Semitic translation, are also found. In all probability, however, many other inscriptions known only in their Semitic dress are really of non-Semitic origin. For an account of these, as also for a description of the country, its history, etc., see the article BABYLONIA.

SHION (שִׁיאֹן; B Σιωνά, A Σειάν; Seon).—A town of Issachar (Jos 19^{19}) mentioned between Hapharaim and Anaharath. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) place it near Mount Tabor. Its identification by Eli Smith with 'Ayûn esh-Sh'aîn, about 3 miles east of Nazareth, has been very generally accepted.

SHIPHI (שִׁפְעִי; B Σαφάλ, A Σεφείν, Luc. Σωφεί).—A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4$^{37\,(36)}$.

SHIPHMITE.—See SHEPHAM and SIPHMOTH.

SHIPHRAH (שִׁפְרָה; LXX Σεπφωρά, the rendering also of צִפֹּרָה Ẓippōrāh, in Ex 2^{21}).—One of the two Hebrew midwives, Ex 1^{15} (E). The name is probably connected with the root שפר 'to be beautiful' (Baentsch in Nowack's Hdkom.). It is unlikely that it is a Hebraized form of an Egyptian name. See, further, Dillm.-Ryssel, ad loc.

SHIPHTAN (שִׁפְטָן; B Σαβαθά, A Σαβαθάν, F Σαφατάν, Luc. [Σ]αφαθά).—An Ephraimite prince, Nu 34^{24}.

SHIPS and BOATS (אֳנִיָּה, סְפִינָה [only Jon 1^{5}], צִי; ναῦς [only Ac 27^{41}], πλοῖον, πλοιάριον, σκάφη [only Ac 27$^{16.\,30.\,32}$]).—These are often referred to in the Bible, but to a very small extent in connexion with Israelitish history. In OT the most important instances connected with this people are the building of the fleet of Solomon at the port of Ezion-geber, at the head of the Ælanitic arm of the Red Sea (1 K 9^{26}); and another undertaking of a similar kind in the reign of Jehoshaphat, which had a disastrous result (1 K 22^{48}). In NT we have the voyages of St. Paul, especially the last into Italy (Ac 27).[*] The voyage of Jonah belongs to another category.

The Phœnicians were by far the most successful navigators of ancient times; and the history of the art of shipbuilding amongst Eastern nations can be very clearly followed in connexion with the history of this remarkable people (see GREAT SEA). Originally settled on the shores of the Erythræan Sea (Persian Gulf),[†] they had become familiar with navigation in a rude form before their migration to the shores of the Mediterranean about B.C. 1500, and carried with them the art of shipbuilding to their new home.[‡] Perhaps in both countries this art did not extend beyond the construction of rafts, or canoes hollowed out of trunks of trees (Monoxylæ); but as time went on these would give place to boats, built with a keel, and ribs covered with canvas and daubed with pitch. The models of boats found amongst Phœnician remains are of a very rude and simple form.[§] From a Cyprian model, represented by Count L. di Cesnola, and believed to be of early Phœnician date, the ships appear to have consisted of a hull of wood with a high curved stern and an upright bow; from the centre rose a mast not very high, supporting a yard-arm for carrying a sail; from the stern projected two steering oars with broad shovel-shaped blades passing through the timbers of the ship.[‖] The use of sails was probably preceded for a long period by that of oars. A boat of large size is represented on certain coins, regarded by some as Phœnician, by others as belonging to Cilicia, in which the bow is low, the stern elevated and accompanied by steering oars. It was impelled by one bank of oars, such as was called by the Greeks a 'triaconter' or 'penteconter,' and it was destitute of a mast.[¶]

About B.C. 700 a great advance seems to have been made in navigation by the Phœnicians, owing to the introduction of two sets of oarsmen seated on benches at different levels, and using double banks of oars; these were called by the Greeks 'biremes'; and, at a later period, a further advance was made by the introduction of a mast and sail, somewhat of the shape of a 'square-sail' of our own times. These ships must have resembled the Chinese junks of the present day.

The Phœnician ships described by Herodotus were of two kinds: those used in war, and those employed in mercantile traffic. The former were broad of beam, and impelled both by oars and sails. The sails were, from their shape, of use only when sailing before the wind. The war vessels were those which the Greeks called triaconters and penteconters, each impelled by fifteen to twenty-five oars on either side. They were long open boats in which the oarsmen sat all on the same level; each galley was armed at its head with a sharp metal spike or beak, intended for ramming.[*] Afterwards these were superseded by biremes, which were decked, had masts and sails, and double banks of oarsmen. Later still, triremes, impelled by three banks of oarsmen, came into use; and about the end of the 6th cent. B.C. boats with additional banks of oars were invented.[†]

[*] On the Sea of Galilee, in the time of our Lord, small trading vessels and fishing boats appear to have been very numerous, and some of the most interesting events in His life are connected with this lake and the sailors on its waters (Mt 8^{23}, Mk 4^{36}, Lk 5$^{1\text{-}11}$, Jn 6^{22} 21$^{4\text{-}14}$).

For some centuries the Phœnicians confined their navigation to the shores of the Mediterranean, Propontis, and Euxine; but before the time of Solomon (c. B.C. 930) they had launched out into the deep, had passed the pillars of Hercules, and opened a trade with Tartessus (Tarshish) on the Atlantic coast of Spain. Coasting along Africa, they had visited the Senegal and Gambia; and, in the opposite direction, had crossed the Bay of Biscay and the English Channel, and opened a trade for tin with the Cassiterides. It is no less certain that they reached the Canaries (Fortunate Islands), lying 170 miles off the coast of Africa. In Ezk 27 we have an eloquent description of the glories of Tyre and Sidon, and the construction of their ships.

The Greeks.—Ships with four ranks of oarsmen were first constructed by the Greeks about the year B.C. 400, when Dionysius I. of Syracuse built the first quadriremes (τετρήρεις), with which he had probably become acquainted through the Carthaginians.[‡] After the time of Alexander the Great, ships with four, five, and even more ranks of rowers became general; and, according to Polybius, the first Punic war was chiefly carried on with quinqueremes.[§]

Assyrian.—While the Phœnicians were making progress in naval architecture, their old neighbours and probably rivals, the Babylonians and Assyrians, were also at work in the same direction, but not to any important extent. As Rawlinson observes, it is only as fresh-water sailors that the Assyrians come within the category of navigators at all.[‖] They left the navigation of the Persian Gulf and Mediterranean to the Babylonians and Phœnicians, contenting themselves with the profits without sharing the dangers of sea voyages; their attention being concentrated on the navigation of their two great rivers—the Tigris and Euphrates. This was effected at first by rafts of timber supported on inflated skins; and these are still in use on the rivers of Mesopotamia.[¶] Bas-reliefs from the most ancient palace of Nimroud show two kinds of boats: the larger contains the king in his chariot with his attendants, and is navigated by two men.[] It is considered by Rawlinson to have resembled in structure the Welsh coracle, round in form and made of wicker-work covered with skins and smeared over with bitumen. To have carried such heavy loads they must have been of large size. The smaller was used for the conveyance of merchandise.

In the sculptures of Sargon, who reigned from B.C. 722–705, we have a representation of a ship of a more advanced type. Here four rowers standing to their oars impel a vessel, having a figure-head of a horse, and for the stern the tail of a fish; but it is possible that this vessel may have belonged to an invading force, not that of the Assyrian inhabitants.[*]

The sculptures of Kouyunjik represent ships in great perfection. One of these represents a naval battle, as may be gathered from the introduction of marine forms, such as star-fish and jelly-fish, not found in rivers. Layard recognizes in these vessels a resemblance to those used to a comparatively late period by the inhabitants of the cities of Tyre and Sidon on the Syrian coast.[†] That the Chaldæans were skilful shipbuilders, and were proud of their attainments in this art, may be gathered from the statement in Isaiah (43^{14}), where they are referred to as rejoicing in their ships.[‡]

Christian era.—The ships in NT times, chiefly belonging to the Romans, were galleys impelled by oarsmen and using square sails. They were sometimes of large size; that which carried St. Paul containing in all 276 souls, besides cargo.[§] Their timbers were so badly put together, that when subjected to the strain arising from a storm, they required to be undergirded (or braced) by means of strong ropes; and they seldom ventured far out of sight of land, or some port into which they could be run in stress of weather.

SHISHAK (שִׁישַׁק [in 1 K 14^{25}, Kĕth. שׁוּשַׁק, Ḳĕrê שִׁישַׁק], Σουσακ(ε)ίμ).—Shishak is Sheshonḳ I., the first king of the 22nd or Bubastite Dynasty. He belonged to an important family of chiefs of Libyan mercenaries, who by degrees attained to very high position. His grandfather married a princess named Mehtenusecht, doubtless of the 21st or Tanite Dynasty. The successors of Sheshonḳ were much attached to Bubastis, and his dynasty is named Bubastite by Manetho; but it is doubtful whether he himself had much connexion with that city. In his 21st year he began building a new court in the great temple of Karnak, and close to it caused to be sculptured a representation of himself sacrificing figures symbolic of the conquered cities in Palestine. In all, 156 place-names were thus recorded, and most of them are still legible. There are few important cities amongst them. They include Rabbath and Hapharaim in Issachar, and Mahanaim on the east of the Jordan, besides towns in Judæa. From the biblical account (1 K 14^{25}), it had been concluded that Shishak attacked only the kingdom of Rehoboam and spared that of Jeroboam, who had lived many years in exile in Egypt; but this interpretation is not necessary. Since Ramses III. no Pharaoh had ventured to transport an army across the eastern desert and to attack Palestine. Later, even Taharḳa and Psammetichus did not go so far; only Necho went farther. But Sheshonḳ's expedition was insignificant compared to the expeditions of the 18th dynasty. For the absence of the title 'Pharaoh' in the biblical record see above, vol. iii. p. 819.

[*] These were probably the kind of boats in use amongst the Greeks in Homer's time, in which he represents the descent of the Grecian warriors on the coast of Ilium (Iliad, i. 360, ii. 585, 630; Smith's Dict. Greek and Roman Antiquities, art. 'Naves,' 783 (1849), in which the subject is very fully treated).

[†] The Phœnicians had a practice of placing at the bow of their boats the figure of some monstrous form gaudily painted, in order to strike terror into the natives whose country they were invading. We seem to have something of the kind in the case of the Greek ships invading Asia Minor, 'Twelve ships with scarlet bows' (Iliad, ii. 739).

SHITTAH TREE (שִׁטָּה shiṭṭāh, πύξος, spina, Is 41^{19} RV 'acacia tree'); SHITTIM WOOD (עֲצֵי־שִׁטִּים 'ăẓê-shiṭṭîm, ξύλα ἄσεπτα, ligna setim, Ex 25$^{5.\ 10.\ 13}$ 26$^{15.\ 26}$ 27$^{1.\ 6}$, Dt 10^{3} RV 'acacia wood').—Shiṭṭāh is modified from shinṭāh, as ḥiṭṭāh, 'wheat,' from ḥinṭāh. The cognate Arab. equivalent for shinṭāh is sonṭ, a name identical with the old Egyp. name of this tree, and is, like it, generic for Acacia, but particularly applied to A. Nilotica, Del. The desert acacia, of which the Ark of the Covenant, and the boards, tables, etc. of the Tabernacle were made, is no doubt A. Seyal, Del., and A. tortilis, Hayne, if the two be not, as we suspect, varieties of the same species. Both are called seyyâl. Sayl means 'torrent,' and prob. the ellipsis 'tree' should be supplied. It is the torrent tree, i.e. the characteristic tree of the desert wādis of Sinai, et-Tîh, and the Dead Sea. The comus of these trees resembles that of the apple. It is about 15–25 ft. high, and a little broader than its height. It has stiff, thorny branches, bipinnate leaves with leaflets 1–2 lines long, and ½ line broad, and more or less spirally twisted, necklace-shape pods, 3–4 in. long. Its wood is heavier than water, exceedingly hard, of fine grain, the sap-wood yellow, the heartwood brown. It is not attacked by insects. It was therefore eminently suited for furniture such as that for which it was employed, in a climate where insects commit such ravages as in the desert and in Palestine. These trees must have been very numerous in ancient times, perhaps filling most of the desert valleys, and growing in clefts of the rocks on the now bare mountain sides. Even now, after they have been so extensively cut by the charcoal burners, there are large numbers of them. They form quite a characteristic feature of the desert landscape. The trunks are now not infrequently 2 ft. thick, and old trees may have been much thicker, quite sufficiently so to supply planks 10 cubits long and 1½ wide (Ex 36^{21}). If any difficulty existed on this point, it would be easily met by supposing that the planks were joined. Arab. carpenters do this now very cleverly in Egypt and Syria. Besides the wood, so valuable on account of its durability and the excellent charcoal which can be made from it, the tree yields the famous 'gum arabic' in considerable quantities. Its astringent bark is used for tanning yellow leather.

A number of places were named from this tree, as SHITTIM (Jos 2^{1} al.), perhaps the modern Ghor es-Saisabân, where there are still plenty of acacia trees, and ABEL-SHITTIM (Nu 33^{49}), i.e. the Plain of the Acacias, which is the same as the above. The Valley (נַחַל 'wādy') of Shittim (Jl 3 (4) ^{18}) may have been the lower part of the Wādy en-Nâr, the continuation of Kidron, into which flows the water from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. This, as all the valleys debouching on to the Dead Sea, would naturally have acacia trees growing in it.

G. E. POST.

SHITTIM (הַשִּׁטִּים always with def. art. 'the acacias,' see preceding article).—One of the limits of the camping-ground of the children of Israel in the plains of Moab, Nu 33^{49} (here only it is called ABEL-SHITTIM). According to Nu 25^{1} the anger of the Lord was there kindled against Israel for joining himself unto Baal-peor. The spies were sent out from Shiṭṭim (Jos 2^{1}), and from thence the children of Israel moved to Jordan before crossing the river (Jos 3^{1}). These are the only places where the word occurs in the Hexateuch. The LXX in the last three passages has Σαττείν in B (ν is omitted in A of Jos 2^{1}). In Nu 33^{49} Βελσά in B and Βελσαττίμ in A are renderings of Abel-shittim.

The word occurs twice in the Prophets: (1) Mic 6^{5} 'from Shiṭṭim unto Gilgal.' By some this is regarded as a gloss; others suggest that a part of the text has been lost here—'[remember that which I did] from Shiṭṭim unto Gilgal'—with reference to the wonders manifested at the passage of the Jordan. (2) Jl 3^{18} 'the valley of Shiṭṭim.' The Heb. word here used for 'valley' (נַחַל 'wādy'; see BROOK) is never applied to the broad open space immediately N. of the Dead Sea in which Shiṭṭim was situated. The idea in the passage is similar to that in Ezk 47$^{1-12}$, Zec 14^{8}, and Rev 22^{1}—waters (of life) issuing from the house of God would reach the Eastern (the Dead) and the Western (the Mediterranean) seas. The ordinary course of waters from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea would be along the Wādy Sitti Mariam and Wādy en-Nâr, the ancient Kidron called נַחַל 2 S 15^{23} (cf. Driver, ad loc., in Camb. Bible for Schools and Colleges).

The LXX rendering in both these passages is τῶν σχοίνων. It has been proposed (the suggestion is as old as Jerome) to read σχίνων, and then the translators would have considered the shiṭṭah-tree as equivalent to the mastick-tree (σχῖνος, Pistachia-lentiscus), a tree common in Mediterranean countries. The agreement between these two passages, and their variation from the renderings in the Hex., are noteworthy (cf. Ryssel on Mic 6^{5}).

SHIZA (שִׁיזָא; B Σαιζά, A Σεχά, ℵ Σεζά, Luc. Σιζαί).—The father of a Reubenite chief, 1 Ch 11^{42}.

SHOA (שׁוֹעַ; B Σουέ, A Σούδ; tyranni).—Apparently a race-name. It is mentioned in connexion with the Babylonians, Chaldæans, PEKOD, KOA, and all the Assyrians (Ezk 23^{23}), whose relations with Jerusalem had been intimate, and who were to come up and sit in judgment upon her. According to Schrader (KAT^{2} p. 425), Shoa is the Assyrian Sutû, the name of a people who are constantly associated in the inscriptions with the Kutû. The land of Sutû is identified by Delitzsch (Par. p. 233, etc.) with the district that extends eastward from the Tigris to the southern declivities of the Medo-Elamite mountains.

SHOBAB (שׁוֹבָב).—1. One of David's sons, 2 S 5^{14} (B Σωβάβ, A Σωβαδάν, Luc. 'Ιεσσεβάν), 1 Ch 3^{5} (B Σωβάν, A Luc. Σωβάβ), 14^{4} (B 'Ισοβοάμ [i.e. וְשׁוֹבָם 'and Shobam'?], A Σωβάβ, Luc. Σωβήβ). 2. A Calebite, 1 Ch 2^{18} (B 'Ιασούβ, A Σωβάβ, Luc. Σουβάβ).

SHOBACH (שׁוֹבַךְ; B Σωβάκ, A Σαβάκ; Sobach).—A general in the army of Hadadezer, king of Syria, at the time of the war with Ammon (2 S 10^{16}). He is not mentioned as taking part in the battle near Rabbah, where Joab and Abishai routed the combined forces of Ammon and Syria, and we may infer that he did not become 'captain of the host of Hadadezer' until after that event. The victory of Joab does not seem to have been followed up (see RABBAH), and before long the Syrians again prepared to attack the newly-founded kingdom of Israel. For this purpose Hadadezer gathered all the forces at his command, even the distant tribes from 'beyond the river': the latter were led by Shobach, who was apparently placed in command of the whole Syrian army. In the engagement that ensued at Helam on the east of Jordan, David commanded the Israelite army in person, and utterly defeated the Syrians. Shobach was mortally wounded in the battle, and his fall doubtless contributed to the rout of the Syrians (2 S 10$^{15-18}$). In the parallel narrative (1 Ch 19$^{16.\ 18}$) his name is given as Shophach (שׁוֹפַךְ; B Σωφάρ and Σαφάθ, A Σωφάχ and Σωβάχ, ℵ* 'Εσωφάρ, ℵ$^{\text{ca?}}$ 'Εσωφάχ).

SHOBAI (שֹׁבָי).—A family of gatekeepers, Ezr 2^{42} (B 'Αβαού, A Luc. Σωβαί) = Neh 7^{45} (B Σαβεί, A Σαβαί, Luc. Σωβαί).

SHOBAL (שׁוֹבָל).—1. A 'son' of Seir the Horite, and one of the 'dukes' of the Horites, Gn $36^{20.\,23.\,29}$ (Σωβάλ)=1 Ch $1^{38.\,40}$ (BA Σωβάλ, Luc. Σουβάλ). 2. A Calebite family in the tribe of Judah. This Shobal is called in 1 Ch $4^{1.\,2}$ (BA Σουβάλ, Luc. Σωβάλ) a 'son' of Judah, and in $2^{50.}$ (B Σωβάρ, A Σωβάλ, Luc. Σωβά)^{52} (BA Σωβάλ, Luc. Σωβά) 'son' of Caleb and 'father' of Kiriath-jearim. The name is probably to be connected, if not identified, with No. 1; see Wellh. de Gentibus, etc. 39.

SHOBEK (שׁוֹבֵק; BA Σωβήκ, Luc. Σωβείρ).—One of the chiefs of the people who sealed the covenant, Neh $10^{24\,(25)}$.

SHOBI (שֹׁבִי; Οὐεσβεί; Sobi).—From 2 S $17^{27ff.}$ we learn that Shobi the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon, together with two other influential and wealthy landowners of the trans-Jordanic country, came to meet David, when he fled from Absalom, at Mahanaim, bringing with them large quantities of stores and provisions for the Israelite army. It seems, however, very doubtful whether such a person as Shobi ever existed. His name is not mentioned elsewhere, and it is difficult to reconcile this action on the part of a son of Nahash with the insults offered by Hanun the son of Nahash, king of Ammon, to David's ambassadors (2 S $10^{1f.}$), and with the subsequent war between Israel and Ammon, which resulted in the siege and capture of Rabbah. S. A. Cook (AJSL xviii. 3, p. 155 f.) suggests very plausibly that we should read 'Nahash, etc., brought' (וַיָּבִיאוּ נָחָשׁ), in place of 'Shobi the son of Nahash,' etc. (וְשֹׁבִי בֶּן־נָחָשׁ). This emendation restores a natural construction to the verse at the expense of the words 'Shobi son of': in its present form the construction is involved and unusual (see Driver, ad loc.). If, however, Cook's emendation is accepted, it is difficult to resist his further contention that the section dealing with the Ammonite war (2 S 10^{1}–11^{1} $12^{26\text{-}31}$) has been misplaced, and that it should follow and not precede chs. 13–20. J. F. STENNING.

SHOE (נַעַל na'al, σανδάλιον, ὑπόδημα).—The na'al of the modern Arabic shoe means the sole, thus indicating the sandal character of the ancient Heb. na'al, usually tr. 'shoe.' Similarly, the Gr. term ὑπόδημα means something tied on or under the foot, that is, a sandal. Sandals must have varied in material and appearance according to the station and occupation of the wearer, those of shepherds being strongly made as a protection against thorns and rocks, while those worn by women of rank would be of a lighter and more ornamental pattern (Ca 7^{1}). Cf. art. DRESS, vol. i. p. 627. The shoes of the present day in Syria exhibit various transition forms, from the single strap of leather or embroidered cloth over the toes, and the leather sheath for the front of the foot, to the complete upper in different colours of leather, and covering the whole foot. Sandals of the original form are still worn by Bedawin and monks. Peasants when on a journey prefer to press down the leather at the heel-end of the shoe, and thus make them more loose and open, like the sandals of primitive times. In this way also the dust of the road can from time to time be shaken out without the trouble of removing the shoe. The act of repudiation mentioned in Mt 10^{14}, Mk 6^{11}, Lk 9^{5} 10^{11}, Ac 13^{51}, meant, along with the implied release from all moral responsibility, that the connexion thus dissolved was one of defilement and worthlessness.

1. Putting on and removal of shoes.—From the Oriental habit of sitting and moving about in the house with the feet uncovered, the possession of shoes became one of the essential requirements for a journey, and the wearing of them one of the symbols of travel (Ex 12^{11}). The Gibeonites drew attention to their feet bandaged with rags in order to keep their out-worn sandals together and protect their feet (Jos $9^{5.\,13}$). A similar appearance is presented by Turkish troops at the present day when returning from a punitive expedition against the Arabs of the desert. In the parable of the Prodigal Son the absence of shoes is noted (Lk 15^{22}). In the apostolic injunction to have the feet 'shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace' (Eph 6^{15}), the symbol of travel is introduced among the leading truths of the Christian life, making progress one of the permanent features of the Christian Church.

As Oriental peasant life has always been in villages and not in solitary houses, the shoes were constantly covered with dust and defiled with mud and refuse, and consequently were left at the door of the house. This custom, beginning with ordinary comfort and cleanliness, received a new emphasis when the entrance was into a house of prayer and into the presence of One who required cleanliness of heart. Hence the removal of the shoes on holy ground (Ex 3^{5}, Jos 5^{15}, Is 20^{2}, Ac 7^{33}). The custom is still observed in Oriental churches and mosques. It was the inevitable result of such connexions that any reference to the shoe and the thong or latchet that passed through the sandal loops was one of implied inferiority and contempt (Mk 1^{7}, Jn 1^{27}, Ac 13^{25}). 'You are my shoe!' 'You are under my shoe!' are exclamations of abuse often heard in the streets of Oriental villages and towns.

2. The shoe of witness (Dt $25^{9.\,10}$, Ru $4^{7.\,8}$).—From the latter passage we learn that it was an ancient custom in Israel, when property was sold or any right given up, to take off the sandal and hand it to the purchaser or the person to whom the right was transferred. In the former passage the husband's brother allows his sandal to be taken off by the widow, who at the same time reproaches him both by act and word for renouncing an honourable privilege and duty. The removal of the shoe became a sort of documentary evidence. The possession of one shoe by the widow was to her like a bill of divorce to a betrothed or married woman, setting her free to marry another; and the possession of the corresponding shoe by the man remained his protective proof that all claims had been formally settled.

3. 'Upon Edom will I cast my shoe' (Ps 60^{8}=108^{9}).—From the context the leading idea in this expression appears to be that of taking possession of or claiming as one's own. Possibly the casting of the shoe upon a piece of land may have been a legal symbol, similar to that considered above, of a claim to ownership. Or the meaning may be, 'Unto Edom do I cast my shoe,' Edom being then represented as the slave to whom his master tosses his sandals (see Driver, Par. Psalt. p. 169). Duhm also suggests that the allusions to Edom and Moab are designedly contemptuous, the latter being represented as a washing-basin for the feet, while Edom is thought of as a kind of corner into which dirty shoes may be cast.

The 'shoes' (AV and RVm) of Dt 33^{25} should be 'bolts' or 'bars' (RV). The Heb. is מִנְעָל (cf. מַנְעוּל of Ca 5^{5}, Neh $3^{3.\,6.\,13.\,14.\,15}$). G. M. MACKIE.

SHOHAM (שֹׁהַם [on this word see art. ONYX]; B Ἰσοάμ, A Ἰσσοάμ, Luc. Ἰεσσάμ).—A Merarite, 1 Ch 24^{27}.

SHOMER.—1. 1 Ch 7^{32}. See SHEMER, No. 3. 2. 2 K 12^{21}. See SHIMEATH.

SHOPHACH.—See SHOBACH.

SHOSHANNIM, SHOSHANNIM EDUTH.—See Psalms, p. 155^{a}.

SHOVEL.—1. [יָע], only in plur. יָעִים (from root יעה = 'sweep together,' with collat. idea of carrying away, Is 28^{17} [only]), occurs 9 times (Ex 27^{3} 38^{3}, Nu 4^{14} [all P], 1 K $7^{40.45}$, 2 K 25^{14}, 2 Ch $4^{11.16}$, Jer 52^{18}), always in a list of utensils belonging to the tabernacle or the temple. There is no reason to doubt that shovels for removing the ashes from the altar are meant (cf. AVm note at Jer 52^{18}).

The LXX has in 1 K $7^{40.45\,(26.31)}$ θερμάστρεις ('tongs or pincers' for taking hold of hot metal or coals), in 2 K 25^{14} it transliterates ἰαμείν (so B; A strangely ἱμάτια). In the other passages of the LXX either the Heb. word is not represented at all, or it is difficult to say what stands for it in the Gr. text, which differs from the MT both in the order and in the number of utensils mentioned.

2. רַחַת Is 30^{24} [only]. This stands for the broad, shallow winnowing shovel (the πτύον of Mt 3^{12}, Lk 3^{17}; cf. the use of the Gr. word [not found in LXX] in Hom. Il. xiii. 588; Aeschyl. Fr. 194; Sophocl. Fr. 931; Theocr. vii. 156) with which corn after threshing was thrown up against the wind to clear it of the chaff. It is to be distinguished from the מִזְרֶה (Arab. midrā) mentioned along with it in Is 30^{24} (elsewhere only Jer 15^{7} fig. of winnowing, i.e. chastising, the people),* which was a fork with 5 or 6 prongs, used in the process of winnowing, along with the רַחַת, in the way described in art. Agriculture, vol. i. p. 51^{a}, where both instruments are figured (cf. Wetzstein ap. Del. Jes.^{2} 707 ff.). The EV of Is 30^{24} would therefore be improved by reading 'winnowed with the shovel and with the fork' for 'winnowed with the shovel and with the fan.' The word 'fan,' which is misleading at best, ought, if retained in our version at all, to be used for רַחַת, not for מִזְרֶה.

SHREWD.—Sir 8^{19} only, 'Open not thine heart to every man, lest he requite thee with a shrewd turn' (καὶ μὴ ἀναφερέτω σοι χάριν: the sense, says Bissell, is given correctly by AV, χάριν meaning here 'an ill turn'; but RV renders literally, 'And let him not return thee a favour.' [Is 'shrewd' a tr. of ψευδῆ, which is read before χάριν in some good MSS and by the Lat. falsam gratiam?]).

The Eng. word 'shrewd' is a participial adj. meaning 'malicious,' originally the ptcp. of shrewen, to curse. The verb shrewen was formed from the subst. 'shrew,' an Anglo-Sax. word, meaning a scolding or cursing person, usually a woman. In Shaks. 'shrewd' has the general sense of 'bad'; it is applied to the contents of a paper, to news, to days and nights. The modern sense of 'clever' perhaps occurs in Troil. and Cress. i. ii. 206—'He has a shrewd wit, I can tell you.' But the usual meaning is 'sharp-tongued,' 'shrewish,' as in Much Ado, ii. i. 20, 'Thou wilt never get thee a husband, if thou be so shrewd of thy tongue.' The expression in Sirach (a 'shrewd turn') occurs in All's Well, iii. v. 71 and Henry VIII. v. iii. 178. So Latimer, Seven Sermons, 96, 'The greatest man in a realme can not so hurte a judge as the poore wyddow, suche a shrewede turne she can do him.'
J. Hastings.

SHRINE.—See under Diana, vol. i. p. 606^{a}.

SHROUD.—Coming from the Anglo-Sax. serud, a garment (connected with shred, as a portion torn off for some purpose), 'shroud' meant originally any piece of clothing. Thus Piers Plowman, Prol. 2—

> 'I shope me in shroudes as I a shepe [=shepherd] were,
> In habite as an heremite unholy of workes';

and Chapman, Odysseys, vi. 274—

> 'Give my nakedness
> Some shroud to shelter it, if to these seas
> Linen or woollen you have brought to cleanse.'

But the meaning was soon restricted to clothing for the dead, a winding-sheet. So usually in Shaks., as Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 479—

> 'Die when you will, a smock shall be your shroud.'

There was, however, a side application of the word, to express covering or shelter of any kind. Thus Milton, Comus, 147—

> 'Run to your shrouds, within these brakes and trees'; and PL x. 1067—

> 'The winds
> Blow moist and keen, shattering the graceful locks
> Of these fair spreading trees: which bids us seek
> Some better shroud, some better warmth to cherish
> Our limbs benumb'd.'

This is the meaning of the word in Ezk 31^{3}, its only occurrence in AV, 'Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud' (Heb. חֹרֶשׁ, a thicket or forest; LXX omits; Vulg. frondibus nemorosus).

SHUA (שׁוּעַ).—The father of Judah's Canaanite wife, Gn $38^{2.12}$ (A Σαύα, Luc. Σούε), who appears in 1 Ch 2^{3} (RV) as Bath-shua (B θυγάτηρ Αὔας, A . . . Σαύας, Luc. . . . Σούε).

SHUAH (שׁוּחַ).—A son of Abraham and Ḳeṭurah, Gn 25^{2}, 1 Ch 1^{32} (A Σωύε, Luc. Σοῦε, B in latter passage Σῶε). The tribe represented by this name may perhaps be the Suchu of the cuneiform inscriptions, on the right bank of the Euphrates south of Carchemish (so Dillm., Holzinger, et al.). Bildad the Shuhite (הַשּׁוּחִי) of Job 2^{11} (ὁ Σαυχαίων τύραννος) 8^{1} 18^{1} 25^{1} 42^{9} (ὁ Σαυχ(ε)ίτης) is prob. intended to be thought of as belonging to this tribe.

SHUAL (שׁוּעָל; B Σουλά, A Σουάλ, Luc. Σουάν).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{36}.

SHUAL, The Land of (אֶרֶץ שׁוּעָל 'the land of the jackal'; B ἡ Σωγάλ, Luc. ἡ γῆ Σωγάλ).—When the Philistines encamped at Michmash, they sent out three foraging parties. One of these 'turned unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual' (1 S 13^{17}). Another party went westward towards Beth-horon, and the third apparently eastward toward the wilderness. The road to Ophrah must have run northward between the last two routes, and the 'land of Shual' must consequently have been to the north of Michmash (Mukhmâs), and not far from Ophrah, which is very generally identified with the village et-Taiyibeh, to the east of Bethel (PEF Mem. ii. 293).

SHUBAEL.—See Shebuel.

SHUHAH (שׁוּחָה).—A brother of Chelub (i.e. Caleb), 1 Ch 4^{11}. Instead of 'Chelub the brother of Shuhah,' LXX BA read Χαλὲβ πατὴρ Ἀσχά, 'Caleb, father of Ascha' (i.e. Achsah, Jos $15^{15\text{ff.}}$, Jg $1^{11\text{ff.}}$, 1 Ch 2^{49}); Luc. has Χαλὲβ ὁ ἀδελφὸς Σουά.

SHUHAM (שׁוּחָם).—A son of Dan, Nu 26^{42} (B Σαμεί, A Σαμειδή, F Σαμί, Luc. Σαμέ), called in Gn 46^{23} Hushim. The gentilic name Shuhamites (הַשּׁוּחָמִי; B ὁ Σαμεί, A ὁ Σαμειδηί, F ὁ Σαμί, Luc. ὁ Σαμεί) also occurs in Nu 26^{42}.

* The verb זרה in the sense of 'fan,' 'winnow,' 'sift,' occurs (in Qal and Piel) as follows: Ru 3^{2}, Is 30^{24} 41^{16} (mountains as object), Jer 4^{11} (fig. of purification, ‖ לְבָרֵר) 15^{7} (fig., see above), Ps 139^{3} (fig., 'thou siftest [or winnowest, i.e. scrutinizest narrowly] my path and my couch,'—Driver, Par. Psalt. ad loc.). Elsewhere the root has the sense of 'scatter,' 'disperse' (Qal, Piel) or 'be scattered' (Niph., Pual).

SHUNAMMITE.—See next article.

SHUNEM (שׁוּנֵם; in Joshua B Σουνάν, A Σουνάμ, Luc. Συνήμ; in 1 Sam. B and Luc. Σωμάν, A Γωναμάν; in 2 Kings B Σουμάν, B$^{a\ mg}$ Luc. Σωμάν, A$^{*\ vid}$ Σιωνάμ, A$^{?}$ Σιωμάμ). — A place-name mentioned three times in the OT (Jos 19^{18}, 1 S 28^{4}, 2 K 4^{8}). In Joshua it is named in the enumeration of the towns and villages belonging to Issachar. Eusebius-Jerome identify it with a village 5 Roman miles south of Tabor, in their time called Σουλήμ (Lag. Onom.^{2} pp. 183, 284). There is still a hamlet in this same locality named Sûlem or Sôlam. It lies on the slopes of Jebel Dahi, the hill which faces Jezreel from the north. It looks across to Gilboa, which bounds the southern side of the valley that lies at the foot of Jebel Dahi. It has therefore been identified with the camping-ground of the Philistines before their victory over Saul (1 S 28^{4}). Saul's army is supposed to have occupied the ground at the foot of Gilboa. If so, the valley lay between the hostile armies. It runs eastward from Jezreel (Zer'în) to the Jordan. Shunem is almost at its N.W. extremity. The district is described in Robinson, BRP iii. 168 ff.

There is precedent for distinguishing the Shunem of 2 K 4^{8} from that already identified. Eusebius-Jerome say it was a place in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria), ἐν ὁρίοις Σ., within the district of Akrabatta (Lag. Onom.^{2} pp. 184, 285). They give Sanim as the later name. If Akrabatta is the 'toparchy' earlier known as part of Judæa, lying considerably south-east of Samaria, it is too far from Carmel to be very probable. But even Sôlam is not within the easy reach of Carmel implied by v.$^{22ff.}$. The statement that Elisha frequently passed Shunem (v.^{9}) gives more help than any other in determining its situation. It seems to imply that Shunem was a place near his home or on the direct road to a locality which he frequented. Now Samaria was Elisha's home (6^{32} 5$^{3.\ 9}$, cf. 2^{25}), and Carmel appears to have been a favourite resort and the destination of his journeys when he passed through Shunem (4^{25}, cf. 2^{25}). But Sôlam is 8 or 9 hours from Samaria, and decidedly off the road from there to Carmel. The claim of Sanim should therefore perhaps be left open. Whether it was near Samaria or not, if it lay on the way to Carmel the situation would be more appropriate than that of Sôlam. Near Taanach a place Sâlim is marked on the maps. It is not far from the eastern extremity of Carmel, and might be made a stopping-place on the way from Samaria.

An inhabitant of Shunem is a Shunammite (שֻׁנַמִּית שׁוּנַמִּית; B Σωμανεῖτις, A (in Kings generally) Σουμανίτης, Luc. Σωμανῖτις), perhaps also called a Shulammite (see SONG OF SONGS, p. 592^{b}). The vowel of the second syllable is in both cases a, as it is in the oldest spellings of the place-name also (LXX and the Egyptian transcription Shanama [Shanmâ] given by W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa, p. 170). The interchange of the l and the n is further exemplified in the modern name Sôlam compared with Shunem. The former may be a variant which existed even in biblical times.

Two women are designated Shunammites in the Old Testament. One is ABISHAG (1 K 1$^{3.\ 15}$ 2$^{17.\ 21.\ 22}$). The other is simply named 'the Shunammite' (2 K 4$^{12.\ 25.\ 36}$). She is one of those who play a part in the history of ELISHA (2 K 4$^{8\text{-}37}$ 8$^{1\text{-}6}$). Her own history is interesting as a picture of domestic and social life, and particularly as an example of the position a Hebrew woman might occupy at the head of a household. Her power of initiative and freedom to act are prominent features in the narrative. It would almost appear as if she were proprietor of the land which belonged to the family, or perhaps rather an heiress who had brought wealth to her husband (4^{8} 'a great woman,' cf. 1 S 25^{2}, 2 K 4^{13} 8^{3}). It has been supposed that by the date of the events recorded in ch. 8 she was a widow. Even in these circumstances her independence is notable. W. B. STEVENSON.

SHUNI (שׁוּנִי).—A son of Gad, Gn 46^{16} (A Σαυνίς, D and Luc. Σαυνείς), Nu 26$^{15\ (24)}$ (B Σουνεί, AF Σουνί, Luc. Σωυνί). The gentilic name Shunites (הַשּׁוּנִי) also occurs in the latter passage.

SHUPHAM, SHUPHAMITES, SHUPPIM.—See MUPPIM and SHEPHUPHAM.

SHUR (שׁוּר; LXX usually Σουρ, but Gn 25^{18} Σουηλ, 1 S 15^{7} Ασσουρ, 27^{8} a confused doublet -ψουρ τετειχισμένων).—The name of a place, or district, on the N.E. border of Egypt. It is mentioned Gn 16^{7} (where the angel finds Hagar 'by the fountain on the way to Shur'), 20^{1} (Abraham dwelt 'between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar'), 25^{18} (the Ishmaelites dwelt 'from Ḥavîlah—prob. N.E. Arabia—unto Shur that is in front of—i.e. east of —Egypt'; cf. 1 S 15^{7} 27^{8}), and Ex 15^{22} (where the Israelites, after the passage of the Red Sea, go out into 'the wilderness of Shur,' i.e. the wilderness bordering upon it). The 'way to Shur' was no doubt the principal caravan route leading from Ḥebron and Beersheba into Egypt, and having close to it (Gn 16^{14}) the well Beer-laḥai-roi. Though the general position of Shur is thus clear, the precise meaning of the expression is, however, uncertain. A line of fortresses, if not, as others think, an actual wall (anbu), had been built at a very early date, as a defence against invaders from the East;[*] and as the Heb. שׁוּר means a wall, it has been often thought that this is what the term denotes.[†] Others, starting from the same meaning of 'Shur,' have supposed it to denote a long range of white cliffs, running parallel with the coast, some 12–14 miles E. of the Gulf of Suez, now called Jebel er-Râhah, which at a distance presents the appearance of a wall (so F. W. Holland in Recovery of Jerus. 527; Porter in Kitto, iii. 1079 f.; Palmer, Desert of Exodus, i. 38 f., and others): it is said, indeed, that this range is still called by the Arabs Jebel es-Sûr (Rowlands in Williams' Holy City, i. 465). It is, however, some objection to both these views that שׁוּר is an Aramaic (Ezr 4$^{12.\ 13.\ 16}$) rather than a Heb. word (it occurs in Heb. only in poetry, and there but rarely, Gn 49^{22}, Ps 18^{29}=2 S 22^{30}), and also that it has not the art. (as is usual with topographical terms possessing an appellative force, e.g. הָעֲרָבָה, הַשָּׁרוֹן). The most important of the border fortresses referred to above was Ṯa-ru (Ṯor), the Selle of the classical writers, often mentioned as the starting-point of military expeditions (Ebers, l.c. 80 f.; Maspero, l.c. 75 [map], 201 n. 4, and esp. Struggle of the Nations, 122 f., 370, 371 f.;[‡] Erman, 537), now Tell Abû-Sêfeh, 20 miles S. of Port Said; and W. M. Müller (PSBA x. [1888], 476, As. u. Eur. 102) would identify this fortress with Shur, supposing 'Shur' (wall) to be its original name, represented in Egyp. by Ṯa-ru (Ṯor).[§] S. R. DRIVER.

SHUSHAN (שׁוּשַׁן, Σοῦσα, Σουσάν).—The Susa (Ad. Est 11^{3}) of the Greeks, now Sus or Shush in S.W. Persia, between the Shapur and the river of Dizful (the ancient Koprates). It was for many centuries the capital of Elam, and afterwards one of the three capitals of the Persian empire, and is sometimes described as standing on the Choaspes (Hdt. v. 49; Strab. xv. 3. 4), sometimes on the Eulæus (Arr. Exp. Alex. vii. 7; Ptol. vi. 3; Plin. HN vi. 27). This was due to the fact that the Choaspes (now the Kerkhah) originally bifurcated at Pai Pul, 20 miles above Susa, its right branch following its present course, while the left branch flowed east of Susa, absorbing the Shapur 12 miles to the south and afterwards joining the Pasitigris (now the Karun). The ruins of Susa were excavated by Williams and Loftus in 1851–1852, and more recently by Dieulafoy and de Morgan. They covered a space about 6000 ft. long from E. to W., by 4500 ft. broad from N. to S. The greater part of them, however, cover the buildings of the Persian, not of the Elamite, city. On the west is the high mound which marks the site of the Elamite citadel. East of it are the remains of the palace of Darius Hystaspis, and immediately to the north the ruins of the Apadana or audience-chamber, also the work of Darius, which was restored by Artaxerxes Longimanus after a fire, and again by Artax. Mnemon. The walls of the Apadana and palace were adorned with exquisite friezes of enamelled brick, much of which is now in the Louvre.

[§] Hommel conjectures that Shur is abbreviated from A'shûr (cf. Gn 25^{3}), the name of a tribe mentioned by the side of Egypt (and Gaza) in two Minæan inscriptions (AHT 238–45, 249, 252, 253). But see König, Fünf neue arab. Landschaftsnamen, 17 f.

Susa is probably referred to in Bab. documents of the age of the second dynasty of Ur (c. B.C. 2400) under the name of Sas and Sisa, which is stated to be a city of Elam, but the native name was Susun. This seems to be connected with the words suse-ti and sassa, which in the older and later Susian dialects signified 'former,' and so would mean 'the old' city. In the early days of Bab. history, however, the chief city of Elam was not Susa, but Anzan. Already in B.C. 2285, Kudur-Nankhundi, king of Elam, carried away the image of the goddess Nana from Erech to Susa. Susa, however, has been shown by the recent excavations of de Morgan to have still been at this time a province of Babylonia, inhabited by a Semitic population. It was not until after the rise of the Kassite Dynasty in Babylonia that the kings of Anzan made themselves masters of it. From this time forward Susa was the capital of the non-Semitic Elamite sovereigns, many of whose names have been recorded in the inscriptions of Babylonia as well as in those of Elam itself. These latter, though written in the Bab. cuneiform characters, are in the agglutinative language of Elam, which was closely allied to the Amardian or Neo-Susian dialect of the second column of the Achæmenian inscriptions, and is still but partially deciphered.

About B.C. 647, after a long and desperate struggle, the Elamite forces were annihilated by the Assyr. army of Assurbanipal, and Susa was captured and razed to the ground. The images of its gods and kings were taken to Assyria, and the monuments of its former princes were destroyed, the bones of their occupants being scattered to the winds. When Susa rose again from its ashes we do not know; Xenophon (Cyr. viii. 6. 22) and Strabo (xv. 3. 2) state that Cyrus made it his capital (see also Hdt. iii. 30. 65, 70); but its palace, according to inscriptions found on the site, was built by Darius Hystaspis. In Dn 8^2 the prophet is said to have had a vision 'at Shushan the palace' in 'the third year of Belshazzar,' but Belshazzar never actually reigned over Babylonia. An account of the palace in the time of Xerxes is given in Est 1^{2-7}. When Susa was entered by Alexander the Great, he found in it twelve millions sterling and the Persian regalia (Arr. Exp. Alex. iii. 16). After the rise of the kingdom of the Seleucids, Susa gradually fell into decay, being superseded by Babylon and Seleucia. When the kingdom of the Sassanids was conquered by the Arabs, the site of Susa was finally deserted. (Loftus, Chaldæa and Susiana, 1857; Dieulafoy, La Perse, la Chaldée et la Susiane, 1887, L'Acropole de Suse, 1890; Billerbeck, Susa, 1893; de Morgan, Délégation en Perse, vol. ii., containing the Semitic inscriptions found at Susa, edited by Scheil, 1900).

SHUSHANCHITES (שׁוּשַׁנְכָיֵא; B Σουσυναχαῖοι, A Σουσαναχαῖοι).—The Shushanchites or inhabitants of SHUSHAN (Susa) are mentioned in Ezr 4^9 amongst the colonists settled by OSNAPPAR (Assurbanipal) in Samaria (cf. KAT^{2} 375 f., 610 f.).

SHUTHELAH (שׁוּתֶלַח; B Σουτάλα in Numbers, Σωθάλαθ in 1 Chronicles; A Θωσουσάλα and Θουσάλα in Numbers, Σωθάλα and Σωθέλε in 1 Chronicles; Vulg. Suthala; gentilic name Shuthelahites הַשֻּׁתַלְחִי; B ὁ Σουταλαεί, A ὁ Θουσαλαί).—In Nu 26^{35-37} (P^s) Shuthelah, Becher, and Tahan are given as the clans of Ephraim, and Eran as a 'son' or subdivision of Shuthelah. In the LXX Becher is omitted, Tahan becomes Tanach, and Eran (ערן) becomes Eden (ערן). The parallel passage 1 Ch 7^{20-29} has been variously altered and expanded; instead of a list of three co-ordinate clans and one subdivision, MT has a genealogy beginning with Ephraim and extending to Joshua, into which is inserted an episode concerning certain descendants of Ephraim (for which see BERIAH). Instead of Shuthelah, Becher, and Tahan as clans of Ephraim we have Shuthelah as the son, Bered the grandson, Tahath the great-grandson of Ephraim. As the genealogy proceeds the names repeat themselves. There is a second Shuthelah, and the 'and Telah' (ותלח) of v.^{25} is probably a torso of a third. Tahath occurs again in v.^{20}, and Tahan of v.^{25} is a variant of Tahath. Eleadah and Elead (v.$^{20f.}$) are variants of the same name; Zabad is a variant of 'and Bered.' Ladan (לערן) may be a variant of Elead (אלער), and also represent the 'to Eran' (לערן) of Numbers. Thus in v.^{20} 'Shuthelah . . . Eleadah,' (v.$^{20f.}$) '[Tahath] . . . Elead,' (v.^{25}) '[Shu]T[h]elah . . . Ladan,' we seem to have three versions of the same genealogy variously supplemented, all three, perhaps, ultimately based on Nu 26^{35-37}, combined with some other source, in which Ezer and Elead were subdivisions of the clan Shuthelah. Cf. GENEALOGY, VII. 4.

LXX B has for v.$^{20f.}$ 'And the sons of Ephraim: Sothalath. The sons of Laada, Noome his son, Zabed his son, the men of Gath,' etc. The omissions may be due to the carelessness of scribes, but it is also possible that the names omitted by LXX were a very late addition to MT. W. H. BENNETT.

SIBRAIM (סִבְרַיִם; B Σεβράμ, A Σεφράμ, Q Σεφραΐμ; Sabarim).—One of the points on the ideal northern boundary of the Holy Land, described by Ezekiel, was to be 'Sibraim which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath' (Ezk 47^{16}). Its site is uncertain. Von Kasteren (Buhl, 67) would identify it plausibly with Khurbet Sombariye, between Merj 'Ayyun and Hermon.

SICCUTH.—See CHIUN and REPHAN.

SICKLE stands in EV of OT for two Heb. words, the distinction between which is not apparent.—1. חֶרְמֵשׁ Dt 16^{9} 23^{25}; 2. מַגָּל (cf. Aram. magaltā, Arab. manjal) Jer 50 $(27)^{16}$, Jl 4 $(3)^{13}$ (fig. of judgment). The LXX in all these passages has δρέπανον, which is also the NT word for 'sickle' (Mk 4^{29}, Rev $14^{14.\ 15.\ 16.\ 17.\ 18\ bis.\ 19}$). See, further, art. AGRICULTURE, and fig. in vol. i. p. 50^{a}.

SICYON (Σικυών, Συκυών, or Συκιών).—This name occurs in a list of places in 1 Mac 15^{23}, to which Lucius, the consul, on behalf of the Romans, wrote (B.C. 139) to beg them to be friendly to the Jews, and to deliver up to Simon the high priest any fugitives from the Jews that had taken refuge with them. All the places mentioned in this passage were constantly visited by the trading vessels from Syria on their way to Italy. The matter of the letter is most probably authentic, though the form cannot be correct.

Sicyon is a town on the Gulf of Corinth, a few miles to the N.W. of Corinth. The name seems to mean 'cucumber-town.' The town stood originally on the shore with an acropolis above it, and this latter formed the town in the time of the Maccabees. In their time it was always to be found on the side of the Romans, and the direction of the Isthmian games was assigned by them to the inhabitants of Sicyon, though afterwards they were deprived of it. It appears to have been the centre of Roman power for that part of the world.

SIDDIM, VALE OF (עֵמֶק הַשִּׂדִּים; LXX ἡ φάραγξ (or κοιλὰς) ἡ ἁλυκή; Onk. Sam. vale of fields [i.e. הַשָּׂדִים]; on Aq. Theod. see Field. The meaning of שִׂדִּים is obscure; a connexion with Arab. sidd, 'dam,' 'mound' (Conder, Tent Work, 208), is very doubtful).—The place in which the kings of the five cities of the Kikkar joined battle with Chedorla'omer and his allies (Gn $14^{3.\ 8}$); said in v.^{10} to be full of wells of BITUMEN (which see). In v.^{3} it is identified with the Salt Sea; but this (if the entire sea is meant) is geologically impossible; for the DEAD SEA existed ages before the time of Abraham: either therefore the clause v.^{3b} is a late and incorrect gloss, or the reference (if the narrative is historical) is to the shallow S. part of the Dead Sea (from the peninsula el-Lisān S.-wards), where, in the time of Abraham, there may have been dry land. This view, already allowed by Nöldeke in 1869, has also been adopted by the two geologists who have written most recently upon the subject. Blanckenhorn, in an elaborate geological study 'On the Origin and History of the Dead Sea' (ZDPV, 1896, 1–59), says (pp. 51–53) that to the 'critical geologist' the matter is 'extremely simple': at the beginning of the post-glacial period what is now the shallow S. part of the Dead Sea was fertile soil (like the present Ghôr eṣ-Ṣâfiyeh, at its S.E. corner [see ZOAR]); but an earthquake took place, which caused a subsidence of the ground, and overthrew all the cities except Zoar; the 'Vale of Siddim' was engulphed by the S. part of the Dead Sea, and the site of the four cities became the present saline morass (6 m. broad by 10 long), es-Sebkha,* S. of the Dead Sea;† a tradition of this prehistoric event is preserved in Gn 19, where it is connected with the history of Lot. Blanckenhorn considers that this earthquake was 'tektonic,' i.e. connected with a dislocation of the earth's crust, taking place at a 'fault' (such as pass along both the E. and the W. sides of the Dead Sea).* Diener, in a criticism of his article,† while agreeing that it was an earthquake which destroyed the four cities, regards it not as 'tektonic,' but rather as a local subsidence, accompanied by an effusion of underground water, which may well have taken place in the age of Abraham (pp. 13–16, 22); as a parallel he quotes the earthquake near Lake Baikal (in Central Asia) in 1862, which broke up a large area of the adjacent alluvial soil, so that it sank, and the lake covered it. Blanckenhorn in his reply (ZDPV, 1898, H. 2, pp. 65–83) maintains (pp. 70–76) that this view is improbable, and inconsistent with the fact that all the conditions for a 'tektonic' earthquake are present in the Jordan Valley; and he supports his opinion by quotations from two high geological authorities, Süss and Hörnes. Which of these two views is the more probable, a writer who is no geologist is naturally not in a position to say; perhaps some one sufficiently conversant with the geology of the district could explain whether it might not be possible to combine them, or, in other words, to suppose that the 'tektonic' dislocation, producing the broader features of the S. end of the Dead Sea, took place at the beginning of the post-glacial period, while the local subsidence, producing the submergence of the 'Vale of Siddim' under the present lagoon, and overthrowing the four cities, may have followed long afterwards, in the days of Abraham.‡

SIDE (Σίδη; Side).—One of the towns to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favour of Simon Maccabæus and the Jews (1 Mac 15^{23}). It was colonized by Cyme, surrendered to Alexander, became the chief port of the pirates,—who used it as a market to dispose of their plunder,—and was an important town under the Roman emperors. It was closely connected with Aradus in Phœnicia, and the men of Side and Aradus fought side by side in the fleet of Antiochus the Great when it was defeated by the Rhodians off the harbour of Side. The town occupied a low triangular promontory on the coast of Pamphylia. It had two harbours, and was strongly fortified. The ruins, now known as Eski Adalia, are about 10 miles east of the Keupri Su, the river Eurymedon, and are extensive and interesting. They include the remains of a very large theatre, the city walls and their gates, temples, a nymphæum, streets with covered porticoes, etc. (Murray, Hbk. to Asia Minor, p. 173).

SIDON, SIDONIANS.—See ZIDON, ZIDONIANS.

SIGN (אוֹת, σημεῖον, signum) is used throughout the Bible of any symbol or token, but more especially of such as mark the relation of man to God and the providential care which God lavishes upon men. The rainbow was the first sign of this (Gn 9^{12}) as the token of a Divine covenant. The Jews, from the beginning of their chequered history, counted themselves God's chosen people; and circumcision was the sign of the covenant relation in which a Jew stood to the God of Abraham (Gn 17^{11}, Ro 4^{11}). Living under the direct rule of J″, they looked for signs of His power and pledges of His care at every crisis of their fortunes. Such were the plagues of Egypt (Ex 10^{2}); such was the visitation vouchsafed to Gideon (Jg 6^{17}); such were the events by which Saul was assured of his future dignity as king (1 S 10^{7}). The prophets frequently allege their forecasts of the future as signs that their message is from J″ (Is 7^{14} 38^{7}, Jer 44^{29}, Ezk 14^{8}). St. Paul's observation that 'Jews ask for signs' (1 Co 1^{22}) is abundantly illustrated by the Gospels (Mt 12^{38} 16^{1}, Lk $11^{16.\,29}$, Jn 4^{48}); they demanded of Christ credentials of His authority to speak in the name of God. It will be observed that a sign need not necessarily be miraculous (see 1 S 2^{34}, and esp. Is 8^{18} 20^{3} where the expression sign and wonder is applied to events which were only extraordinary because unexpected); the distinction between natural and supernatural phenomena was not clearly conceived by the simple piety of the Jews.* But (although John did no sign, Jn 10^{41}) a sign is closely associated with the idea of prophetical prediction and warning. That was the motive of the sign of Jonah (Mt 12^{39}). A sign was given to the shepherds (Lk 2^{12}); Simeon declared that Jesus Himself was εἰς σημεῖον ἀντιλεγόμενον (Lk 2^{34}). Christ's miraculous works are spoken of all through St. John's Gospel as His signs (Jn 3^{2} 4^{54} etc.); they are the signs of one who declares 'His almighty power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity.' So signs were wrought in His name by the apostles (Mk 16^{20}, Ac 4^{16}), by Stephen (Ac 6^{8}), and by Philip (Ac $8^{6.\,13}$); and the signs of an apostle are claimed by St. Paul (2 Co 12^{12}, cf. Ac 15^{12}). And, though we may not recognize them when they come, the end of the present dispensation shall be ushered in by signs (Mt 24^{30}, Lk 21^{25}, 2 Th 2^{9}, Rev 12^{1} 13^{13} 15^{1} 16^{14} 19^{20}). To seek a sign is not necessarily a mark of faithlessness (see Jn 6^{26}); on the contrary, faith will naturally look for such tokens of the Divine protection. It is the demand for prodigies, τέρατα, which is the mark of an ill-instructed and undisciplined mind (Jn 4^{48}). See MIRACLE, NATURE.

SIGNET.—In the early days of civilization the art of writing was practically limited to a class of professional scribes. Every one outside that class, from the king downwards, needed a signet to authenticate the documents with which he was concerned. Herodotus, i. 195, says of the Babylonians, σφρηγῖδα δὲ ἕκαστος ἔχει. An immense number of these seals have come down to us, Egypt and Assyria being the two great sources from which, directly or by imitation, the leading types have been derived. One of the earliest and most persistent forms is that of the scarab, originating in Egypt, but imitated by the Phœnicians and others. These scarabs were often made of clay or steatite, and bore the owner's name on the flat side. Another very early variety is the Assyrian and Babylonian cylinder of jasper, chalcedony, or other stone, $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch to $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and from $\frac{1}{2}$ inch to 1 in. diam., pierced longitudinally, and worn on a linen or woollen cord round the neck. Ball (Light from the East, p. 24) figures some of these, which are said to range from B.C. 4500 downwards. The name of the owner and of the deity whom he specially worshipped were engraved on them; sacred emblems and scenes are also common, such as a god slaying a lion, a tree guarded by genii. Conical signets, with the device on the broad end and the attachment at the top, have also come down to us from very early ages. Amongst what are classified as 'Hittite' gems there are several other shapes; some almost hemispherical, with hole near the top; some nearly annular; a few stone rings; tablets with a device on the lower side; lenticular gems; square or polygonal tablets, with a design on each side; seals with handles. Some very ancient Greek signets are gold rings with large bezels, on which are designs that originated in Assyria or Egypt. In the Ægean Islands and elsewhere engraved bean-shaped pebbles of various materials have been found, to which the names 'island' or 'lenticular' gems were given. The signets found in Palestine are mainly oval in form. Such of them as bear a device, in addition to a name, are either of Phœn. workmanship or imitations thereof. And the Phœnicians themselves were under the influence of Babylonian or Egyptian craftsmen. Amongst the designs may be mentioned the Phœnician palm-leaf, a border of pomegranates, a bull, a worshipper whose attire reminds us of the Egyptian priests, a winged circle. The matter on which the signet was pressed was wax or prepared clay. There is an allusion to the latter at Job 38^{14}, and excellent illustrations are to be found in the photographs of jar-sealings given by Flinders Petrie in Royal Tombs of the First Dynasty.

Judah's signet (חֹתָם, חֹתֶמֶת Gn $38^{18.\,25}$) is worn by a cord (פָּתִיל) round his neck, as the inhabitants of the Arabian towns wear their seal-rings still. He gives it as a pledge, because it was the one thing which could be proved to belong to him, and would serve to identify him. Pharaoh (Gn 41^{42}) took off his signet-ring (טַבַּעַת) from his hand and put it on Joseph's; it was the Egyptian custom to wear the signet on the finger (cf. Jer 22^{24}). Joseph was now enabled to sign decrees on behalf of the king. Jer 22^{24}, Hag 2^{23}, Sir 17^{22} 49^{11} indicate the value of the rings in question. Sir 38^{27} shows that in the 2nd cent. before Christ the seal engravers must have occupied a prominent place amongst the artisans of the day. 2 Ti 2^{19} refers either to the two inscriptions which were sometimes engraved on two sides of a seal, or to the authentication of a document by each party affixing his signature. Such passages as 2 Es 2^{38}, To 9^{5} imply that the signet was used as a mark of proprietorship. When Darius (Dn 6^{17}) seals the den with his own signet (עִזְקָא) and that of his lords, and when the Jewish authorities (Mt 27^{66}) 'made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone,' the idea was that if the impression was broken the fact could not be hidden, for the culprits would not be able to reproduce the stamp. In this connexion it should be remembered that one of Solon's laws forbade gem engravers to keep an impression of any gem they had sold, lest another should be made exactly like it (Diog. Laert. i. 57, in Middleton, Engraved Gems, p. 22). Greek and Roman letter-writers were also so much afraid of their letters being tampered with, that at the close of the epistle they often described the seal. See also RING and SEAL. J. TAYLOR.

SIHON (סִיחֹן and סִיחוֹן, cf. for the ending עֶגְלוֹן; BA Σηών, Luc. Σιών; Vulg. Sehon).—A king of the Amorites defeated by the Israelites at Jahaz after crossing the Arnon. This battle marks the commencement of the struggle for the possession of the land, and the end of the journeyings past friendly tribes with which Israel was forbidden to contend. The account of Sihon's defeat is given in Nu 21^{21-26}, and is followed by a poetical extract from an older source commemorating a defeat of Moab. The account is repeated in Dt 2^{24-37} [with the additional statement that the country was treated as חֵרֶם (see CURSE)], and in Jg 11^{18-22}. References are made to Sihon's defeat and the assignment of the land in Nu 32^{33}, Dt 1^{4} $3^{2.6}$ $4^{46.47}$ 29^{7} 31^{4}, Jos 2^{10} 9^{10} 12^{2} $13^{10.21.27}$, 1 K 4^{19}, Neh 9^{22}, Ps 135^{11} 136^{19}. 'Sihon' in Jer 48^{45} is in parallelism with 'Heshbon,' and equivalent to the city of Sihon.

* At Ex 7^{9} the LXX translates מוֹפֵת a wonder, by σημεῖον, showing that there was no very sharp distinction between σημεῖον and τέρας; cf. also Lk 23^{8}. See Trench, Miracles, pp. 1–6, for the subject of this article.

In these passages the name of Sihon occurs almost invariably in close connexion with that of Og, king of Bashan. The territories of these two kings became the inheritance of Israel on the E. of the Jordan, and were assigned to Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. According to Nu 21^{26} the Amorite king Sihon had, before the coming of Israel, taken from the Moabites the portion of their kingdom lying to the N. of the Arnon. For the criticism of this passage and of the song in Nu 21^{27-30}, and discussion of the wars of Sihon against Moab and Israel, see art. MOAB in vol. iii. p. 409 f. A. T. CHAPMAN.

SILAS (Σίλας, in Acts), SILVANUS (Σιλουανός, in Epp.).*—A prophet and leading member (ἡγούμενος) of the primitive church of Jerusalem (Ac $15^{22.32}$), who seems to have possessed the Roman citizenship† (16^{37}). He was sent as a delegate of that church to Antioch, along with Judas Barsabbas as colleague, and in company with Paul and Barnabas, in order to convey to the converted Gentiles of Syria and Cilicia a brotherly greeting, and the epistle which embodied the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem; and also to 'tell them the same things by mouth,' with any necessary explanations (Ac 15^{22-29}). Silas, as well as Judas, remained at Antioch 'for some time,' and, in the exercise of the gift of 'prophecy,' 'exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them' (15^{32}). Thereafter he returned to Jerusalem;‡ but, prior to St. Paul's Second Missionary Journey, Silas came again to Antioch, perhaps along with St. Peter, on the occasion of the latter's visit recorded in Gal 2^{11}, or at St. Paul's invitation after the rupture with Barnabas (Ac 15^{39}). St. Paul's choice of Silas as missionary colleague (15^{40}) was particularly appropriate in view of the projected tour 'through Syria and Cilicia' (15^{41}), to the Gentile Christians, for which Silas had been accredited by the church of Jerusalem (15^{23}). If Silas possessed the Roman citizenship, this may also have led, in part, to his being selected, in view of missionary 'perils from the Gentiles,' as well as from the Jews. The acceptance of St. Paul's invitation by a leading member of the church of Jerusalem, even after the apostle's ecclesiastical as well as personal difference (Gal $2^{13f.}$) with Barnabas, the trusted ambassador of that church (Ac 11^{22}), testifies to the fulness of confidence reposed at that time in St. Paul by the more liberal Jewish Christians.

In company with St. Paul, Silas journeyed not only through Syria and Cilicia, but in Lycaonia, Phrygia, Galatia, and the Troad (Ac 16^{1-8}). He crossed over with the apostle to Macedonia, shared his varied experiences at Philippi ($16^{12ff.}$),§ accompanied him to Thessalonica, and thence to Berœa, where he remained with Timotheus after St. Paul's departure for Athens (17^{14}). He rejoined St. Paul, apparently, not at Athens, as originally had been intended (17^{15}), but (owing probably to the apostle's early departure from that city) at Corinth (18^{5}).* His evangelistic service there is referred to in 2 Co 1^{19}. In the two letters, sent by St. Paul from Corinth to the Thessalonians, Silvanus is associated with him in the opening salutations. His name then disappears from the history.

That he did not leave Corinth in company with St. Paul appears to be indicated by Ac 18^{18}, and by the absence of all reference to him in the record of the remaining stages of St. Paul's Second Missionary Journey ($18^{19ff.}$). That he did not settle at Corinth, in permanent charge of the church there (as suggested by pseudo-Doroth., who calls him bishop of Corinth),† may be inferred from the omission of any greeting to him in 1 and 2 Cor., and also from the fact that both Timotheus and Titus act as deputies of St. Paul in Corinth a few years later (1 Co 4^{17}, 2 Co 8^{6} 12^{18}). Probably Silas left Corinth during St. Paul's protracted sojourn of 18 months (Ac 18^{11}). He may not have been prepared for longer absence from Jerusalem. Moreover, at Corinth, where the Jewish element in the church was weak (Ac 18^{6}), St. Paul does not seem to have felt bound to impose the decrees of the Jerusalem Council (1 Co 8). These decrees were intended, immediately at least, for the churches of Syria and Cilicia; they were 'delivered for to keep' in Lycaonia (Ac 16^{4}); but at Corinth the circumstances were different. We can readily understand, however, that the bearer of the Council's communication might deem it improper for him to take part in any deliberate disregard of the Council's compromise between liberty and restriction, and would feel constrained, without any personal quarrel, to separate from one who went beyond what Silas's own fellow-churchmen of Jerusalem would approve. The addition of Timotheus, also, to the missionary party, and the strong personal attachment of St. Paul to him, may have caused Silas to feel that he was no longer indispensable to the apostle, and may thus have loosened the tie between the two men. Beyond question, the attitude of the Jewish Christians towards St. Paul changed considerably prior to the Third Missionary Journey. It was about this time that the Judaistic counter-mission to Galatia and elsewhere originated; and the same broadened ecclesiastical policy of St. Paul, which aroused the hostility of the narrower party in Jerusalem, probably also cooled, to some extent, the cordiality previously subsisting between the apostle and the more liberal section to which Silas belonged.‡

It is highly probable, although not certain, that the Silas or Silvanus who was St. Paul's associate is the Silvanus referred to in 1 P 5^{12} as the bearer § of St. Peter's Epistle from Rome ‖ to the Christians of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The separation of Silas from St. Paul would naturally lead to the resumption of the former's intimate relations with St. Peter, between whom and Silas, as both Jewish Christians of liberal views on the whole, there would be full sympathy; and the description of St. Peter's Silvanus as 'a faithful brother' to the Christians in the above-named provinces, fits in with the experience of St. Paul's colleague, who, long before, had visited a portion, at least, of the churches now addressed by St. Peter, and would be probably known by repute to all. More than ten years had passed since Silvanus had parted from St. Paul. The apostle's last visit to Jerusalem, his charitable errand, his conciliatory attitude on that occasion, and his subsequent sufferings for the truth, had doubtless improved the relations between him and Jewish believers (Ac 21. 24^{17}). The majority of St. Paul's extant letters, moreover, had probably by this time come into circulation, and produced a favourable impression on Hebrew Christians. In 1 Peter extensive use is made of Pauline ideas and phraseology, especially those of the Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians (see vol. iii. 788). Accordingly, since at the time when 1 Peter was written St. Paul either was a prisoner at Rome, or had recently suffered martyrdom, the mission of Silvanus, as representative of both apostles, may have been part of an Apostolical eirenicon, expressly designed to undo, in Galatia and in Asia Minor as a whole, the effect of earlier rivalry and friction between the Pauline and the Jewish parties in primitive Christendom. (See vol. iii. p. 791).

* Silas may be a contraction of Silvanus (cf. Apollos from Apollonius), or the original name (perh. = שִׁלְשׁ 1 Ch 7^{35}, but see Zahn, Einl. i. 22 f.), of which Silvanus is a Latinized form. Several persons called Silas are mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XIV. iii. 2, XVIII. vi. 7; Vita, 17). The identity of Silas and the Silvanus of 1 Th 1^{1}, 2 Th 1^{1}, and 2 Co 1^{19}, is generally accepted (cf. Ac 17^{1} 18^{5}); although pseudo-Doroth. (6th cent.) in his Σύγγραμμα represents them as separate individuals; and Weizsäcker, with some hesitation (Apost. Age, i. 292 f.), suggests, without reasonable grounds, that the author of Acts has substituted Silas of Jerusalem for the Pauline Silvanus, 'in order to signalize the apostle's connexion with the primitive Church.'

† So Ew. HI vii. 361; Mey. Comm.; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 176; McGiffert, Ap. Age, 242, etc. On the other side, see Wendt (Comm.), who regards the inclusion of Silas with St. Paul in Ac $16^{37f.}$ as due to 'inaccuracy for the sake of brevity.'

‡ Ac 15^{34} is prob. an interpolation; it is not found in אAB.

§ For vindication of the credibility of Ac $16^{25\cdot34}$ (assailed on internal grounds by Weizs., Wendt, and B. Weiss) see Giesekke in SK, 1898, p. 348 ff., and Exp. Times, March 1898, p. 274 f.

* It is possible, however, that Silas (as well as Timotheus) may have come to Athens, and returned to Macedonia for some special purpose. 1 Th $3^{1f.}$ is not decisive on the point. Silas and Timotheus are probably the brethren referred to in 2 Co 11^{9} as having brought from Macedonia what supplied St. Paul's needs.

† The same designation is given to Silas in the ὑπόμνημα, or Memorial of Peter and Paul (a compilation, ascribed to the 9th cent., but embodying more ancient material; see Lipsius, Apok. Apost. ii. 9, 10). The testimony, however, of both documents is discredited by their representation of Silvanus as bishop of Thessalonica, apparently owing to 1 Th 1^{1}, 2 Th 1^{1}.

‡ This coolness is perhaps suggested by the summary manner in which St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem is referred to in Ac 18^{22} (see Farrar's Life of St. Paul, ii. p. 5); and it manifests itself, on that apostle's side, in the somewhat disparaging tone of Gal 2^{6}, written from Ephesus during St. Paul's Third Journey.

§ Possibly, but not necessarily, the amanuensis also of St. Peter (see vol. iii. p. 790, and Ewald, HI vii. 464).

‖ The Babylon of 1 P 5^{13} is usually interpreted as meaning Rome (see vol. i. 213 f., iii. 769).

The names of both Silas and Silvanus are included, as different individuals, in the list of the 'Seventy' compiled by pseudo-Dorotheos. The position of Silas as a ἡγούμενος of the church at Jerusalem renders it fairly probable that in this instance the catalogue is correct. For the conjecture that Silas is the author of Hebrews (Böhme, Mynster) there appears to be no foundation. The adoption of the name Silvanus by Constantine, the founder of the pseudo-Pauline Paulician heresy in the 7th cent., indicates a conviction that Silas remained faithful essentially to Pauline views.

Millo was possibly either the acropolis of Mount Zion or one of its towers, and Silla was, apparently, in the valley below. There is no clue to its position. SILOAM.—A place mentioned, apparently, four times in Scripture: (1) Is 8^{6} 'the waters of Shiloah' (הַשִּׁלֹחַ 'shooting forth' or 'sent forth'; B Σειλωάμ, A Σιλωάμ; Luc., Aq., Symm., Theod. Σιλωά; Vulg. Siloe). (2) Neh 3^{15} 'the pool of Siloah' (RV Shelah, הַשֶּׁלַח; BA κολυμβήθρα τῶν κωδίων:* piscina Siloe). (3) Jn 9^{7} 'the pool of Siloam' (κ. τοῦ Σιλωάμ; natatoria Siloe). (4) Lk 13^{4} 'the tower in Siloam' (ὁ πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλωάμ; turris in Siloe). The Rabbis and early Jewish travellers use the word with the article (השילוח hash-Shîlôaḥ) as in the Bible. Josephus gives the name as Σιλωά, Σιλωᾶς, and Σιλωάμ; the Greek Fathers have Σιλωάμ; and the Latin Fathers, following the Vulgate, have Siloe and Syloe; Arabic 'Ain Silwân.

Excepting the statement in Neh 3^{15} that the wall of the 'pool of the Shelaḥ' was close to the king's gardens, which were on the south side of Jerusalem, and the fair inference that the wall of the pool formed part of the fortifications of the city, the Bible gives no indication of position. Josephus, on the other hand, distinctly states (BJ v. iv. 1) that the spring (πηγή) of Siloam was at the end or mouth of the Tyropœon ravine, which separated the hill of the upper city and the lower hill. This position is indicated in other passages (BJ II. xvi. 2; v. iv. 2, vi. 1, xii. 2; VI. viii. 5), and agrees with the statements of Jerome, who writes of the fons Siloe as flowing 'in radicibus Montis Moria' (in Matt. 10), and 'ad radices Montis Zion' (in Is. 8^{6}); and also as watering the gardens of Hinnom and Tophet (in Jer. 8. 19^{6} 32^{35}). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) and all later pilgrims place Siloam near the mouth of the valley that runs through the midst of Jerusalem, and there is every reason to believe that its general position is represented by the present 'Ain Silwân and Birket Silwân.

The Birket Silwân, situated in the narrowest part of the Tyropœon ravine, is an artificial pool, which receives its supply of water, by transmission through a rock-hewn tunnel, from the 'Ain Sitti Mariam, or Fountain of the Virgin—an intermittent spring in the Valley of the Ḳidron. A little below the B. Silwân, at the very mouth of the ravine, which is here closed by a dam of masonry, there is a second and larger pool, known as the Birket el-Hamra. This pool, long filled with soil, and now an open cess-pit, received the surplus waters of Siloam before they were utilized in the irrigation of the gardens which once filled the open space below the junction of the Tyropœon with the Valley of the Ḳidron.

The Fountain of the Virgin, the only true spring at Jerusalem, is very generally identified with GIHON, and the changes made in the distribution of its waters are intimately connected with the history of Siloam.* After the capture of Jerusalem by the Hebrews, possibly during the reign of Solomon, the water of the spring was impounded in a reservoir in the Ḳidron Valley, and used for irrigating the king's gardens, which filled the valley to the south. This reservoir, the site of which is lost, is called by Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) 'Solomon's Pool.' After a time the water was carried by a rock-hewn conduit (discovered by Dr. Schick, PEFSt, 1886, p. 197 ff.; 1891, p. 13 ff.) down the west side of the Ḳidron Valley, and through the extremity of Mt. Moriah, to a pool in the Tyropœon, so that it might be more accessible to dwellers in the lower parts of the city. To this conduit, with its slight fall and gently flowing stream, Isaiah possibly referred when he compared (Is 8^{6}) 'the waters of Shiloah that go softly'—typical of the unseen working of God and of the prosperity that would follow the confidence in Jehovah which he was urging upon the people—with the turbulent waters of the mighty Euphrates overflowing their banks,—an emblem of the overwhelming violence of the great world-power, Assyria, with which the people were seeking alliance.

At a later period the winding rock-hewn tunnel which connects the Fountain of the Virgin with the Birket Silwân was made, and the water of the spring was collected in the two reservoirs in the Tyropœon Valley. The execution of this remarkable work may be ascribed with much probability to Hezekiah, who, prior to the Assyrian invasion, stopped 'the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought it straight down to (or on) the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32^{30}, cf. 2 Ch 32^{4}, Sir 48^{17}). In June 1880 a Hebrew inscription (see Literature at end) in old Semitic characters was discovered on the east side of the tunnel, about 25 ft. from its exit at Siloam. The inscription records that the tunnel was excavated from both ends, that the workmen met in the middle, and that the length was 1200 cubits.* There is no name of any king, and this, with the absence of a date, seems to indicate that the inscription was cut by one of the workmen employed, and had no official character. The form of the letters is not opposed to the view that the tunnel was made during the reign of Hezekiah. The serpentine course of the tunnel is attributed by M. Clermont-Ganneau (Les Tombeaux de David et des rois de Juda et le Tunnel-Aqueduc de Siloe, 1897) to the prior existence of the rock-hewn tombs of the kings, which he places immediately north of the great southern bend. The view that this curve is due to design, and not to accident or bad workmanship, is supported by the existence of shafts from the surface which determined its direction at two important points (PEFSt, 1882, plan, p. 123).

[*] Shelaḥ is possibly a corrupt form of the earlier Shilôaḥ, due to a change in the pronunciation, or in the spelling of the word during the period that intervened between Isaiah and Nehemiah. The meaning of shelaḥ in Hebrew is 'dart,' but in Talmudic Hebrew 'skin'; and the LXX adopted the latter interpretation. They and the earlier Rabbis appear to have regarded the pool of the Shelaḥ, or of the 'sheep-skins,' as being distinct from the pool of Siloam.

[*] The Targ. Jon., Pesh., and Arab. VSS read 'Shiloaḥ' for 'Gihon' in 1 K 1^{33}.

Excavation has shown that the present Birket Silwán has been constructed within the limits of the ancient pool of Siloam. The original pool measured 71 ft. from N. to S. and 75 ft. from E. to W., and was for the most part excavated in the rock. A flight of rock-hewn steps led down to it from the city, and it could be emptied by a sluice-gate at its southern end. After the return from the Captivity, possibly during the reign of Herod, a covered arcade, 12 ft. wide, 22½ ft. high, and roofed with large flat slabs of stone, was erected in the pool, and ran round its four sides. This was probably the condition of the pool when Christ told the blind man (Jn 9^{7}) to go and wash 'in the pool of Siloam (which is by interpretation, Sent).' †

In the 5th cent. a three-aisled church was built, with its high altar directly above the point at which the stream issued from the tunnel, and its south aisle over the northern arcade of the pool. The church was entered from the north, on which side there were an atrium, and a narthex with a flight of steps leading down to the level of the north aisle. It appears to have been the work of the empress Eudocia, who is said to have included the pool of Siloam within the city wall. In the reign of Justinian the basilica was converted into a domed church,‡ which is noticed by Antoninus Martyr (c. 570), the only pilgrim who mentions a church at Siloam.§ The church must afterwards have been destroyed, probably during the Persian invasion (614), for it is not again mentioned (Bliss, Excavations at Jerusalem, pp. 132–210; Guthe, 'Ausgrabungen bei Jerusalem,' in ZDPV v. p. 52 ff.).

The larger pool, Birket el-Hamra,‖ has not been completely examined, but excavation has shown that it is partially cut in the rock, and that the dam of masonry at its lower end, which has a thickness of 20 to 8 ft., and is strengthened by buttresses, is at one point 44 ft. high. The construction of the dam, and the manner in which its masonry is bonded into the rock at either end, shows that, like the dam of the Birket Israil, it formed part of the defences of the city (Bliss, l.c.). The pool is probably the work of Hezekiah, and referred to (Is 22^{11}) as the mikveh, or 'ditch (RV reservoir) between the two walls for the waters of the old pool.' The dam is apparently the wall of the 'pool (bĕrēkhah) of the Shelaḥ' repaired by Shallun (Neh 3^{15}). This pool is mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim, by Antoninus Martyr, and other pilgrims, and, in the Middle Ages, it was frequently called Natatoria Siloe, to distinguish it from the upper pool of Siloam. The tunnel and the pools are possibly referred to in 2 Ch 32^{4}, Is 22^{9}, and Sir 48^{17}.

The water of Siloam is described by Josephus as being sweet and abundant (BJ v. iv. 1); and by the Rabbis, who attributed digestive properties to it, as being clear and sweet. On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, water from the spring was poured upon the altar (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 145 f.). In 985 Mukaddasi, a native of Jerusalem, calls the water 'fairly good'; but the author of the Marasid (c. 1300) says that it was then no longer sweet. Writers of the 15th and 16th cents. call it brackish but wholesome. As the spring depends upon the annual rainfall for its supply, the water, which percolates through vast accumulations of refuse, must to a certain extent be impure, but it is still used for drinking purposes by the villagers of Silwán and by the poor of Jerusalem. In consequence of the miracle wrought on the blind man, the water and pool are held in much honour by Jews, Christians, and Moslems. Healing properties, especially in the case of eye diseases, have been attributed to the water from the early days of Christianity, and numerous legends have gathered round it. Christians believed that it came from Shiloh or from Mt. Zion; Moslems, that on the night of 'Arafat it came underground from the holy well, Zemzem, at Mecca. A small perennial stream flows from the Fountain of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam, and its volume is increased, at uncertain times, by a sudden rush of water from the spring. The Bordeaux Pilgrim, Jerome (in Is. 8^{6}), and most of the pilgrims, write of the increased flow as periodic; but in reality it varies greatly, and is dependent upon the rainfall and the season. During a wet winter the stream swells two or three times a day, whilst in summer the rise takes place only once in two or three days. All knowledge of the tunnel through which the stream runs was lost for several centuries, and it was first rediscovered in the 13th cent. It may perhaps even be inferred from the silence of Josephus that the Fountain of the Virgin was unknown to him, and that it was first opened, after its closure by Hezekiah, some centuries later.

After the capture of Jerusalem by the Arabs a village sprang up in the valley below the pool. In 1047 Nasir-i-Khusrau found an endowed hospital, with salaried physicians, and many buildings, erected for charitable purposes, near the spring. Early in the 12th cent. there was a small monastery at Siloam, but about 1300 the buildings were in ruins, and the irrigated gardens, which had been bequeathed by one of the Khalifs to the poor of Jerusalem, had disappeared. By the middle of the 17th cent. the pools were filled with rubbish, and the tradition, which had lingered into the 16th cent., that a church dedicated to the Salvator illuminator had once stood above the mouth of the tunnel, was lost. The village of Siloam, Kefr Silwán, on the left bank of the Kidron Valley, at the foot of the Mount of Olives, is of comparatively recent growth. Christian anchorites, and afterwards Moslems, are alluded to as living in the caves; but Quaresmius, in the 17th cent., is the first to distinctly mention the village by its present name (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems; Tobler, Die Siloahquelle und der Oelberg; P.P. Text Society translations).

The 'tower in Siloam' (Lk 13^{4}), of which nothing further is known, may have been one of the towers in the city wall near the pool.

SILVER (כֶּסֶף [Aram. כְּסַף], ἄργυρος, ἀργύριον) comes next to gold in the list of precious metals. Its value arises partly from its comparative rarity, and partly from its properties of resistance to corrosion, brilliant white lustre, malleability, ductility, and the like, which make it a specially suitable material for artistic workmanship. The knowledge and use of silver in classical and Bible lands go back to prehistoric times. This metal appears in Homer as put to a great variety of purposes. Vessels and ornaments made of it were found by Schliemann at Mycenæ. Silver is equally in evidence among the remains of the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hittites. It is repeatedly mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets.

* Conder, in his very complete description of the tunnel (PEFSt, 1882, p. 122 ff.), gives its length as 1706·8 ft., or, approximately, 1200 cubits of 17 in., and states that the point of junction was 944 ft. from the Siloam end. See also PEF Mem. 'Jerusalem,' p. 345.

† On the play upon the meaning of the word, and on the parallelism between 'the sent one' and 'the sent water,' see Basil on Is 8.

‡ The position of the church with regard to the pool is not unlike that of St. Mary in probatica, in the Pool of Bethesda near the Church of St. Anne.

§ The church is also mentioned in the life of St. Peter the Iberian (409–488).

‖ This name is derived from the hard red cement full of pounded pottery which is used for lining cisterns, and is locally called hamra.

Silver is rarely found in the native state, and has almost always to be extracted from some form of ore. The principal Asiatic source of it in ancient times was in the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan. Homer (Il. ii. 857) refers to the special excellence of the silver brought from Alybê in Pontus. The mines of these regions have been wrought by the Turkish Government in modern times. In Europe the silver mines of Laurium in Attica were of considerable importance, and proved a rich source of wealth to Athens. There were also mines in Thrace and Epirus. But the most abundant supplies of silver were obtained from Spain. The workings there were at first in the hands of the Carthaginians, and it was when the Romans obtained possession of them that silver first became plentiful in Italy, though it had previously been used in art by the Etruscans, who may have derived their supply of the metal from Gaul or from the Phœnicians.

Silver was obtained from its compounds by smelting along with other metallic ores, of which that of lead was essential to the process. At a high temperature the lead combined with the impurities in the silver to form a heavy 'slag,' which separated by its weight from the molten silver, leaving the latter pure.

The relative values of gold and silver varied in ancient times. As long as the supply was restricted to Asiatic sources, silver was scarcer than it afterwards became. There are indications of a struggle for supremacy between the two metals at first, and even of a preference for silver to gold in some places. In Egypt silver is always mentioned before gold in the inscriptions, and silver objects are rarer than golden ones in the tombs. From a fragment of Agatharcides it appears that in ancient Arabia silver was reckoned 10 times more valuable than gold. The laws of Menes in Egypt fixed the value of gold as 2½ times that of silver. Herodotus (iii. 95) makes gold equal in value to 13 times its weight of silver. The Egyptian ásem (Gr. ἤλεκτρον [or -ος], Lat. electrum) was a highly prized alloy of gold and silver.

Silver was an early form of currency, and at first was reckoned by weight (see MONEY, vol. iii. p. 418 ff.), coinage being unknown among the Hebrews before the Exile. Hence in OT כֶּסֶף is frequently tr. ἀργύριον by LXX, and 'money' in EV. It is also occasionally rendered 'price,' and once (Is 7^{23}) 'silverlings.' Similarly in Apocr. and NT ἀργύριον is often tr. 'money.' 'Piece of silver' stands in one passage (Lk 15^{8}) for δραχμή.

The mention of silver in Scripture as a medium of exchange goes back to the time of Abraham (Gn $23^{15.16}$). Silver is an item constantly enumerated in accounts of wealth, spoil, and tribute. The wealth of Solomon is indicated by his making silver as plentiful as stone in Jerusalem (1 K 10^{27}, Sir 47^{18}), and that of the restored Jerusalem is described in the promise, 'for iron I will bring silver' (Is 60^{17}). So Tyre (Zec 9^{3}) and the wicked man (Job 27^{16}) are said to 'heap up silver as dust.' Idols were made of silver or plated with it. It was the material of various parts of the Tabernacle (sockets, fillets, hooks, etc.), of the trumpets of the priests, and of many of the sacred vessels of the temple. Vessels of silver were a form of votive offering (Nu 7 passim), and were part of the furniture of wealthy private houses (2 Ti 2^{20}). Joseph's divining cup was of silver (Gn $44^{2\text{ff.}}$). This metal was used for chains (Is 40^{19}) and ornaments ('jewels,' Gn 24^{53}; 'pictures,' Pr 25^{11}). Silver 'shrines,' or models of the temple of Diana, were largely made and sold at Ephesus (Ac 19^{24}). Silver mines are referred to in Job 28^{1}, and the process of refining is alluded to in Pr 17^{3} 27^{21} 25^{4}, Zec 13^{9}, Mal 3^{3} etc. It is described with special fulness in Jer 6^{28-30} (where it is represented as fruitless) and in Ezk 22^{17-22}. In both of these passages special emphasis is laid on the presence of lead among the other metallic ores. These other metals and the impurities combined with them are the 'dross' of silver. 2 Ch 9^{14} tells how Solomon obtained silver from Arabia. Tarshish is named as the source of the metal in 2 Ch 9^{21}, Jer 10^{9}, Ezk 27^{12}, the second of these passages referring specially to the silver being 'spread into plates.' In 1 Mac 8^{3} the acquisition of the Spanish mines by the Romans is mentioned. Silversmiths are mentioned in Wis 15^{9} (ἀργυροχόος) and Ac 19^{24} (ἀργυροκόπος). There was a guild of this craft at Ephesus, of which in St. Paul's day Demetrius was a leading member. In LXX ἀργυροκόπος is the tr. of צוֹרֵף ('founder,' Jg 17^{4}) and of צָרוֹף (AV 'founder,' RV [as inf. abs.] 'refine,' Jer 6^{29}, where also צֹרֵף = ἀργυροκοπεῖν). 'Silver plate' is the equivalent of ἀργύρωμα in Jth 12^{1} 15^{11}, 1 Mac 15^{32}. The plumage of doves in sunlight is described in Ps 68^{13} as 'wings covered with silver.' Wisdom and instruction are frequently compared for preciousness to pure silver, as are also the words of God (Ps 12^{6}). The refining of silver is a figure for the discipline of the righteous (Ps 66^{10}, cf. also Is 48^{10}). Silver turned to dross is a metaphor for moral deterioration (Is 1^{22}, Jer 6^{30}).

SIMEON (שִׁמְעוֹן; LXX and NT Συμεών, whence RV form usually employed in NT, Symeon).—A common name amongst the Jews, esp. in its later (Greek) form Simon (see art. PETER (SIMON), ad init.). The Heb. name is used of—1. The second son of Jacob and Leah, Gn 29^{33}. The etymology, or at all events the original signification of the name, is unknown. J, in Gn 29^{31-35}, characteristically derives it from שָׁמַע (='hear'), and reports that 'Leah said, Because the LORD hath heard (shāma') that I am hated, he hath therefore given me this son also, and she called his name Simeon (Shim'ôn).' Only two incidents in the history of Simeon are related in the Book of Genesis. In conjunction with his brother Levi he is said to have massacred the Shechemites in revenge for the dishonour of his sister Dinah (Gn 34). The details of the story are obscure, and are drawn from several sources, whose standpoint is not always the same. The real significance of this narrative we shall seek to appreciate in art. SIMEON (TRIBE). The other occasion upon which Simeon is mentioned is when Joseph determined to detain one of his brothers in Egypt as security that they would return with Benjamin (Gn 42^{24}). From the circumstance that Simeon is selected for this purpose, it has been supposed that the narrator means to insinuate that he had been the chief actor in the tragedy that led to Joseph's servitude in Egypt. The truculent character of Simeon, as vouched for by the massacre at Shechem, might also be supposed to furnish the justification for his severe treatment; but it is questionable whether the narrator (E) of his detention in Egypt had any such reference in his mind, seeing that among the sources of Gn 34 E has no place, and consequently he may have been ignorant of that story. It is more probable that in Gn 42^{24} Simeon the second son of Jacob is detained as a hostage rather than Reuben the firstborn, because the latter, according to E (Gn 37^{22}), had acted a more friendly part than the rest of Joseph's brethren, and had sought to deliver him out of their hands.

The rape of Dinah and the massacre of the Shechemites were commemorated in verse by the Jewish or Samaritan poet Theodotus (c. 200 B.C.). It is instructive to compare the judgment passed upon the act of the two brothers in Gn 49 (cf. 34^{30}) with what we find in some of the literary productions of post-exilian Judaism. Words of disapproval and severe censure give place in the latter to hearty approval and warm eulogy. The contrast is strikingly displayed in the Book of Judith, whose heroine belongs to the tribe of Simeon, and whose estimate of the character and conduct of her progenitor is as different from that ascribed to Jacob in Genesis as her language is offensive to good taste (Jth 9$^{2\text{f.}}$; cf. Book of Jubilees, ch. 30).

2. The great-grandfather of Judas Maccabæus, 1 Mac 2^{1}. 3. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{30}. 4. The 'righteous and devout' (δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής) man who took the infant Jesus in his arms and blessed Him, on the occasion of the presentation in the temple (Lk 2$^{25\text{ff.}}$). The notion that this Simeon is to be identified with a Rabbi who was the son of Hillel and the father of Gamaliel I. is as precarious as the apocryphal legends about his two sons Charinus and Leucius; see NICODEMUS (GOSPEL OF). The very existence of a Rabbi Simon ben Hillel is doubtful (see Schürer, HJP II. i. 363), and in any case he was not, as late legends assert, president of the Sanhedrin, an office which in the time of Christ was always held by the high priest (see SANHEDRIN, p. 401). If the Simeon of St. Luke had been Hillel's son, is it conceivable that he would have been introduced simply as 'a man in Jerusalem whose name was Simeon'? 5. A prophet and teacher at Antioch, whose surname was NIGER (Ac 13^{1}). 6. Ac 15^{14}, 2 P 1^{1} (RVm). See PETER (SIMON), vol. iii. p. 756.

J. A. SELBIE.

SIMEON (TRIBE).—The history of this tribe, which theoretically traced its descent to the second son of Jacob and Leah, is involved in considerable obscurity. From the fact that Shaul, the eponymous head of one of its families, is called 'the son of the Canaanitish woman' (Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}), we may infer that it contained a considerable admixture of non-Israelitish elements. From Jg 1$^{3.\ 17}$ we learn that, at the beginning of the conquest of Canaan, Simeon joined his forces with those of Judah. It was probably not long thereafter that Simeon and Levi together sought to gain a settlement in Mount Ephraim, which was then occupied by the Canaanites. Such at least is a plausible interpretation of the tradition which underlies the narrative of Gn 34. Upon any theory it is difficult to disentangle the details of that story, for the chapter in question is, in its present form, not homogeneous, and the different narratives date from different periods, and are inspired by different motives (cf. artt. HAMOR, and JACOB in vol. ii. p. 530 f.). None of these narratives is at all suitable to pre-Mosaic times, and there is much plausibility in the theory of Wellhausen, that we have here a reminiscence of an attempt on the part of Dinah bat-Leah (a branch of Simeon) and the other Simeonites, in conjunction with Levi, to possess themselves of the town of Shechem by treacherously taking advantage of the friendly relations that had hitherto subsisted between them and the Canaanites.

Whatever degree of success may have attended the enterprise at first, its ultimate consequences were most disastrous, for the Canaanites of the surrounding districts appear to have attacked and practically annihilated the invaders (cf. Moore, Judges, 240). This explains the insignificance or the entire absence of Simeon in the subsequent history of Israel. The shattered remnants of this tribe, which had begun its warlike activity in alliance with Judah, now fell back upon the latter for protection and a share of the land (Jos 19^{9}).

In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), in which the tribes of Israel are praised or blamed according to the part they had played in the struggle, both Judah and Simeon are passed over—Judah probably because at this period it pursued its own aims in complete separation from the northern tribes (cf. Gn 38), Simeon because it was practically part of Judah.

The absence of Simeon in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33) has been felt to be more surprising, and various explanations have been offered, or attempts made to supply the omission. A and some other MSS of the LXX, indeed, insert Simeon in v.^{6b} 'Let Reuben live and not die, and let Simeon be many in number' (Συμεὼν ἔστω πολὺς ἐν ἀριθμῷ). This, however, may be simply a deliberate correction of the text, devoid of any support from Heb. MSS. Other solutions of the difficulty have been proposed by Kohler (Der Segen Jacob's, 5) and Graetz (Gesch. d. Juden, II. i. 486 f.) which have been accepted with modifications by Heilprin (Hist. Poetry of the Hebrews, i. 113 ff.) and Bacon (Triple Tradition of the Exodus, 270 f.). Founding upon the unnatural shortness of the blessing of Judah, and the character of Levi's blessing, which seems too warlike for a non-secular tribe, Kohler conjectures that v.^{7} has fallen out of its place and should follow v.^{10}, so that vv.$^{7.\ 11}$ would form the blessing of Judah. Graetz boldly substitutes 'Simeon' for 'Judah' in v.^{7}, a method of procedure which is approved by Heilprin and Bacon as far as v.^{7a} is concerned, while at the same time they change the order of the verses as Kohler proposed. We thus obtain (v.^{7a}) as the blessing of Simeon, 'Hear, O Jehovah, the voice of Simeon, and bring him to his people' (the latter prayer perhaps referring to the Simeonites who, according to 1 Ch 4$^{42\text{f.}}$, found a settlement in Mt. Seir). The blessing of Judah would then be contained in v.^{7b} 'Judah with his hands contends,' etc., and v.^{11} 'Bless, Lord, his substance,' etc.—But, however plausible these explanations may be, there will probably be little hesitation in assenting to the judgment of Dillmann (approved by Driver), that the corrections of the text which they involve are 'too violent' to be probable. The death-blow which Simeon received so early in his career is quite sufficient to account for the non-mention of him in Dt 33, even if we ascribe a considerable antiquity to that chapter.

The early decadence of this tribe is implied also in the priestly narrative of the Hexateuch, for while at the first census (Nu 1^{23}) Simeon counted 59,300, at the second (26^{14}) it had fallen to 22,200. Knowing the methods and the motives of the Chronicler, we can of course attach no importance to his introducing the tribe of Simeon as numerous in the time of David (1 Ch 12^{25}), especially when we observe that elsewhere even he is compelled to acknowledge its feebleness (1 Ch 4^{27}).

The question has been needlessly raised, To which of the two divisions did the tribe of Simeon attach itself at the disruption of the kingdom? The truth is that long before that event this tribe had ceased to have any independent existence, having been practically absorbed by Judah. The Chronicler, indeed, perhaps in order to make up the number ten, appears to reckon Simeon as belonging to the N. kingdom (2 Ch 15^{9} 34^{6}; cf. Ezk 48$^{24.\ 25.\ 33}$, Rev 7^{7}). There is probably more foundation for the tradition which he has preserved of conquests made by Simeonites in the time of Hezekiah (1 Ch 4$^{28-43}$).

The list of the sons of Simeon is given in Gn 46^{10} and Ex 6^{15}. A different list appears in 1 Ch 4$^{24\text{f.}}$, which is practically identical with another in Nu 26$^{12-14}$. Simeon's towns are named in Jos 19$^{2-6}$ and (with the exception of some deviations due probably to copyists' errors) in 1 Ch 4$^{28\text{f.}}$. All these towns are in Jos 15$^{26-32.\ 42}$ reckoned to Judah, and to the same tribe are elsewhere reckoned such of them as Ziklag (1 S 27^{6}), Hormah (1 S 30^{30}), and Beersheba (1 K 19^{3}). This is in perfect harmony with the conclusion already reached, that Simeon was absorbed by Judah; and this same conclusion is strengthened by the circumstance that after the return from the Exile there is no mention of Simeonites, but only of Judahites as dwelling in any of the above cities (Neh $11^{26f.}$).

In addition to what is contained in the OT, the Pal.-Jewish literature supplies a multitude of details regarding the tribe of Simeon and its eponymous head (cf. especially Test. of Twelve Patr. and Bk. of Jubilees). These stories are too manifestly apocryphal to merit serious consideration; and the basis is not more substantial upon which Dozy (de Israëlieten te Mekka) builds his theory that the sanctuary at Mecca was founded by Simeonites in the time of David. In his important monograph, der Stamm Simeon (Meissen, 1866), Graf not only rejects this opinion as wholly devoid of historical support, but subjects to a searching examination the attempt of Movers and Hitzig to discover other OT allusions besides those of the Chronicler to Simeonite conquests and settlements outside Palestine. The words of Mic 1^{15} 'The glory of Israel shall come even unto Adullam' have been, strangely enough, connected with the history in 1 Ch 4^{34-43}. The exegesis by which this result is reached is exceedingly strained, and the interpretation also involves, what was not the case, that Simeon belonged to the N. kingdom. Equally unsuccessful is the attempt to prove that it is the Simeonites of Mt. Seir who put the question in Is 21^{11} ('Watchman, what of the night?'). The title of the oracle, 'Burden of Dumah,' has been sought to be connected with the Dumah of Gn 25^{14}, mentioned as a family of the Ishmaelites side by side with Mibsam and Mishma, which last are in 1 Ch 4^{25} the names of Simeonite families. The latter circumstance may legitimately be urged in favour of the probability of large admixtures of Ishmaelite as well as Can. elements in the tribe of Simeon. But none of the localities known to us by the name Dumah will suit the topographical necessities of Is $21^{11f.}$, and it is far more probable that דומה is a textual error for אדום (Cheyne in SBOT; Marti, Jes. ad loc.), or that Dumah ('silence') is in this instance a symbolical designation of Edom (Del., Dillm., and many others).

Side by side with Dumah we find in Gn 25^{14} Massa, to which Hitzig finds a reference in Pr 30^{1} 31^{1}. By an emendation of the text he makes the former read, 'Words of Agur, the son of the queen of Massa,' while the latter is rendered 'Words of (to) Lemuel, king of Massa, which his mother taught him.' Hitzig endeavours to connect Massa with the Simeonite settlement in Mt. Seir; but the very most that the evidence entitles us to infer is that there may have been an Ishmaelite kingdom of Massa, and that its queen, like the queen of Sheba, may have had a traditional reputation for wisdom. That this kingdom, however, had any connexion with the Simeonites of 1 Ch 4^{42} is not proved, and is on many grounds unlikely.

SIMILITUDE, as used in AV, usually means 'image' or 'likeness.' Cf. Gn 1^{26} Tind. 'Let us make man in our symilitude and after oure lycknesse,' and Ezk 8^{3} Cov. (where the Heb. is תַּבְנִית), 'The symilitude stretched out an honde, and toke me by the hayrie lockes off my heade.' The words so tr^{d} are (1) תַּבְנִית (Ps 106^{20} 144^{12}), for which see under Pattern; (2) תְּמוּנָה (Nu 12^{8}, Dt $4^{12.15.16}$), for which see under Image; and (3) דְּמוּת (2 Ch 4^{3}, Dn 10^{16}), which is usually tr^{d} 'likeness.' The last is the only word tr^{d} 'similitude' in RV. The words tr^{d} 'similitude' in NT are: ὁμοίωμα (Ro 5^{14}), ὁμοίωσις (Ja 3^{9}),* and ὁμοιότης (He 7^{15}); in each case RV substitutes 'likeness.' See under Pattern.

But 'similitude' occurs once in the sense of illustration, parable, proverb: Hos 12^{10} 'I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes' (אֲדַמֶּה, from דָּמָה [the root of דְּמוּת] 'to be like,' Piel 'to liken'). Cf. Mt 13^{3} Tind. 'And he spake many thynges to them in similitudes'; He 9^{9} Tind. 'Which was a similitude for the tyme then present'; and Lk 4^{23} Rhem. 'Certes, you wil say to me this similitude, Physicion, cure theyself.'

SIMON (Σίμων), one of the commonest names amongst the Jews, is a later (Greek) form of Simeon (cf. Ac 15^{14}, where St. James, in referring to St. Peter, uses the archaic form of his name). This form is naturally confined to the Apocr. and NT.

i. In the Apocrypha.—The name belongs to—1. Simon I., the high priest who succeeded Onias I. during the Ptolemaic domination (c. 300 B.C.). According to Josephus (Ant. XII. ii. 5) he obtained the surname of 'the Just' (ὁ δίκαιος), a designation intended, probably, to emphasize his strict legalism in opposition to the Hellenizing tendency of the majority of the high priests of the Greek period. In Pirḳe Aboth (i. 2) he is said to have been one of the last of the Great Synagogue, and the saying is attributed to him: 'On three things the world is stayed, on the Torah, on the Worship [cf. ἡ λατρεία in Ro 9^{4}], and on the bestowal of Kindnesses' (Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers^{2}, p. 12). It is very doubtful, however, whether Josephus is right in identifying Simon I. with Simon the Just. Herzfeld (ii. 189 ff., 377 f.) and others claim the title for—2. Simon II. (Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 10), the successor of Onias II. (c. 220 B.C.). The same doubt exists as to the subject of the panegyric contained in Sir $50^{1ff.}$. He is designated simply 'Simon the son of Onias the high priest,' a title applicable either to Simon I. or to Simon II. The graphic description, however, contained in this passage leaves the impression on one's mind that Ben Sira (c. 180 B.C.) is speaking of an elder contemporary (Simon II.) of his own rather than of a high priest who had died a century before (Cheyne, Job and Solomon, 180; see, further, Kuenen, Gesam. Abhandl. 153 f.; Schürer, GJV^{3} ii. 355 f. [HJP II. i. 355 f.]; Graetz, 'Simon der Gerechte und seine Zeit,' in Monatsschrift, 1857, pp. 45–56). 3. A temple official who, out of ill-will to the high priest Onias III., suggested to Seleucus IV. the plundering of the temple treasury, 2 Mac 3^{4}. See Heliodorus. 4. Simon the Maccabee.—See Maccabees, vol. iii. p. 185. 5. 1 Es 9^{32}. See Chosameus.

ii. In the NT.—1. The Apostle Peter.—See Peter (Simon). 2. See Simon Magus. 3. Another of the apostles, Simon the Cananæan (which see). 4. A brother of Jesus (Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}). It is very doubtful whether he should be identified with the Symeon who is said to have succeeded James 'the Lord's brother' as bishop of Jerusalem (Euseb. HE iii. 11, iv. 22), and to have suffered martyrdom under Trajan (ib. iii. 32). Hegesippus, whom Euseb. professes to quote, describes this Symeon as son of Clopas, and calls him ἀνεψιός of the Lord, while James and Jude are spoken of as the Lord's ἀδελφοί. See art. Brethren of the Lord, vol. i. pp. 320^{a}, 321^{b}. 5. Simon 'the leper,' in whose house a woman anointed Jesus, Mt 26^{6}, Mk 14^{3}. The question of the identity of our Lord's host and the cognate questions connected with the incident of the anointing are exhaustively discussed in art. Mary, vol. iii. p. 279 ff. 6. A Pharisee who invited Jesus to eat with him, Lk $7^{36ff.}$. On this occasion we read that a woman that was 'a sinner' (ἁμαρτωλός) anointed Jesus' feet. For the relation of this incident to the narratives of Mt 26, Mk 14, and Jn 12, see, again, art. Mary as just cited, and cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, 250 ff. 7. The father (?) of Judas Iscariot. In all the passages (Jn 6^{71} $13^{2.26}$) where this Simon is named, the Greek text (Ἰούδας Σίμωνος, 'Judas of Simon') leaves it uncertain what was his relationship to the traitor, but the EV 'Judas the son of Simon' is probably correct. It is very precarious to identify Simon Iscariot (Jn 6^{71} 13^{26}) with Simon the Cananæan. 8. A Cyrenian, who was compelled by the Roman soldiers to bear the cross of Jesus (Mt 27^{32}, Mk 15^{21}, Lk 23^{26}). He is described by St. Mark as the father of Alexander and Rufus, names evidently well known in the early Christian Church. The story in the Gospels was perverted by some of the Docetic sects, the Basilidians going the length of maintaining that Simon not only bore the cross, but was actually crucified in mistake for Jesus. 9. The tanner, with whom St. Peter lodged at Joppa (Ac 9^{43} $10^{6.17.32}$).

SIMON MAGUS.—The name usually given for the sake of distinction to that Simon who is mentioned in only one place in the NT, but to whom, both in Patristic literature and in modern criticism, the part assigned is very considerable. There are some features in the story of the NT which excite our curiosity; the early Fathers have detailed accounts of his false teaching, and give him the doubtful honour of being the first of the heresiarchs, the source and spring of all later heresy; early Christian romance writers embellished his history with many wonderful details, and made him the antagonist of Simon Peter, both in verbal disputations and in the exhibition of magical arts; while a school of modern critics has found in his career and the stories concerning him the chief support for a far-reaching reconstruction of our conceptions of early Christianity. In order to obtain a sound basis for our investigations, it will be useful after examining the account in the NT to go carefully through the Patristic evidence in chronological order, and after that consider the fuller narratives of uncertain date contained in the Clementine literature and Apocryphal Acts. We shall thus be in a better position to estimate the force and value of modern criticism, and be able to offer a probable explanation of the various difficulties that the problem presents.

i. Simon in the NT.—In Ac 8^{5-24}, where the preaching of Philip in Samaria is described, we are told that 'there was a certain man called Simon, which beforetime in the city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one' (λέγων εἶναί τινα ἑαυτὸν μέγαν). All the people followed him, and described him as 'that power of God which is called great' (οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη). When the rest of the city was converted, Simon also believed and was baptized, and continued with Philip, amazed at his miracles. When Peter and John came down, they laid hands on the converts, who received the Holy Ghost. Simon then offered Peter money, saying, 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost.' Peter sternly rebuked him. 'Thy money perish with thee . . . thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter . . . thou art in the gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity.' Simon entreated him to pray the Lord that none of those things might come upon him.

It will be more convenient to postpone comments on this passage until we have collected further information on the subject.

ii. Patristic Evidence.—The earliest information outside the NT comes from Justin Martyr, c. 150 (Apol. i. 26, 56 [cf. Eus. HE ii. 13. 14]; Dial. 120). He tells us that Simon was a Samaritan, of the village of Gitta; he came to Rome in the time of Claudius Cæsar; by the power of the demons he worked miracles, and was honoured in Rome as a god, so that a statue was erected in his honour by order of the Senate and people, between the two bridges, bearing the inscription SIMONI DEO SANCTO. Almost all the Samaritans and a few of other nations honour him as the first god (πρῶτος θεός). He took about with him a woman called Helena, who had formerly been a prostitute, and whom he is said to have called the first conception (πρώτη ἔννοια) which came forth from him. He is described as God above 'all rule and authority and power.' We also gather that Justin looked upon him as the originator of heresy and the source whence all later heresies were derived.

As regards one part of this story an interesting discovery has been made. In the year 1574 there was dug up in the place indicated by Justin, namely, in the island of the Tiber, a marble fragment, apparently the base of a statue, with the inscription SEMONI SANCO DEO FIDIO. It is now generally agreed that Justin mistook a statue dedicated to a Sabine deity for one dedicated to Simon (Gruter, Insc. Ant. i. p. 95, n. 5), although whether the mistake was his own or was earlier than himself we cannot say. But nothing in this mistake need invalidate his testimony about Simon in Samaria. Justin himself was a Samaritan; he draws attention at least once (Dial. 120; cf. Apol. ii. 15) to the fact that he had spoken the truth to his own disadvantage. On the subject of the sect which called itself after the name of Simon he must be taken as first-hand evidence. And there are strong grounds for thinking that we have a fuller account which emanates from him. Accounts of Simon Magus are contained in the following heresiological works: Irenæus (i. xvi.), pseudo-Tertullian (i.), Hippolytus (Refutatio, vi.), Philaster (29), Epiphanius (Panarion, 21). Of these, that in Hippolytus' Refutatio consists of two parts; that from § 7 to § 18, containing extracts from a work called ἡ μεγάλη ἀπόφασις, 'the Great Revelation,' presents a different system from that found elsewhere, and will be noticed further on; that in § 19 and § 20 is derived from the same source from which the greater part of the matter in all the other heresiologists comes. It is now generally agreed, and probably on good grounds, that this common source was a treatise (σύνταγμα) on heresies written by Justin and referred to by himself (Apol. i. 26). The following is the account put together from these different sources:—

Simon was said to have taught that he was the highest God, the most elevated virtue (τὴν ὑπὲρ πάντα δύναμιν). He carried about with him Helena, who he said was the first conception of his mind, the mother of all, by whom he conceived in his mind to create the angels and archangels. She was also called Wisdom (σοφία), according to pseudo-Tertullian, and Holy Spirit and Prunicus (προύνικος), according to Epiphanius. She, knowing her father's wish, leapt forth from him and created the angels and powers by whom this world and man were created. She was unable to return to her father because of the envy and desire of those whom she had created, and suffered contumely, and was compelled to assume human form. She passed through the centuries, as it were, from one vessel to another, transmigrating from one female form to another. She was the Helen about whom the Trojan war was fought; the wooden horse representing the ignorance of the nations. After that she passed from form to form, and lastly became a prostitute in a brothel at Tyre: she was the lost sheep. But since the rulers of the world ruled it ill, and in order to redeem her, the Supreme Power descended to the lower world. He passed through the regions ruled by the principalities and powers, in each region making himself like to those in it, and so among men he appeared as a man. He appeared among the Jews as the Son, in Samaria as the Father, in other nations as the Holy Spirit. In Judæa he had seemed to suffer, but had not. He allowed himself to be called by whatsoever names men liked. He thus succeeded in saving Helena, as she expected. He brought man to a knowledge of himself, and liberated the world and those who were his from the rule of those who had made the world. The Jewish prophecies, he said, were inspired by the angels who made the world. Therefore those who had hope in him and Helena need no longer care for them, but might freely do as they would, for men were saved according to his grace and not according to good works. There was no real difference between good and bad, they were merely accidental distinctions made by the creators of the world. The morality of the sect was, we are told, in accordance with these principles. Their priests (mystici sacerdotes) lived lascivious lives, used magic and incantations, made philtres, had familiar spirits, and had images of Simon and Helena made in the form of Zeus and Athena.

Hegesippus (c. 180), in a corrupt passage quoted by Eus. iv. 22, speaks of Simon, from whom came the Simonians; Cleobius, whence the Cleobians; and Dositheus, whence the Dositheans; and Gorthæus, whence the Gortheni; and Masbotheus, whence the Masbotheans—from these, he says, came the followers of Menander; and he then enumerates the later heretics. It would be interesting to know if this heretical genealogy is independent of Justin.

Tertullian (c. 200) does not seem to have any original information. He knows the story about the statue (Apol. 13). He gives a long account of Simon's system, derived apparently from Irenæus (de Anima, 34). He says that even in his own day the presumption of the sect of Simon is so great that they even presume to raise the souls of the prophets from the lower regions (Ecce hodie eiusdem Simonis hæreticos tanta presumptio artis extollit, ut etiam prophetarum animas ab inferis movere se spondeant).

Clement of Alexandria (c. 200) gives us little information about Simon. There is a chronological remark in Strom. vii. 17 which is quite inexplicable, and in Strom. ii. 11 he tells us that the followers of Simon wish to be made like the 'Standing One' whom they worship.

In Hippolytus (Refutatio, vi. 7–18) (c. 230 A.D.) extracts are given from a work which evidently described a somewhat different system, and was called 'the Great Revelation.'

The first principle, according to this, is called ἀπέραντος δύναμις, it is fire or silence; the fire is of two sorts, φανερόν and κρυπτόν, that which is hidden being the secret principle which causes that which is open. The world is derived from the unborn fire (γεννητὸς ἐξ ἀγεννήτου); first came six roots in pairs, male and female, viz. νοῦς and ἐπίνοια, φωνή and ὄνομα, λογισμός and ἐνθύμησις. Corresponding to these are six visible or realized counterparts οὐρανός and γῆ, ἥλιος and σελήνη, ἀήρ and ὕδωρ. A large part of the work is devoted to proving the system by an allegorical use of the OT, but it is interesting to notice that there are elements derived from Aristotle, especially the distinction which runs through the whole of δύναμις and ἐνέργεια. Simon calls himself ὁ ἑστώς, ὁ στάς, ὁ στησόμενος, implying his pre-existence and his immortality. A short extract will be sufficient to show the character of the book: 'To you then I say what I say, and I write what I write. The writing is this. There are two offshoots of the complete Æons, having neither beginning nor end, from one root, which is the invisible, incomprehensible power silence, of which the one is manifested from above, which is the great power, the intellect of the universe, that administers all things, the male principle; but the other is from below, vast thought, the female principle, generative of all things. Whence corresponding to one another they form a pair (συζυγία), and they reveal the middle space as an atmosphere which cannot be comprehended, having neither beginning nor end. But in this is the father who hears and nourishes all things that have beginning and end. This is he who stood, who standeth, who will stand, being a bisexual power, the reflex of the pre-existent, unlimited power which hath neither beginning nor end, being in solitude; for from this the thought which pre-existed in solitude came forth and became twain.'

Besides the extracts from this book, Hippolytus also tells us (vi. 20) that Simon went as far as Rome, where he seduced many by his magical arts, but was opposed by Peter. This is the earliest reference to a contest with St. Peter at Rome, unless the notice in Philaster (see below) was derived from the earlier treatise of Hippolytus, in which case it would belong to the close of the 2nd cent. Hippolytus goes on to give an account of his death, different from any that we have in other sources. At the end of his life Simon stated that if he were buried alive he would rise on the third day. He ordered his disciples to dig a grave and to bury him. They did as they were ordered, 'but he remained away even to the present day. For he was not the Christ.'

Origen (c. 249 A.D.), in the contra Celsum, v. 62, tells us that Celsus, enumerating all the Christian heretics, speaks of Simonians who, worshipping Helena, or a teacher Helenus, are called Heleniani. Origen points out that Celsus has omitted to notice that the Simonians never confess Jesus as the Son of God, but say that Simon is the power of God. In vi. 11 Origen points out that Simon has no followers, and Dositheus not more than thirty. He adds that this is all the more marvellous, as Simon had taken away for his disciples the danger of death, saying that to sacrifice to idols was a matter of indifference. In the same work (i. 57) we are told that Simon has not thirty followers, or that that is an exaggerated number.

Commodian (c. 250), in Carm. apol. p. 613, speaking of beasts which have had the power of speech by the power of God, tells us of the dog which St. Peter made to speak to Simon. This story is found in the Apocryphal Acts.

The author of the treatise de Rebaptismate, ch. 16 (c. 260 A.D.), tells us of followers of Simon who make fire appear in the water when they baptize.

In the Syriac Didascalia (end of 3rd cent.), vi. 8 and 9 (Lagarde, Syriac text, and in Bunsen, Analecta Antenicæna, ii. p. 325), we have a reference to Simon and Cleobius and others of his followers, and an account of the final destruction of Simon in the contest with Peter at Rome. As this work is almost inaccessible, and its evidence is important, the following extracts are given in full: *—

Syriac, p. 100, l. 18 '(Concerning Simon the sorcerer). For the beginning of heresies was on this wise. Satan clothed himself with Simon, a man who was a sorcerer, and of old time was his servant. And when we, by the gift of the Lord our God, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, were doing powers of healing in Jerusalem, and by means of the laying on of hands, the communication of the Holy Spirit was given to those who presented themselves, then he brought to us much silver, and desired that, as he had deprived Adam of the knowledge of life by the eating of the tree, so also he might deprive us of the gift of God by the gift of silver, and might seize our understandings by the gift of riches, in order that we might give to him in exchange for silver the power of the Holy Spirit. And we were all troubled about this. Then Peter looked at Satan, who was dwelling in Simon, and said to him, "Thy silver shall go with thee to destruction, and thou shalt not have part in this matter."'

P. 101 '(Concerning false apostles). But when we divided to the twelve parts for all the world, and went forth among the Gentiles in all the world, to preach the word, then Satan wrought and disturbed the people to send after us false apostles for the refutation of the word. And he sent out from the people one whose name was Cleobius, and joined him to Simon, and also others after them. They of the house of Simon followed me, Peter, and came to corrupt the word. And when he was in Rome he disturbed the Church [much], and turned away many. And showed himself as though flying. And he laid hold of the Gentiles, terrifying them by the power of the working of his sorceries. And in one of the days I went and saw him flying in the air. Then I rose up and said, "By the power of the name of Jesus I cut away thy powers." And he fell, and the ankle of his foot was broken. And then many turned away from him. But others who were worthy of him clave to him. And thus first was established and became that heresy of his. And also by means of other false apostles,' etc.

(Brackets as in Syriac text).

Arnobius (c. 310, contra Gentes, ii. 12) knows of the story of the contest of Simon and Peter at Rome. 'For they had seen,' he says, 'the chariot of Simon Magus and the four flaming horses scattered by the mouth of Peter, and disappearing at the name of Christ.' He had been hurled down, and his legs broken; then, taken to Brunda, worn out with tortures and with shame, he had again thrown himself down from a lofty summit.

Eusebius (c. 324 A.D., HE ii. 13. 14) gives an account of Simon drawn from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, and embellished with somewhat strong vituperative language. He then goes on to refer to a contest with Peter, first in Judæa, then in Rome.

'Forthwith,' he says, 'the above-mentioned impostor was smitten in the eyes of his mind by a Divine and wonderful light, and when first he had been convicted in Judæa by the Apostle Peter of the evil deeds he had committed, he departed in flight on a great journey over the sea from the East to the West, thinking in this way only he would be able to live as he wished.' He tells us that he came to Rome, was assisted there > by the devil, obtained great influence, and was honoured by a statue. But during the reign of Claudius, Peter himself came there. 'And when the Divine word thus made its dwelling there, the power of Simon and the man himself were immediately quenched.'

* The writer is indebted for these extracts to the Rev. W. C. Allen of Exeter College, Oxford, who is engaged on a translation of the Syriac. The passage is also contained in the Latin Fragment. xxxii.

Eusebius and the author of the Syriac Didascalia quoted above are the first writers who speak of both a contest in Judæa and also one in Rome; but there does not seem to be any reason for thinking that either of them had any other source for the former than the Acts of the Apostles. We do not know Eusebius' source for the overthrow of Simon by Peter, and his language is curiously ambiguous. Probably he is giving the common story, drawn from mere apocryphal writing, the worthlessness of which he knows quite well. This makes him avoid both a quotation and direct details.

Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 347, Cat. vi. 14, 15) gives an account based upon the Acts and Justin. He also gives an account of the destruction of Simon when he attempted to fly. It is interesting, as we shall see, to notice that he ascribes the final catastrophe to the joint agency of Peter and Paul, showing that he possessed a story which contained the names of them both.

The work de excidio Hierosolym. iii. 2 (A.D. 368), ascribed to Hegesippus, but probably by Ambrose, gives an account of a contest at Rome of Peter and Paul with Simon. It narrates a considerable number of incidents contained in the Latin Acts.

Philaster (c. 380 A.D.), in his account of heresies (Hær. xxix.), knows of the contest at Rome with Peter before Nero. He tells us that Simon fled from Jerusalem to escape Peter, and came to Rome, and then narrates the contest. If this came from his source, the early treatise of Hippolytus, it would throw the evidence for it into the 2nd cent.; but as it is absent in the parallel passage of Epiphanius, and as Hippolytus in his later treatise knows the story in another form, it is not probable that it did.

Jerome (in Matt. 24⁵) (387 A.D.) tells us that Simon said, 'Ego sum sermo Dei, ego sum speciosus, ego paracletus, ego omnipotens, ego omnia Dei.'

The Apostolic Constitutions, which date from Antioch about the year 400, give the legend of Simon Magus in what we may call its complete form (vi. 7–9)—

> The source of all heresy is Simon of Gitta. First of all, the story in the Acts is given. Then comes an account of all the false teachers who went forth into the world. Then of the contest between Simon and Peter at Cæsarea, where the companions of Peter were Zacchæus the publican, and Barnabas, and Nicetas and Aquila, brothers of Clement, 'bishop and citizen of Rome, who had been the disciple of Paul and co-apostle and helper in the gospel.' They discoursed for three days concerning prophecy and the unity of the Godhead. Then Simon, being defeated, fled into Italy. Then comes an account of the contest at Rome of the same character as we shall come across shortly in the Apocryphal Acts.

This account is very much fuller than the narrative contained in the Syriac Didascalia, written probably rather more than a century earlier, and seems to imply a considerable growth of the legend. As will shortly be seen, it implies a knowledge of the Clementine literature in some form, and of the Apocryphal Acts.

In reviewing this catena of passages certain points become clear. During the 2nd cent. all the information, as far as we know, that existed about Simon, is derived from the Acts of the Apostles and the writings of Justin. There seems to be no knowledge of the contest with Peter at Rome, although Justin believed that Simon had visited Rome. In the 3rd cent. we begin to get an account of the contest with Peter, which we find in Hippolytus, Commodian, the authors of the Syriac Didascalia, and Aurelius. Eusebius and the Didascalia contain this legend, with an account of a contest in Palestine, but do not imply anything beyond the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles; Cyril's account seems of much the same character. It is not until we reach the close of the 4th cent. that we find in the Apostolic Constitutions what we may call the completed legend, combining the stories which, as we shall see, are derived from the Clementine literature with those derived from the Apocryphal Acts and the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles. The contrast between the earlier Didascalia and the later Constitutions is from this point of view most instructive. We are now in a position to study the fuller legends.

iii. THE CLEMENTINE LITERATURE AND APOCRYPHAL ACTS.—(a) THE CLEMENTINE HOMILIES AND RECOGNITIONS.—These are two forms of what appear to be an early Christian romance, containing the story of the wanderings of Clement in search of truth, the preaching and missionary journeys of Peter, his contest with Simon Magus, and the reunion of Clement with the lost members of his family—his father, mother, and two brothers. The Recognitions we possess only in a translation made by Rufinus about the year 400; the Homilies contain a somewhat different form of the same story in Greek. There are also a Syriac version and later epitomes which need not trouble us. Neither the Recognitions nor the Homilies contain the story in its original form, both presenting later features; and there is no accepted opinion concerning the date or the sources of the book. But the completed work must belong to a time when the controversy with Marcion's teaching and the preservation of the Divine μοναρχία were of interest in the Church, i.e. to the early part of the 3rd cent.; and some of the sources may be earlier. The earliest quotations come from Origen (c. 230). The work is clearly not orthodox in doctrine, but presents Ebionite features tinged with the Gnosticism it combats. We will give the account contained in the Homilies, stating at the conclusion the main differences in the narrative of the Recognitions.

The Homilies begin with an account of Clement, of his early religious impulses, of the desire that he had to hear of the new prophet, and of his meeting with Peter at Cæsarea in Palestine. He finds that Peter is, on the next day, to dispute with a certain Simon of Gitta (Bk. i.). The history of Simon is then related by Aquila and Nicetas, who had formerly been his pupils. His father's name was Antonius, his mother's, Rachel. He was a Samaritan of the village of Gitta or Gitthæ, six miles from Samaria. He was educated at Alexandria, and skilled in the wisdom of the Greeks and in magic. He wishes to be considered the highest virtue (ἀνωτάτη τις δύναμις), higher than the Creator of the world. He calls himself the Standing One (ὁ Ἑστώς), as signifying that he will always be firmly established (ὡς δὴ στησόμενος ἀεί), and having no cause of corruption in him. The Creator of the world is not the highest God, nor will the dead be raised. He denies Jerusalem and substitutes Mt. Gerizim. He puts himself in the place of Christ. He perverts the Law by his own interpretation of it. He was the chief of the disciples of John the Hemerobaptist. As our Lord had 12 apostles symbolizing the 12 months of the year, so John had 30, of whom one was a woman named Helena, thus symbolizing the 29½ days in a month. The death of John occurred during the absence of Simon in Alexandria, and Dositheus succeeded to his place. Simon, on his return, desiring the headship, pretended to be a disciple, and then accused Dositheus of not delivering the teaching correctly. Dositheus then attempted to beat him with a rod, whereupon Simon became a cloud of smoke. Dositheus, knowing that he was not himself the 'Standing One,' said, 'If you are the Standing One, I will worship you.' Simon claims that he is, becomes head of the sect, and Dositheus shortly afterwards dies. Simon, taking Helena with him, goes about disturbing the people. Helena, he says, had come down from the highest heavens; was mistress (κυρίαν), the All-mother, and Wisdom (παμμήτορα οὐσίαν καὶ σοφίαν); for her sake the Greeks and barbarians fought, having formed an image of the truth, for she was really then with the highest God. To aid him in his magical arts, he had killed a boy, and separated the soul from his body, and made an image which he kept concealed in an inner room by which he divined. A description is given of his miracles. He made statues walk. He appears wrapped in fire without being burnt. He is able to fly, to make bread out of stones. He becomes a serpent or a goat. He shows two faces. He can open and shut doors. He makes vessels in his house which wait upon him, without its appearing how they are moved (Bk. ii.).

After some delay, during which Peter has explained the mystical meaning of Scripture, the disputes between him and Simon take place; Simon undertaking to prove from the Scriptures that there is more than one God, and that he whom Peter called God is not the highest God, for he is without foresight, imperfect, incomplete, and exposed to every form of human passion (iii. 38). The disputations last three days. On the fourth day it was found that Simon had fled by night to Tyre, and was there deceiving the people by his magic (iii. 58). Clement, Nicetas, and Aquila are sent on to Tyre, and Simon flees to Sidon, leaving some of his disciples (iv. 6), who, at Tyre, discuss with Clement the Greek fables concerning the gods (Bks. iv.-vi.). Peter comes to Tyre and Sidon, when Simon goes on to Berytus. Peter follows him, and after a slight altercation Simon goes to Tripolis. Peter again follows (Bk. vii.) him, and Simon flees into Syria.

At Tripolis Peter remains a long time. There Clement is baptized, and then they go on towards Antioch in Syria by Orthosia and Antaradus (viii.-xi.). Then comes the story of Clement's family (xii.-xv.), and they go on by Bataniæ, Paltus and Gabala to Laodicea. To Laodicea comes Simon from Antioch, and a long dispute takes place between him and Peter concerning the unity of the Godhead and the existence of evil (xvi.-xix.). Then Faustus, the newly-discovered father of Clement, goes to see Simon. Simon by his magical arts succeeds in making the face of Faustus like his own, and then departs to Antioch, where he accuses Peter of being a magician. Cornelius the centurion has been ordered by the emperor to arrest all magicians. It is for this reason that Simon has changed the face of Faustus, and he escapes to Judæa. Faustus then goes to Antioch, and uses the appearance which Simon has given him to destroy the latter's influence. The people think that he is Simon. In Simon's name he recants, confesses his deceit and impostures, and Peter is sent for to come to Antioch.

The main differences which concern us in the Recognitions are as follow: Nothing is said about Simon being a pupil of John. Helena is called Luna (σελήνη). Simon says that Rachel was not really his mother, but that he had previously been conceived by a virgin. The main difference in the book is one of order: instead of two disputes between Peter and Simon—one at Cæsarea, the other at Laodicea—we have one dispute at Cæsarea, and there most of the matters discussed in the Homilies at Laodicea are placed by this editor (ii. 19–72, iii. 12–48). Reference is made (iii. 63) to Simon having said that he would go to Rome, and that there he would be looked on as a god and honoured with statues, and in iii. 64 it is said that he had been there. The voyage along the Syrian coast-line is treated very shortly, in iv.–vi. we have discourses of Peter, in vii.–ix. the story of Clement. Then at the end of x. Simon comes on the stage again, we have the same story as at the close of the Homilies, only that the father of Clement is called, not Faustus but Faustinianus.

It will be noticed that this work seems to fall very easily into separate elements. Bks. i. and vii.–x. 51 are concerned with the story of Clement. Bks. ii. and iii. with the story of the contest of Simon and Peter. Bks. iv.–vi. with sermons of Peter. Bk. x. 52 ff. contains the concluding story concerning Simon, which hardly fits in with this version of the history. The journey along the Phœnician coast is very much attenuated, and there are suggestions that originally Simon went straight to Rome after the contest at Cæsarea.

(b) THE LEGENDARY ACTS OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.—The story of Simon in these Acts differs from that in the Clementine literature. Both alike are concerned with contests between Simon Magus and Simon Peter; but while the latter place the scene of the contest in Syria, the Acts place it in Rome. The legends appear in two forms: the one is that contained in the Actus Petri cum Simone, a document of Gnostic origin, believed to have belonged to the collection known as Leucian; the other is the Acts of Peter and Paul (πράξεις τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου).

(1) According to the Actus Petri cum Simone, after St. Paul had left Rome, a stir arose in that city, about a man called Simon, who was at Aricia, who had worked many miracles, and said he was the great power (magnam virtutem) of God, and without God did nothing. He receives a summons: 'Thou art in Italy God, thou art the saviour of the Romans; hasten quickly to Rome.' He promises to come the next day at the seventh hour, flying through the air at the city gate. At the appointed time smoke is seen approaching, and suddenly Simon appears in the midst. The brethren are in a state of great consternation because Paul is away, and they are left without any to comfort them, and the greater number fall away. Meanwhile the twelve years of Peter's sojourn in Jerusalem are fulfilled, and Christ bids him go to Rome, for Simon, whom he had driven out of Judæa, had anticipated him there. We may pass over the account of Peter's voyage and arrival in Rome. He finds Simon living in the house of Marcellus, a Roman senator of great philanthropy, whom he had perverted by his magic. When Peter hears of the manner in which Marcellus has been deceived, he begins an attack on Simon, describing him as a 'ravening wolf, stealing the sheep which are not his.' It was he who inspired Judas to betray Christ, and hardened the heart of Herod and Caiaphas. He then goes to the house of Simon. Being refused admittance, he looses a dog and bids him carry a message. The dog goes in, raises his forefeet, and in a loud voice bids Simon come forth. Marcellus at once recognizes his sin, and, going out, falls at Peter's feet and asks pardon. He explains how he had been persuaded to erect a statue SIMONI IVVENI DEO: 'To Simon, the youthful god.' Further conversations of Simon and of Peter with the dog follow; then it, having fulfilled its mission, dies. Peter then turns a dead sardine into a live fish, and Marcellus, overpowered by these miracles, with the help of his servant turns Simon out of his house. Simon then goes to Peter's home. Peter sends him a message by means of an infant seven months old, who speaks and bids him leave Rome, and keep silence until the following Sabbath.

Peter then narrates the story of how he had rescued a woman named Eubola from Simon in Palestine. Further miracles and discourses of Peter are narrated, and the night before the contest is spent in prayer and fasting. On the day of the contest all Rome comes together, the senators, the prefect, and the officers. First comes a verbal disputation, and in the speech of Peter we notice apparently a Gnostic tendency. The contest begins by Simon making a young man die by his word. An interruption occurs. A woman rushes in saying that her son is dead, and some young men are sent to fetch him. Peter then raises the young man whom Simon had put to death, a favourite of the emperor, and the son of the widow who had been brought to him. Again, the mother of a certain senator, Nicostrates, asks Peter to heal her son. The dead body is brought. Peter challenges Simon to raise it. Simon makes it seem to move, but Peter really raises it. All the people then follow Peter.

Simon still tries to deceive the people by pretended miracles, but Peter exposes him. As no one believes him, he explains that he is going to God: 'Men of Rome, do you think that Peter has shown himself stronger than me, and has overcome me? And do you follow him? You are deceived. To-morrow, leaving you impious and godless men, I will fly to God, whose power I am, having been weakened. If, then, you have fallen, I am he that standeth (ὁ Ἑστώς), and I go to the Father, and will say to him, "Me, the Standing One, thy son, they wished to overthrow; but having refused to agree with them, I have come to thyself."' The people come together to see him fly. He appears flying over Rome. Peter prays, and he falls down, having his leg broken in three places. The people stone him, and all follow Peter. Simon is taken to Aricia, and then to Terracina, where he dies.

(2) The Acta Petri et Pauli occur in two forms, the Μαρτύριον τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου and the πράξεις τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, but the variations between them do not affect the story of Simon. The main point of difference between this story and that which we have just narrated is that St. Paul is here made the companion of St. Peter instead of being represented as having left Rome.

Owing to the success of the preaching of Peter and Paul, the Jews and priests stir up Simon against Peter. Simon is summoned before Nero, and by his miracles convinces Nero of the truth of his claims to be Son of God, and Nero orders Peter and Paul to be brought before him. The contest is first one of words, in which St. Peter quotes a letter of Pontius Pilate about our Lord, then it passes into miracles. Each challenges the other to say what is in their thoughts. Peter blesses and breaks a loaf of bread, and has it prepared to give to the dogs which Simon sends against him to devour him, thus disclosing that he knew what was in Simon's thoughts. Simon then demands that a lofty tower should be erected. Nero remembers how once Simon had appeared to raise himself from the dead after he had been killed three days, and still expects his victory. This Simon had done by making the executioner who had been sent to execute him cut off the head of a ram instead of his own. At this point there is inserted a conversation between Nero and Paul, and then a dispute on the subject of circumcision. Then comes the final test. While Paul prays, it is the part of Peter to oppose Simon. Simon starts flying. Peter then says, 'I adjure you, angels of Satan, who bear him to the air to deceive the hearts of the unbelievers, by God the creator of all, and Jesus Christ, whom on this day He raised from the dead, from this hour no longer bear him, but let him go.' He then falls and dies. Nero puts Peter and Paul in prison, but keeps the body of Simon to see if it will rise on the third day.

It will be noticed in this narrative that the part played by St. Paul is clearly subordinate. His name and his action might really be omitted without serious injury to the narrative. This suggests that very probably the story in its original form came from a source similar to the Actus Petri cum Simone, in which St. Paul is entirely absent.

iv. MODERN CRITICAL VIEWS.—We have now gone sufficiently minutely through all the various vicissitudes which the legends about Simon Magus experienced during the early centuries, and can pass to some equally curious developments of modern criticism.

There is no doubt that the Clementine literature is to some extent Ebionite in character, and might naturally contain anti-Pauline teaching. Starting from this point of view, Baur discovered certain passages in which Simon represented, or seemed to represent, St. Paul. He then propounded the view that Simon the Samaritan was not a historical character, but a term of reproach invented for the Apostle Paul. The contest between Simon Peter and Simon Magus really represented the original conflict of Peter and Paul. Wherever Simon Magus occurs we should read Paul. At first it was clearly understood who this person designated as Simon the Samaritan really was, but as the two parties more and more came together the original meaning was forgotten, and hence we find, even in a book like the Acts of the Apostles, written in a conciliatory interest, fragments of the old contest still embedded. But we have to recognize that the whole of our accepted history of early Christianity is really a conventional ecclesiastical legend, and the real history of the period must be disentangled from the Clementine literature. It is marvellous with what ingenuity the parallel was worked out when once the idea was started. Simon called himself the great power of God. Paul claims that he lived by the power of God (2 Co 12^9 13^4). When Simon offers money to buy the power of conferring the gift of the Holy Ghost, this is an allusion to Paul, who by his contributions for the poor saints at Jerusalem was attempting to obtain the apostleship. Peter telling Simon that he has neither part nor lot in this matter, is really Peter telling Paul that he has not the κλῆρος τῆς ἀποστολῆς.

Lipsius, who had worked out this theory in the most ingenious manner, did so mainly in connexion with his researches into the early history of the story of St. Peter's martyrdom at Rome. The original idea of Peter having visited Rome was Ebionite. 'The tradition of Peter's presence in Rome, which, unhistorical as it is, can only be explained by an anti-Pauline interest, is most universally connected in the most ancient records with his relation to Simon' (Zeller, Acts of the Apostles, i. p. 267, Eng. tr.). Rome must be claimed for true Christianity and the Jewish prince of the apostles, so a story was invented describing the manner in which Peter had visited Rome and there won a great victory over the false apostle, the Samaritan, i.e. Paul. Ultimately, the Roman Church realized how important for their prestige was the visit of Peter to Rome and his martyrdom there, and they adopted this legend in a Catholic sense, Peter and Paul being represented as the first founders of the Roman Church. The difficulty about this theory is that in the documents which we possess the Catholic theory is really the oldest, and therefore it is necessary to invent an early Ebionite Acts of Peter which contain the Ebionite form of the legend. This, according to Lipsius, was the common source of the Simon legend and the Apocryphal Acts, and he devoted great ingenuity to reconstructing it in accordance with his theory. But in his later works Lipsius has given up much of his former theory, although he still holds to the existence of early Ebionite Acts of Peter.

This theory of the identity of Simon Magus and the Apostle Paul is gradually ceasing to be held, and many scholars summarily dismiss it; it is, however, we notice, still accepted by Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. i. p. 913), and will, no doubt, be fully worked out by him. At first sight, from the point of view of common-sense, it seems absurd, and as a matter of fact it has very little evidence in its favour. The evidence that there seemed to be arose from a certain method of looking at facts owing to preconceived ideas. Without going into the question more thoroughly than space permits, we may touch upon the following points:—

(i.) It is very doubtful whether the Simon of the Clementines conceals the Apostle Paul.

(ii.) There is little or no evidence for early Ebionite Acts of Peter.

(iii.) The evidence for the Catholic history of the visit of Peter to Rome is earlier and better than that for his visit to Rome to combat Simon Magus. That is a later story (not appearing until the 3rd cent.), arising from the combination of two or three stories.

(iv.) The catena of Patristic evidence given above suggests a quite different account of the growth of the legend.

(i.) How far does the Simon of the Clementines conceal the Apostle Paul?—It is quite natural that the writer of the Clementines, who was probably an Ebionite by extraction, should be anti-Pauline, and any teaching that he would consider erroneous he would put into the mouth of Simon. But how far does the masque of Simon really conceal Paul?

(a) In Hom. xvii. 12–19 Simon defends the thesis that the belief obtained by visions is more certain than that from personal intercourse. Peter maintains that the personal knowledge that he possesses is more trustworthy. This may very naturally be referred to the claim of St. Paul, that he was an apostle because he had seen the Lord in a vision; nor are there wanting verbal parallels. Peter says (ch. 19): εἰ κατεγνωσμένον με λέγεις, cf. Gal 2^{11}; so again, εἰ δὲ ὑπ' ἐκείνου μιᾶς ὥρας ὀφθεὶ, καὶ μαθητευθεὶς ἀπόστολος ἐγένου, and we know that St. Paul claimed to have visions (2 Co 12^1). This explanation is quite possible; but has not the whole passage probably very much more meaning when applied to the claims made by heretics to have a special revelation superior to the Church revelation?

(b) In Hom. ii. 17 Simon is said to be ὁ πρὸ ἐμοῦ εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πρῶτος ἐλθών. He preaches the false doctrine, the coming of which must precede the true which Peter taught. Is not this Paul going among the heathen and teaching them falsely, to be followed by Peter, who teaches them what is true? So again Hom. iii. 59 Peter says that when he wished to teach the heathen the belief in one God, Simon went further, and taught them to believe in many. In vii. 4–8 Peter tells the people of Tyre that they have been deceived by his forerunner Simon. The second instance clearly takes away from the force of the first, because the false teacher is made to teach the belief in more than one God, and is clearly the first disseminator of Marcionism.

(c) In Hom. xviii. 6–10 we have a condemnation of indiscriminate teaching. This is Peter condemning Paul; but really it will have equal meaning if we suppose it introduced to explain why this special doctrine of the Clementines has only been known to a few.

(d) In Recog. iii. 49 Simon is called a vas electionis . . . maligno, a chosen vessel for evil, cf. Ac 9^{15}; and in Recog. ii. 18 he is said to be malignus transformans se in splendorem lucis, cf. 2 Co 11^{14}. But nothing can be drawn from the last sentence, and the first does not mean much. Why, if Paul is called a chosen vessel in a good sense, should not Simon be called a chosen vessel for evil?

(e) Something more may be said for the expression in the letter of Peter prefixed to the book in which he speaks of ἐχθροῦ ἀνθρώπου ἄνομόν τινα καὶ φλυαρώδη . . . . προσηκάμενοι διδασκαλίαν.—Here Paul may well be referred to as 'the enemy' whose doctrine was lawless; but why should not the enemy be simply Simon, who was by tradition the source of all false teaching? Lawlessness does not mean breaking the law, but teaching immorality.

(f) The most significant passage is Recog. i. 70 (a curious episode peculiar to the Recognitions). James by his preaching has very nearly persuaded the high priest and all the people to be baptized when 'homo inimicus' appears and bids them not to be deceived by a magician, and attacks them. He was clearly intended to be Saul (in his unconverted days), but he is specially distinguished from Simon, who is introduced as someone different in the next chapter but one. Paul is quite clearly not Simon here.

It seems very doubtful, indeed, whether Simon is ever intended to represent Paul, nor is there any Pauline teaching put into Simon's mouth. The above passages, which are all the more important quoted, are hardly sufficient to establish the theory that Simon is Paul. The author or compiler of the Clementines really starts from the belief that the Simon of the Acts, whom Peter combated, was the source of all heresy, and so he makes his favourite apostle travel from place to place combating in the person of Simon the false Marcionite teaching of which he was believed to be the originator. This will explain the whole situation, and is much less far-fetched than the explanation which finds St. Paul everywhere.

(ii.) But without forcing this too far, and admitting that the writer may possibly have been intending somewhat delicately to attack Pauline teaching, there is a further question: Is there any evidence for early Ebionite Acts which contained a narrative of Peter and Simon (concealing Paul)?

The theory of Lipsius formerly was that there was an original Ebionite Acts which was the common source of both the Roman legend and the Clementines. He found an external support for this statement in the passage given above from the Apostolic Constitutions, which he boldly said belonged to the earlier portion of that work. This is an admirable illustration of the danger of such statements, and how very untrustworthy are the attempts of any critic, however able, to guess at the original portions of a work. Some years before Lipsius wrote thus, Lagarde had already published his Greek version of the Didascalia, the earlier form of the Constitutions, and disproved the whole theory. There is no external evidence for the existence of early Ebionite Acts as the source of the whole story, and Lipsius has given up the theory in this form, but he still believes in early Ebionite Acts. As a matter of fact, there seems very little evidence for their existence. He finds Ebionite tendencies in some passages of the Acts of Peter and Paul, but the controversy there is not with Jewish Christianity, but with Judaism—and Simon Magus is the champion of Judaism. That is the position that he occupied in the Leucian Acts, and the passages suggest much more a Leucian than an Ebionite origin. It is even more difficult to speak of the sources of the Clementines, but it is very doubtful if it is necessary to assume an Ebionite Acts which contained an account of Simon. The contest between Simon and Peter along the Syrian coast is almost absent from the Recognitions, perhaps the earlier form. With the exception of the concluding incident, which was clearly not part of the original work, the portion concerning Simon resolves itself into the account of his career, which is obviously based largely on Justin, and the disputes with Peter at Cæsarea, in which Simon is made the protagonist of Marcionism. The latter would probably be the direct work of the author, and does not demand a source. On no subject connected with the Clementines is it possible to speak with certainty; but this much seems clear, that there is no evidence of Ebionite Acts, and no need to suppose that they existed. They are merely a hypothesis, invented to support preconceived views.

(iii.) If we examine the chronological order of the development of the legend, the Catholic account of the first work of Peter and Paul at Rome is older than the story of Simon and Peter. Both Dionysius of Corinth and Irenæus know the story of their visit, and both ascribe to them the foundation of the Roman Church. There is no certain trace of the story concerning the contest of Simon and Peter at Rome before the 3rd cent., although as a matter of fact it probably existed in the Leucian Acts not later than the close of the 2nd century. Chronologically, the Catholic story caused the legend, not vice versâ.

(iv.) The same is true of the whole growth of the story. We first of all trace the various elements of it as existing in different sources and varying forms. The more complicated and fuller stories are the result of later growth, and not the original source. The simple narrative of the Acts is the earliest, not the latest account. This will come out more clearly in what follows.

v. THE GROWTH OF THE LEGEND.—We are now in a position to sketch tentatively the growth of the whole legend. Our primary authorities must be the Acts and Justin Martyr, because they are chronologically the earlier, and because the acceptance of them explains the rest. Justin Martyr, who lived in Samaria less than 100 years after the time of Simon, was writing about something that he would know. Whether the fully developed system as described by Justin comes directly from the founder of the heresy or was the product of a later member of the school, may of course still be doubted, but the system harmonizes with what we read in the Acts; nor are there any a priori reasons for doubting the story about Simon and the woman he chose to call Helena. The later account of the system which we find in Hippolytus was probably the production of some member of the sect; but it is on the same lines as the older work, and we must remember that the essence of Gnosticism was not orthodoxy but speculation. Different members of the school of Basilides produced very different systems, and in the same way some members of the school of Simon produced the later development described above. The main source of the Clementine literature was directly or indirectly Justin, possibly also Hegesippus, and some of the personal details of his life and connexion with Dositheus may be authentic.

We now pass to the Roman visit. Are there any grounds for thinking that this really took place? Probably not. Of what happened in Samaria, Justin is a first-hand authority; on matters in Rome he would be ignorant and misinformed. He saw the statue, and jumped to the conclusion that Simon, of whom he had known so much, was here represented. It may be noticed that Justin gives no authority for the Roman visit except the statue. In another direction Justin is responsible for the Simon legend, namely, by making him the source and originator of heresy. How far there is an actual historical basis for the idea that Gnosticism was directly or indirectly derived from him may be doubtful. His system exhibits all the elements which go to make up Gnosticism; especially we may notice that there we first find the idea that the highest God was not the creator of the world; but then such tendencies and ideas were in the air. The same influences of dualism and syncretism which worked in his case would work in others. But, anyhow, Simon was the one clear instance of a heretic mentioned in the New Testament. It was natural, therefore, to represent him as the typical arch-heretic, the originator of heresy, and the place which Justin assigned to him at the head of his heretical genealogy was one in which his position was uncontested.

Next comes the Roman contest with Peter. The materials out of which this was constructed were (1) the contest of Peter and Simon in the Acts; (2) the Roman tradition that the Church was founded by Peter; (3) the story of the Simon statue; (4) a story contained in Suetonius (Nero, 12). At games initiated by Nero, some one, personating Icarus, attempted to fly, and the emperor was sprinkled with blood when he fell. The story of Simon's flight towards heaven was probably invented at Rome before the close of the 2nd cent., not later at any rate than the beginning of the 3rd. Whether the author of the Leucian Acts of Peter—a Gnostic—was the first originator or not we cannot say; very probably he was, as he seems to have helped to give Simon Magus a prominent place. According to Photius (Cod. cxiv.) that work taught that the God of the Jews was evil, whose minister Simon was. This would make it very natural that the author we call Leucius should have invented the episode; and the date which we assign later than Justin, but not later than the end of the 2nd cent., harmonizes with other indications. This story, like many other Leucian inventions, was attractive to the orthodox, and therefore we find it here worked up in a comparatively speaking orthodox dress. Paul was introduced as a companion of Peter, not because there had been anything anti-Pauline in the original story, but because the combined activity of Peter and Paul became a favourite subject of legend. For an Ebionite form of this legend there appears to be no evidence. There remains a certain chronological confusion to discuss. According to Justin, it was in the reign of Claudius that Simon came to Rome. The origin of this date was probably the date on the statue which he saw. The earlier form of the story, then, would bring Peter to Rome in the days of Claudius; and in the Actus Petri cum Simone nothing is said about Nero. But the martyrdom of Peter was by tradition under Nero, so that at a later date the legend was changed to Nero's time. Eusebius, however, had before him the earlier account. He brings Simon to Rome under Claudius, and Peter immediately after him. Is not this probably the origin of the 25 years' episcopate of Peter at Rome?

The origin, then, of the Roman legend was probably the Leucian Acts. These are represented for us mainly by the Actus Petri cum Simone, the Leucian affinities of which have been shown by James (Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. p. xxiv); the πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου are an orthodox recasting of the story, with the exaggerated miraculous tendency omitted.

A separate line on which the legend developed is represented by the Clementine literature. A combination of arguments would incline us to put its date at the beginning of the 3rd cent. and its origin in Syria. The sources out of which it was composed must be very doubtful, as we have little to go on, but the story is obviously made up of different elements. There is a story of Clement and his relations; there is a story of a dispute with Apion, which sometimes seems to have been put into the mouth of Peter, but in our texts is put into the mouth of Clement. There are certain κηρύγματα or Preachings of Peter, and there is an account of the travels of Peter. But how much of this was derived from earlier sources and how much was the work of the compiler of the legend we have no means of determining. The story of the travels of Peter contained, obviously, an account of his journey from Cæsarea to Antioch, of the Churches that he founded during that journey, and the bishops and presbyters that he instituted. This is preserved in both our texts; but was the dispute with Simon Magus part of the original document? It is usually supposed that it must have been; but in the Recognitions, which is generally considered the older form of the story, the part of Simon is confined to Cæsarea, and is an episode by itself. Again, does the author know of the Roman contest? The references to Rome occur mainly in the Recognitions, and may have been introduced to adapt the story to a Roman audience. It is quite possible that the introduction of Simon Magus is due to the compiler of the work, and that his only historical source of knowledge about Simon was Justin Martyr and, possibly, Hegesippus.

But if his sources are doubtful, his purpose is more clear. He is an Ebionite Christian by extraction, who has been influenced by the speculative ideas which we associate with Gnosticism, and he writes to reconcile the conflicting claims of Judaism and Christianity. His main tenet is the Divine unity, and therefore he combats the polytheism of the heathen, the dualism of Marcion, and Trinitarianism (if we may use the term). This last feature gives us his date, the period of the Monarchian controversy early in the 3rd cent.; and for this date there is also external evidence. Within the limits of a common Monotheism he hopes to find room for both Jews and Christians, and his references to the establishment of bishops and presbyters by Peter show that he wishes to adopt the existing ecclesiastical organization. There is a certain amount of art in his choice of characters. The defender of polytheism is Apion, perhaps the traditional opponent of Judaism; the attack is put into the mouth of Clement, as obviously more fitted for such work than Peter. The one heretic of the apostolic age, Simon, who was the traditional source of all heresy, is made the exponent of all false Christian teaching, and his natural combatant is Peter. Paul is never mentioned by name, but anything like an overt attack on him would have been quite beside his purpose. There are no doctrines which were ascribed to Paul attacked in the person of Simon. Simon is not Paul, nor intended by the author to be Paul. He was obviously a writer with considerable powers of invention; he had a certain amount of history or legend or tradition, but he may very likely be himself responsible for most of the personal episodes he describes, and for the use he has made of Simon. There is no evidence, at any rate, for any Ebionite Acts which he is supposed to have used, nor any need to imagine them. One more feature must be referred to. Simon is with him the magician as well as the false teacher, and a great deal is said about the magical element, which requires all Peter's miraculous powers to dispel. The whole of this side of the legend appears absurdly puerile to a modern reader. But we are apt to forget that all the tricks Simon claimed to perform were believed in at the time, and that those who claimed to perform magical rites were among the most determined opponents of Christianity. Magic was a real danger, and a very subtle form of false teaching. It was the true spiritual force of Christianity which overcame it; but numerous writers always ascribed this triumph to the exhibition of vulgar miraculous power.

It is maintained that this reconstruction of the history of the Simon legend represents a much more probable and consistent account of the origin of the story than the distorted and complicated theories which have appeared since the time of Baur, and have rested chiefly on unproved hypotheses of sources and fanciful reconstructions of the early historical period.*

vi. THE AFFINITIES OF SIMON'S SYSTEM.—The historical nucleus of the legend is, as we have seen, the narrative in the Acts, part of the story in Justin, the system as described by him belonging either to Simon himself or an earlier follower, and perhaps some incidents recorded by the Clementines. When we accept this as original, the affinities of the system suggested by Baur and his followers become a legitimate explanation. Samaria was a country in which a sort of bastard Judaism came in contact with the old Syrian and Phœnician religions and the newer Hellenic paganism. All these different elements are present in Simon's system. That the relation of himself and Helena is a reminiscence of the Syrian male and female deity is equally natural, whether Helena be a real person (as is probable) or only the personification of an idea. The fact that in one account—that of the Recognitions—she is called Luna (a translation of σελήνη), makes the parallel to the Sun and Moon worship, the Baal and Astarte, more close. Simon represents an almost pre-Christian Gnosticism, and it is significant that only here do we find this very repulsive dualistic element. Simon represents the impostor of the period, whose claims are even more improbable than those of Apollonius of Tyana or Alexander of Abonoteichus. His mind is a medley of Hellenism, Judaism, and Orientalism; out of this he forms a system, in which he himself occupies the first position. The influence of Christianity and then the opposition to it give a certain vitality and force to the ideas he suggests, and in other hands they become fertile and prolific. Later Gnostics were more definitely Christian. The founders of the sects never claimed Divine honours for themselves. They discarded more extravagant features. But they shared with Simon the fundamental doctrine that the Creator of the world was an inferior and, perhaps, a malevolent deity.[*]

---

* It may be objected that nothing has been said about the Simon of Cyprus mentioned in Jos. Ant. xx. vii. 4. In the opinion of the present writer the two Simons have nothing to do with one another, and the resemblance of names counts for nothing. There are said to be twenty-four Simons in the Index to Josephus.

vii. SIMON MAGUS AND SIMONY.—In another direction the name of Simon has become used universally for the sin of attempting to purchase spiritual gifts or spiritual preferment for money. Both sorts were included under the sin of Simon. The earliest example seems to be from the Apostolical Canons, where it is said: 'If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon obtain this dignity for money, both he that is ordained and the ordainer shall be deposed, and also cut off from all communion, as Simon Magus was by Peter.' And the instance is often quoted in later canons. The use of the term appears to have arisen through the Canon Law.

viii. SIMON MAGUS AND THE FAUST LEGEND.—There are some curious coincidences, if they are nothing more, between the legend of Simon and the story of Faust. The hero of that legend is supposed to have been a certain Dr. Faust, of Knittlingen, who died in 1540. The legend appears first in a written form in 1587, and was obviously the result of a fertile imagination. It is quite possible that in building up the story reminiscences direct or indirect of the legend of Simon Magus may have come in. The following are points of resemblance: (1) firstly and most clearly the introduction of Helena in both; (2) the name Faustus; (3) the homunculus; (4) in Simon Magus himself we may have a suggestion of Mephistopheles. This connexion may be due to direct literary influence, or we may have here two different versions of a theme which has been common at various times, the contest between Religion and Magic—a contest which we have to believe is far older and more universal than was once thought.

LITERATURE.—(1) On Simon Magus generally. The two most complete expositions of the two opposing points of view are by Möller in Herzog, RE^{2} xiv. s.v., and by Lipsius in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon, v. 301–321. For older works see Mosheim, Inst. hist. eccl. i. 389. There are accounts in all the works on heresies in the Early Church, of which the most useful is that of Hilgenfeld, die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristenthums, pp. 163 and 453. The most complete account in English is that by Salmon in Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 681. Other treatises referred to are Simson, 'Leben und Lehre Simon des Magiers,' in *Z. f. hist. SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY.—The words tr^{d} 'simple' in AV are (1) פֶּתִי (from פָּתָה to be open), 'openness,' inexperience, descending to 'heedlessness.' In Pr 1^{22} the abstract use occurs and the word is tr^{d} 'simplicity,' elsewhere the meaning is personal, and the translation 'simple' or 'simple one.' In Pr 9^{6} the translation is 'foolish' (RV 'simple ones'). It occurs chiefly in Proverbs (see Oehler, Theol. of OT, ii. 446; Cheyne, Devout Study of Criticism, 388; Schultz, Old Test. Theol. ii. 283 f.). (2) פְּתַיּוּת, only Pr 9^{13}, of Folly personified. (3) ἄκακος, 'guileless,' Wis 4^{12}, Ro 16^{18}. (4) ἀκέραιος, 'sincere,' lit. 'unmixed,' Ro 16^{19} (see Trench, Syn. § lvi.).

Simplicity is the tr. of (1) פֶּתִי in Pr. 1^{22}. (2) תֹּם (of which the plu. is תֻּמִּים, the Thummim of Heb. oracles) completeness, uprightness (from תָּמַם to finish), only 2 S 15^{11}. (3) ἁπλότης, 'onefoldedness,' 'singleness,' 'sincerity,' Wis 1^{1}, 1 Mac 2^{37m}, Ro 12^{8}, 2 Co 1^{12} 11^{3}. (See Sanday-Headlam on Ro 12^{8}; G. Montefiore in JQR vi. 469).

The Eng. adj. 'simple' (used also as a subst.) signifies 'onefold,' 'single' (from Lat. simplex, through Old Fr. simple). This original meaning is seen, e.g., in its application to medicines: thus Gosson, School of Abuse (Arber, p. 37), 'Chiron was . . . a reader of Phisicke, by opening the natures of many simples.' And we still speak of a matter being 'simple' when it is not complicated. When applied to persons the meaning is now 'weakminded,' 'foolish.' But in AV and older Eng. generally the meaning is never quite so strong as that, and, when it approaches it, always implies moral blame.

1. Inexperienced or unsophisticated, as Gn 25^{27} Tind. 'Jacob was a simple man and dwelled in the tentes.' This is perhaps all that is expressed by the word in Pr 1^{4} 'To give subtilty (RVm 'prudence') to the simple'; 14^{15} 'The simple believeth every word'; and especially Ro 16^{19} 'I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple (AVm 'harmless') concerning evil.'

2. This inexperience may be ignorance to be instructed, or weakness to be defended. Thus Ps 19^{7} 'The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple'; 116^{6} 'The Lord preserveth the simple.' Cf. Hamilton, Catechism, fol. xv, 'Ye that are simple and unleirnit men and wemen suld expresly beleif al the artikils of your Crede'; Is 53^{3} Cov. 'He shalbe the most symple and despised of all'; 60^{22} Cov. 'The yongest and leest shal growe in to a thousande, and the symplest in to a stronge people.'

3. But in Proverbs the tendency is to regard inexperience as heedlessness and almost folly, thus 14^{18} 'The simple inherit folly'; and as blameworthy, thus 1^{22} 'How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity?' Cf. Bunyan, Holy War, 129, 'I heard him say it in Folly Yard, at the house of one Mr. Simple, next door to the sign of the Self-deceiver.'

Simplicity has not quite the same range of meaning as 'simple.' 1. Ignorance or weakness, descending to folly, as Pr 1^{22}, cf. Adams, Works, i. 29—'God, in regard to thy simplicity, brings to naught all their machinations.' 2. Guilelessness, rising to innocence and sincerity, as 2 S 15^{11} 'They went in their simplicity'; Wis 1^{1} 'Think of the Lord with a good heart, and in simplicity of heart seek him'; 1 Mac 2^{37m}; Ro 12^{8} 'He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity' (ἐν ἁπλότητι, AVm 'liberally,' RV 'with liberality,' RVm 'with singleness'); 2 Co 1^{12} 'in simplicity and godly sincerity' (RV [reading with edd. ἁγιότητι for ἁπλότητι of TR] 'in holiness'); 11^{3} 'the simplicity that is in Christ.' Cf. Elyot, Governour, i. 220, 'Trewely in every covenaunt, bargayne, or promise, ought to be a simplicitie, that is to saye, one playne understandinge or meaning betwene the parties'; and Ac 2^{46} Rhem. 'They tooke their meate with joy and simplicitie of hart.' It is to be observed that 'simplicity' in its modern sense does not occur in AV or RV: to take 2 Co 11^{3} in the mod. sense is wholly to misunderstand the passage. J. HASTINGS.

SIMPLICITY (ἁπλότης, 'singleness,' LXX tr. of תֹּם as also of יֹשֶׁר) is the characteristic attribute of the man who is whole-hearted and single-hearted. The word ἁπλοῦς is applied by Plato to God, who is 'perfectly simple and true both in word and deed' (Rep. ii. 382 E). It is used to describe the man who plays only one part and does one thing, in contrast to him whose energies are not concentrated but divided over a variety of pursuits (Rep. iii. 397 E). Simplicity is a mark of the just man who wishes to be and not to seem good (Rep. ii. 361 B), while the man of an opposite type who lacks the true virtue of a 'unanimous and harmonious soul' is διπλοῦς, for he is at war with himself, and is virtually two men, not one (Rep. viii. 554 D). Its close relationship to ἀκακία (guilelessness) is indicated by the fact that in many passages where the LXX has ἁπλότης, Aq. has ἀκακία as tr. of the same word (Ps 7^{9} $26^{1.\ 11}$ 41^{13} 78^{72}); its relationship to εὐθύτης (rectitude), by the fact that in LXX יֹשֶׁר is tr. by both words (1 K 9^{4}, 1 Ch 29^{17}). Simplicity describes the moral and mental attitude of the man who is absolutely at one with himself in motive, aim, and end, whether in relation to God or his fellow-men. This unity and concentration of the inner nature gives fulness of spiritual perception, as our Lord shows by a comparison taken from another sphere of vision. 'If, therefore, thine eye be single (ἁπλοῦς), thy whole body shall be full of light' (Mt 6^{22}, Lk 11^{34}). Such a man is incapable of insincerity, or artifice, or malice, or finesse. Hence he is opposed to the two-souled man, who is driven now Godwards, now earthwards (δίψυχος, Ja 1^{8}), to the double-hearted (Ps 12^{2}) and the double-tongued (διλόγος, 1 Ti 3^{8}; δίγλωσσος, Pr 11^{13}, Sir 5^{9}). In his walk he does not try to go upon two ways (Sir 2^{12}), but goes straight to the goal, with his face set thitherward, neither halting, nor lingering, nor diverging. In his obedience to Christ there is no reservation, no element of calculation, only unconditional loyalty (2 Co 11^{3}). In his devotion to God there is no bargaining as to the minimum of disobedience which He may permit (2 K 5^{18}), in his work for men is no taint of eye-service (Col 3^{22}, Eph 6^{5}). In his giving there is no admixture of any base element (Ro 12^{8}). For he gives as God gives, without any afterthought (Ja 1^{5}), for no end save the good of the receiver. The simple one is guileless, and as such, though not free from prejudice, he is open to conviction (Jn 1^{47}). Himself incapable of being swayed by ignoble motives, he attributes a similar incapability to others, and thus may be easily deceived; in this way simplicity may so degenerate that it becomes not merely opposed to craftiness, but to prudence (2 S 15^{11}).

In the NT conception prudence is consistent with simplicity, and should be inseparably associated with it (Mt 10^{16}, Ro 16^{19} ἀκέραιος). In the Test. of the Twelve Patriarchs there is a graphic picture of the man of simplicity. He is not a busybody in his doings, nor malicious and slanderous against his neighbours. He never speaks against any one, nor censures the life of any one, but walks in the simplicity of his eyes. He is free from lustful desires; he is unselfish in his beneficence. 'The simple coveteth not gold, defraudeth not his neighbour, longeth not after manifold dainties, delighteth not in varied apparel, doth not picture to himself to live a long life, but only waiteth for the will of God, and the spirits of evil have no power against him' (Testament of Issachar, c. 3–4, Sinker's tr.).

JOHN PATRICK.

SIN.—I. IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—Prefatory.—The doctrine of sin in the OT must be considered as there given; that is to say, the historical method forbids our taking into account NT interpretations of it—such, for instance, as St. Paul's comments in Romans on the sin of Adam and its consequences. The same method requires that the chronological order of the OT should be followed, but the attempt to do this precisely would so complicate the treatment that it seems best to examine the main divisions of the Heb. Bible as they stand—(1) the Law, (2) the Prophets, (3) the Hagiographa, leaving open such questions as what amount of the Priestly legislation may be considered to be pre-exilic, and what dates are to be assigned to Deuteronomy and the Books of Kings.

Sin is a negative conception, and involves a preceding idea to which it is contrary, namely Righteousness, first attributed to Noah, Gn 6^{9}. The righteousness of God is His conformity to the moral law which is His nature, and to His covenants with man. The righteousness of man is conformity to the same moral law and the same covenants. 'Walking with God' (Gn 5^{24}) is but another phrase for righteousness. Sin as the contrary of righteousness is disobedience to God, departing from God, self-assertion against God. Thus the fundamental OT conception of sin is not sin against other men, or against a man's self, but sin against God. The OT anticipates what modern Christian thought has asserted, that the nearest relation of the human soul is its relation to God (Müller, Chr. Doct. of Sin, tr. vol. i. p. 81).

i. THE LAW.—Starting with this hypothesis, let us first see how far it is borne out in the traditions of pre-Mosaic religion.

(1) There is no occasion to enter into the question whether the story of the Fall is to be regarded as both historical and symbolic (Aug. de Civitate Dei, xiii. 21) or merely symbolic (Origen, de Prin. iv. 16). One point comes out clearly: sin is set before us at its very beginning as disobedience to Divine law, an exercise of human free will in conscious opposition to that law, a departure from an original state. There is, however, nothing to imply that that state was a perfect one, as scholastic theology described it. The free communications with God, on which much stress has been laid as evidence of a lofty state, continue after the Fall. (On the supposed contradiction between the results of anthropological science and the idea of a Fall, see Illingworth's Bampton Lectures, Lect. vi.). It must also be observed that the OT does not anywhere teach a corruption of human nature derived from Adam, still less an imputation of his guilt. All that it teaches is the universality of sin in Adam's offspring. But if the descent of all mankind from Adam is taken as a fact, then the universality of sin may be presumed to have some relation to descent from Adam (see Mozley's Lectures and Theological Papers, Lect. on 'Original Sin'). And the prevalent feeling that the nation rather than the individual was the subject of sin (see Clemen, Lehre von der Sünde, p. 42 ff.) would prepare the way for the thought of all mankind being involved in the guilt and penalty of Adam and Eve, when religious thought came to reflect on the relation to God of mankind generally, and not merely of Israel. This reflexion, however, belongs to a later date (2 Esdras and Romans), and the absence of reference to the Fall in OT is remarkable. The three passages usually quoted, Job 31^{33} (see RVm), Hos 6^{7} (see RVm), Is 43^{27} (see Dillmann, ad loc.), are not to the point. Cf., further, Thackeray, St. Paul and Jewish Thought, 31 ff.

(2) The interest of the Cain narrative is, (a) that man is not left to himself either before or after sin. There are voices of God warning, promising, condemning. And (b) sin is already personified; it has gained a positive existence instead of being a mere negation: 'If thou doest not well, sin coucheth at the door,' Gn 4^{7}; cf. Sir 27^{10}.

(3) The next point is the development and increase of sin (Gn $6^{5.\ 11\text{-}13}$). Sin is a parasitic growth which multiplies in its appropriate soil. It is not merely a number of isolated rebellions, but results in a state of sin both in the individual and in the race. This state of sin takes possession of the thoughts of the heart, and its outward effect is violence (חָמָס) between man and man.

(4) At the Flood the method of God is, so to speak, changed. He recognizes (Gn 6^5) the predominance of 'the evil imagination' (יֵצֶר הָרַע), a term which afterwards plays an important part in Jewish theology (see Weber, Jüd. Theol.^{2} p. 213 ff., and Dillmann, ad loc.). Sin must be dealt with in other ways, by an election and a covenant. The one righteous man is taken, special relations are established with him, and a covenant given. This covenant is followed by those with Abraham, and with Israel at Sinai. But these covenants, while designed for salvation, open out, each of them, new possibilities of sin. It is no longer a matter of transgression against undefined moral law, but there are definite ordinances. Sin is not merely the breach of the universal relation between creature and Creator, but the breach of covenant, a revolt (פֶּשַׁע). Moreover, with patriarchal religion, the contrast of faith and unbelief comes in in a definite way (Gn 15^6). Esau's sin also is plainly unbelief. This is gradually shown to be the root of sin, and every particular sin is regarded as a manifestation of it. When, with Abraham, we reach the distinction between those within and those without the covenant, the question arises, Is there a recognition of the moral law and a consciousness of sin in the Gentile world? The question is answered in the affirmative by the case of Abimelech (Gn 20), and the existence of such a law outside the covenant is implied throughout the OT, e.g. Am 1. Thus there is nothing in the OT claim of unique revelation to Israel, which is inconsistent with that consciousness of sin which is to be found in Babylonian, Persian, Vedic, and Greek sources, though there it is sin against Istart, Ahuramazda, or Varuna, not against Jehovah. As to what conduct is sin, the range is narrow, and the moral standard within the covenant does not materially differ from that outside it. Deceit, sensuality, and cruelty are not yet distinctly felt as sinful.

(5) The Mosaic covenant. The terminology of sin now increases and becomes definite, and it will therefore be necessary to examine it in detail. The three most important terms occur together in one verse, Ex 34^7 (cf. Ps $32^{1.2}$), iniquity (עָוֹן), transgression (פֶּשַׁע), sin (חַטָּאָה, חַטָּאת, חֵטְא).

(a) Sin.—Three cognate forms in Heb., with no distinction of meaning, express sin as missing one's aim, and correspond to ἁμαρτία and its cognates in NT. The etymology does not suggest a person against whom the sin is committed, and does not necessarily imply intentional wrong-doing. But the use of the word is not limited by its etymology, and the sin may be against man (Gn 40^1, 1 S 20^1) or against God (Ex 32^{33}). Clemen's concession (Lehre von der Sünde, pp. 22, 23), that sin and iniquity meant failure to comply with national custom (Volkssitte), must be qualified by the consideration that national custom was practically religion, and was always associated with supernatural sanction, so that sin against it was considered sin against God, even where God is not mentioned. It is no doubt true that this implicit thought that sin is against God, comes much more distinctly to the surface in Deuteronomy. Two subsidiary uses of חַטָּאת must be noticed. Like עָוֹן, it is used for the punishment of sin, as well as for sin itself (Zec 14^{19}, La 3^{39}). The passage from one sense to the other is seen in Nu 32^{23}. These instances open the question of the meaning of חַטָּאת (and עָוֹן) in a class of passages in the Psalms, where modern expositors take them to signify not sin or guilt, but punishment. See Cheyne on Ps 31^{11}. This double sense of both words is a witness to the Heb. view of the close connexion of sin and suffering, which will demand special attention in Job. Secondly, חַטָּאת is used for sin-offering (Lv 4^3). This use of the same word for the offence and the offering meets us again under אָשָׁם (trespass).

(b) Iniquity (עָוֹן), literally 'perversion,' 'distortion' [but see Driver, Sam. 135 n., who follows Lagarde in distinguishing two roots עוה, one='bend, twist,' the other (the root of עָוֹן)='err (from the way)'].—It is to be distinguished from (a) as being a quality of actions rather than an act, and it thus acquires the sense of 'guilt,' which might well have been adopted by RV as the rendering of עָוֹן. Guilt as distinguished from sin may be described as the sinner's position in regard to God which results from his sin. Guilt involves punishment, and thus the connotation of עָוֹן is enlarged still further. As Schultz says (OT Theol. ii. p. 306), 'in the consciousness of the pious Israelite, sin, guilt, and punishment are ideas so directly connected that the words for them are interchangeable.' See esp. Gn 4^{13}, Lv 26^{41}. An illustration of this connexion is the phrase 'bear iniquity' (less frequently 'bear sin'), first occurring Gn 4^{13}, and frequent in Ezekiel, H and P. The idea is that of being involved in guilt with the inevitable consequence of punishment (Nu 14^{34}), and the phrase is nearly equivalent to the verb אָשֵׁם; cf. Lv 5^{1-6}. It must, however, be noticed that the verb translated 'bear' (נָשָׂא) sometimes has for its subject the person offended against, and is used in the sense of 'taking away' sin. For reff. see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 671. In Lv 16^{22} the goat for AZAZEL 'bears iniquities' into a land not inhabited. Here both the senses above mentioned are implied; and the same may be said of the more important passage in Is 53^{12}, where the Servant of the LORD both bears and takes away the sin of many. Thus this phrase lies at the root of the doctrine of the Atonement.

(c) Transgression (פֶּשַׁע).—The original sense of the noun is clear from the use of the verb (cf. 1 K 12^{19} 'Israel rebelled against the house of David'). It is a breaking away from law or covenant, and thus it implies a law and lawgiver. It implies what חַטָּאת does not necessarily imply, namely, the voluntariness of sin. This distinction comes out clearly in Job 34^{37} 'he addeth rebellion unto his sin.'

(d) Wickedness (רֶשַׁע).—This is sin become a habit or state. Its adjective רָשָׁע in plur. describes sinners as a class, 'the wicked'; and is invariably the correlative of צַדִּיק ('righteous'); cf. Gn 18^{23}.

Besides the foregoing, three other words require brief notice, אָשָׁם with מַעַל and רַע. AV does not sufficiently distinguish them, rendering מַעַל 'trespass,' 'transgression,' and אָשָׁם or אַשְׁמָה 'trespass,' 'trespass-offering'; whereas מַעַל is strictly an act of unfaithfulness or treachery towards God or man, producing a state of guiltiness designated by אָשָׁם, requiring an offering to atone for it, which offering is also expressed by the same word אָשָׁם (RV 'guilt-offering'). See Oehler, OT Theol. § 137. מַעַל is a word of limited range belonging to the priestly terminology (see Driver, LOT 127 [^{6} 134]), while אָשָׁם and its cognates run through OT. There is in the latter word the sense of a need of compensation, and the guilt-offering is to be regarded as a compensatory offering for an injury done (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 79).

We now proceed to the Mosaic covenant, not merely as contained in Ex 20–23, but as developed in the whole of Ex.-Lv.-Numbers, keeping in mind the widely different dates to which different portions may belong. The object of this law as a whole, if we regard it as providentially developed, appears to be not so much directly to advance morality or to deepen a sense of moral imperfection, as to create a nation within which communion with the One God might be realized and preserved,—or, in other words, to form a hard external shell, within which a higher religious life might be gradually and securely evolved. Hence the political and ceremonial elements were the prominent ones. And hence sin under the Law meant much more neglect, conscious or unconscious, of ceremonial regulations than moral transgression, and no distinction was drawn between the two. This was a necessary first stage. Again, God was the King of the new nation. Thus there was no room for non-religious law. His purview embraced all acts. Therefore there was no distinction between sin and crime. In the present day there are sins which are not regarded by English law as crimes or torts. It was not so in Israel. If an act was outside the Law, it was not sin. He who kept the Law was blameless. Conversely, there are offences against the law of England which the most conscientious would hardly regard as sin; but in Israel all enactments were part of the Divine law, and the breach of any of them was sin. This religious character of law was, of course, not peculiar to Israel. It is characteristic of early Brahmanic law (see Maine, Early Law and Custom, c. ii. esp. p. 42 ff.) and of other systems.

If, as seems probable, Deut. is earlier in date than much of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, it cannot correctly be called an advance on the views hitherto treated, but at any rate it takes much higher ground. Not only does the love of God and of one's neighbour in Deut. supply the Israelite with new motives for fulfilling express commands, but this love opened new views of duties beyond those commands, and thus enlarged and deepened the sense of sin where these were not fulfilled. There are humane directions which tend to positive virtue. Deut. is not open to Wellhausen's charge against the rest of the Law, 'What holiness required was not to do good, but to avoid sin' (Hist. Isr., Eng. tr. p. 500).

It will now be necessary to examine one class of offences against the Law which has had an important part in providing terminology and forming conceptions of sin. It is acknowledged that the Law of Israel was in great part a reformation and republication of existing Semitic custom, and indeed of customs not exclusively Semitic. This was the case with the class of enactments which related to what was clean (טָהוֹר) and unclean (טָמֵא). These concerned not only food, but persons and things. Offences in respect of these were sin, and punishable with death. There are three explanations of these enactments which must be set aside. Taking them as a whole, it is impossible to regard them as having a moral character. Nor are they designedly allegorical. So far as they disclose this character they possess it not by virtue of direct Divine appointment, but from their origin long before the birth of Israel. They grew out of man's sense of the unseen, his reverence for it, his consciousness of physical and spiritual dangers besetting him. The proof of this lies in the existence of very similar bodies of law as to cleanness and uncleanness, outside Israel, as for instance in the Vendidad (Sacred Books of the East, tr. Darmesteter, vol. iv.). Thirdly, the conception of clean and unclean was not a sanitary one, and had nothing in common (except incidentally) with modern notions of cleanliness. It was rather, that certain things, especially everything connected with birth and death, carried with them an infection of danger and an unfitness for worship. The opposite of uncleanness was holiness, and this too in the Law has an infectious character (Lv 6^{27}). The sin-offering is so holy that everything it has touched must be washed, broken, or done away with (see, further, art. UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS).

The importance of the foregoing in considering the OT doctrine of sin is as follows: (1) All these enactments enlarged the area of sin (Ro 5^{20}), though no doubt they mainly affected the priests (Montefiore, Hibbert Lect. ix.). At the same time it must be added that to those who observed them they also increased the area of righteousness and the opportunities of conscious joyful obedience. (2) The notion of the holiness of God, to which the system of clean and unclean had a close relation, was so elevated by the prophets, especially by Isaiah, that the terms connected with the system or their equivalents came to supply much of the vocabulary for sin in the NT and in the Christian Church: e.g. the use of such words as καθαρός, καθαρίζω cannot be understood without recalling their source in the Law.

The next matters for consideration are the punishment and the forgiveness of sin under the Law.—(1) Punishment. Sin is to be stamped out; the punishment for almost all sin is death. In theory, at any rate, the severity of the Law is amazing. What is taken into account is not so much the ill-desert of the individual, as his guilt involving the nation in guilt, so he must be extirpated (cf. Jos 22^{20}). It is only as regards the nation that punishment is restorative.—(2) Forgiveness. The only sin admitting of individual atonement was sin not committed 'with a high hand' (i.e not wilful), for which sin-offering and guilt-offering were provided (Lv 4–6^{7}); see Westcott, Ep. to Heb. p. 288. The DAY OF ATONEMENT must also be taken into consideration, though its main object appears to have been the purification of holy things and places. That forgiveness was so difficult of attainment, implied and fostered conceptions of God and His wrath which were strongly anthropopathic. One effect was that God was thought of as injured by man's sin; and the guilt-offering had in it, as we have seen, the notion of compensation for injury done. In Job (7^{20} 35^{6}) we find the first explicit contradiction of this thought. But Deuteronomy, if anterior to the priestly legislation, had already provided an antidote. There God's love for Israel is set forth, and the purpose of all His commands is repeatedly stated to be man's good (Dt 6^{24} 10^{18}). His commands give life. Hence God hates sin against Himself because it hurts, not Him, but the sinner.

ii. THE PROPHETS.—(a) The Former Prophets.—If the essence of sin is departure from God, then, in whatever form, idolatry must be the worst sin because the most complete. That is its position throughout the historical books. In Judges it is the cause of all Israel's sufferings. In 1 and 2 Samuel it is comparatively absent, and consequently there is a great burst of national vigour and prosperity. In 1 and 2 Kings the standard by which all reigns are measured is the permission or repression of idolatry. The history of the Northern Kingdom is the history of the continuance and effects of the sin of Jeroboam, and the word 'sin' is almost restricted to that special meaning. The sin of idolatry took different forms, such as degrading the conception of Jahweh, identifying Him with Baal, worshipping Him in heathen fashion and with visible representations, combining His worship with that of other gods, or, far less commonly, forsaking Him altogether for other gods. But in one form or another it is regarded in the historical books as the first and worst of all sins, and rightly so, at that stage of national life.

(b) Yet this view was too concentrated to be complete. It is not to the retrospective record in 1 and 2 Kings that we look for light on the progress of the national conscience, but to contemporary authorities, the so-called Later Prophets, i.e. the prophetical books of the 8th cent., Amos, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah. It is they that develop the moral character and moral requirements of J″; and as a necessary consequence the range, depth, and danger of sin.

The history of David supplies us with two examples of sin—one flagrant, and the other difficult to regard as sinful. The points which come out in his sin with Bathsheba are (1) possibility of immediate forgiveness on repentance; (2) punishment after forgiveness, severe and protracted; (3) the punishment of the sinner involves suffering for others. This, however, appears more clearly in the next instance, that of the census (2 S 24^{1}). The point to notice in this is, that the sin is ascribed to the causation of J″ Himself, just in the same way as the evil spirit which came upon Saul is described as 'from God.' Several other passages, e.g. Jg 9^{23}, are of the same character. On them Clemen (Lehre von der Sünde, p. 123 ff.) builds the conclusion that God was regarded as the author (Veranstalter) of sin. It is more correct to say that we have in them reflexions of that perplexity about the interaction of Divine control and human freedom which has at all times been felt, and not alone in Israel. For later protests against false inferences from such expressions, see Sir 15^{11-20} and Ja 1^{13-16}. What was in Hebrew religion only a hesitation and perplexity, which never produced dangerous results, became in Islam a principle fatal to morality. 'The unbelief of the unbeliever, the impiety of the impious, and bad actions, come to pass with the foreknowledge, will, predestination, and decree of God, but not with His satisfaction and approval' (Sell, Faith of Islam^{1}, pp. 118, 173).

Amos leads the way in bringing moral offences to the front. He carries on one side of Elijah's work, and the transgressions denounced in Am 1. 2 are offences against justice and humanity between man and man. Micah and Isaiah (e.g. Is 1^{10-17}) follow Amos. To Hosea the sin of Israel is heinous because it is sin against God's love. In Hosea we have the OT counterpart to 1 John. What Hosea (and indeed all the prophets) did, was to enlarge and deepen the conception of sin indirectly by making men realize far more fully the moral character of God. This work of the prophets, though by far the most important phase in the history of the OT doctrine of sin, is so obvious on the surface of their writings, and has been so often and so fully dealt with (e.g. Robertson Smith, Prophets of Israel, Lect. ii.; Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets, passim), that it must here be taken for granted in order to leave room to deal with less obvious contributions and developments. See also Clemen, Lehre von der Sünde, p. 70 f.

Another point in the teaching of the prophets as to sin is their preaching of repentance, both national and individual, outside the covenant (cf. Jonah) as well as within it. The development of individualism by Jeremiah and Ezekiel is a moment of great importance in the doctrine of sin. Hitherto the prominent thought has been that of sin affecting the nation through the individual, and entailing guilt on succeeding generations, though it must be noticed that the heredity of guilt is not allowed as a ground for private revenge (Dt 24^{16}, 2 K 14^{6}, but cf. 2 S 21^{6}). Ezekiel attaches his teaching to that of Jeremiah, and works it out. His result is well summed up by A. B. Davidson in his note on Ezk 18, 'the individual man is not involved in the sins and fate of his people or his forefathers.' But even Ezekiel did not dissolve entirely the great predominant OT thought of the solidarity of Israel in respect of sin. There was work for that conception to do in the NT. It made possible the thought of the vicarious atonement of Christ, as representative of the nation and the race (Jn 11$^{51.52}$). For a strong instance of the sense of sin as national, see Is 64. The feeling has been well expressed by Montefiore: 'At his worst the individual felt he belonged to the people of God, and shared their righteousness; and at his best he still felt the depressing burden of Israel's national sins' (Hibbert Lect. p. 512). The whole question was deeply affected by the obscurity and comparative unimportance of the Heb. expectation of a future life. When that dawned clearly, the importance of the individual dawned with it.

iii. THE HAGIOGRAPHA. — The Psalms belong largely, though not entirely, to the prophetic school of thought, and either anticipate or develop its teaching, according to the view we may take of their respective dates. It is in the Psalms that we first have a deep view of sin from the sinner's side. In the Prophets we have the historian or preacher denouncing, but in the Psalms the sinner confessing sin, either personal or national. This deep sense of sin arises invariably out of the pressure of suffering in some form; and in some cases, at any rate, is due to the national suffering of the Captivity and Exile. The Psalmist does not repent for fear of future punishment, but from the pressure of present affliction. It is true that we find the consciousness of uprightness and sincere purpose as well as the consciousness of sin (e.g. Ps 26), but this does not contradict the general impression. A special aspect of sin in the Psalms is that of falsehood. The service of J″ is thought of as truth, practical truth, much in the same way as in the Gospel and Epp. of St. John; hence sin, its opposite, is untruth, vanity, lies. In the Psalms, as in the Prophets, sin is no longer a matter of strict legalism, of failure to obey. Emotions and affections come in largely (as in some degree in Hosea and Deut.). The Psalmists love God, and look on sin as breaking this happy relation, hiding His face and shutting up His mercies. All this reaches its highest point in Ps 51, with its profound consciousness of sin in the individual and in the race (v.^{5}, cf. Job 14^{4}), hatred of it for its own sake, not merely for its consequences, and hopeful assurance of forgiveness and renewal.

M. Holzman (Lazarus and Steinthal's Zeitschrift für Völkerpsychologie, Bd. xv. 1884) contrasts the doctrine of sin in the Rig Veda with that of the Psalms in the following respects: (1) Varuna (the god addressed) is regarded as himself the cause of man's being deceived into sinning; (2) ceremonial offences are regarded as on the same level with moral, which is certainly not the case in the Psalms; (3) guilt is dreaded not for itself, but solely for its punishment.

In Proverbs the aspect of sin is, of course, wholly different. It is practical religion which is treated here, and this from an external and an intellectual point of view. Righteousness is wisdom, and sin is folly. The sinner is (1) simple (פְּתִי), (2) a fool (נָבָל, see article FOOL), or (3) a scorner (לֵץ).

Two characteristics may be specially noticed. (1) Men are sharply divided into good and bad; and though in chs. 1-9 the possibility of change is assumed, there is no reference to sorrow for sin, or conversion from bad to good (see Toy, Proverbs, Introd. p. xiii). This is the attitude towards sinners which is developed and hardened in Sirach, as noticed below. (2) In Proverbs, and still more distinctly in Job, it is the moral state of the individual which occupies attention; for even if Job be typical of Israel, the type is worked out with thorough dramatic truth. The result is that we obtain in these books far more detailed ethical reflexions than are found elsewhere in the OT. Although the religious consciousness of sin cannot be said to be prominent, yet it does find expression in a verse which is the strongest statement in OT of the universality of human sinfulness, namely Pr 20^{9}; and throughout Pr 10-24 the approval or disapproval of the Lord often recurs as the standard of action.

The Book of Job presents features of far greater interest, and represents the furthest advance in the doctrine of sin prior to the NT. Its results may be classed under three heads. (1) The Law being designedly excluded from the drama, the sins which come in question are purely ethical and nowhere ritual. The spread of sin is definitely acknowledged as universal; it is inherent in human nature (Job 4^{17} RVm, 14^{4} 15$^{14-16}$), and it includes sins of thought and desire. This latter point comes out most fully in Job 31, where we get the author's conception of sin, a very wide and penetrating one, not less remarkable for inwardness than the Sermon on the Mount. (2) The close relation between sin and suffering, believed in by Israel in early times, and implied by the double sense of חַטָּאת and עָוֺן (see above), is in this book shown to be at any rate not a necessary one. Sin does not always bring suffering, and suffering does not always imply sin. But this result is something very different from denying altogether such a relation between the two, a denial which would at a blow cut away the ground from under the religious life of Prophets and Psalmists. (3) The character of sin as affecting God comes in for treatment incidentally. Expression is given to two false guesses: (a) that God watches man's transgressions with something approaching satisfaction, Job 14$^{16.17}$; (b) that human sin cannot affect Him, Job 7^{20} RV; cf. Elihu in 35^{6}. Of these (a) is merely one of the rash words which fall from the sufferer, but (b), as confirmed by Elihu, shows Jewish thought strongly, perhaps dangerously, in reaction against its earlier anthropopathic conceptions.

Ecclesiastes contributes little except the final decisive conviction of the universality of sinfulness, 'Surely there is not a righteous man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not' (Ec 7^{20}).

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—Sirach.—As in Proverbs, so in Sirach the righteous and the wicked under various names form two great classes over against one another (33$^{12-15}$), and it is to the former class only that the writer addresses himself. Fools are incapable of amendment. Turning from sin (8^{5}) is only the repentance of the righteous; and, with the exception of 17$^{25f.}$, the attitude of Sirach prefigures that attitude towards sinners which it was the great work of Jesus to challenge and set aside by His example (Lk 15^{2}). Yet Sirach denies to sinners the excuse that they cannot help themselves. It is not God who causes man to sin (see above, I. ii.). The author's assertion of human freedom and responsibility is striking and powerful, if somewhat too broad (Sir 15$^{11-20}$). It is not in any degree limited by the statement of 25^{24} that Eve's sin brought death upon the race, for the inheritance of death by every man does not necessarily imply a doctrine of original sin.* The philosophy of

* See important art. by F. R. Tennant (Journal Theol. Studies, ii. 6, p. 207), published since this art. was written. He sums up thus: 'The Fall (according to Sirach) was the cause of death, but only the beginning of sin.' Cf. Thackeray, l.c.

Sirach accounts for physical evil in creation as a necessary complement to moral evil in man, and designed for its punishment; see Sir 39$^{28-31}$ 40$^{8-11}$.

Wisdom of Solomon.—In this book, notwithstanding the totally different atmosphere produced by (1) a hope full of immortality (3^{4}), and (2) the practical identification of Wisdom with the Spirit of God (9^{17}), the ground thought is the same as that of Sirach, namely, that sin is ignorance, and that it is the intellectual side of man that must by 'discipline' be fortified against it. The character of the book is therefore, at first sight, in the strongest contrast with the words of Christ, 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes' (Mt 11^{25}). Yet if the above-mentioned identification of Wisdom with the Holy Spirit be pressed a little further, the contradiction disappears (cf. 1 Co 2^{13}). It should be noted that Wis 12$^{10f.}$, which appears to make for a doctrine of inborn sin, applies only to the Canaanites, and not to mankind at large. The idea of the derivation of a universal taint from Adam's transgression is altogether wanting.

Prayer of Manasses.—We here encounter the first unqualified presentation of the later Judaic belief in the complete sinlessness of the patriarchs ('Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which have not sinned against thee,' 4). This attribute was extended afterwards to many other OT personages (see Weber, Jüd. Theol.^{2} pp. 32 and 54 ff.). Lk 15^{7} does not necessarily admit the existence of absolute human sinlessness, and must be interpreted, ad hominem, as addressed to Pharisees and scribes (see 15^{2}) in a spirit not far removed from irony. St. Paul expressly dissociates himself from the above tendency (Ro 3^{23}), but Rev 14$^{1-5}$ seems to show traces of it.

2 Esdras (chs. 3–14).—This book ought in strictness to be dealt with separately, as being post-Christian (prob. A.D. 81–96). Its close relation (along with Apoc. Baruch, see BARUCH [APOCALYPSE OF]) to the line of thought in the Ep. to Romans has been fully brought out in Sanday-Headlam, Romans; see esp. p. 137. We learn from 2 Esdras that at the time at which it was written there was in Judaism a doctrine of inborn inherited sin. It is hard to see how such a doctrine could be expressed more definitely than is the case in 2 Es 4^{30} 'a grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time.' In the light of this passage the less clear utterances of 2 Es 3$^{21f.}$ and 7^{48} become unambiguous. On the side of human free-will Sanday-Headlam (l.c.) quote 2 Es 8^{59} 9^{11} and esp. Apoc. Bar 54$^{15.\,19}$. They truly remark that both works 'lay stress at once on the inherited tendency to sin, and on the freedom of choice in those who give way to it' (p. 134). If the biblical doctrine of sin finds its most important expression in Romans, then 2 Esdras, as illustrating Romans, has a special value for the study of the subject. Cf. Thackeray, l.c.

III. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—Terminology.—

1. The ἁμαρτάνειν group. Ἁμαρτία may mean sin as a habit, a state, a power (so freq. in Romans), and also a single act of sin; while ἁμάρτημα is restricted to the latter; see Westcott, Epp. John, Add. Note on 1 Jn 1^{9}.

2. παράβασις, transgression; παράπτωμα, trespass (more precisely, fall or declination). 'These two words are closely allied, referring respectively to the consequences on the agent and to the line transgressed. Both presuppose the existence of a law' (Lightfoot, Notes on Epp. St. Paul, Ro 5^{20}), and herein they differ from ἁμαρτία. While law multiplies transgression, it reveals sin.

3. ἀνομία, AV iniquity. The word had been so coloured by its LXX use, as a frequent rendering of עָוֹן and other words meaning sin, that its proper sense, violation of law, can be certainly recognized only in one passage, 1 Jn 3^{4}. In its strict sense it truly represents the conception of sin given in the Epp. of James and John.

4. ἀσέβεια. As ἀνομία is disregard and defiance of God's law, so ἀσέβεια is the same attitude towards God's Person. It expresses the insult and blasphemy involved in sin.

5. ἀδικία. This word brings forward that side of sin which is against our neighbour and does him a wrong, and as such is common to human and to Divine law (see Westcott, Epp. John 5^{17}, note for relation of ἀδικία to ἁμαρτία).

6. ὀφείλημα. Though occurring but once, it has a special importance from being the term for sin chosen by the Lord Himself to be used by us in our daily prayer for forgiveness, the Lukan form ἁμαρτίας (Lk 11^{4}) being probably a paraphrase (see Chase, The Lord's Prayer, p. 54 ff.).—Other words for sin are rather aspects of it, such as falsehood, darkness, ignorance, and do not come under terminology.

i. SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—Looking back on the OT as a whole, we are struck with the range and completeness of the doctrine of sin which it presents. This accounts for a feature in Christ's teaching as given in the Synoptic Gospels which would otherwise be surprising, namely, the paucity of teaching about sin. Sin is mentioned almost exclusively in connexion with its forgiveness. Jesus appears as one who forgives sin, and not as insisting and enlarging on it, or as convicting of it. It is obvious how different would have been the effect of His ministry on the world, if it had been primarily a ministry of conviction of sin. In the Fourth Gospel He explicitly disclaims such an aim (Jn 12^{47}), thus confirming the impression derived from the Synoptists. At the same time it is forgiveness, not indifference. There is no trace of the Ritschlian view, that till He came all sin was practically ignorance, and that sinners only needed to lay aside their sense of guilt. That ignorance, even where it exists, is but a partial and not a sufficient excuse, appears in Lk 12^{47}, and the explanation of that passage is that moral ignorance is never total, and only comes near totality by man's own fault. The sharp distinction between sins of ignorance which are forgivable, and sins without ignorance which are not, is untrue to life. The man who sins from ignorance has still some spark of knowledge which is enough to condemn him, and the man who sins against light has still some ignorance, for how can a man in his present limitations realize the gravity of the issues which are presented to him here? For the first point see Lk 23^{34}; the soldiers in their ignorance, nevertheless, need forgiveness; and for the second see the lament over Jerusalem, Lk 19^{42}.

The Lord's teaching as to sin, so far as He touched it, was not so much to correct OT doctrine regarding it, as much rather to get rid of a spurious development of it, represented by the legalism and casuistry of the Jewish scribes. The character of prophetic invective appears in one class of discourses only—those addressed to the Pharisees. We are next led to consider what exceptions must be made to the general statement above as to the absence in the Gospels of denunciations of sin. They are as follows:—

(1) Hypocrisy, (2) offences (σκάνδαλα), (3) sin against the Holy Ghost. It will be seen that two of these are closely cognate, and all three attach more or less to the same class of persons.

(1) Hypocrisy, defined Mt 23^{5} 'all their works they do for to be seen of men.' It is in a great degree a new revelation of sin, for the words in OT tr. 'hypocrite' have not that meaning (see art. HYPOCRITE). Yet although no corresponding Heb. word occurs, the condition of soul is described in Is 29^{13}, and is quoted as such by Christ (Mk 7^{6}). Further, it had already been brought as a charge against the Sadducees by the Pharisees, ἀνθρωπάρεσκοι being used to denote hypocrites (Ps-Sol 4$^{8.\,10}$). They were now to have the reproach cast back upon themselves by Christ.—(2) Offences. This sin is fairly prominent in OT; as, for instance, the sin of Hophni and Phinehas, who made the Lord's people to transgress (1 S 2^{24}), and still more the sin of Jeroboam. The offence (σκάνδαλον) may be within the man and limited in its operation to him, as in Mt 18^{8} and perhaps 1 Jn 2^{10}. Or it may involve two persons, the cause of the offence being in one person and the actual stumbling taking place in another, as in Mt 18^{6}. Subdividing this latter alternative, we find that the cause of stumbling may be in itself positively sinful, as in the OT instances quoted above, and again as in the attitude of the Pharisees towards Christ, which turned the multitude away from Him. Another instance is that of Simon Peter, whose counsel was an 'offence' to Christ Himself (Mt 16^{23}). Or, secondly, the cause of offence may be in itself quite an innocent act, as in Ro 14^{5}, and only sinful because of its easily foreseen consequences (Ro 14^{21}). This principle explains the otherwise unnecessary payment of the half-shekel (Mt 17^{27}). Yet, further, the act causing offence may be not only innocent, but necessary in itself, in which case its incidental consequences cannot make it sinful. Christ Himself, His sayings, His cross, are all described in NT as 'offences.' The general teaching, if we anticipate and include St. Paul's development of the subject, is that we are bound to look forward to the probable consequences of our actions, even when those consequences are far from our intentions. Ro 14 grows naturally out of Mt 18^{6}. Nothing is gained by confounding, as Clemen does (Lehre von der Sünde, p. 216 ff.), the sin of causing offences with the general topic of the self-propagation of sin, and its power to bring men into bondage, on which see below, § ii. 2.—(3) Sin against the Holy Ghost. This was exemplified in, but is not to be limited to, the attribution to evil spirits of the work of the Holy Spirit in the actions and words of Christ. For a probable explanation of the different judgments pronounced by Christ on blasphemy against the Holy Spirit and that against the Son of man, see art. BLASPHEMY. The persistent denial of the inspiration of Jesus by those who in some measure felt the truth of His claims was an unpardonable sin. The three passages, Mt $12^{31.32}$, Mk $3^{28.29}$, Lk 12^{10}, are, like most of the Lord's teaching, not a new unrelated utterance, but rather a republication and adaptation to the Kingdom of God of the ancient law of blasphemy, Lv 24^{16}. It must be added that the unpardonable sin does not consist in the utterance of particular words, but in the condition of soul which is expressed by them, namely, that persistent resistance to the Holy Ghost which was afterwards emphasized by Stephen (Ac 7^{51})

Taking a general survey, it may be said that there are three points which appear specially in the Synoptists of which the last is by far the most important. (1) An extension of the area of sin by the spiritual interpretation of the Mosaic law, and by the new requirements of the Kingdom of God. (2) A limitation of its area by the great principle now clearly formulated, that sin cannot be contracted by physical contact with things ceremonially unclean, but must proceed from within (Mk 7^{15}, Mt 15^{11}). (3) The Lord's own attitude towards sin in man as a revelation of God's attitude to it, namely forgiveness. The message which He brought and which He entrusted to the apostles (Lk 24^{47}) was the forgiveness of sins, and it is this which we find them declaring in Acts and expanding in the Epistles.

ii. THE FOURTH GOSPEL. — The same note is struck by St. John at the outset: 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1^{29}). Yet His coming and gracious work opened the possibility of a new sin, that sin of rejection of salvation which overshadows so largely the first twelve chapters of the Fourth Gospel, and reappears under other circumstances in the Ep. to the Hebrews (He 2^{3} 4^{1} $6^{4.5}$ 10^{26}).

1. In short, the principal teaching as to sin in the Fourth Gospel is the capital nature of the sin of unbelief in Jesus as the Christ the Son of God. There had been unbelief in Galilee, and that unbelief had called forth the severe denunciation in Lk 10^{12-16}. But the unbelief of Judæa was far more marked and general, and the gospel of the Judæan ministry is darkened everywhere by collision with it. This is the sin of which the Holy Spirit will specially convict men, 'of sin because they believe not on me.' Could this sin be regarded as a sin of ignorance? It could not, for Christ had come and manifested Himself. 'If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no excuse for their sin' (Jn 15^{22}). We are here close to the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has been already treated. That is a special and aggravated form of the more general sin of unbelief.

It may be added that the sin of unbelief in Jesus as the Christ the Son of God holds in the NT much the same position which idolatry holds in the OT. In each case the sin is the worst sin that can be committed, because it cuts off the soul from God, and so from the source of its life and peace. It is an evil heart of unbelief falling away from the living God (He 3^{12}).

2. The second important point in the Fourth Gospel is its emphasis on sin as bondage. The direct teaching is brief, contained in six verses in Jn $8^{31ff.}$, but the development afterwards given it by St. Paul in Ro 6 places it in the front of NT teaching on sin. It is perhaps anticipated in Mt 6^{24} 'ye cannot serve God and mammon.'

3. There are also lesser points worthy of notice. The old question of the connexion of sin and suffering is raised in Jn 9, and its universality is there denied; while, on the other hand, it is clear that it holds good in some cases, as appears in 5^{14} 'sin no more, lest a worse thing befall thee.' The passage in Lk 13 as to the slaughter of the Galilæans is not precisely to the point, as what is there taught is the general guilt of the nation of which only these few had as yet paid the penalty. Another class of passages bearing on the subject is that distinctive one in which this Gospel gives us, far more fully than the others—the Lord's dealings with individual souls. What is remarkable is His gentleness towards their sins, as, for instance, Jn $4^{17.18}$ and 8^{11}.

Lastly, we must observe that the principal teaching as to sin in the Gospels, taken as a whole, is that which results from the revelation of a perfect standard of life as shown in Christ. As Ritschl says (vol. iii. Eng. tr. p. 329), 'The only way in which the idea of sin can be formed at all is by comparison with the good.' It is true that Ritschl presses this too far, and seems to imply that no competent standard of morality had existed before the preaching of the Kingdom of God. 'But to affirm the absolute standard is not to deny the relative standard. God was in the preparation for the Kingdom of God as in the realization of that Kingdom in Christ' (Garvie, Ritschlian Theology, p. 303). We must, nevertheless, allow that the coming of Christ and the preaching of the gospel did give a new character to sin. Sin was thus placed in a new relation, that of opposition to the Kingdom of God, and yet, further, it was shown, as in the parable of the Prodigal, to be not only sin against power and wisdom, but also against goodness and love.

iii. EPISTLES.—1. St. James.—Three passages deserve special consideration. (a) The genesis of sin in the individual (Ja $1^{14.15}$). It comes from the will consenting to a desire for something not lawful. The desire in itself may be innocent (see art. LUST), but, in the case supposed, it can only be gratified at the expense of transgression of moral law. The will surrenders, and the desire is fulfilled in an act of sin (cf. $4^{1.2}$). Desire (ἐπιθυμία) here corresponds nearly to 'the flesh' of St. Paul's theology. To understand the bearing of the passage, see Sir $15^{11ff.}$, which perhaps suggested it. There the source of evil lies in the freedom of the will. The fact that this freedom is God's gift does not make Him the author of evil, for it is freedom. (b) Sin in relation to law. The Law, rather than Christ, is the central thought of the Epistle, but it is the Law as revealed and interpreted by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount and in His life. It is a perfect law (1^{25}); a law of freedom, i.e. not enforced from without, but freely accepted as the aim and desire of the subject of it (1^{25} 2^{12}); a royal law (2^{8}). There is also the thought of the solidarity of the Law, with its consequences on the doctrine of sin. Conscious, wilful transgression of any one point is tantamount to transgression of the whole, for, all being God's will, any transgression is defiance of God's will (2^{10}). This, so far from being a pedantic conception, is founded on a true spiritual view of the relation of man to God. It is applied to an apparently small matter—respect of persons within the Church, and preference given to the rich over the poor. It must be added that the passage does not justify us in inferring the equality of all sins. It is rather a warning against regarding lesser sins as of no consequence. (c) Forgiveness of sin (5^{15-20}). Two points deserve notice. (1) The mediation of the Christian community, not of the elders only, in the forgiveness of sins (εὔχεσθε ὑπὲρ ἀλλήλων, v.^{16}). This mediation is effected by mutual confession and prayer. It may extend even to the case of a Christian who has actually forsaken the truth (v.^{19}), and every member of the Church is bidden to consider the blessing which may attend his efforts. The sins covered are certainly those of the sinner who is converted (see Toy on Pr 10^{12}). (2) The close connexion in the writer's mind between forgiveness of sin and healing. The passage begins simply with the idea of a case of sickness (v.^{14}), and goes on to assume that it may perhaps be occasioned by sin (cf. the forgiveness of the paralytic, Mt 9^{2}). The removal of the chastisement and the forgiveness of the sin which occasioned it go together; cf. Ps 103^{3}, which was interpreted in this sense.

2. Hebrews.—The persons addressed had to the full the sense of sin which the OT had prepared and developed, and they had had to part with the ritual which had hitherto cleansed them and brought them nigh. A main purpose of the Epistle is to show them that better provision than the Law could offer is made for these needs in Christ and His priestly sacrifice. Hence the prominent aspect of sin in this Epistle is that of sin as guilt, as the cause of the separation between man and God, barring access to Him. The work of Christ is the restoration of communion, and the earlier portion of the Epistle reaches its goal in He 10^{19}. Besides the general teaching as to the removal of guilt, the Epistle deals with a particular form of sin, that of falling away from grace. It is written to men in danger of lapsing into their former Judaism, not merely as individuals, but as a body (see $6^{4ff.}$ $10^{26ff.}$). The sin as to which the Hebrews are warned is not ordinary sin after baptism to which every Christian is liable, but nothing less than apostasy. It should also be observed that He 2^{10} sets a final seal on the gradually developed conviction that much of human suffering is not a consequence of sin, but a means to perfection.

3. St. Paul.—Lechler (Apostolic Times, Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 340) asks what is the kernel, the life-centre of St. Paul's Christian feeling and doctrine, and replies, 'God's grace in Christ towards the guilt-laden sinner.' It is not merely that St. Paul as a theologian felt that the most important aspect of the gospel was that of a remedy for sin, but that the gospel was that remedy for himself. He had felt as few men have felt, his own sinfulness. In this respect we recognize a contrast between him and other NT writers. If it is in the Epistle to the Romans that we find the full development of St. Paul's hamartiology, it is because the question there propounded is, How is man to be righteous before God? For that purpose man's present sinfulness must first be set forth, and that is done systematically in Ro 1–3^{20}, and incidentally throughout the Epistle. The teaching of St. Paul, esp. in Romans, on the subject will be considered under the following heads: (a) universality of sin; (b) heredity of sin; (c) the seat of sin; (d) sin as a power; (e) sin and law; (f) sin and death; (g) death to sin.

(a) Universality of sin.—The Jewish and the Gentile worlds had to be dealt with separately. In the Jewish world there had been preparation, but sin against ceremonial law had been so exaggerated as to put out of sight sin against moral law. Here St. Paul follows Christ Himself, and his exposure in Ro $2^{17ff.}$ reminds us of Mt 23 and many scattered sayings in the Gospels. Another point regarding Jewish sinfulness has already been noticed under II. (Prayer of Manasses). St. Paul rejects the supposed sinlessness of the patriarchs. We next take his condemnation of the Gentile world, which in Romans comes first. This had become necessary now that the gospel of forgiveness was offered to the Gentiles. It was true that they had had their preparation. The notion of sin is clear enough in Babylonian, Egyptian, and Persian religion, but it is mainly ceremonial sin. In Greek religion there was a truer conception of sin, which reaches its highest representation in Æschylus, the poet of Divine retribution on the sinner. 'The "Prometheus," the "Seven against Thebes," and the "Orestes" contain a natural testimony of the soul to the reality of sin, and the inevitable penalty which it carries in itself' (Westcott, Religious Thought in the West, p. 94).

But to accompany a gospel of forgiveness some clear arraignment was needed. So, in an epistle addressed to the centre of the Gentile world, this clear arraignment stands in the front. And here the doctrine of the universality of Gentile sin is set on a true foundation, not on the popular Jewish conception that every Gentile was a sinner simply as not knowing the Mosaic law (cf. Gal 2^{15}, and Lightfoot, in loc.). But, as the sin of the Gentiles did not consist in not having the Mosaic law, so neither did their want of it excuse them. They had the law of conscience or reason (Ro 2^{14-16}), and sin against this was sin against God.

(b) Heredity of sin.—Here we must distinguish two separate ideas, both of which find expression in Romans, namely, (1) participation in guilt; (2) inheritance of sinful disposition.

(1) In the OT (to use Dorner's words, System Chr. Doct., Eng. tr. vol. ii. p. 325) are already found 'the materials for a conception of moral evil as a generic characteristic, and not merely a matter of the individual person.' A family, a tribe, a nation are conscious of a solidarity in respect of guilt and innocence difficult to realize in an age of strongly developed individual responsibility. It is enough to refer to the guilt in the sense of liability to punishment brought about by the sin of Achan, and by David's census; and to the effect of sin on the land itself (Dt 24^{4}). So St. Paul, contemplating not merely a family, tribe, or nation, but all mankind, sees them all affected by the sin of Adam—all reconciled by the obedience of Christ (Ro 5^{12-21} and cf. Sir 25^{24}). The correspondence between Adam and Christ has taken hold of his mind, it helps him to set forth the work of salvation which the Lord has accomplished. It is not that Adam's sin is actually reckoned against us, but that we are because of it involved in punishment.*

This effect on mankind of the sin of Adam may be inferred (according to Ro 5^{13}) from the death of Adam's descendants who lived before the law was given. In the absence of law they were not liable to punishment. To account for their mortality, 'generic' guilt must be assumed. It is evident that such an argument cannot be pressed absolutely, but must be correlated with the statement as to Gentile responsibility without the Law (Ro 2^{12-16}); see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 5^{13}.

(2) But besides generic participation in Adam's guilt we have also to consider the doctrine of the inheritance from Adam of a sinful nature. In OT the transmission of a sinful nature from parent to child is clearly admitted (Ps 51^{5}, Job 14^{4}), but it is not traced back to Adam. It is a question whether St. Paul so traces it, for neither Ro 5^{12} nor 5^{19} is decisive on the point. Taking the section (Ro 5^{12-21}) as a whole, it is difficult to disentangle with certainty the ideas of a transmitted sinful disposition, or of an actual sinfulness of all men, from the idea of the generic guilt of mankind (described above) with which they are closely interwoven. The latter is certainly the leading though not the only thought (cf. v.^{12} ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον) of the passage, which is occupied much more with the reign of death than with the reign of sin. The view taken of the sin of Adam is not so much that thereby human nature was infected in itself, but rather that thereby sin, an alien power, got a footing in the world, and, involving all men in actual sin, brought death upon all. This is very far short of the Augustinian doctrine of Original Sin, which appears to be a development of 2 Es 3^{21} 4^{30} rather than of anything to be found in NT. The language of St. Paul ('sin came into the world,' Ro 5^{12}) leaves room for the communication of a sinful tendency, not only by heredity in the strict sense of the word, but also by all that interpenetration of the individuals by the race which makes it impossible to regard them as isolated atoms dependent only on birth for their characteristics.[*]

(c) The seat of sin.—Strictly speaking, this is in the will; but in a wider sense its seat is in that which moves the will, namely, in 'the flesh.' 'The flesh' in St. Paul denotes not merely sensual desires and appetites, but 'man's entire life so far as it is not determined by the Spirit of God.' It may thus denote also man's rational nature. The fleshly mind is 'the God-resisting disposition in virtue of which man in self-sufficiency and pride opposes himself to God, and withdraws himself from the spirit of Divine life and love.'[†] In short, 'the flesh' is man in his selfishness. But neither the flesh in the material sense, nor human nature on the whole, are in themselves evil; for the body may be brought into subjection (1 Co 9^{27}), may become a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6^{19}), and its members may be 'servants to righteousness unto sanctification.'

(d) Sin as a power.—St. Paul regards sin not as an isolated act, nor as an accumulation of acts, but as a power which has gained a lodgment in man (Ro 7^{17}), enslaving and paralyzing his will. 'The flesh' is only the material medium in which it works. Cf. above, Prefatory (2), and Jn 8^{34}, and see esp. Sanday-Headlam on Ro 5^{12-21}, p. 145.

(e) Sin and law.—Here we have something new, new as the result of conscious reflexion, yet the result of what has gone before. St. Paul looks back on the history of the nation, and of his own spiritual experience, and sees (Ro 8^{3}) τὸ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου (the inability of the Law) for the restraint of sin. The result of law, by itself, must always be sin rather than righteousness. It provoked and revealed sin. 'The strength of sin is the law' (1 Co 15^{56}).

(f) Sin and death.—St. Paul, as stated above (b), regarded physical death as the consequence of the Fall, and argues from this premiss in Ro 5^{12-21}. But it is probable that he (like the author of Wisdom) did not separate strictly the conceptions of physical and moral death. He uses the words 'death' and 'life' with a breadth which makes it difficult to say in any particular case which kind of death he is attributing to sin as its effect, e.g. Ro $6^{21.\,23}$. To him physical death is but the symbol of its far more terrible moral counterpart, final separation from God, and the extinction of the life of the Spirit; cf. Ja 1^{15}. See Beyschlag, NT Theol., Eng. tr. vol. ii. p. 55 ff.

(g) Death to sin.—The wide use of the idea of 'death,' illustrated above, enabled it to be applied to any absolute final separation of objects hitherto closely related. Hence the entry into union with Christ is death to sin (Ro 6^{1-14}). All that St. Paul has to say on the sinfulness of the flesh, on sin as an inmate of the soul, on sin as a ruling power, relates to the state before justification. The Christian is, as such, dead to sin. St. Paul contemplates the Church (as in Eph. passim) and the Christian in their ideal state. But he is no dreamer; he knows how incompletely the ideal is realized. His delineation of it is his mode of expressing the imperative. His hopefulness as to its realization is not mere opinion, but the experience of a man who himself had felt what he taught, of a teacher who had entered into the heart of the gospel. The doctrine of St. John (see below) converges to the same goal, starting from a different point, and expressed in different phrases. And it must be remembered that 'death to sin' is not equivalent to insensibility to temptation; it is rather deliverance from bondage.

4. St. John (Epistles).—(a) The great contribution which 1 John makes to the doctrine of sin is a paradox. Nowhere is the reality of sin more strongly insisted on as occurring in the Christian life, and nowhere is the sinlessness of the Christian more distinctly asserted. In 1 Jn 1 the sinfulness of Christians is presented in three different aspects (reality, responsibility, fact; see Westcott, in loc.). Again, it is involved in the very purpose of the Epistle (1 Jn 2^{1}, and cf. 5^{16}). But in 1 Jn $3^{6.\,9}$ and 5^{18} he who is begotten of God and abides in God does not, cannot, sin. St. John is not intentionally putting these opposing statements side by side, but they are called out by different forms of error (πλάνη). While some denied in various ways the reality of sin, others were under the delusion that, for the enlightened, conduct is a matter of indifference. The answer to the first was this: we have sin (1^{8}); and, to the second, whosoever abideth in Him sinneth not (3^{6}). So far as we sin we fall short of our position as children of God abiding in Him. There must be infirmities needing repeated advocacy and propitiation ($2^{1.\,2}$), but the choice of the man is against all sin, and towards complete conformity to the will of God. He still needs to purify himself (3^{3}); but sin is no longer at the centre of the inner life, it has been driven out to the circumference. Further, St. John goes on to teach a certain security against sin, regarded as coming from without. 'The evil one toucheth him not' (5^{18}). The Christian abides in Christ and is 'kept.' The agency of Satan in occasioning human sin is strongly marked in this Epistle (3^{8-12} $5^{18.\,19}$), as it had been also in the Lord's teaching recorded by St. John (Jn 8^{44}). On the whole section cf. above iii. 3 (g). (b) A second but less important point in 1 John is the sin unto death (5^{16}). It is inconceivable that this should be some particular kind of sin, the name of which is concealed. A classification of sins as mortal and venial, though not without its grounds and its uses, is alien from the spirit of the gospel, which teaches us that the guilt of sins is estimated by their conditions rather than by the actual thing done. The sin unto death is nearly related to, but not the same as, the sin against the Holy Ghost; again, it is also nearly related to the sin of wilful apostasy, already treated under Ep. to Hebrews. But the three must not be identified. Any sin wilfully persisted in would satisfy the conditions of 1 Jn 5^{16}, and the 'sin unto death' is perhaps to be regarded as a genus under which the two sins above mentioned are to be classed. St. John does not forbid intercession for such a case, he only says that such a case is not what he is speaking about, and that he cannot attach a distinct promise to such intercession. characteristic of these Epistles is the representation of sin and righteousness in the aspect of falsehood and truth (cf. above, Sin in Psalms). Sin is falsehood. It came in with the primal lie, 'thou shalt not die' (cf. Jn 8^{44}). It rests for its power upon deceit. But the life of love is the life of truth; it corresponds with the movement of the Divine government, with its purposes of mercy, with the Being and attributes of God (2 Jn $^{1-4}$).

SIN (סִין; Σάϊς, Συήνη, A in Ezk 30^{15} Τάνις; Vulg. Pelusium).—A city in Egypt mentioned in Ezk $30^{15f.}$ along with Pathros (Upper Egypt), Zoan (Tanis), Sin, No (Thebes), Noph (Memphis), Aven (Heliopolis), Pi-beseth (Bubastis), and Tehaphnehes (Daphnæ). Arranging these in geographical order, we find them to be the most important cities in the N.E. of the Delta and along its eastern edge leading to Memphis, the capital of Lower Egypt, followed by Pathros (Upper Egypt) and its capital No. Sin is characterized by Ezek. as 'the stronghold of Egypt' (RV), yet it is not mentioned by Jeremiah. LXX tr. it by Sais (the capital of the 26th Dynasty, in power at the time of the prophecy), or Syene, the southern frontier. The latter identification is, however, impossible. In all probability Sin is Pelusium. The name Sin seems, like Pelusium, to be connected with 'mud'; and a modern name that clings to the neighbourhood of Pelusium is eṭ-Ṭîneh, which is from the same root as Sîn. Unfortunately, nothing is known of the history of Pelusium before the time of Herodotus, in whose days it was a place of importance owing to the development of commerce by sea; and soon it became the key of Egypt on the N.E., as in the Persian war and long afterwards (Her. ii. 17, 154, iii. 10). From the wording of Ezek. it would seem to have held this position at a date when Daphnæ was still a great garrison city, guarding the approach to Memphis. The ancient Egyptian name of Pelusium is still unknown. In Coptic it is Peremûn, in Arab. el-Fermâ. The ruins are about a mile distant from the sea in the extreme N.E. corner of the Delta. They consist of a long narrow mound parallel to the sea, containing ruins of a temple and a large red brick enclosure, evidently a Byzantine or Arab fortress. At the E. extremity, after a slight gap, is another high mound, nearly touching the desert, and crowned by a structure of red brick. These brick buildings are of the Arab. period. West and south all is barren salt marsh, without a living soul for miles; the marsh is now indeed intersected by the Suez canal, which brings human beings within 20 miles. Yet even down to the 11th cent. A.D. el-Fermâ was a large city, and the country round, though marshy, was to a great extent cultivated and populous. Near the shore were salt-pans, and places for salting fish. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (מִדְבַּר־סִין; LXX ἡ ἔρημος Σ(ε)ίν; Vulg. desertum Sin).—This 'wilderness' is described in Ex 16^1 as between Elim and Sinai; in 17^1 an encampment in Rephidim is mentioned between Sin and the wilderness of Sinai; and in the itinerary of Nu 33 an encampment by the Red Sea is inserted between Elim and the wilderness of Sin, and two other camping-places besides Rephidim between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai. On the supposition that the traditional site of Sinai is the correct one, the encampment by the sea is generally placed at the end of Wādy Tayibeh, near Râs Abu Selimeh, and the wilderness of Sin may be the open plain a little to the south of this headland. Others put it in Wādy Schellal or Wādy Budrah. This wilderness appears to be different from the wilderness of ZIN (Nu 13^{21} 20^1 27^{14} 33^{36} $34^{3.4}$, Dt 32^{51}, Jos $15^{1.3}$), in which the Israelites encamped after leaving Mt. Sinai, but the student cannot fail to notice the close similarity of the three names Sinai, Sin, Zin. A. T. CHAPMAN.

SINAI, MOUNT (סִינַי, Σ(ε)ινά).—The impressions derived from a study of the wanderings of the children of Israel as they are recorded in the Scriptures, are found to undergo important modifications as soon as the biblical tradition is supplemented by an actual topographical survey of the peninsula at the head of the Red Sea, which takes its name from Mt. Sinai, and is supposed to contain the famous mountain where the Law was said to have been given to Israel. For while the student of the Scriptures without their topographical supplement would conclude that the route of the Exodus lay entirely outside the pale of civilization, the student of the country is able to affirm with certainty that there was an actual civilization in the peninsula itself; that there were important mines, with at least one port of debarkation for ships coming from Egypt; and that the country was intersected by trade routes which connected the upper end of the Red Sea with regions lying farther north and east; the mines alluded to being contemporary with the earliest Egyptian dynasties, and the trade routes being also, in all probability, of extreme antiquity. And not only are there within the limits of the so-called Sinaitic peninsula the marks of an astonishingly early stage of civilization, but there is also the indication of the existence of early forms of religion, far removed from the semi-fetishism of wandering Arab tribes.

One of these forms of religion was the Egyptian, represented by the temples at Sarbut el-Kadeem on the northern route to Mt. Sinai; it was the natural concomitant of the imported Egyptian influence which came in with the officials who had charge of the mining operations in the west of the peninsula. But besides this form of religion there is reason to suspect that Babylonian religion was also represented, for there are traces in the Babylonian literature of mining and quarrying operations in the eastern part of the peninsula and in the adjacent country of Midian, and these traces are very suggestive of religious concomitants, especially when we find a reflexion of the Babylonian theology in the very name of the sacred mountain. Mount Sinai, in fact, is named after the moon-god Sin (cf. the formation of Mordecai from the name of Marduk); and if this be so, it was from the earliest times a place of sanctity, and the routes that converge upon it would easily acquire the character of ḥaj routes or pilgrim roads. There is therefore no a priori difficulty in the account of the wandering of the children of Israel to a sacred mount, nor any need to regard the sanctity of the place as acquired in the time of the Exodus, or projected back upon the story by later chroniclers.

The real problem lies in the identification of the mountain described in the Pent., especially in view of the fact that the whole of the peninsula is a mass of mountains, many of which are conspicuous objects in the landscape, and certain to have early attracted attention and invited nomenclature. We are assuming that Mt. Sinai is somewhere in the tongue of land at the head of the Red Sea, between the two arms of that sea which constitute respectively the Gulf of 'Aḳaba and the Gulf of Suez. It should, however, be remembered that Sayce thinks he has grounds for locating Mt. Sinai outside the peninsula and in the land of Midian itself. In this he is following in some points an earlier and more fantastic suggestion of Beke. The advantage of such a theory lies in the fact (1) that Mt. Sinai is closely connected with the land of Midian in the biblical account. Thither Moses escapes from the wrath of Pharaoh, and while engaged in pastoral occupations in that land he sees the theophany of the burning bush. Moreover, his wife and her relations are Midianite. The general opinion is that Midian is on the farther side of 'Aḳaba to the east and north, and that special evidence is needed if we would include in it the surroundings of the traditional Mt. Sinai. (2) The theory furnishes a new explanation of the encampment of the Israelites by the sea, which on this theory is the Gulf of 'Aḳaba; (3) it finds a site for the much-disputed Elim in the modern Aileh (ancient Eloth); (4) it explains why nothing is said about the exquisite valley of Feiran by a writer who is so careful to record the palm-trees and springs (certainly of a much inferior quality) at Elim; the identification of Rephidim with Feiran is, on this hypothesis, incorrectly made.

The theory is not lightly to be set aside; the main objection to it lies in the itinerary (which appears to have been one of daily marches along a conventional road). No satisfactory attempt has been made to trace this itinerary to the E. or N. of the Gulf of 'Aḳaba.

Setting aside, then, the theory of a (trans-'Aḳaba) Midianite Sinai as inconsistent with the most natural interpretation of the biblical traditions, we proceed to determine the most likely spot within the peninsula to which those traditions can be referred. And first of all we may clear away the apparent confusion between Horeb and Sinai which occurs in the Pent., and has often been perplexing to commentators who had to reconcile such expressions as 'to the mountain of God, even to Horeb' (Ex 3[1]), with which cf. 1 K 19[8], where Elijah is said to have come 'to the mountain of God, even to Horeb.' Here and in other places 'the mountain of God' is identified with Horeb, i.e. Sinai and Horeb are practically interchangeable. An examination of the sources of the narrative will show that Horeb is the term used for the seat of the Deity in E and D, while Sinai is the term used in J and P. According to the sources, then, we can only say that the centre of the worship of J″ is in Horeb according to the northern tribes, and in Sinai according to the southern; and no further help is forthcoming for the location of Horeb (which may simply mean 'waste').

Returning to the question of the actual mountain involved in the tradition, we have a remarkable divergence of opinion amongst critics and travellers, not a few of whom (especially Lepsius and Ebers) have sought to identify the biblical Sinai with Mt. Serbal, which rises just above the oasis of Feiran to the south. It may be admitted that Serbal is a much more conspicuous object than Jebel Musa (the traditional mountain of the Law), although it is not so lofty. It is also true that the centre of early Christian life in the peninsula in the first centuries of the occupation of the holy places is in the Wady Feiran, which stands for the ancient Paran, the seat of an episcopate and the home of innumerable ascetics, whose caves and rude dwellings may still be traced. We need not be surprised, then, if it should be maintained that the special place of sanctity in the peninsula was not far from the Wady Feiran, in which case Serbal can hardly fail to be the holy mountain. In further support of this it is urged that immediately after the battle with Amalek the Israelites are said (Ex 19[2]) to have come to Mt. Sinai, or at all events to the wilderness which bears the name of that mountain, and it would therefore seem that the mountain was at no great distance from Rephidim, which is almost universally identified with the Wady Feiran. So that, when we combine the biblical statement of the proximity of Rephidim to Mt. Sinai with the undoubted fact that Feiran is the primitive Christian metropolis, a strong case is made out for identifying the beautiful and imposing Mount Serbal with the biblical Sinai. Various attempts have further been made, by means of quotations from Cosmas Indicopleustes, Eusebius, Jerome, etc., to show that there has been a monastic translation of the accepted site of Sinai from Serbal to Jebel Musa (cf. Lepsius, Tour from Thebes and the Peninsula of Sinai, 1846, tr. by Cottrell; and Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai, 2nd ed. Leipzig, 1881). And it has been affirmed in accordance with this hypothesis that there was no monastery or monastic settlement in the neighbourhood of Jebel Musa before the convent, called popularly after the name of St. Catherine, was built by Justinian.

Unfortunately for this ingenious hypothesis, it has been reduced almost to absurdity by the discovery of a document which is in itself one of the most interesting of pilgrim itineraries, and which for the settlement of the early Christian tradition has immense weight. We refer to the document known as the Peregrinatio Silviæ, edited in Rome in 1887 by Gamurrini from an imperfect MS, and since reprinted by J. H. Bernard as a volume of the Palestine Pilgrims' Text Society. The pilgrimage in question is dated in the years 385–388 by its editor, and its authorship is assigned with good reason to a lady from Aquitaine. The imperfect MS opens with topographical details which certainly identify the plain of er-Raḥah in front of Jebel Musa ('vallem infinitam ingens* planissima et valde pulchram, et trans vallem apparebat mons sanctus Dei Syna'). And, in fact, the whole of the route which Silvia describes between Egypt and Sinai, and the holy places which she visits, coincide closely with the route and the sanctities recorded in modern books of travel. The theory of the displacement of the traditional Sinai from Serbal to Jebel Musa in the early Christian centuries may therefore be abandoned, and this practically amounts to the final abandonment of the Serbal-Sinai theory itself and the acceptance of the traditional site. Any residual difficulties which are connected with the account of the Exodus and the last stages of the journey to Sinai are probably due to unhistorical elements in the tradition. Mt. Sinai must therefore be sought in the cluster of eminences which includes Jebel Katerina, Jebel Musa, etc. Of these the highest is Jebel Katerina, but it does not appear that any attempt has been successful to find at the foot of Jebel Katerina a suitable place for an Israelite encampment. And in so far as this is the case, the traditional site must be allowed to retain the identification until further light can be thrown on the subject from unexpected quarters.

* Ingens=valde in this document frequently; but here in its natural sense, for she says a little later valle illa quam dixi ingens.

The traditional Sinai is bounded on the north side by the great plain er-Rahah, out of which it rises precipitously; on its east and west sides are wadis named respectively, the one on the east Wady ed-Deir and the one on the west Wady el-Leja. The former takes its name (Valley of the Convent) from the celebrated convent of St. Catherine, which stands upon the slope of the mountain; the derivation of the other name is more obscure. In this western wady are the remains of the convent of the Forty Martyrs (Deir el-Arba'in) and a number of other traces of early monastic life, and by this valley it is customary to make the ascent of Jebel Katerina, which lies to the S.W. of Jebel Musa. The northernmost peak of Jebel Musa is called Ras es-Sufsafeh ('Head of the Willow,' probably from a tree growing in one of its gullies), and is commonly taken as the place of promulgation of the Law, for which it is a very striking and suitable site. The height of Sufsafeh is 6937 ft., while the southern peak is somewhat lower. The latter is the true holy place according to the Greek and Arab tradition. There is an ascent to it by a flight of rude steps commencing not far from the convent, and extending, with slight intermission, almost to the summit.

ADDITIONAL NOTE.—Objections to the traditional site of Mt. Sinai.—In the foregoing we have found ourselves closely in accord with the traditional view of the route of the Exodus, and of the location of Mt. Sinai. If the Israelites really went into the Sinaitic peninsula, the route and the goal of their wanderings have probably been correctly identified. We have shown that the tradition in favour of Jebel Musa is earlier and more constant than has generally been recognized. But the real difficulty begins with the question whether the biblical Mt. Sinai was in the peninsula, after all. Objection after objection has been raised under this head, and some of them are not easy to refute. (1) The biblical references to Mt. Sinai do not seem to warrant an identification in the limits of the peninsula. Dt 1^{2} gives a distance of 11 days from Horeb to the mountains of Seir, and this would agree well enough with the distance from Jebel Musa. But in other passages, such as Dt 33^{2}, Hab 3^{8}, the contiguity between Sinai and Edom seems to be more pronounced: even if we grant a certain freedom of expression to poetical passages, still such language as Dt 33^{2}—

> J″ came from Sinai,
> And rose from Seir unto them, might, in view of Heb. parallelism of the members, imply more than that Sinai was in the direction of Seir. It might be urged in reply that the passage continues—

> He shined forth from Mt. Paran,
> And came from Meribah Kadesh, and Paran has been commonly identified with Feiran in the peninsula. But this identification has also been questioned on account of the parallelism with Kadesh and other references.

(2) Some of the places in the itinerary of Exodus have apparently been found outside the limits of the peninsula, as Elim in Elath-Eloth, and the encampment by the sea in the Gulf of 'Akaba.

(3) Mt. Sinai is suspiciously connected with the land of Midian, and it has to be shown that the Sinaitic peninsula could be thus described. At the time of the Exodus it was an Egyptian province.

These and other objections have been raised against the traditional theory; their resolution depends upon the final discrimination of the documents underlying the Pent. and upon the results of further archæological investigations, not only in the peninsula of Sinai but to the N. and E. of it.

J. RENDEL HARRIS.

SINCERE.—In 1 P 2^{2} 'sincere' is used in the sense of 'unmixed,' 'pure': 'Desire the sincere milk of the word' (τὸ λογικὸν ἄδολον γάλα, Vulg. sine dolo, Wyc. 'with out gile,' Tind. 'which is without corrupcion,' Cran. 'which is with out disceate,' Gen. 'syncere,' Rhem. 'without guile'; RV goes back to Wyc. and Rhem. 'which is without guile'). For 'sincere' in this sense, cf. Rhem. NT, Preface, p. 16, 'We translate that text which is most sincere, and in our opinion, and as we have proved, incorrupt'; and Cranmer, Works, i. 134, 'If there be none other offence laid against them than this one, it will be much more for the conversion of all the fauters hereof, after mine opinion, that their consciences may be clearly averted from the same by communication of sincere doctrine . . . than by the justice of the law to suffer in such ignorance.' J. HASTINGS.

SINGERS, SINGING.—See artt. PRAISE IN OT, and PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

SINGULAR is properly that which concerns a single person or thing; so AV, after Tindale, in Lv 27^{2} 'When a man shall make a singular vow' (יַפְלִא נֶדֶר, RV 'shall accomplish a vow,' RVm 'make a special vow').* So also Knox, Works, iii. 141, 'Without harnes or weaponis (except my sling, staf, and stonis) I durst interpryes singular battell aganis him'; Bp. Davenant, Life, 329, 'For my part, I am of opinion that there is no sane or possible Way for any singular person to attein to the comfortable persuasion that hee is Elected unto Salvation, but a Posteriori.' Cf. the phrase 'all and singular,' as in the Act of Uniformity in K. Edward VI. Second Prayer-Book (1552), 'And for their authority in this behalf, be it further likewise enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all and singular the same Archbishops, Bishops, and all other their officers exercising Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as well in place exempt, as not exempt, within their dioceses, shall have full power and authority, by this act, to reform, correct, and punish, by censure of the Church, all and singular persons which shall offend within any their jurisdictions or Dioceses.'

Then the single person or thing may be regarded as special and remarkable, as Wis 14^{18} 'the singular diligence of the artificer.' Cf. Ridley, Brefe Declaration, 144, 'Origen . . . was compted and judged thi singular teacher in his tyme of Christes religion'; Mt 5^{47} Tind. 'And yf ye be frendly to youre brethren onlye, what singular thynge doo ye?' J. HASTINGS.

SINIM (סִינִים; Πέρσαι; de terra australi).—The 'land of Sinim' (Is 49^{12}) must, from the context, have been in the extreme south or east of the known world. In the south, Sin (Pelusium, Ezk $30^{15f.}$) and Syene (Ezk 29^{10} 30^{6}) have been suggested (the former by Saadya, Bochart, and Ewald; the latter by Cheyne [Introd. to Is. 275, and in SBOT], who would read סְוֵנִים, with J. D. Michaelis, Klostermann, Marti), but these places are perhaps too near. The LXX favours the view that a country in the east was intended, and modern commentators have identified Sinim with China, the land of the Sinæ. The name Tsin was known as early as the 12th cent. B.C.; and it was not improbably familiar to the Phœnicians. There was a trade, at a very early date, between the extreme east and southern Arabia and the Persian Gulf. This interpretation of the name Sinim as referring to China, which was first suggested by Gesenius, is strongly opposed by Dillm. (Jesaja, ad loc.), Duhm, and Richthofen (China, i. 436 f., 504). Dillm. e.g. points out that no Israelites could have been in China at the time of this prophecy, that we should expect צינים not ס׳, and the name Tsin (derived from a dynasty of 255 B.C.) could not have been yet in use in Babylon.

A Canaanite people, Gn 10^{17}=1 Ch 1^{15}. Dillm. (Genesis, ad loc.) compares the name of the ruined city Ṣin, mentioned by Jerome (Quæst.), as not far from Arḳa at the foot of Lebanon. Strabo (XVI. ii. 18) also names a mountain stronghold Ṣinna(n) (Σιννᾶν, accus.) on Lebanon, and a Phœn. city Ṣiânu is named along with Ṣemar and Arḳa in an Assyr. inscription (Del. Paradies, 282; cf. W. M. Müller, As. u. Europ. 289).

SIN-OFFERING.—See Sacrifice, p. 337ᵇ.

SION.—1. (שִׂיאֹן; LXX Σηών) A name of Hermon, Dt 4^{48}. Sion is taken by some to be a textual error for Sirion (שִׂרְיֹן), the Zidonian name of the same mountain, Dt 3^{9}. This view is supported by the reading of the Syr., which, however, is as likely to be a correction of the Hebrew text (Driver, ad loc.). Like Senir, Sion may have originally been the designation of a particular part of Hermon. 2. See Zion. J. A. Selbie.

SIPHMOTH (שִׂפְמוֹת; B Σαφει, A Σαφαμώς; Sephamoth).—One of the places, 'where David and his men were wont to haunt,' to which a portion of the spoil of the Amalekites was sent after David's return to Ziklag (1 S 30^{28}). It is mentioned with Aroer, now 'Ar'arah, to the east of Beer-sheba, and Eshtemoa, now es-Semû'a, in the hill-country S. of Hebron. The site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σαφαμωθ, Sofamoth), and it has not yet been recovered. It was probably in the Negeb to the S. of Eshtemoa. Riehm (HWB) suggests that Zabdi, the Shiphmite (1 Ch 27^{27}), was a native of Siphmoth and not of Shepham—the change from Sh to S being easily made, and a few MSS reading Shiph- for Siph- in 1 Samuel. i. History.—The history of the book, which in the English Bible retained the Latin name Ecclesiasticus, while it is called in German the book (of) Jesus Sirach or, abbreviated, Sirach, falls into two periods, the second beginning on 13th May 1896, when S. Schechter, Talmudic reader in the University of Cambridge, wrote in a letter to Mrs. A. S. Lewis there, that the fragment of a Hebrew MS of hers, which he had taken with him, represented 'a piece of the original Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus. It is the first time that such a thing was discovered' (see A. S. Lewis, In the Shadow of Sinai: A Story of Travel and Research from 1895 to 1897; Cambridge, 1898, p. 174). Since that day, 39 out of the 51 chapters of which the book consists have been recovered totally or in part in Hebrew from 4 different MSS, and a new period in the history of this book has thus been opened. What we knew about it before that time or believed we knew, is, perhaps, best summed up in the Introduction and Commentary of A. Edersheim, in the Speaker's Commentary ('Apocrypha,' ed. by Henry Wace (London, 1888), ii. 1-239).

ii. Importance.—In many respects this book is the most important of the so-called Apocrypha. It is important for the student of history who wishes to trace the Jewish religion in its transition from the OT to the NT, and it is important on account of the influence it exercised and still exercises on the religious life of generations. Both the Jubilee Rhythm of St. Bernard of Clairvaux (partially translated in Hymns Ancient and Modern, 178, 177), and what may be called the German Te Deum, Nun danket alle Gott (ib. 379), are taken from this book. How much has been lost by those parts of the Church which excluded it from their Bibles may be gathered from the use made of it in other parts, not only in the Greek and Roman, which place it on the same footing as the whole Bible, but also in the Lutheran, which placed it among the Apocrypha but made a very large use of it.

On the Latin Church compare especially Augustine. When he collected from the Bible, towards the end of his life, his so-called Speculum, i.e. those passages which he considered useful for the guidance of the religious life, he found in this book more for his purpose (plura huic operi necessaria) than in any other book of the OT or NT (no fewer than 36 pages out of 285 in the edition of Weihrich [CSEL, vol. xii. 1887]; from Proverbs 21 pages, from Matthew 18). After the excerpts from those books 'quos et Judæi canonicos habent,' he goes on to say 'sed non sunt omittendi et hi quos quidem ante salvatoris adventum constat esse conscriptos, sed eos non receptos a Judæis recipit tamen eiusdem salvatoris ecclesia. in his sunt duo qui Salomonis appellantur a pluribus propter quandam sicut existimo eloquii similitudinem. nam Salomonis non esse nihil dubitant quique doctiores. nec tamen eius qui Sapientiæ dicitur quisnam sit autor apparet. illum vero alterum quem vocamus Ecclesiasticum, quod Jesus quidam scripserit, qui cognominatur Sirach, constat inter eos qui eundem librum totum legerunt.'

As to the Lutheran Church it may be noted that the protocols of the Meistersinger of Nürnberg alone mention about 100 songs all beginning 'Jesus Sirach' or 'Sirach (the wise man)'—see the Indexes published by K. Drescher in vol. 214 (1897) of the Literarische Verein. In 1676 a preacher published the themes and dispositions of 170 sermons on this book,[*] and the Bible Society of Halle (founded by Francke-Canstein) circulated from 1712-1823 no fewer than 77,105 copies.[†]

iii. Name and Place in the Bible.—(a) Place. (1) The book had at no time a place among the 24 (or 22) books of the Hebrew Bible, though it is quoted in one passage of the Bab. Talmud (Berakhoth, 48*a*) with the quotation-formula דִּכְתִיב 'as it is written,' which is used elsewhere only of the acknowledged books; but in the parallel passages the name of the book is added. In two other passages two rabbinical authorities actually quote from our book, while believing themselves to be quoting from Scripture (see Strack, 'Kanon des AT' in *PRE*³ ix. 753). The book is therefore not mentioned in those lists of the canonical books which profess to give the Jewish Canon, as Melito, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nazianzus, Amphilochius, pseudo-Athanasius' Synopsis, Canon of Laodicea, capitulus (Zahn, Geschichte des Kanons, vol. ii.). Epiphanius, de Mens. 4 (Lagarde, Symmicta, ii. 157), says on the two books, mentioned above by Augustine, Wisdom and Sirach: αὗται χρήσιμοι μέν εἰσι καὶ ὠφέλιμοι, ἀλλ' εἰς ἀριθμὸν τῶν ῥητῶν οὐκ ἀναφέρονται·[‡] δι' ὃ οὐδὲ ἐν τῷ ἀρῶν (אֲרוֹן) ἐνετέθησαν, τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ τῆς διαθήκης κιβωτῷ.

(2) But Sirach had a sure and prominent place among the books of the Bible in the Greek and still more in the Latin Churches. In the MSS of the Greek Bibles it was most commonly grouped with the other Poetical books (see the lists in Swete's Introduction, pp. 198–214); the order being in cod. S: Psalms, Proverbs, Eccl., Cant., Wisd., Sirach, Job; in B: Ps., Prov., Eccl., Cant., Job, Wisd., Sirach, Esth.; in AN: Ps., Job, Prov., Eccl., Cant., Wisd., Sirach.

On the question whether Clement of Alexandria had Wisdom and Sirach as an Appendix to the NT, see, on the one side, Credner-Volkmar, Geschichte des neutest. Canons, p. 387 (on the strength of Photius, cod. 109, ὁ δὲ ὅλος σκοπὸς [of his 'Ἐκλογαί] ὡσανεὶ ἐρμηνεῖαι τυγχάνουσι τῆς Γενέσεως, τῆς Ἐξόδου, τῶν ψαλμῶν, τοῦ θείου Παύλου τῶν ἐπιστολῶν καὶ τῶν Καθολικῶν καὶ τοῦ Ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ), and H. Eickhoff, Das NT des Clemens (Progr. Schleswig, 1900, p. 22); on the other side Zahu, Geschichte des Kanons, ii. 223.

The 85th of the Apostolic Canons orders: ἔξωθεν δὲ ὑμῖν προσιστορείσθω μανθάνειν ὑμῶν τοὺς νέους τὴν Σοφίαν τοῦ πολυμαθοῦς Σειράχ.

The Coptic Church counts 6 books of Wisdom (ἑξάσοφος); see I. Guidi, 'Il canone biblico della chiesa copta' (Revue biblique, x. 2, 166, 169) = Job + Salomone 5 libri (Prov., Wisd., Eccl., La Sapienza di Bāgor ben Bagy (=אגור בן יקה), Cant.); after the Prophets follows La Sapienza di Gesù figlio di Sirach scriba di Salomone.

(3) In the Western Church, too, it became at a very early date common to group these 5 books (Prov., Eccl., Cant., Wisd., and Sirach) together and presently to count them all as Solomonic. One passage from Augustine has been already quoted [§ 1]: in de Doct. Christ. ii. 13 he says of Wisdom and Sirach: 'de quadam similitudine Salomonis esse dicuntur . . . qui tamen quoniam in auctoritatem recipi meruerunt juxta propheticos enumerandi sunt.' Innocent I. (Ep. ad Exsuperium) counts expressly, after Prophetarum libri xvi., 'Salomonis libri v.,' then Psalterium; so also Cassiodorius (de Inst. Div. litt. 14; but see Zahn, Gesch. d. Kan. ii. 270, 271 n. 5, 272), the Council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (can. 47 = 39), the stichometrical list from Freisingen published by C. H. Turner (JThSt ii. 240), while, in the list of the MS of F. Arevalo (l.c. p. 241), in pseudo-Gelasius and in Isidore, 'Salomonis libri iii.' is followed by Wisdom and Sirach (in pseudo-Gelasius in the order Sirach, Wisdom).[*] The same arrangement is found in mediæval Bibles and translations—for instance in the famous Wenzel Bible at Vienna (on which see Kurrelmeyer, Amer. Journ. of Phil. xxi. 62, 69); and this custom of placing Sirach and Wisd. in company with Prov., Eccl., and Cant., and of reckoning all five as books of Solomon, became so prevalent that as late as the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries several separate editions of this group were published, not only in Latin but also in English, either with the express heading 'libri Salomonis' or without it.

See in the Catalogue of the British Museum 'Bible' (OT) the remark before Hagiographa (col. 323, comp. with 718, 720, where Sirach by mistake is called 'the Book of Wisdom'). Latin editions containing these 5 books are in the Brit. Mus. from Antw. 1537; Paris, 1537; Lyons, 1543; Paris, 1564; Antw. 1591; with Psalms, 1629; Psalterium Davidis et Libri sapientiales (without Cant.), Leiden, 1659. Of English editions the two oldest are: The Bokes of Salomon, namely, Proverbia, Ecclesiastes, Sapientia, and Ecclesiasticus or Jesus the sonne of Syrach (The story of Bell, whjch is the xiiij chapter of Daniel after the Latin), E. Wbytcburch, London [1540?], 8vo (in the copy of the Br. Mus. a few MS notes by King Henry VIII.; the text follows that of the Bible of 1535; a reprint 1545, 16mo); The bokes of Salomon, namely, Proverbia, Ecclesiastes, Cantica Canticorum, Ecclesiasticus or Iesus the sonne of Syrach, W. Bonham, London [1542?], 8vo (text follows Great Bible of 1539; another ed. Wyllyam Copland, London, Jan. 1550 [1551], 8vo).

The order in the present English editions of the Apocrypha (1 Es., 2 Es., Tobit, Judith, the Rest of Esther, The Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, etc.) seems to go back in the last instance to the German (Zürich) translation of Leo Jud (Zürich, 1529, fol. and 8vo; Strassburg, 1529–30), which separated 'die Bücher die by den alten onder Biblische geschrifft nit gezelt sind, auch by den Ebreern nit gefunden' from the rest of the Bible, and arranged them 1–2 Es., Tob., Jud., Bar., Wisd., 'das Buch Ecclesiasticus das man nennen mag die weisen Sprüch Jesu des Suns Sirach,' 1–3 Mac., Sus., Bel and Dragon.

The first Greek edition of the Bible, which separated 'Απόκρυφοι αἱ παρ' Εβαίοις [sic] ἐκ τοῦ τῶν ἀξιοπίστων ἀριθμοῦ συγκαθίστανται, is that of Lonicerus (Argentorati, Cephaleus, 1524, 26). Its order is: Tob., Jud.; Bar., Ep. Jer.; Song of the Three Children, Esdras, Σοφία Σολομῶντος, Σοφία 'Ιησοῦ υἱοῦ Σειράχ. The ground of Luther's (1534) arrangement (Judith, Wisd.; Tob., Sirach) becomes clear only from his Prefaces, which are now omitted in almost all German Bibles: the story was made to be followed by the fabula docet.

In Syriac Lexicographical Notes on the Bible the order is: Kings, Ruth, Wisd., Eccl., Cant., Sirach, Prophets (see Opuscula Nestoriana, ed. G. Hoffmann).

(b) Name.—Luther says in his Preface: 'This book has been called hitherto in Latin Ecclesiasticus, which has been rendered the spiritual discipline (die geistliche Zucht). Elsewhere its true name is Jesus Sirach, after its master, as it is styled in its own Preface and the Greek,[*] in the same way as Moses, Joshua, Isaiah, and all the books of the Prophets are styled after their masters.' In our documents it is styled (1) Σοφια Σειραχ in codex B (inscr.); (2) Σοφια Ιησου υιου Σειραχ (or Σι-) in codd. ACS, and in the subscription of B. Ch. 50 has the inscription Προσευχη Ιησου υιου Σειραχ, and occurs separately under this heading, e.g. in cod. Bodl. misc. gr. 205 (xiv cent.); (3) Σοφια η πανaρετος Ιησου υιου Σειραχ stands in the edition of Camerarius, 1551, before the so-called Prologus incerti auctoris. The expression πανάρετος is applied to Proverbs (Eus. HE iv. 22), to Wisd. (Athan., Synops., Epiph., subscr. in codex Syro-hexaplaris Ambrosianus), to Sirach (Eus. DE viii. 2, Jerome).

Clement of Alexandria quotes: φησὶν ἡ τοῦ 'Ιησοῦ Σοφία, ἡ γραφή (Str. ii. 180), ἡ Σοφία, παρὰ τῷ Σολομῶντι (ii. 160), παρὰ Σολομῶντος, Παιδαγωγός. Origen (ii. 77): τοῦ τὸ σύγγραμμα τὴν Σοφίαν ἡμῖν καταλιπόντος 'Ιησοῦ υἱοῦ Σιράχ; (iii. 48) φησὶν γὰρ ἡ Σοφία, (139) λεγούσης τῆς γραφῆς.

In the official editions of the Latin Bible the book has the heading Ecclesiasticus; then follows, 'In Ecclesiasticum Jesu filii Sirach Prologus.' Ch 50 has the heading 'Oratio Jesu filii Sirach.' In the codex Amiatinus the inscription and subscription is Liber Ecclesiasticum Salomonis; the subscription standing after 3 Regn. 8^{22-31}, which follows in this MS immediately after ch. 51. The same arrangement is found in mediæval Bibles, as the Wenzel Bible, the first German Bible (Eggestein, Strassburg, c. 1461).

Very strange is the heading 'Εκκλησιαστικός (because hitherto found only in Latin and the passage of Photius quoted above)[†] in cod. 248 before the text of the book and the Prologus incerti auctoris, the latter being inscribed Σοφία Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σειράχ.

[*] Of printed Greek texts Luther knew probably only the edition of Lonicerus just mentioned, 1526; the other texts printed at that time were in the Polyglot Bible of Ximenes, 1514, and in the Greek Bible of Aldus, 1518; Melanchthon's edition of the Greek Bible appeared a few months before Luther's death, 1545. Frz. Delitzsch (Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Polyglottenbibel des Cardinals Ximenes, Leipzig, 1871, p. 5) states that Luther nowhere mentions the Bible of Ximenes, but that Melanchthon refers to it while Luther was living, and that the library of Wittenberg possessed the copy dedicated to the Elector; two years after the death of Luther it passed into the library of Jena.

[†] Besides the statement of Zahn, Gesch. d. Kan. ii. 233, cf. Oikonomos, περι των ό ερμηνευτων, ii. 579. On the adjective ἐκκλησιαστικός see Clement, Str. vi. 125 (ed. Dind. iii. 217), κανὼν ἐκκλησιαστικός, Origen, ii. 97. 1, iii. 44. 1; Rufinus (Expos.

The common Latin designation since Cyprian is Ecclesiasticus, and means, most probably, the Church-book κατ' ἐξοχήν, from its frequent use in the Church, especially for the instruction of catechumens.

Ecclesiasticus is used in Cyprian once of Ecclesiastes (Test. 3, 86. 61), once of Wisd. (3, 112 cod. A), of our book (3, 1. 95. 110. 111); it is ascribed to Solomon in 3, 6. 12. 20. 53. 113, Op. 5, Sent. 27, Ep. 3, 2; it is both ascribed to Solomon and called Ecclesiasticus in 2, 1. 3. 35. 51. 96. 97. 109 (see Rönsch, 'die Alttest. Citate bei Cyprian' in Zeitschrift für histor. Theol. 1875, 95). Ambrose writes: 'In Ecclesiastico Syrach, in libro Sapientiæ Syrach'; Lactantius (Ep. 25), 'In Ecclesiastico per Salomonem'; it is referred to Solomon also by Vigilius of Thapsus, Anicetus of Buruch; Hilary ('qui nobiscum Salomonis inscribitur, apud Græcos atque Hebræos [!] Sapientia Sirach habetur'). Jerome says, 'In Sapientia quæ Sirach inscribitur.'

The (wrongly) abbreviated inscription of codex B and the editio Sixtina have become prevalent in modern books, even in those of Roman Catholic authors.

(c) Name of the original work.—Jerome (in the Preface to the books of Solomon) writes: 'Fertur et πανάρετος Jesu filii Sirach liber, et alius ψευδεπίγραφος qui Sapientia Salomonis inscribitur; quorum priorem Hebraicum reperi, nec Ecclesiasticum, ut apud Latinos sed Parabolas prænotatum; cui juncti erant Ecclesiastes et Canticum Canticorum, ut similitudinem Salomonis non solum librorum numero, sed etiam materiarum genere adæquaret,* secundus apud Hebræos nusquam est.' This raises the question, What was the original title of the work? The Syriac version, which is based (see § viii.) on the Hebrew, is in Lagarde's edition (from cod. 12,142 of the Brit. Mus., vi cent.) inscribed חכמתא דבר סירא 'Wisdom of Bar Sira'; in Walton's Polyglot, כתבא דשמעון אסירא דמתקרא הו כתבא חכמתא דבר אסירא 'Book of Simeon Asira, which book is called the Wisdom of Bar Asira.' At the end we read (a) Hitherto the words of Jesu bar Simeon, who is called Bar Asira † and (b) 'Endeth to write the Wisdom of Bar Sira.' Walton has (see Lagarde, p. ix) 'Endeth the Wisdom of Bar Asira. In 20 chapters and to God glory in eternity.' The MSS of Pococke and Ussher add after (a) instead of (b) 'Endeth the book of the Wisdom of Jesus the son of Simeon who is called Bar Asira (cod. Ussher 2, Sirak), in which are 2500 words.'

In the Hebrew text we read at the end, 'Hitherto the words of Simeon ben Jeshua who is called ben Sirā. The Wisdom (חכמת) of Simeon ben Jeshua ben Eleazar ben Sirā. The name of Jahweh be blessed from now and till eternity.'

From these Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew statements it would appear that the title of the book was 'Wisdom,' Σοφία, in Heb. חָכְמָה (or מוּסָר); but how is this to be reconciled with the statement of Jerome that the title was in Hebrew Parabolæ (i.e. מִשְׁלֵי)? Is this a confusion with Proverbs, a solution recommended by the fact that in the Hebrew seen by Jerome Eccl. and Cant. followed; or was the copy seen by Jerome not a copy of the original, but a retranslation from the Greek, as already Scaliger suggested? And then, Jewish quotations from Sirach, where they mention not only the name of the author as אמר בן סירא, or in Aramaic בר סירא, or ספר בן סירא, have twice הַמֹּשֵׁל אָמַר 'the Parabolist said,' or מתלא אמר בן סירא 'a proverb said ben Sira' (see C-N, p. xxiv n. v. liv and p. xx n. x.). The same word מַתְלָא 'proverbs' occurs in the Syriac VS at 50^{27}; the Heb. text has there מוסר שכל, and the book is quoted as ספר מוסר by Saadia (C-N, p. ix n. 4). The question of the original title is, after all, a puzzle, and new puzzles as to the author's name arise from the newly discovered texts.

iv. THE NAME OF THE AUTHOR.—(a) Hitherto it has been generally held that the author's name was Jesus the son of Sira (Jesus filius Sirach, Jesus Siracida). Especially subsequent to the Reformation this name became current instead of the Latin book-name Ecclesiasticus. Compare the title of the first separate edition of the book in Greek by Joachim Camerarius (Basileæ, 1551), 'Sententiæ Jesu Siracidæ Græce.'* But now new difficulties arise. In the Greek text the author himself (50^{27}) gives his name as Ἰησους υἱος Σειραχ Ἐλεαζαρ ὁ Ἰεροσολυμειτης; † instead of the last word the first hand of codex S had ἱερεὺς ὁ Σολυμείτης; the name Ἐλεαζαρ is omitted by cod. 248 and the Complutensian and Sixtine editions; Ἐλεαζαρου is written in cod. 68 and the Aldine Bible, Ἐλεάζαρος in V 253. The Syriac Hexapla has 'Jesus son of Sirach of Eliezer' (ראליעזר); the Pesh. omits the passage altogether; in the Latin Vulgate it runs, 'Jesus filius Sirach Jerosolymita'; and now in the Hebrew in the twice-repeated colophon, לשמעון בן ישוע בן אלעזר בן סירא 'by Shimeon son of Jesus son of Eleazar son of Sirā.' And so the author is called also by Saadia (see S-T, p. 65). Many recent writers think the Hebrew pedigree Simeon—Jesus—Eleazar—Sira a mere clerical error for the sequence Jesus—Simeon—Eleazar—Sira. But it must be pointed out that the name Simeon is firmly attached to the author of this book in the Syriac Church. There he was identified with the Συμεὼν ὁ θεοδόχος of the NT, the author of Nunc dimittis. On this identification see especially Georg, bishop of the Arabs (Briefe und Gedichte, ed. Ryssel, p. 59 f., 80 f., 159 f.), who opposes the identification for chronological reasons, the author of the book having lived, according to Georg, 244 years before Christ, in the 65th year of the Greek era, under Euergetes. Cf. further, Gregory Barhebræus (Scholien, ed. Kaatz), who identifies him at the same time with Simeon (II.) son of Onias; Opuscula Nestoriana (ed. G. Hoffmann, p. 107,‡ 139 §); History of the Blessed Virgin Mary, ed. Budge (p. 36), where cod. B for 'Simeon the old' has 'Simeon Asira'—he becomes priest after in Symb.), after the canonical books of the OT, among which he mentioned 'Salomonis vero tres': 'Sciendum tamen est, quod et alii libri sunt, qui non canonici sed ecclesiastici a maioribus appellati sunt, ut est Sapientia Salomonis et alia Sapientia quæ dicitur filii Syrach, qui liber apud latinos hoc ipso generali vocabulo Ecclesiasticus appellatur, quo vocabulo non auctor libri, sed Scripturæ qualitas cognominata est.'

* How are these words to be understood? Just as there are three books of Solomon (Prov., Eccl., Cant.), so there were extra-canonical books equal in number and contents (Sirach + Eccl. + Cant. ?).

† Thus also Opuscula Nestoriana, p. 107, and after a remark, 'endeth Bar Sira.'

* There is a good story told by Melanchthon, which, whether it refers to this edition or not, ought not to be suppressed: 'Quidam sacrificulus cum in bibliopolio vidisset Syracidem editum dixit: quam mali homines sunt Lutherani; etiam Christo nomen aliud affingunt: antea vocabatur Christus Jesus, nunc illi vocant eum Jesus Syrach' (see GGN, 1894, 180).

† AV 'Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem'; RV 'Jesus the son of Sirach Eleazar of Jerusalem.' Note the Grecized form of the name (instead of Ἰερουσαλήμ).

‡ 'That he was called bar Sirā; they relate that he called his father אסירא, because he is the Simeon whose tongue was bound (אֲסִירָא) by the Holy Ghost, till he should see the Christ, and when he had seen Him, he spoke, Let me now part in peace to my fathers.'

§ The Septuagint is said here to have been made 'six years after the return of the children of Israel from Babel, which was the 17th year of the death of Alexander the Greek, and 1400 years after the Law was given to Moses. Simeon the old (סבא), the father of Jesus bar Sira, the Wise, was one of the seventy-two old men just mentioned; and he was the Simeon bar Nethaniah bar Chonja (=Sir 50^1), and Simeon was brother of the priest Eleazar; and it was he who carried our Lord in his arms, and his life was stretched over 216 years, and he called himself with a contemptible name (בשמא בסירא), like Abraham, who called himself dust and ashes, and David, who said, I am a worm and no man, סירא, i.e. dust from the white-washing, which is beaten off the walls. Instead of Sira the Greek says Asira (אֲסִירָא).'

Zechariah the father of John the Baptist, Protev. Jacobi, ch. 24; The Book of the Bee (p. 71): 'Simeon the son of Sira died in peace in his own town.' In one Greek recension of the Lives of the Prophets, Συμεὼν ὁ ἱερεὺς found a place towards the end between Zechariah the son of Barachiah and Nathan (see Nestle, Marg. und Mat. p. 33). That Simeon θεοδόχος was one of the Seventy, is stated, among Greek writers, by Euthymius Zigabenus, Kedrenus, Nicephorus Kallisti.

The pedigrees we thus obtain are—

𝔥	𝔊	𝔖	or
Simeon.	Jesus.	Jesus.	Jesus Bar-Sira.
Jesus.	Sirach.	Simeon.	Simeon.
Eleazar.	[Eleazar].	Sira.
Sira.

It has been suggested by Blau that 'the two traditions, that of the Greek and that of the Syriac, are mutually complementary.' Thus we should have in 𝔏 a combination of both, what textual critics call a conflation. The decision depends on the general question of the value of 𝔏, see § ix. As to whether Simeon or Eleazar can be identified with one of the known bearers of these names, see below.

(b) The name Sirach.—The latest contribution to Hebrew lexicography, M. Jastrow's Dictionary of the Targumim, etc., contains the following words which come into consideration for the explanation of this name: (1) סיר 'pot'; (2) סירא =Heb. שִׁרְיָה 'coat of mail'; (3) סירא 'thorn'; (4) סירא=the present proper name; (5) סִירָה, סִירָא f. (a) '[degenerate growth],' 'thorn,' 'thornbush,' (b) 'refuse,' 'foul matter'; (6) סִירָה, סִירָא f. 'surrounded place,' 'court,' 'prison.' From Thes. Syr. we may add (7) סיר=σύρ, 'Sir'; (8) סירא=σειρά; and (9) the explanation of the name given by the Syriac lexicographers=שִׁירָא 'thin dust from the walls.' If there was not the constant tradition that the initial letter was ס, the Greek Σ might correspond also to other letters, as ז, or צ, or שׁ, and the name might be connected with זְעִירָא, צְעִירָא, 'small,' 'little,' 'lesser,' זְעֵיר or זְעִירָא being, in fact, the name of several Jewish Amoraim.

The χ at the end of the Greek form may correspond to ג (cf. Σερουχ, Φαλεχ), ח (Καλαχ, Μασβαχ), to ךְ (many names in -μελεχ), to ע (Βαλαχ), to ק ('Αμαληχ, Βαραχ), to still other letters, as ו (Κενεχ, Μαωχ) or ה (Βαιθαναχ, Δειναχ); but it is most probably a mere representation of the mater lectionis א; cf. 'Ακελδεμαχ, 'Ιωσηχ Lk 3^{29} = יוֹסֵי, the spelling "Αλλαχ = Allah [Schlatter takes it for υ=υἱός]. A. Meyer (Muttersprache Jesu, p. 39) takes the word to mean coat of mail or iris oculi; Ryssel (p. 234), 'more probably thorn or thorn-hedge than mail-coat,' referring to Levy, NHWB iii. 519, 520. Ryssel takes bar-Sira as name of the family; we should thus have only three generations: Jesus, Simeon, Eliezer—not four as in 𝔏.* In view of the Prologue, 'ὁ πάππος μου 'Ιησοῦς,' it seems certain that the author was Jesus (the son of Simeon), and not Simeon the son of Jesus. Whether the translator, too, bore the name of his grandfather, as is stated by the Prologus incerti auctoris, is not certain. This second Prologue, which was first printed from cod. 248 in the Complutensian Polyglot, and was first shown by Hoeschel (1604) to be part of the so-called pseudo-Athanasian Synopsis, begins—

> 'Ιησοῦς οὗτος Σιρὰχ μὲν ἦν υἱός, ἔγγονος δὲ 'Ιησοῦ ὁμωνύμου αὐτῷ . . . ὁ οὖν πάππος αὐτοῦ . . . φιλόπονός τε γέγονεν ἀνὴρ ἐν 'Εβραίοις . . . ἐπεὶ οὖν τὴν βίβλον ταύτην ὁ πρῶτος 'Ιησοῦς σχεδόν τι συνειλεγμένην καταλιπὼν ἐξ ἀνθρώπων ᾤχετο, Σιρὰχ οὗτος μετ' αὐτὸν πάλιν τῷ οἰκείῳ παιδὶ κατέλιπεν 'Ιησοῦ· ὃς δὴ αὐτῆς λαβόμενος εἰς ἓν ἅπασαν ἐναρμόνιον σύνταγμα συνήγαγε Σοφίαν ἐπί τε αὐτοῦ καὶ τῷ τοῦ πατρὸς ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ τῷ πάππου* ὀνόματι (κ)εκληκώς.

Thus we have the pedigree: Jesus [II, the translator]—Sirach [II]—Jesus [I, the author]—Sirach [I, Eleazar].

Another enlargement has taken place in the translator's Preface, as it seems, in Latin MSS, though it is known to the present writer only from the pre-Lutheran German Bible. There it is stated that the 'anherre' (avus, πάππος) was a son of Josedek (see ch. 49^{12}), and one of the Seventy, and that the grandson Jesus the son of Sirach pursued higher studies. Finally, Euergetes is stated in the same connexion to have reigned after Philadelphus, his brother, under whom the Bible had been translated from Hebrew into Greek (see Nestle, 'Zum Prolog des Ecclesiasticus' in ZATW, 1897, p. 123 f.). Already Isidore of Seville identifies Jesus the son of Sirach with Jeshua the son of Jozedek. This is of course impossible. For the translator states: ἐν γὰρ τῷ ὀγδόῳ καὶ τριακοστῷ ἔτει ἐπὶ τοῦ Εὐεργέτου βασιλέως παραγενηθεὶς εἰς Αἴγυπτον καὶ συγχρονίσας εὗρον οὐ μικρᾶς παιδείας ἀφόμοιον. This date is not to be understood of the 38th year of the life of the translator (Camerarius) nor of any unknown era, but of the reign of Euergetes (see especially Deissmann, Bibelstudien, i. 255 [Eng. tr. 339 ff.]; R 235; Ed. 4 ff. As only Euergetes II. reigned more than 38 years (from B.C. 170 with his brother, from 145 alone, reckoning his years from 170),† it is the year B.C. 132; and as he states that he stayed some time in Egypt (συγχρονίσας) before he undertook his task, we may place the translation about 130, and the original some forty or fifty years earlier (B.C. 190–170). Then we must understand the high priest Simon, who is so highly praised in Sir $50^{1ff.}$, from personal knowledge as it seems, to be Simon II. Others, taking πάππος in the sense of 'ancestor,' prefer to place the author more than a hundred years earlier, under Simon I. In the former case it would be possible to identify our author 'Ιησοῦς with the high priest 'Ιάσων (175–172); but beyond the identity of the time and name nothing leads to this identification. That the author of our book was high priest is stated by Syncellus (Chron., ed. Dindorf, i. 525); the reading ἱερεὺς ὁ Σολυμείτης by the first hand of S cannot be more than a clerical error.‡

v. EDITIONS.—(a) The first editions of the Greek text are in the Complutensian Polyglot (c) 1514, from cod. 248 § (see below, p. 544^{a}), in the Aldine Bible (a) 1518, which has been taken for this book without any doubt from cod. 68; and cod. 68 itself is, to all appearance, for this book a copy of cod. B, so that a represented the text of cod. B in many passages more faithfully than the Sixtine of 1587.* A reprint of a is the edition of Lonicerus † (Argent. 1526); but the editor introduced many changes: for instance, in 3^1, where a has ἐμοῦ τοῦ πατρὸς, Lonicerus put (from the Latin) κρίμα τοῦ πατρός. That Lonicerus changed his text has been overlooked by subsequent editors and commentators, hence in later books a number of misstatements as to the text of a;‡ Lonicerus in turn was followed by Melanchthon (Basle, 1545), Melanchthon by the edition of Wechel (1597, see art. SEPTUAGINT, p. 440^a).§ The editors of the Sixtine (b) made use not only of B, but of c a Lonicerus, Melanchthon, and the codd. V 106, 155, 253 || (see on b, above, p. 440^a); on Grabe's edition, see p. 440^b.

---

* This is possible; cf. Josephus, Vita, 1: ὁ πρόπαππος ἡμῶν Σίμων ὁ Ψελλὸς ἐπικαλούμενος . . . γίνονται δὲ τῷ Ψελλῷ Σίμωνι παῖδες ἐννέα· τούτων ἐστὶν Ματθίας ὁ 'Ηφαίου (v.l. 'Ηφλίου) λεγόμενος.

* The word πάππος used here and in the Preface may have the more general meaning 'ancestor,' but in this connexion it will be 'grandfather.' In the Concordance of Hatch-Redpath it is quoted from Symmachus on Zec 1^{1}, where it seems to belong to 'Αδδώ.

† On the reign of Euergetes we are well informed through the inscriptions of the temple of Edfu (see Dümichen, Die erste bis jetzt aufgefundene sichere Angabe über die Regierungszeit eines Ägyptischen Königs aus dem alten Reiche, Leipzig, 1874, p. 20 ff.; and Ztschr. f. äg. Sprache, 1870). There the years 28, 30, 46, 48, 54 (as the last of this king) are mentioned; the first Toth of his 28th year fell on the 28th Sept. B.C. 143, the first Payni (rise of Sirius) on the 20th–19th July 142.

‡ Here it may be mentioned that in a late compilation (see C-N, pp. xiv f., xxix) Ben-Sira is made the son or grandson of Jeremiah, and has a son Uziel and a grandson Joseph. See Proverbia Ben-Siræ Autoris antiquissimi, qui creditur fuisse nepos Ieremiæ prophetæ, Opera J. Drusii, Franeker, 1597. In the Preface Drusius thinks it a probable inference, 'interpretem Græcum Ecclesiastici Josephum fuisse Vzielis filium.' Cf. on this literature the edition of Steinschneider, Alphabetum Siracidis utrumque, Berolini, 1858; and Schürer, *GJV*³ ii. 161.

In other legends he has been brought into connexion with Solomon as his wezir or secretary; see above, p. 540^{a}; a legend about Aphkia (the wife of Sirach) and Solomon has been published in Arabic by Mrs. M. D. Gibson in number viii. of the Studia Sinaitica, London, 1901.

§ Sirach was committed with the rest of the 'libri Sapientiales' to the care of Johan de Vergara, who, at the end of his life, had no greater wish than to illustrate Sirach by notes (Alvarus Gomez, de rebus gestis a Franc. Ximenio, lib. 2).

(b) Separate editions of the Apocrypha are mentioned, p. 441^b. The edition of Fritzsche (1871) is the best, but for our particular book quite unsatisfactory (see Nestle, Marg. 1892, pp. 48–58).

(c) Of separate editions of Sirach alone the oldest is: Sententiæ Jesu Siracidæ, Græcè summa diligentia et studio singulari editæ, cum necessariis Annotationibus, Joachimo Camerario, Pabepergen., autore, Basileæ, 1551, 8vo.¶

It has both Prologues, is the first which numbers the verses, and has useful notes, especially parallels from the classics, but also various readings. In the Prologue, Camerarius writes ἐφόδιον for the doubtful ἀφόμοιον (v.l. ἐφόμοιον and ἀφορμήν), which reading has been mentioned in the notes of b and other editions and received into the text by Grabe.

Then comes Σοφια Σειραχ, sive Ecclesiasticus Græce ad exemplar Romanum, et Latine ex interpretatione J. Drusii, cum castigationibus sive notis eiusdem, Ad Reverendissimum in Christo patrem D. Johannem Whitgiftum archiepiscopum Cantuariensem, etc., Franekeræ, 1596, 4to; with a double appendix, 'Proverbia-Bensiræ' and 'Adagiorum Ebraicorum Decuriæ aliquot nunquam antehac editæ.'

Besides the previous printed editions—among them 'Biblia R. Stephani quæ vulgo Vatablo attribuuntur,' apparently the edition [Geneva, 1st March] 1557–58—Drusius made use from ch. 20 onward of a collation sent to him through Jan Gruter from Heidelberg. 'Huius enim hortatu Jacobus Kimedontius iunior . . . codicem Palatinæ bibliothecæ vetustissimum membranaceum cum editione Camerarii anno 1578 [sic; in his notæ he writes 1570] Lipsiæ cusa diligentissime contulerat.' This is apparently the codex 296 of HP.

A most conscientious edition is that of Hoeschel: Sapientia Sirachi sive Ecclesiasticus, Collatis lectionibus variantibus membranarum Augustanarum vetustissimarum et xiv præterea exemplarium. Addita versione Latina vulgata, ex editione Romana, cum notis Davidis Hoeschelii Augustani. In quibus multa SS. Patrum loca illustrantur, Augustæ, 1604.

His codex Augustanus ('H' in the edition of Fritzsche, p. xxii) is apparently codex 70 of HP, now at Munich 551, and deserves the more a fresh collation, as HP gave it only for the first chapter, and as the codex is closely related to 253 and the Syriac Hexapla.

The source and present place of another MS used by Hoeschel ('Fragmentum MS variæ lectionis aliquot capitum e scidis Fr. Sylburgii') are unknown to the present writer.

From Hoeschel till Fritzsche not much was done for the textual criticism of a book which needed it greatly. We have—Sententiæ Jesu Siracidæ, Græcum textum ad fidem codicum et versionum, emendavit et illustravit, Linde (Gedani, 1795); and Liber Jesu Siracidæ Græce, Ad fidem codicum et versionum emendatus et perpetua annotatione illustratus, a C. G. Bretschneider (Ratisbonæ, 1804), xvi. 758 pp.

Br. is not accurate enough, but he has the merit of having called attention to a witness in textual criticism, the Florilegium of Antonius and Maximus, neglected by most workers in this field.

Hart's edition must find its place among the MSS (see below).

vi. THE GREEK TEXT.—The problem of textual criticism in this book is of exceptional interest. Luther declares in the Preface to his translation (what pains it had taken him to translate this book may be judged from a comparison with all other copies, Greek, Latin, or German, old or new): 'There have come so many "Klüglinge" over this book, that it would be no wonder if it were totally disfigured, not to be understood, without any use. Like a torn, trampled, and scattered letter, we have gathered it, wiped off the dust, and brought it as far as can be seen.' Some idea of this may be gathered by the English reader from a glance at the margins of RV. There are about eighty marginal notes; fifty times it is stated that a verse or part of a verse or even a series of verses is omitted by many or by the best or the oldest authorities (cf. $1^{4.\ 18.\ 21}$); once only (17^{10}) 'this line is added by the best authorities'; at other places we read, 'The Greek text here is probably corrupt,' 'the Greek text is here very confused.' The numbering of verses and even of the chapters does not agree. The latter is caused by the misplacement of some leaves (Ryssel says 'two'; and it may have been two, which must have been the inner leaves of a layer, and somewhat more closely written than A and still more than BS*) in the copy from which all the Greek MSS hitherto known have been derived. This fact, first pointed out by O. F. Fritzsche (Ausleg. 169, 170), who was led to his discovery by a similar observation of H. Sauppe on a Heidelberg MS of Lysias †, would not have been recognized with such certainty but for the Latin and Syriac texts, which have the different order. ‡ Already Nobilius declared the Latin order to be the better, calling attention especially to the reading κατακληρονόμησον 'in non nullis (libris),' 'quod optime convenit, si conjungatur cum illis quæ in vulg. c. 36' (a reading received into the text by Grabe, but not to be found elsewhere in HP, quoted by Hoeschel from his codex Augustanus; Camerarius put κατακληρονόμησαι). Where did the Roman editors get it from? and which is the 'unus vetustus codex,' which according to their repeated statement has, like the Complutensian, the Latin order? It is not the cod. 248,

---

* More than thirty readings quoted by Holmes-Parsons as singular from a turn out to be in reality readings of B. How did 68 really read in these passages? it seems very badly collated, for Holmes-Parsons.

† See above, pp. 440^a, 540^b.

‡ Comp. Bretschneider on 3^1 'Aldina, Melanth. et Bas. minor: χρίμα τοῦ πατρὸς quod et codd. quidam Hoeschelii.' The first and last statements are quite incorrect.

§ D. Hoeschel quotes amongst the editions used by him frequently 'Biblia Parisiis impressa a R. Stephano, A 1555.' From his quotations it would appear that it is in Greek and Latin with notes. Is there such an edition?

|| This follows from a comparison of the scholia and the Notes of Nobilius in the edition of 1588; comp. on 3^1 'in aliquibus libris est κρίσιν τοῦ πατρὸς' [=cod. 253], 'in aliquibus aliis κρίμα' [=Lonicerus]. Nobilius quotes at least a dozen readings from a and MSS which are not found in HP.

¶ Kolde (art. 'Camerarius' in PRE^{3} iii. 689) mentions only the second edition (Lipsiæ, 1568); the same year is given by Hoeschel (1604); but Drusius (1596) and the Catalogue of the British Museum give 1570, 2 vols.

* Toy (Encyc. Bibl. vol. ii. col. 1173) speaks of the displacement of rolls of the 𝔊 MS, or possibly of the Hebrew MS from which the Gr. translation was made.

† This accident occurs very often in ancient MSS. In the British Mus. there is a German Bible which has Mt 1^1–5^4 after Deuteronomy; at Gotha there is another with the same misplacement. On a misplacement in cod. S see Swete, Introd. p. 131; in a MS of ecclesiastical canons see Turner, JThSt ii. 269; in the Church History of Zacharias of Mitylene see the edition of Brook-Hamilton; in the Homilies of Origen on Jer. see E. Klostermann (Or. III. p. xiii). For other examples (Plautus, Mostellaria, etc.) see Ed. p. 154.

‡ The strange confusion Melanchthon produced in his edition, by placing the verse καὶ κατεκληρονόμησα in the middle of ch. 33 and λαμπρᾶ καρδία in the middle of ch. 36, has been partially amended in the edition of 1597.

in spite of the definite statement of Edersheim and others * (see Nestle, Marginalien, 1892, p. 58; J. K. Zenner, 'Ecclesiasticus nach Cod. Vat. 346' in Z. f. Kath. Theol. 1895; Ryssel, p. xxviii; and now the edition of Hart).†

Parsons used for this book fourteen MSS; the two uncials iii. and 23, i.e. AV, but cod. 70 (Hoeschel's Augustanus) only for the Prologue and ch. 1. In the Addenda is to be found for the Prologue the collation of a fifteenth MS (234). Fritzsche excerpted the apparatus of Parsons, but in an insufficient way, and added the collation of C, S, and Hoeschel's Augustanus from his edition of 1604.‡

In Swete's OT in Greek we have a faithful representation of the readings of BACS (=ℵ); but it is now generally acknowledged that the text of these uncials is a very bad one in Sirach.§ It is therefore a great boon that the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press are to publish shortly an edition of the codex Vaticanus 346 (=HP 248, the basis of c) by J. H. A. Hart, who, with the assent of the Syndics, had the kindness to communicate to the present writer, for the benefit of this article, the proofs before publication.‖

Of MSS not yet laid under contribution there are known to the present writer:—(1) A palimpsest of the 6th or 7th cent. at St. Petersburg, written in three columns (see Urtext, p. 74; Swete, Introd. p. 147 n. 12). (2) Two palimpsest leaves belonging to cod. 2 in the Patriarchal Library at Jerusalem, ascribed to the 6th cent., containing Prol. and 1^{1-14} 1^{29}–3^{11}, published by J. R. Harris, Biblical Fragments from Mount Sinai, No. 5.

(3) The προσευχή (ch. 51) is to be found in Cod. Bodl. Misc. 205 (xiv sæc.); see Coxe, Catalogus, i. 762. This chapter is missing in the MSS 296 and 308* of HP and (at present) in the codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus; but there only through the deplorable loss of a leaf.

Of minuscles, two Vienna MSS, Cod. Theol. Gr. xi. and cxlvii., both of which were brought by Busbecq from Constantinople, have been partially collated by Edw. Hatch and quoted as Vienna 1 and 2 in his Essay on the text of Ecclesiasticus (Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 247 ff.). On the confusion about the 308 (or 308*) in HP see Hatch, l.c. 248; and Swete, Introd. p. 159, No. 149.

Now comes the strange fact that our Greek MSS—which, as stated, go back, without any exception, to one and the same copy, in which the dislocation had taken place—show the greatest divergences. For instance, after 1^4 two lines are inserted by six MSS of HP (23, 55, 70, 106, 248, 253); after v.^{5} again two lines by five MSS (the above without 248); after v.^{10} and v.^{12} two lines, but only by two MSS (70, 253); after v.^{17} one line by two MSS (here, however, not 70 and 253, but 70 and 248); after v.^{20} two lines by four MSS (70, 106, 248, 253); in v.^{10} two words, ἀπ' αὐτῆς, by one MS (70). How is this possible if all go back to the same original? And the variation is increased by the second and third class of our witnesses, the ancient Versions and Patristic Quotations.

vii. VERSIONS AND QUOTATIONS.—(a) In the first place has to be mentioned the Syriac version by Paul of Tella (c. 616 A.D.), the so-called Syro-Hexaplar, preserved to us through the codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus. If we retain the designation Syro-Hexaplar, we must bear in mind that Sirach had no place in Origen's Hexapla; but in one particular respect this Syriac version reminds us of the Hexapla: one of the critical marks of Origen, the asteriscus, appears also in Sirach, at least in its first part up to ch. 13. There are altogether 45 asterisks, and they mark just some of the additions mentioned above. No Greek MS of Sirach seems to have been found as yet with asterisks; but there is scarcely a doubt that the asterisks were not added by Paul of Tella, but were taken over by him from the Greek MS which he translated. This MS contained, before the text of the book, the capitulation, which is found in the so-called Synopsis of Chrysostom (Migne, Patr. Gr. lvi. 575), and some good corrections of the printed text may be gathered from it. Now the question arises the more: Where did these additions come from in this Greek copy? Take the very first one, which has an asterisk in 𝔭, 1^7 ἀπ' αὐτῆς, given in the text in Syriac as מנה⁎, and on the margin, to remove any ambiguity, in Greek letters as ΑΠΑΤΤΗΣ. There is a slight difference between 𝔭 and the solitary Greek witness, from which this addition is known hitherto, Hoeschel's Augustanus (70), inasmuch as the latter gives it after μετὰ πάσης σαρκὸς ('alii non agnoscunt has voculas neque Athanasius Orat. 3. contra Arian.'), while 𝔭 has it after κατὰ τὴν δόσιν αὐτοῦ. This makes no difference of sense; in both cases ἀπ' αὐτῆς is a limitation of the preceding αὐτὴν (retained by 70 𝔭): God does not shed out His whole wisdom (αὐτήν) on all flesh, but only ἀπ' αὐτῆς; it is a mere dogmatical correction; but while appearing hitherto only in a single and late Greek MS—70 is of the 15th cent.—it gains suddenly in strength when shown by 𝔭 to be perhaps 1000 years older; nevertheless it is a mere gloss, which might be added by any copyist from his own brain, without any source. But what about the lines immediately following, put in 𝔭 under asterisks in quite the same way?—

⁎ and he gives it to them that love him,
⁎ the gift of the Lord is Wisdom,
⁎ glorious,
⁎ to them to whom he appears he deals
⁎ it in his appearance;

or with the two lines after v.^{12},

⁎ the fear of the Lord is a gift from the Lord, for on love he raises paths.*

Both additions are found not in 70 alone, but in 70 and 253. Where do these additions come from?† We must look for more witnesses—versions and quotations.

The versions to be mentioned are the Armenian, Georgian, Ethiopic, Coptic, Arabic.

On the Armenian version and its complicated history see PRE^{3} ii. 68, 69 (=Urtext, p. 128 f.); Ryssel, p. 129; Margoliouth-Edersheim, § ix.; Conybeare (vol. i. p. 153^a); Herkenne, pp. 28–33. The older text rests on the authority of a single MS, which breaks off at 42^{27}, and has a lacuna from 35^{19}–38^{14}, and several omissions besides—e.g. the whole of ch. 8.

† At present the Latin order is found in the edition of Camerarius; can this be meant?

‡ Bretschneider, p. 694: 'Cum Compl. textu maxima ex parte consentit codex Augustanus, cuius lectiones Hoeschelius in criticis sacris t. v. nobis dedit, quod modo accuratius ac clarius fecisset voluerim. . . . quum . . . haud raro lectiones, neque eas spernendas haberet, quorum nullum in reliquis deprehenditur vestigium.' That Hoeschel's codex E is identical with 'Drusii MS Heidelbergense' Bretschneider failed to recognize.

§ Edw. Hatch closes his examination of the text of Sirach with the remark, that as one of the points established by his investigation will be acknowledged 'the inferior value of some of the more famous uncial MSS as compared with some cursives' (Essays, p. 281).

‖ One of the characteristics of this MS is the insertion of about 130 glosses, to guard the text against misunderstanding, especially in chs. 1–30; see 1^{31} ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, 2^4 ἀσμένως, 3^{21} ἀναισθήτως and ἀφροσύνη, ^{22} ὁσίως and βλέπειν ὀφθαλμοῖς, ^{24} ἡ ματαία, 4^8 ἀλύπως, ^{25} κατὰ μηδὲ ἕν, 5^{11} ὀρθήν, 6^{37} τελείως, 8^8 εὐμαρῶς, 13^{10} ἀκρίτως, 16^4 ἐν τάχει, ^{11} διὰ τάχους, ^{20} ἀξίως, 17^9 συνετῶς, ^{29} ὁσίως. Interesting is 19^{15} πολλάκις γὰρ γίνεται διαβολὴ ματαία, because the motive is quite the same as led to the addition of εἰκῆ in Mt 5^{22}. Some of them are found in the Syro-Hexaplaric MS under asterisks, one of these (5^{11}) also in one of the Hebrew texts, others in the Latin texts.

* That the critical marks are not absolutely to be trusted is shown by these examples: in the first a line is placed under asterisk ('and he gives it,' etc.), which ought to be free from it; in the second, the second line ('for on love,' etc.) ought to have the asterisk.

† Starting from the same observation, that some of the characteristic additions of the cursives 106, 248, 253 are to be found in the Syr.-Hex. with asterisks prefixed, the editor of cod. 248 raises (in a private communication to the present writer, 8th June 1901) the question: Is it possible that Sirach also was found in Origen's Hexapla, and that he knew a Hebrew original and compared the Greek text therewith?

On the Georgian version no more is known to the present writer than what is stated by Holmes at the end of the Præf. in Pent.: 'In Bibliis Georgianis Moscuæ curatis, liber Ecclesiastici et duo libri Macchabæorum, critico usui forte haud inservient.'

The Palæo-Slavonic version, says Margoliouth, 'follows a text similar to that of the Complutensian version, but with only a portion of the additions.' As in other books it is revised from a, the question must be put, whether this be not the case in Sirach also.

The Ethiopic version was published in 1894 as the last work of A. Dillmann (Veteris Testamenti Æthiopici tomus quintus, quo continentur libri Apocryphi, Baruch . . . Judith, Ecclesiasticus, Sapientia . . . Berolini, 1897, 4to. On its confused state see Nestle, Marginalien, p. 58 ; Dillmann's Epilogus, p. 113 ff. ; Herkenne, pp. 33–38 : Margoliouth believed he could find in a few places signs of contamination from the Syriac (8^5 22^{15} 38^{30} etc.) ; but they are of rather doubtful character.

Of Coptic versions the one in the Sahidic dialect is almost complete, existing in a unique MS of the 6th cent. at Turin, and published by P. de Lagarde in his Ægyptiaca (Göttingen, 1883 ; Anastatic reprint, 1897 ; see his Mittheilungen, i. p. 176 n.). From a MS in the Museo Borgiano, A. Ciasca published short fragments from chs. 1 and 2 (Sacrorum Bibliorum fragmenta Copto-Sahidica, vol. ii. (1889) p. 218) ; and the same by E. Amélineau (Fragments de la Version Thébaine de l'Écriture Ancien Testament, Parisiis, 1889), together with two leaves from a MS at Berlin, containing 6^{17}–7^{18}, $21^{8\text{-}23a}$, supplying and emending some defects in Lagarde's codex (see Herkenne, pp. 23–27, and Norb. Peters, Die sahidisch-koptische Übersetzung des Buches Ecclesiasticus auf ihren wahren Wert für die Textkritik untersucht Freiburg, 1898).—A fragment in the Bohairic dialect (ch. $2^{1\text{-}9}$) has been published by Lagarde, Orientalia, i. (1879) p. 69 ; the same piece with some more fragments (chs. 1. 4^{20}–5^2 12^{13}–13^1 $22^{7\text{-}18}$ $23^{7\text{-}14}$ $24^{1\text{-}11}$) by U. Bouriant, Recueil de travaux relatifs à la philologie et à l'archéologie égyptiennes et assyriennes, vol. vii. (Paris, 1886), p. 81 ff.—One piece, finally, has been published by U. Bouriant in the dialect of Akhmîm in the Mémoires publiés par les membres de la mission archéologique française au Caire sous la direction de M. Maspero, I. 2. (Paris, 1885), 255 ff., containing 22^{16}–23^6.

In Arabic there seem to exist several versions. One MS, said to be corrected from the Greek, is preserved in the Medicean Library at Florence : in the Prologue the grandson is made to say that he translated the work into Syriac. A compendium of the Arabic version in an imperfect state (5 pages) is preserved, according to Margoliouth, in the Bodleian Library (Hunt. 260).

The version contained in Karshuni in cod. Syr. 179, i., at Paris, is said to be due to Basilius, bishop of Tiberias, but goes back to the Syriac, not the Greek text of Sirach.

All these versions, except the last, rest on the common Greek text ; and so do most of the quotations in Greek Fathers. An exceptional position among them is held by Clemens Alexandrinus, whose quotations in important details agree with cod. 248, 253, and the monks Antonius and Maximus.

Of greater importance than the other versions, and of greater value than for other parts of the Greek OT, is—

(b) The Latin Version. It is true that the suggestion first broached by the Roman Catholic commentator Cornelius a Lapide (†1637, Comm. on Sirach, 2 vols., 1634), next mooted by Sabatier, then discussed in a special paper by Ernst Gottlob Bengel (1769–1826),* that the Latin version was based immediately on the lost Hebrew original, has turned out to be wrong ; but even the latest investigation (H. Herkenne, de Veteris Latinæ Ecclesiastici capitibus i–xliii, Leipzig, 1899) has arrived at the result : 'Nititur Vetus Latina textu vulgari græco ad textum hebraicum alius recensionis Græce castigato.' It is all the more to be regretted that its text has not yet been published in a satisfactory way.

It is generally believed that the text in our ordinary editions of the Vulgate is the Old Latin untouched by Jerome.† But his expression 'calamo temperavi' does not exclude, in our opinion, those stylistic emendations which we perceive when comparing the current Latin text with older documents, either MSS or quotations.‡

The most convenient edition of the Latin Vulgate is that of van Ess (pub. 1824), which gives on the margin the variations of the Sixtina and Clementina after the Vatican editions of 1590, 1592, 1593, and 1598.

Sabatier (see vol. ii. 53) reprinted the official text with the collation of four MSS 'optimæ notæ' (ib. 389, 'Corbeienses duos, unum Sangermanensem, & alium S. Theoderico ad Rhemum'). The Corbeiensis I. is now Paris 11,532 (9th cent.; Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate, 104, 107) ; Sangermanensis 15, now Paris 11,553 (9th cent.; Berger, 65, 408).

In 1740 J. Blanchinus published, in his Vindiciæ canon. script. Vulgatæ Latinæ editionis, a collation of the codex Toletanus, with Henten's edition (1569) ; repeated in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxix. 985.

After the collations of the Amiatinus by Heyse-Tischendorf (Lips. 1873) the whole text of this MS was published for Wisd. and Sirach by Lagarde, Mitth. i. 283–377 ; see also p. 191.

Ph. Thielmann devoted to the Latin Sirach two articles in Wölfflin's Archiv, and showed that chs. 44–50 were due to another hand than the rest of the book ; the former of European, the chief part of African origin (Archiv für lat. Lexikogr. viii. 501–561, ix. 2, 247 ff.) ; see vol. ii. p. 10.

The text published by C. Douais (une ancienne version latine de l'Ecclésiastique, Paris, 1895, 4to) is, according to Thielmann and Kennedy, an apparently Spanish text, a revision of the primitive African version (ch. 21^{17}–22^{22}). In the judgment of the present writer it may be just as well a new translation, independent of the former.

Ph. Thielmann ('Bericht über das gesammelte handschriftliche Material zu einer kritischen Ausgabe der lateinischen Übersetzungen biblischer Bücher des alten Testamentes' in Münchener Sitz.-Ber., 1899, ii. 2, 205 ff.) gives for Sirach the collation of twenty-three MSS (1–4 Spanish, 5, 6 Anglo-Saxon, 7–12 French before Charlemagne, 13–16 St. Gall and Italy, 17–19 Theodulf, 20–23 Alcuin), and specimens from fourteen MSS more ; some fragments cod. Veron. i. and cod. Ambr. D. 50 f. (olim Bobb.) are of the 6th cent. But still older are the—

QUOTATIONS OF THE LATIN FATHERS.—Augustine's Speculum is mentioned above ; it contains whole chapters from Sirach, and its text agrees closely with that of the codex Amiatinus ; but other quotations in the writings of Augustine

† Edersheim : 'Jerome tells us expressly that he had left the text of the Vetus Latina untouched (calamo temperavi) in the (apocryphal) Wisdom of Solomon, and in Sirach' (Præf. in edit. libr. Salom. iuxta Sept. interpr., ed. Vallarsi, 10,436).

‡ Comp. the same expression on his version of the Latin Gospels in the Epistula ad Damasum: 'quæ ne multum a lectionis Latinæ consuetudine discreparent, ita calamo temperavimus, ut his tantum quæ sensum videbantur mutare correctis, reliqua manere pateremus ut fuerant.'

(collected by Sabatier and Lagarde) show strange variations.

See, for instance, 15^{21} 'laxamentum peccandi' for 'spatium p.' ('spatium' also in the Speculum).* Not a single one of his MSS, as Thielmann informs the present writer, has this word 'laxamentum'; yet it is found for this passage also in that other Speculum falsely ascribed to Augustine, now called liber de divinis scripturis (edited together with the former by Weihrich), and must for internal reasons be considered as the original reading of the Latin version.

For 'opprobrium,' 20^{26}, this Speculum has 'supervacuitas' (in no MS of Thielmann); further, 22^{23} 'conservationem' instead of 'custodiam' (no Biblical MS); Augustine 'signaculum astutum' instead of 'certum'; 25^{32} instead of 'beatificat virum suum' the Liber has 'consentit in angustio viro suo'; in this case Complutensis 1 agreeing with it (only 'angustiis'); 28^{5} instead of 'dum caro sit servat iram' (σὰρξ ὢν) the Liber has 'cœpit retinere iram' (=ἄρχων); 29^{11} we find in the Liber the imperative 'animæquitarda' (= μακροθύμησον), a word to be added to the new Thesaurus Latinæ linguæ for 'animo fortior esto' of the Vulgate, or 'animæquior esto' of Compl. 1, Metz 7 (first hand, second hand=Vulgate). Here we have three stages of subsequent revisions.

The greatest surprise is 31^{5}. By a comparison with the Syriac it seemed clear that instead of διαφθοράν we must read διάφορα, and πλανηθήσεται instead of πλησθήσεται (see Ball, Variorum Apocrypha; Nestle, Marginalien, p. 56. The RV does not materially alter the AV: 'he that followeth destruction shall have the fill of it'); 'qui insequitur destructionem replebitur ea': for this the Liber has 'qui ins. multa, in illis implanabitur,' i.e., just as proposed, διάφορα and πλανηθήσεται. Of all MSS collated by Thielmann, only the first hand of Metz 7 has preserved a remembrance of this rendering, reading 'multa in illis inplicabitur' (sic).†

Now the questions arise—(1) How have this quotation and the codex of Metz preserved this true reading? (2) How did the wrong text find its way into all the other MSS? Is the latter circumstance due to an intentional revision, and may this revision have been made through Jerome? The former may be due either to a Greek MS which preserved the original text, or to recourse to the Syriac version, or to derivation from the original Hebrew.‡

In all cases the importance of 𝔏 in its original form and of the early quotations is evident—the worse therefore the neglect of these studies; but still more evident is the value of the Syriac and the Hebrew texts.

viii. THE SYRIAC TEXT.—In his edition of the Libri Veteris Testamenti Apocryphi (or deuterocanonici, as he wished to read afterwards) syriace (1861), Lagarde gave to Sirach the first place, to show that he believed with Bendtsen (Specimen exercitationum criticarum in V. T. libros apocryphos e scriptis patrum et antiquis versionibus, Göttingen, 1789), that this version was not made from the Greek, but from the 'Hebrew' (see Lagarde, Symm. i. 88, 17; Mitth. i. 191). As this view is now almost universally accepted—it was still debated by Bretschneider and Fritzsche—it need no longer be proved. The question is only whether the translation was not influenced, like other books in the Peshiṭta, here and there by the Greek version, and whether its text has come down to us in good preservation.

It was first published in the great Polyglot Bibles of Paris and London,—in the latter on the basis of three MSS of Ussher and Pococke; then by Lagarde from the cod. 12,142 in the British Museum, which belongs to the 6th cent. (with a collation of Walton's text), and lies before us further in Ceriani's photo-lithographic reproduction of the codex Ambrosianus of about the same age (Milano, 1876–83, folio). It suffered, of course, some textual corruptions, but on the whole there are no such difficulties as arise in connexion with 𝔊 and 𝔏. The other question whether it was influenced by 𝔊 must, it seems, be answered in the affirmative. This may have been the case already when the version was made, or at a later though very early and only partial revision. The former view seems the more probable (see Ryssel, p. 253). It is a drawback for our purposes that 𝔖 is rather a paraphrase than a version; nevertheless, the great progress made in the explanation of Sirach by Margoliouth-Edersheim depends on the use made especially of 𝔖 for the corroboration or correction of 𝔊 and the restoration of the original Hebrew. These two texts were, so to speak, our Röntgen apparatus, enabling us to see the Hebrew text underlying them.

ix. THE HEBREW TEXTS.—Especially among those who knew the precarious state of the present Greek, Latin, and Syriac texts of Sirach, the surprise and joy were great when the news spread that a fragment of the original Hebrew text had been discovered, and when, after its publication, more and more parts of a Hebrew Sirach came to light, of which in the Church at least, since the days of Jerome, nobody had heard or seen anything, while even among the Jews few scattered quotations had survived, partially in Hebrew and partially in Aramaic (see their collection in C–N). It is impossible to notice all that has been published on these finds. Suffice it to say that after the first private communication (see above, p. 539^{a}) the first public announcement appeared in the Academy of 16th May 1896. (1) The first publication of the text was in the Expositor, July 1896, 1–15 (see on it D. S. Margoliouth in the same periodical, Aug., 140–157); (2) then came nine leaves, which had found their way into the Bodleian Library, published by Cowley and Neubauer, 1897, and republished by R. Smend (Abhandlungen der K. Ges. der Wiss. zu Göttingen, N.F. ii. 2); after this (3) the chief publication of Taylor-Schechter (Camb. 1899), containing, besides fourteen pages from the first MS (now called B), eight pages from a new MS, now called A; (4) in the Jewish Quarterly Review for Oct. 1899, G. Margoliouth gave four pages from MS B, acquired by the British Museum; (5) I. Lévi published in the Revue des Études Juives for Janvier–Mars, 1900, two pages from a third MS (C) and two from a fourth MS (D), both in the library of the Consistoire Israélite at Paris. The JQR for April 1900, finally, gave four pages of MS A published by E. N. Adler and four of MS C by S. Schechter (6, 7), and (8) in the number for July 1900 (p. 688 ff.) two pages of C belonging to M. Gaster. All the publications were at last brought together most conveniently—if it may be called convenient to study torn and faded leaves of Hebrew MSS—in a splendid publication, Facsimiles of the Fragments hitherto recovered of the Book of Ecclesiasticus in Hebrew (Oxford and Cambridge, MDCCCCI, 60 plates in case).* C, it should be added, consists only of excerpts (see p. 548^{b}).

But in the meantime—between the second and third publications—there had suddenly fallen a bitter drop into the general joy. D. S. Margoliouth, who had published in 1890 as his Inaugural Lecture an Essay on the place of Ecclesiasticus in Semitic Literature, and before that time had contributed largely to the commentary of Edersheim, declared in a paper on The Origin of the 'Original

---

* The variations are partially mere lexical: 4^{33} 'veritas' instead of 'iustitia'; 6^{36} 'limen' instead of 'gradus'; 14^{12} 'sæculum' instead of 'mundus'; others touch the sense or even the underlying Greek text, as 38^{16} 'flectet fortitudinem' (=ἰσχύν) against 'flectet cervicem' (αὐχένα ?).

† Another trace of this reading is found in the 25th epistle of Paulinus (p. 167*c*): 'qui terrenas possessiones concupiscit, in illis implanabitur.' Sabatier, who quotes this passage, remarked: 'at hæc postrema ex alio loco desumpta videntur.'

‡ For mere conjectural emendation the rendering seems too clever, or rather not clever enough, for the proper meaning of διάφορα='property' has not been recognized. It is quite the same with the preservation of the original order in chs. 31–36 in 𝔏. This may be due either to the fact that 𝔏 was made from a Greek MS which was independent of the one from which our present 𝔊 texts are derived, or it may have been restored after the Syriac or after the Hebrew. 𝔏 shares some of the strangest misspellings with 𝔊; see 43^{25} 'dominus Jhesus' Ἰησοῦς instead of νήσους 'insulas' (in the official Vulg.).

* With 'New York, Frowde, 5 dollars,' mentioned by W. Muss-Arnolt in the Theol. and Sem. Lit. for 1900, p. 32.

Hebrew' of Ecclesiasticus (Parker, 1899, 20 pp.), that the newly-discovered Hebrew was not the original, but a retranslation; a certain reading, 43^{13}, appeared to him to be a translation of a corruption of a Persian translation of a corrupt reading in the Greek, the work of a Jew, whose native language was Arabic, about the 10th cent. He closed his paper with the remark that 'Mrs. Lewis by her precious discovery has hit biblical criticism harder than it was ever hit before, or is ever likely to be hit again. For, the next time we proceed to parcel out Isaiah, will not our very street boys call out to us, "You who misdate by 1300 years a document before you, what do you know of the dates of the Prophecies and Psalms"?'

Startling even as this was, a similar verdict was pronounced by such a scholar as Bickell, who in earlier years had discovered under the Greek disguise that the closing chapter must have been an alphabetical poem ('Ein alphabetisches Lied Jesus Sirach's. Nachgewiesen von G. B.' in Z. f. kath. Theologie, vi. 319–333), and had tried to restore the very metres of the Hebrew ('Die Strophik des Ecclesiasticus' in Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, 1892, 87–96). Bickell published his view in a short paper on this alphabetical poem ('Der hebräische Sirachtext eine Rückübersetzung,' ib. 1899, 251–256). Other scholars took up the challenge of Prof. Margoliouth—among them Th. Nöldeke ('Bemerkungen zum hebräischen Ben Sīrā' in ZATW xx. [1900] 81–94); Smend (ThLZ, 1899, col. 506); M. D. Gibson (The Record, June 23, 1899, p. 641); Ed. König in a series of papers in the Expos. Times, 1900, and separately (see Literature, 6, at end of present art.) and in other periodicals; see Muss-Arnolt, p. 33.

Fortunately, the new documents which came to light afterwards enable us to place our judgment on a broader basis. The four MSS seem to be all of about the same age, the 11th cent. D is apparently the oldest of them, but even on C Adler remarked: 'From a comparison of paper and character with my earliest fragment from the Genizah, dated 832, there is nothing to induce one to assume that its date is later.' Some passages of Sirach occur in these four MSS twice, a few even three times. Now if ℌ—to use this symbol for the Hebrew texts—were the original, the MSS of ℌ must agree,—apart, of course, from such transcriptional variations as are common to the transmission of works before the invention of Gutenberg,—according to the rule laid down by Jerome on the Latin texts of the Gospels as compared with the Greek, verum non esse quod variat. But what do we find? One of the first verses now lying before us in two MSS of ℌ is 4^{30}—

καὶ φαντασιοκοπῶν ἐν τοῖς οἰκέταις σου.

𝔏 Noli esse sicut leo in domo tua;
evertens domesticos tuos et opprimens subiectos tibi.

𝔖 לא תהוא כלב בביתך
וזעיף ודחיל בעבידָתך

'be not a dog in thy house, and rebuking and fearful in thy works.'

Nobody doubted that 'ὡς λέων' and 'a dog' went back to an original כְּלָבִי, read בְּלֶב by 𝔖, and that 'as a lion' was right. Again, in the second member it appeared necessary to seek a common Hebrew equivalent for φαντασιοκοπῶν on the one hand, and 'rebuking and fearful' on the other; further, for 'slaves' and 'works.' The latter was, so it seemed, found easily: עֲבָדִים from עֶבֶד, would = 'slaves,' from עֲבָד (Ec 9^1) = 'works'; the other was more difficult to guess, because φαντασιοκοπῶν is a hapax legomenon in the Greek Bible, and a rare word, with doubtful meaning; some good examples of it from Ecclesiastical authors may be found in the edition of Hoeschel.*

And now for the texts of ℌ—

A אל תהי ככלב בביתך
ומוזר ומתירא במלאכתך

C אל תהי כאריה בביתך
ומתפחז על עבודתך

i.e. A 'be not like a dog in thy house, and [—?] and fearful in thy labour.'
C 'be not like a strong lion † in thy house, and raging over thy works.' ‡

Can there be any doubt that A agrees with 𝔖 and C with 𝔊? Compare especially the second clause, where 𝔖 has two words, A has also two, § C for one word of 𝔊 has one word. What is more natural than the conclusion that A and C are not the original, but dependent upon 𝔖 and 𝔊, retranslations, as Margoliouth affirmed of B? But we must not be too rash: we ask, How would a late Jewish translator hit upon מתפחז to render so obscure a word as φαντασιοκοπῶν? פחז is rare in biblical Hebrew (Gn 49^4, Jer 23^{32}); it suits the context very well; it might be easily confounded with פחד 'fear,' and thus explain the rendering of 𝔖, and it is a favourite word with Sirach (see ℌ 8^2 19^2 $41^{17\,\mathrm{mg.}}$ $42^{10\,\mathrm{mg.}}$, 𝔖 19^2 $23^{4.\,6.\,16.\,17}$); it may therefore have preserved the original. ‖ This supposition gains probability from a comparison of Zeph $3^{3.\,4}$ 'her princes are lions in her midst . . . her prophets are פֹּחֲזִים,' where the two words stand together just as here in clause a and b. Schechter has shown that the whole text of ℌ is full of allusions to the OT (cf. p. 548^b: 11^{30} a reminiscence of Gn 42^9). These are used, of course, also by pious Jews of later times; but when the grandson testifies in his prologue that his grandfather 'having given himself to the reading of the Law and the Prophets and the other books of our fathers, and having gained great familiarity therein, was drawn on also himself to write somewhat pertaining to instruction and wisdom,' why should we hesitate to consider those characteristics as belonging to the original?

Take the next verse which lies before us in two MSS of ℌ—

4^{31} 𝔊 μὴ ἔστω ἡ χεὶρ σου ἐκτεταμένη εἰς τὸ λαβεῖν
καὶ ἐν τῷ ἀποδιδόναι συνεσταλμένη.

𝔖 לא תהוא פשיטא אידך למסב
ותהוא קפיסא למחל

---

[*] In the Thesaurus of Stephanus-Hase 'Eccl 4' and 'Sir 4^{33}' are quoted as different passages! The wrong form φαντασιοσκοπῶν is translated suspicax by Grotius. Nobilius gives arrepticius; even Ryssel translates as if it came from σκοπεῖν, 'Gespensterseher,' i.e. argwöhnisch, misstrauisch ohne thatsächlichen Grund. AV 'frantick' (see vol. ii. 65), RV 'fanciful'; Frankel translated אַכְזָר 'cruel' (for 'lion' לַיִשׁ); מְזֻעָף נְפִיחָאִית ק 'boisterously rebukeful' (whether influenced by 𝔖? or reading φυσιο-?); on the Coptic see Herkenne, who thought for 𝔊 of some word from √שׁעף (Job 4^{13}), for 𝔏 of √סעף (Is 10^{33}), and adduced from the Apophthegmata Antonii et Maximi, p. 602 ('morosus') ἐν τοῖς οἰκ. σου καὶ ταπεινῶν τοὺς ὑποχειρίους σου (= 𝔏).

[†] The Hebrew word is different from לביא.

[‡] Or slaves, if we derive עבודה from עֲבֻדָּה (Job 1^3), as suggested to the present writer by Dr. Driver, and independently to the editor by Dr. A. B. Davidson.

[§] The first of them מוזר is not clear; see C-N and R (SK, 1900, 378); the latter compares Ps 69^9. We suspect a corruption of ועף = זוף, see Expos. Times, xi. 336 note; for מתירא R proposes מְחוּן or מַתִּין 'zuwartend, langsam'!

[‖] The passage is discussed with a different result by Taylor (JThSt, i. 576). He considers אריה aryeh and מתירא mithyaré to be the original; 𝔊 may have turned the latter into מתראה; 'the synonymous מתפחד with a clerical error accounts for מתפחז C.' The first two suppositions are natural, but when, where, and why should מתירא have been turned into מתפחד, so as to arrive at מתפחז?

𝔭 agrees in the first clause completely with 𝔖, in the second it has

ולפניו קפיכא

Now take A and C—

A אל תהי ידך פתוחה לקחת
וקפוצה בתוך מתן
C אל תהי ידך מושטת לשאת
ובעת השב קפורה

that is to say: instead of a common original we have two versions differing more from one another than the two Syriac, every word for which there is more than one Hebrew equivalent available being rendered differently—

stretch out √	פתח and ישט
receive	לקח and נשא
in	בתוך and בעת
give (back)	נתן and השיב
shut	קפץ and קפר

A third passage is—

5^{9b} 𝔊 καὶ μὴ πορεύου ἐν πάσῃ ἀτραπῷ
𝔖 ומתפנא לכל שביל
A ופנה דרך שבולת
C ואל תלך לכל שביל

A is translated by Taylor, 'and turning the way of the stream,' C agrees with 𝔊.

Further, v.^{11}—

A ובארך רוח השב פתגם
C ובארך ענה תענה נכונה

C=𝔊 with the addition ὀρθήν, which is found only in 248, 253 and 𝔭 sub ⁎

V.^{13a} 𝔊 εὐλαλιᾷ
𝔖 ביד מן דממלל 'through him that is speaking.'
A ביוד בוטא
C ביד בוטה

V.^{13b} 𝔊 ἡ πτῶσις αὐτῶν
𝔖 דמא להון 'throws them down'
A מפלתו
C מפליטו

(C being, of course, a corruption of A).

7^{25} 𝔊 δώρησαι αὐτήν
𝔖 הביה give her
A חברה join her
C זברה grant her.*

What follows from these passages? That the question is a very complicated one. Not even of C is it possible to say that it is a simple retranslation of 𝔊, for even in C there are passages which are at variance with 𝔊. On the other hand, it is equally impossible to maintain that ℌ has preserved everywhere the original, independent of 𝔊 and 𝔖. There are passages in ℌ which cannot be explained in any other way than by the supposition that they rest on a corrupt and glossed text, sometimes of 𝔊, sometimes of 𝔖.

A passage which, for the present writer at least, is perfectly convincing is—25^{17}. 'The wickedness of a woman . . . darkeneth her countenance like sackcloth,' AV (mg. 'Or, like a bear'), RV as a bear doeth (without even mentioning the other reading).

𝔊 ^{B}, etc. ὡς σάκκον; 𝔊 ^{AS}, etc. ὡς ἄρκος.

𝔏 combining both readings: tanquam ursus et quasi saccum.

𝔖 . . . 'makes pale the face of her husband and makes it black like the colour of a sack)';* now C has ויקדיר פנ לדוב 'makes black (his or her; the letters are torn away) face . . . to a bear.'

All rules of textual criticism (the general one: scriptioni proclivi præstat ardua, and the special one for Sirach, the agreement between 𝔊 and 𝔖) must be nought, or C is here the retranslation of a corrupt Greek text.

The close connexion of C with 𝔊 is corroborated by other passages. The very first words preserved in C—it begins 4^{23} (את חכמתך) תקפוץ, for which A has the synonymous תצפין—do not occur, it is true, in the received Greek text, but in the MSS 106, 248, 253 (c); C even preserved such glosses (mentioned above, p. 544^{a}) as 5^{11} γίνου ταχύς (C נָכוֹן=?) ἐν ἀκροάσει σου+ἀγαθῇ (C טובה=106, 248, 253 𝔭), καὶ ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ φθέγγου ἀπόκρισιν+ὀρθήν (C נכונה=248, 253 𝔭 ⁎).

Again, all rules of textual criticism are nought if such additions be not glosses, and glosses added to the Greek, not to the original Hebrew text; and yet they occur in C. ℌ^{C}, therefore, is dependent —partially at least—on a glossed text of 𝔊, as it is represented by 248, 253.

It is to be hoped that scholars will agree in this, and they may do so the more because this concession does not decide the question for the other MSS ABD, nor even for the whole content of C; C being an exception also in this respect, that it does not give a continuous text, but mere excerpts from chs. 4^{23}–7^{25} 18^{31}–20^{7}; then come suddenly $37^{19.\ 22.\ 24.\ 26}$,† followed by 20^{13}, and, finally, 25^{8}–26^{2}.

If ℌ^{C} is chiefly dependent on 𝔊, there abound in the other MSS ℌ^{ABD} traces of the influence of 𝔖, especially in so-called doublets, passages appearing twice. Cf. 11^{30}—

In 𝔊 we have two lines—

> Πέρδιξ θηρευτὴς ἐν καρτάλλῳ, οὕτως καρδία ὑπερηφάνου·
> καὶ ὡς κατάσκοπος ἐπιβλέπει πτῶσιν.

In 𝔏 three—

> sicut perdix inducitur in caveam (v.l. foveam) > et ut caprea in laqueo, sic et cor superborum > et sicut prospector videns casum proximi sui.

In 𝔖 five—> like a partridge caught in a cage is the heart of the proud, > and like a spy who looks on the fall;

> How many are the iniquities of the ungodly!
> [cf. 𝔊 v.^{29}]
> like a dog which enters into every house and robs, > so enters the ungodly into every house and disturbs.

In ℌ six or more—

> As a bird caught in a cage so is the heart of a proud man;
> As a wolf that lieth in wait to tear.
> How many are the iniquities of the covetous man!
> As a dog is he among those that eat in the house.

---

* 7^{25} AC הוצא בת ויצא עסק, 𝔊 καὶ ἔσῃ τετελεκὼς ἔργον μέγα, 𝔖 ונפוק עשוקיא, AC ויצא עסק; 'and the trouble (or strife, see S-T p. 47) has gone'; cf. the witty though rude saying of Schopenhauer at the death of an old woman whom he had to care for: obit anus, abit onus. It is clear that here C cannot rest on 𝔊.

* It is difficult to understand how Bickell, Zöckler, Ryssel, RV could prefer the bear, which crept in from the mentioning of lion and dragon in the context; 𝔖 being independent of 𝔊 decides for the sack; and then compare parallels like Rev 6^{12}, but especially 1 Clem. ad Cor. 8, αἱ ἁμαρτίαι ὑμῶν . . . μελανώτεραι σάκκου; see on these variants Nestle, Marginalien, p. 51.

† It is owing to this insertion that we have these fragments three times in B, C, D, with slight variations.

He doeth violence to all . . .
The covetous man cometh and maketh strife in all their goods ;
The tale-bearer lieth in wait as a bear for the house of the scorners ;
And as a spy he seeth nakedness.

On the two lines of 𝔊 Bochart has written a whole chapter in his Hierozoicum. More than one article would be necessary on the correspondence between κατάσκοπος (and its equivalents ܕܘܒܐ = דוב=זאב) and the other equivalents. It seems clear that the dog כלב owes its existence to the κάρταλλος = כְּלוּב.

On the arguments adduced by Margoliouth from the Persian we must refer to Nöldeke (ZATW 1900, p. 94); on the question raised by Margoliouth, whether the Sepher ha-galūy, which betrays knowledge of the Cairene texts, is by Saadia or not; and on the age of the Talmudic quotations from Ben-Sira, cf. the papers of Margoliouth on the one hand, and König, Schechter, Abrahams, Bacher, Harkavy, etc., on the other (see Literature).

But that even in C fragments of the original are preserved, see above on 7^{25}. What Jew of later times, who had nothing before him except 𝔊, ἔκδου θυγατέρα καὶ ἔσῃ τετελεκὼς μέγα ἔργον, could have hit on הוצא בת ויצא עסק? Even with the help of 𝔖 it would have been difficult to arrive at this text. But there are passages where ℌ offers readings different alike from 𝔊 and 𝔖.

A good example occurs in the very first leaf discovered of ℌ, 40^{18}—

> καὶ ὑπὲρ ἀμφότερα ὁ εὑρίσκων θησαυρόν.

The very context shows that 𝔊 is wrong; instead of the one member αὐτάρκους ἐργάτου there must have been two. Grotius, Grabe, Fritzsche, AV, RV, inserted καί and spoiled the sense; for the life of the αὐτάρκης is sweet (ipse suis pollens opibus, Lucretius), but not that of the working man. 𝔖 gave no help; for the first member is wanting. What a pleasure, then, to read in ℌ—a life of wine and strong drink is sweet; cf. the same pair in v.[10] in ℌ, where 𝔊 had οἶνος καὶ μουσικά=שִׁיר, and 𝔖 חמרא עתיקא 'old wine.' And what a surprise to find on the margin an additional (though wrong) reading: יותר שכל (C-N='that excels in prudence'; but יותר perhaps=αὐτάρκης). The grandson mistook שֵׁכָר 'strong drink' for שְׂכִ(י)ר 'hired worker.'[*] What a surprise, again, to find the whole margin of this leaf covered with various readings, spellings, notes—one in Persian referring to a different MS.

חיי יין ושכר ימתקו

V.[20], where we had read in 𝔊 that 'better than wine and music is the love of wisdom,' in 𝔖 'better than old wine the love of a friend,' we now find that the grandfather had written, 'Wine and strong drink make the heart exult, but the love of lovers (דוֹדִים) is above them all.'

Surely it is not going too far to say that with the finding of these texts a new period begins in the history of our book. Where we hitherto were bid (7^{23}) to bow down the neck of our children from their youth (κάμψαι τὸν τράχηλον αὐτῶν—but τὸν τράχηλον αὐτῶν is correctly omitted by 𝔏 and Clemens Alexandrinus (i. 186, 2, ed. Dind.[†]),—we are now advised to marry them early (𝔖 ℌ^{AC}=confusion between שה and שא).

It is neither possible nor necessary to go on multiplying examples of this kind. A great field waits for patient workers. The task for future editors of Sirach will be to compare most carefully—(1) the witnesses for 𝔊 (MSS,[*] Versions, Quotations[†]); (2) the witnesses for 𝔖—on the whole, an easy task; (3) the witnesses for ℌ^{ABCD}; and the quotations to be compared with each other, where there is more than one, then with 𝔊𝔖. The text, in translation, would have to be given in parallel columns: in the middle what is common to all, at the right and the left the variations, at the bottom would be shown how the variations originated.

On the language of ℌ see in C-N p. xxxi ff. the 'Glossary of Words not found in the Hebrew of the OT, or found in it only in the passages quoted or referred to'; and cf. Nöldeke (ZATW, 1900, p. 94), who was at first in favour of the Oxf. Heb. Lex. beginning to take notice of Ben Sira, but afterwards thought it a safer course that his words should be gathered into an Appendix. The Concordance to the Septuagint by Hatch-Redpath promises for the second part of the Supplement 'A Short Concordance showing the Hebrew equivalents to the Greek in the lately discovered fragments of Ecclesiasticus.' This will be very welcome. To learn what interesting questions are raised, see, for instance, 10^{10} שֶׁמֶץ מחלה=μικρὸν ἀρρώστημα;[‡] 18^{32} (C) שֶׁמֶץ תענוג=μικρᾷ τρυφῇ; שְׁכָמִים=μέρη 37^{18} (cf. Gn 48^{22}); עליל (see I. Löw, 'Marginalien zu Kohut's Aruch' in Semitic Studies in Memory of A. Kohut, p. 374); אפנים 50^{27} with אבני 50^{9} and Pr 25^{2}. The similarity to the language of the 'Paitanim,' the late Jewish hymn-writers, seems to militate against the originality of ℌ; but even Schechter cannot deny it: 'If he thought like a Rabbi, he wrote like a Paitan' (cf. Toy in Encyc. Bibl. p. 1167 f.; D. Strauss, Sprachl. Stud. zu den heb. Sirachfragmenten, Zürich, 1900; W. Bacher, Die älteste Terminol. der jüd. Schriftauslegung, Leipzig, 1899, p. 207).

x. CONTENTS AND THEOLOGY.—1. It is clear that in many details our views about the contents of the book must be revised since the recent finds; but on the whole the standpoint of the book has been correctly estimated. It has been considered as the chief monument of primitive Sadduceism, and this found corroboration in an unexpected way.

C. Taylor wrote (1877) in the first edition of the Sayings of the Jewish Fathers: 'It has been suggested, with a certain plausibility, that the Book Ecclus. approximates to the standpoint of the primitive Çaduqim as regards its theology, its sacerdotalism, and its want of sympathy with the modern Soferim. The name of Ezra is significantly omitted from its Catalogue of Worthies.' At the same time he called attention to the fact that the Book of the Sadducees and the Book of Ben Sira are placed side by side on the 'Index Expurgatorius' (Sanh. 100*b*). It must have been gratifying to be able to publish twenty years later, at the end of the Hebrew Ben Sira, a hymn, not to be found in the earlier texts, which ends with praise of the Sons of Ṣadok. See S-T p. 41, the hymn (after ch. 50^{12})—

'O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good;
For his mercy endureth for ever.'
. . . .
O give thanks unto him that maketh to bud a horn for the house of David;
For his mercy endureth for ever.
O give thanks unto him that chose the sons of Sadok to be priests;
For his mercy endureth for ever.'

לבוחר כבני צדוק לכהן.

[*] Bacher, Ryssel, Smend are not satisfied with 'wine and strong drink.' Bacher, comparing Ex 5^{11}, wishes to read יָשֵׁן וְשָׂכִיר 'who can sleep and has work'; Ryssel with Smend, יוֹתֵר וְשָׂכָר 'who has plenty, and has paying work.'

[†] The agreement between 𝔏 and Clement is of great importance.

[*] Special attention is due, amongst these, to those of the longer recension, called 'Alexandrian' by Ryssel; cf. A. Schlatter, Das neugefundene hebräische Stück des Sirach. Der Glossator des griechischen Sirach und seine Stellung in der Geschichte der jüdischen Theologie, Gütersloh, 1897 (='Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie,' i. 5, 6). On the passage $26^{18ff.}$, especially 'the tower of death' (=2 Mac 13^{5}; Valerius Maximus, ix. 2), see Nestle, Marginalien, p. 52.

[†] On the quotations of Clement see esp. O. Stählin, Clemens Alexandrinus und die Septuaginta (Nürnberg, 1901, Progr.), pp. 46–58; note in 18^{22} μικρᾷ.

[‡] μακρὸν ἀρρ. all Greek MSS; most σκώπτει, four κόπτει or ἐκκόπτει, one σκόπτει; instead of ἰατρός Hitzig and the corrector of S ἰατρόν; AV 'The physician cutteth off a long disease'; RV 'It is a long disease, the physician mocketh'; 𝔏, combining both readings, 'Languor prolixior gravat medicum; brevem languorem præcidit medicus'; 𝔖 'and his bowels the physician tears' (נצרא); but, with Herkenne, we may perhaps read נצרא (=σκώπτειν). Adler's translation of ℌ ('of course quite tentative') is, 'A trace of disease that maketh the physician serene' (יצהיב). It seems best to combine the translation of Hitzig with the reading μικρόν: 'A little disease baffles the physician.'

2. Among former descriptions of its contents see especially T. K. Cheyne, Job and Solomon, or The Wisdom of the OT, 1887, pp. 179–198, 247 (ch. i.: The wise man turned Scribe—Sirach's moral teaching; ch. ii.: his place in the movement of thought); then the Introduction of Edersheim, and now the article of C. H. Toy (Encyc. Bibl. 1164–1179).

3. In its form and substance the book is a fine example of Hebrew Ḥokmah-literature, with its lights and shadows. It is no longer the prophet that speaks in it, neither the prophetic speaker of earlier times, nor even the prophetic writer like Ezekiel or Malachi; nor is it a poet like the author of Job; on the other hand, the Rabbi of the Talmud has not yet taken their place; there is scarcely a trace of Haggadah and Halachah in the book. The author is full of respect for the religious literature of the past; he knows himself to be an epigone, but nevertheless he dares to give something of his own. He does not preach as yet from given texts (33^{16} 'I awaked up last of all, as one that gathereth after the grape-gatherers; by the blessing of the Lord I profited (got ahead) and filled my winepress like a gatherer of grapes'; cf. also the Prologue). What he has to give is Ḥokmah, Wisdom, an outcome of that Divine Wisdom which is from the Lord, and is with Him for ever, but given by Him to them that fear Him, especially among His chosen people Israel ($17^{17ff.}$ $24^{7ff.}$). But the author does not dwell long in those lofty regions, but turns himself to the wisdom of daily life, giving counsels for all kinds of emergencies, and communicating his observations on men and women, rich and poor, high and low.

4. The book has not received, apparently, its final shape; its contents at least are so varied and loosely arranged that it is difficult to give a table of contents.

See the headings, which are partially preserved in the book itself, in the Greek text from 18^{30} onwards (ἐγκράτεια ψυχῆς; 20^{27} λόγοι παραβολῶν; 23^{7} παιδεία στόματος; 24^{1} αἴνεσις σοφίας; 30^{1} περὶ τέκνων; ^{16}περὶ βρωμάτων; 44^{1} Πατέρων ὕμνος; 51^{1} Προσευχὴ Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σειράχ); the capitulations placed before the book in ancient Greek and Latin texts; the Synopsis of pseudo-Chrysostom; the headings of the AV, which are dropped instead of revised in the RV; careful superscriptions in the German translation of Ryssel; the attempts in the Comm. to find out a plan of the book.

But it would be a pleasant task to give more than a sketch of its moral and religious teachings.

(a) The author's idea of God shows an interesting combination of Jewish piety and Greek philosophy, the former decidedly predominating. What Edersheim considered, on account of its pantheistic ring, as a bold later addition of the younger Siracide, namely 43^{27} 'We may speak much and yet come short: wherefore in sum he is all' (τὸ πᾶν ἐστιν αὐτός), is found in ℌ, and means nothing more than that God is to be found in all His work; it does not deny His unity or personality, which is emphasized by the new reading in ℌ 42^{21} 'he is one from everlasting' (εἷς instead of ἕως or ὡς or ὅς). God is the absolute Lord, the righteous judge, the wise ruler, rich in forbearance, though the full conception of Divine fatherhood finds no expression ($18^{10ff.}$).

(b) Of angels and demons there is scarcely any mention, quite in agreement with the Sadducean standpoint; the central idea is the personified Wisdom, which is seen in nature and history, especially in the history of Israel, first of all in the Law. The prominence given to the Law, both its moral and ritual parts, is one of the features which distinguish Ben Sira from Proverbs, leading over to the later Rabbinism. But from the latter our author is far removed, especially in his attitude towards the heathen world. He does not despise it, like the Pharisees, nor does he expect any special manifestation of Jahweh for the benefit of His people or the conversion of the nations. As regards the individual, he speaks neither of the resurrection of the body nor of the immortality of the soul—ἀθανασία occurs only in the glossed text 19^{19} γνῶσις ἐντολῶν κυρίου παιδεία ζωῆς, οἱ δὲ ποιοῦντες τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῷ ἀθανασίας δένδρον καρποῦνται; see on this point especially Schlatter, pp. 110, 176;—of death and Sheol he thinks like the psalmists.

5. A much larger space is taken up in the book by the ethical and social teachings. Through their pointed form many of Ben Sira's sayings have remained popular. Much, of course, is to be taken cum grano salis; to guard against misunderstanding, the glosses have been added in MSS like 248, 253. The author is 'generally acute, sometimes a little cynical, never pessimistic' (Toy, l.c. 1178). Most unfavourable is his judgment on the female sex ($25^{13ff.}$); friendly is that on physicians (ch. 38); he does not despise wine and music. A great rôle is played by money matters and trade; but almsgiving is the chief part of righteousness, and readiness to forgive is a primary condition of obtaining Divine forgiveness. In some of his precepts he comes near to those of the gospel; the Golden Rule, however, does not occur. No wonder that this book was used in the Church, especially for instruction of the young, almost like a catechism of morals and religion (85th Can. Apost.), and that Augustine embodied so many of its sayings in his Speculum. In modern times one of the few attempts made in England to employ its teaching for religious instruction is the small selection published by E. J. Edwards, School Lessons from Ecclesiasticus (1853). It is to be hoped that, when the critical questions about the book are settled, it may gain in popularity.

NOTE.—USE OF THE BOOK IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Cf. Daubney, The Use of the Apocr. in the Christian Church (London, 1900). For the use of Sirach in NT, he compares about 20 passages, e.g. Mt 6^{14} with 28^{2}, 6^{19} with 29^{12}, 16^{27} with 32^{24}. On Lk 1^{17} Bengel quoted 48^{10} and remarked: 'Minime proletarium esse Siracidæ librum, convenientia eius cum angeli sermone docet.' For the Epistle of James, J. B. Mayor (1897) collected thirty-two resemblances to Sirach. The question whether St. Paul did not quote from the Hebrew Sirach in 1 Co 15^{40} has been raised by Müller ('zum Sirachproblem,' in the Orientalistische Literaturzeitung, June 1900).

Early Christian writers made such extensive use of Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch that they appear more familiar with them than with several books of the NT. Allusions to Sirach may be discovered in Polycarp, i. ($6^{29.30}$); Didache, iv. 5 (4^{31}); undoubted quotations from Sirach occur in Barnabas, Tertullian, etc.; Eusebius introduces a quotation from 32^{9} by the formula: διδασκάλῳ χρώμενος παραγγέλματι θείῳ διδάσκοντι (Dem. Ev. I. i.). On the use made of Sirach in the Roman Church (Breviary and Missal) see W. Schenz, Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des alten Testamentes (Regensburg, 1887, 409). In Britain, Alfred († 1005) seems to have been the first writer to make any investigations touching the Canon, especially the two books Wisd. and Sirach, 'placed with Solomon's works as if he made them; which for likeness of style and profitable use have gone for his; but Jesus the Son of Sirach composed them . . . very large books and read in the church, of long custom, for much good instruction.' In the Prayer-Book of 1549 there were 108 daily lessons from the Apocrypha; that of 1552 had 110, that of 1558 had 125. On the use of Sirach in the 'Homilies' see Daubney, p. 67; on that made by English divines, p. 71 ff. To Archbishop Whitgift († 1604), who declared the Apocrypha 'Parte of the Bible,' and gave command for them to be bound up with the Bible, Drusius dedicated his edition of Sirach (1596).

6. Literature since the discovery of the Hebrew texts: On the publication of the texts by Schechter, Cowley-Neubauer (Smend, Lévi), Schechter-Taylor, G. Margoliouth, I. Lévi, E. N. Adler, Schechter, Gaster, see above, p. 546^{b}. The Expository Times, vol. vii., has two, vol. viii. again two references to Sirach (p. 262, a review of Hogg on C-N), vol. ix. one, vol. x. seven, vol. xi. twenty-four such references (by the editor, König, D. S. Margoliouth, S. Schechter, J. A. Selbie, I. Abrahams, Eb. Nestle, C. Taylor, W. Bacher). The record of 'Theological and Semitic Literature for the year 1900,' published by Muss-Arnolt (Chicago, 1900), enumerates thirty papers, published (1900) in twenty-two different periodicals. See also JQR: Adler, Harkavy, D. S. Margoliouth, Lévi, Schechter, Tyler; REJ: Bacher, Chajes, Lambert, Lévi; ZATW: Bacher, Nöldeke; RB: Condamin, Grimme, Touzard. Ed. König, in addition to his papers in the Expository Times, which were published separately in German (Die Originalität des neulich entdeckten Sirachtextes), wrote in four other periodicals. Cf., further, in Muss-Arnolt, pp. 32–34, the names: Bubl, Flournoix, Halévy, Houtsma, Méchineaux, Noordtzij, Peters, Ryssel (in SK, 1900, 3, 4, 1901, 1, 2, 4, a very careful comparison of 𝔐 with 𝔊 and 𝔖, to be continued), Schlögl, Strauss, Wilson, Zenner. B. Baentsch, in Theol. Jahresb. for 1900, notes 51 books or papers on Sirach.

Even on the Strophic structure of Sirach several papers have been published by H. Grimme (at first in RB, 1900–1901; then separately, Leipzig, Harrassowitz); by Norbert Peters (Theol. Quartalschrift, 1900, pp. 180–193);† by Nivard Schlögl in ZDMG liii. (1899), pp. 669–682, and Ecclesiasticus (39^{12}–49^{16}) ope artis crit. et metr. in formam originalem redactus, Wien, 1901, xxxv. 72, 4to.

It will be a long time before all the questions connected with Sirach are settled and a critical edition becomes possible.

SIRAH, THE WELL OF (בּוֹר הַסִּרָה; BA τὸ φρέαρ τοῦ Σεειράμ, Luc. Σεειρά).—The place at which Joab's messengers overtook Abner, and brought him back to Hebron, where he was assassinated by Joab (2 S 3^{26}; Jos. Ant. VII. i. 5, Βησιρά). It lay on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, and is now probably 'Ain Sârah, near Hebron, the 'spring' ('ain) having taken the place of the 'well' (bîr). The spring flows from a spout into a small tank, and stands back from the road in a little alley with walls of dry stone on either side (PEF Mem. iii. 314).

C. W. WILSON.

SIRION (שִׂרְיֹן in Dt 3^{9}; שִׂרְיוֹן MT and Baer, but Mich. שִׁרְיוֹן, in Ps 29^{6}).—The name said to be given by the Zidonians to MT. HERMON, Dt 3^{9} (Σανιώρ). Like SENIR, it may have originally been the designation of a particular part of the mountain. In Ps 29^{6}, where Sirion is coupled with Lebanon, the LXX (confusing with ישרון Jeshurun; cf. its rendering in Dt 32^{15} $33^{5.\ 26}$, Is 44^{2}) reads ὁ ἠγαπημένος.

SISERA (סִיסְרָא; Σεισαρά, meaning doubtful; cf. Assyr., sasur 'progeny,'—Sayce, Hibbert Lects. 373. Ball, Light from the East, s.v., gives the Assyr. form sisseru, seseru, 'child.' Moore, Judges, 112, thinks that the name is not Semitic, and compares Hittite names ending in -sira, Ḫtasira, Manrasira, etc.,—W. Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 332).—1. Jg 4 and 5, 1 S 12^{9}, Ps 83^{9}. The history of Sisera is told in a poetic (Jg 5) and a prose form (Jg 4). In the main particulars both agree, but they differ considerably on some important points. The Song of Deborah, as being nearer in date to the events recorded, must be treated as the more authentic source. (1) In 4^{4-22} Jabin, king of Hazor, is introduced into the history of Sisera. He is not mentioned in ch. 5, he takes no part in the battle, and his city Hazor, if=Merj Ḥadire (or near it), a little S. of Kedesh and W. of the lake of Ḥuleh, is far away from the scene of the conflict, and brings impossible situations into the narrative. Sisera is throughout the actual and independent leader; his forces are his own (cf. 4^{13} with 4^{3}); to slay him is to carry off the honours of the fight (4^{9}). This Jabin-tradition is of the same character as the fragments preserved in Jg 1, and forms the basis of the history in Jos 11^{1-9} [JE]. How it came to be combined with the Sisera-tradition is not clear; perhaps because both were concerned with fighting in Upper Palestine, and because the northern tribes and Canaanites were the combatants in both cases.* The combination must be earlier than the work of the redactor ($4^{1-3.\ 4b.\ 9a\beta.\ 14a.\ 23.\ 24}$), who provided the narrative with an introduction and conclusion (vv.$^{1-3.\ 23\text{ f.}}$), and gave Jabin, who is called merely king of Hazor in v.^{17}, the unhistorical title of 'king of Canaan' ($4^{2.\ 23\text{f.}}$). It is noticeable that 1 S 12^{9} and Ps 83^{9} imply the combination of the Jabin- and Sisera-traditions. (2) In order to harmonize these, Sisera had to be made the general of Jabin's army ($4^{2.\ 7}$); and this must have been done before the redactor dealt with the narrative. (3) The campaign is on a larger scale in ch. 5 than in ch. 4. In the former Sisera appears at the head of a federation of Canaanite kings (5^{19}), and attacks the six tribes bordering on the Central Plain. In ch. 4 only Naphtali and Zebulun are engaged (v.^{6}); the mention of these two tribes only and of Kedesh their headquarters (v.^{10}) was probably an element in the Jabin-story. (4) The scene of the battle in 5^{19} is the left bank of the Kishon; this implies that Barak advanced against Sisera from the S.W. and fell upon him from the Carmel range. In $4^{12.\ 14}$ Barak attacks the Canaanites from Mt. Tabor, and the battle apparently takes place at its foot. (5) The accounts of Sisera's murder present a striking divergence. In ch. 5 Jael, by an ingenious stratagem, kills him with a tent-mallet while he is standing and drinking out of a deep bowl; in ch. 4 she hammers a tent-peg through his temples while he lies asleep in her tent. Some explain this divergence as a prosaic misunderstanding of the parallelism of 5^{26} (so Wellhausen, Composition 222; Robertson Smith, OTJC^{2} 132), but it is more likely to be due to a different tradition. One important detail is preserved in ch. 4 alone—that Sisera's stronghold was Ḥarosheth hag-goyim ($4^{2.\ 13\text{ff.}}$). This place has been plausibly identified with el-Ḥārithīyeh, on the right bank of the Kishon, commanding the road from the Central Plain to the sea. Perhaps $4^{13.16}$ imply that Ḥarosheth was at some distance from the battlefield; so the identification cannot be called certain, and the resemblance of the names, though philologically correct, may be accidental (see Buhl, GAP 214). See arts. DEBORAH and JABIN.

* Nebuchadnezzar wishes to know whether Ben Sira is a prophet, and asks of him the number of trees in the royal gardens. Ben Sira answers that there are thirty kinds: of ten the whole fruit may be eaten; of ten the kernel; of ten the outer parts. Löw gives the list, which is found also in the Bundehesh, on the basis of five texts.

† A great work on Sirach by Norbert Peters is advertised for 1902 by Herder of Freiburg.

* Budde (Richter u. Samuel, 69) thinks that the person of Barak was the link which connected the two, and that tradition ascribed both victories to him (cf. Jos. Ant. v. v. 4).

2. A family of the Nethinim, Ezr 2^{53} (B om., A Σκεραά, Luc. Σισαρά), Neh 7^{55} (B Σεσειράθ, A Σεσιαράθ, Luc. om.). G. A. COOKE.

SISINNES (Σισίννης).—The governor (ἔπαρχος) of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia under Darius, and a contemporary of Zerub., 1 Es $6^{3.7.27}$ 7^{1}. In Ezr 5^{3}, etc., he is called TATTENAI, 'the governor (פֶּחָה) beyond the river,' i.e. satrap of the whole of Syria west of the Euphrates.

SISMAI (סִסְמָי; BA Σοσομαί, Luc. Σασαμεί).—A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2^{40}.

SISTER.—See FAMILY.

SITH.—The Anglo-Sax. prep. sith (originally an adverb='after') with the pron. dam=them, formed siththan 'after that' (=Ger. seitdem). Then siththan was contracted to sithen, which again became sometimes sith and sometimes sin. The adv. suffix s being added to sithen gave middle Eng. sithens, afterwards spelt sithence to keep the s sharp in pronunciation, like pence for pens, dice for dies; and this was contracted to since, the contraction being helped by the form sin. 'Sith' was used as a prep., an adv., or a conjunction. Thus as adv., Wyc. Works, iii. 114, 'Ffyrst they trow in the Ffadyr, for he ys fyrst persone; aftyr they trow in Jesus Crist, be dyvers artyclys; and sytthe they trow in the Holy Gost'; as prep., Knox, Works, iii. 278, 'Transubstantiation, the byrde that the Devel hatched by Pope Nicolas, and sythe that time fostered and nurryshed by al his children'; and as conj., Berner, Froissart, Pref., 'Among all other I read diligently the four volumes or books of sir John Froissart of the country of Hainault, written in the French tongue, which I judged commodious, necessary and profitable to be had in English, sith they treat of the famous acts done in our parts.'

'Sith' occurs in AV 1611 in Jer 15^{7} 23^{38}, Ezk 35^{6}, Zec $4^{10\text{marg.}}$, 2 Es 7^{53}, and Ro 5^{heading}, and 'sithence' in 2 Es 10^{14}. As early as 1616 'sithence' was changed into 'since,' and 'sith' was in time changed (by Paris or Blayney) into the same mod. form in all places except Ezk 35^{6}, Ro 5^{head}. For 'sithence' cf. Lk 20^{33} Rhem. 'In the resurrection therefore, whose wife shal she be of them? sithens the seven had her to wife.' 'Sith' often occurs in the Psalms in metre, viz. 16^{8} 22^{8} 31^{4} 33^{21} 50^{17} (both versions) 73^{10} 86^{3} 109^{21} 119^{45}, always as a conjunction. J. HASTINGS.

SITHRI (סִתְרִי; B Σεγρεί, A Σεθρεί, Luc. Σετρί).—A grandson of Kohath, Ex 6^{22} (P).

SITNAH (שִׂטְנָה 'enmity'; Ἐχθρία; Inimicitiæ).—The second well dug by the servants of Isaac, and for which they strove with the herdmen of Gerar (Gn 26^{21}). The name of the well is derived by J from the disputes over its construction. The site is unknown, but it is supposed to have been in the valley of Gerar, though this is not distinctly stated in the narrative. Palmer (PEFSt, 1871, p. 35) finds a reminiscence of the name in Shuṭnet er-Ruheibeh, a small valley near Ruheibeh (Rehoboth). Riehm (HWB) apparently means the same place, which he calls Wâdy esh-Shetein.

SIVAN (סִיוָן).—The third month, according to the later (Babylonian) mode of reckoning. See TIME.

SKILL.—Skill comes from a Scand. root meaning to separate, discern, and means discernment, understanding. The verb to skill, i.e. to discern or understand, has now gone out of use, but occurs in AV in 1 K 5^{6} 'There is not among us any that can skill (so RV, Amer. RV 'knoweth how') to hew timber,' 2 Ch $2^{7.8}$ (all יָדַע to know), and 2 Ch 34^{12} 'all that could skill of (Amer. RV 'were skilful with') instruments of musick' (הֵבִין to be skilled in, Hiphil of בִּין to separate, understand). Cf. Milton, Areopag. (Hales' ed. p. 39), 'A wealthy man addicted to his pleasure and to his profits finds Religion to be a traffick so entangl'd and of so many piddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going upon that trade'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 181, 'Whether he be a gentyll man or yoman, a ryche man or a poore, if he sitte nat suerly and can skill of ridynge, the horse casteth him quickely'; and Lk 12^{56} Tind. 'Ypocrites, ye can skyll of the fassion of the erth and of the skye.'

SKULL, PLACE OF A.—See GOLGOTHA.

SLANDER or EVIL-SPEAKING (noun דִּבָּה, from [דָּבַב] 'glide'; verbs [לָשַׁן], lit. 'use the tongue'; רָגַל, lit. 'slink about,' and other roots. Greek βλασφημέω, 'speak injuriously'; adj. and subst. βλάσφημος; subst. βλασφημία; διαβάλλω, 'throw over,' 'slander'; διάβολος, adj., and subst. ὁ διάβολος =שָׂטָן).—This sin, of which the tongue is the organ (Pr 18^{21}, Ja $3^{8.9}$), springs from the heart, as the seat of inner life (Mt $12^{34.35}$ 15^{19}, Mk 7^{21}, Lk 6^{45}). As a rule, its mental feature is falsehood (Pr 10^{18} 12^{17} $14^{5.25}$) and its emotional hate (1 P 2^{1}); but even truth may be circulated from motives of malice, and falsehood may be told simply from a perverse pleasure in lying. Hence all tale-bearing, whether false and ill-tempered or not, is blameworthy and injurious (Lv 19^{16}, Pr 11^{13} 26^{20} 18^{8}, Ezk 22^{9}). Against slander and evil-speaking, from which arises much strife (Pr 16^{27-30} 30^{10}), warnings abound in the OT (Ps 34^{13}, Pr 15^{28} 30^{32} 24^{28}) as in the NT (Eph 4^{31}, Col 3^{8}, Ja 4^{11}, 1 P 3^{10}), and threats of punishment are not wanting, alike from God (Ps 50^{19-22} 109^{20} 140^{11}, Pr 8^{13} 21^{28}) and from man (Ps 101^{5}, Pr 19^{5}; cf. Ro 3^{8}). Slander is a sign of moral corruption (Jer 6^{28} 9^{4}, 2 Ti 3^{3}). As angels abstain from all reviling (2 P 2^{11}, Jude ^{8}), so proneness to slander is regarded as disqualifying for citizenship in the Hebrew commonwealth (Ps 15^{3} 24^{4}) and for membership or office in the Christian Church (Tit 2^{3}, 1 Ti 3^{11}). Instances of slander are recorded (2 S 19^{27}, Dn 3^{8}, Neh 6^{13}, Ezr 4^{6}) against persons, and even against a land (Nu 13^{32} 14^{36}). Among other forms of persecution to which the pious in Israel were exposed was slander (Ps 31^{13} 41^{5} 27^{12} 35^{11}, Jer 20^{10}), from which also the members of the Christian Church (1 P 2^{12} 4^{4}), and especially the apostles, suffered (Ac 19^{9} 24^{5} 28^{22}, 2 Co 6^{8}), even as Christ Himself did (Lk 2^{34}, Mk 9^{39}, Mt 11^{19}), and as He foretold that they would (Mt 5^{11}, Lk 6^{22}). Christians are warned to give no occasion for it (Tit 2^{8} 3^{2}, 1 P 3^{16}), as thereby they may bring discredit on the gospel and the Church (Ro 14^{16}; cf. Ro 2^{24}, 2 P 2^{2}, Tit 2^{5}, 1 Ti 6^{1}). Among charges later brought against them falsely were cannibalism, incest, atheism, hatred of human race, licentious orgies. When suffering from such slander innocently, they are urged to bear with patience (1 P 3^{9}; cf. 1 Co 4^{12}) even as Christ did (1 P 2^{23}; cf. Mt 27^{39}, Mk 15^{32}, Jn 9^{28}), and even to rejoice therein (1 P 4^{14}).

False witness is but slander carried into a court of justice, and against this sin the ninth commandment is directed (Ex 20^{16}; cf. 23^{1}, Dt 5^{20}). Its prevalence in the East (Ezr 4^{6}, Lk 3^{14} 19^{8}) necessitated great severity in punishing it, and in the Pentateuch the law of retaliation is literally enforced regarding it (Dt 19^{16-19}). To avoid miscarriage of justice, the testimony of one person was not accepted as sufficient by the Jewish law (Nu 35^{30}, Dt 17^{6} 19^{15}), and this rule was adopted in the Christian Church (2 Co 13^{1}, 1 Ti 5^{19}; cf. Mt 18^{16}). When the charge involved a death sentence, the witnesses had to be first in carrying it out (Dt 17^{7}; cf. Ac 7^{58}). Yet false witnesses could be found (Dn 6^{24}, 1 K 21^{10}), as against Jesus (Mt $26^{59.60}$, Mk 14^{55-57}), Stephen (Ac 6^{13}), and Paul (Ac 24^{13}).

The heinousness of slander is shown by the use of the same Gr. word in NT for sins of speech against God and man (Mt 27^{39}, Lk 23^{39} 22^{65}, Ac 13^{45} 18^{6} 26^{11}, 1 Ti 1^{20}, Tit 3^{2}, Ja 2^{7}); by our Lord's warning about the unpardonable sin (Mt 12^{31}, Mk 3^{28}, Lk 12^{10}); and by the name ὁ διάβολος, given to the spirit of evil, who is represented as playing the part of slanderer against Job (Job 1^{9-11}), Joshua the high priest (Zec 3^{1}), and Christians (Rev 12^{10}).

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—See SERVANT.

SLAVONIC VERSIONS.—See VERSIONS.

SLEIGHT.—Eph 4^{14} 'By the sleight of men' (ἐν τῇ κυβείᾳ [Tisch. WH κυβίᾳ] τῶν ἀνθρώπων, lit. 'by the dice-playing of men,' from κύβος, a cube, die). Tindale translates 'by the wylynes of men,' which is the meaning of AV 'sleight.' It is of the same root as 'sly,' as if for slyth='slyness.' Cf. Ridley, Works, 31, 'The sleights and shifts which craft and wit can invent'; Tymme's Calvin's Genesis, 569, 'Nowe, seeing a lye is damnable of it selfe, therein she sinned the more, that she durst use such deceiveable slightes in so holy a matter.' But the word properly means a device, and may be used in a good sense, as Udall's Erasmus' Paraph. i. 106, 'If this invencion and sleight be brought unto your presidente, we will perswade hym, and deliver you from all daunger of this matter'; Elyot, Governour, i. 173, 'It hath ben sene that the waiker persone by the sleight of wrastlyng, hath overthrowen the strenger.' We still have the phrase 'sleight of hand.'

The adverb sleightly is used in the Preface to AV, 'Now, when the father of their Church, who gladly would heale the soare of the daughter of his people softly and sleightly, and make the best of it, findeth so great fault with them for their oddes and jarring, we hope the children have no great cause to vaunt of their uniformitie.'

There is no connexion either in origin or meaning with 'slight,' 'slightly,' which means originally 'flat,' 'smooth.'

SLIME.—See BITUMEN and MORTAR.

SLING (קֶלַע ḳela', σφενδόνη).—A weapon used by the Hebrews, Egyptians, Assyrians, and other Eastern nations, from whom it passed over to the later Greeks. During the best days of Rome, slingers appeared only among the foreign auxiliaries — Greek, Syrian, and African. We know nothing definite concerning the form of the Hebrew sling, but on the Assyr. reliefs slings are shown, made of two thongs, one of which was doubtless released in the act of discharging the stone. The hollow in which the stone was placed was called the hand (כַּף kaph, 'the bent hand'). Smooth stones (1 S 17^{40}, Job $41^{28\,(20)}$)[*] were used by the Hebrews, stones or leaden bullets (μολυβδίδες) by the Roman auxiliaries, as missiles. Slings were employed in attacking fortresses (2 K 3^{25}, 1 Mac 6^{51}). Among the Israelites the Benjamite left-handed slingers were famous (Jg 20^{16}, 1 Ch 12^{2}); David the Judæan appears as a slinger only in his contest with Goliath (1 S 17^{40}, Sir 47^{4}). From the prominence given to David's 'staff' in 1 S $17^{40.43}$ it is not improbable that his 'sling' was mounted on a staff; the weapon may in fact have been that described by Vegetius, iii. 14, 'Fustibalus fustis est longus pedibus quattuor, cui per medium ligatur funda de corio, et utraque manu impulsus prope ad instar onagri (a powerful military engine) dirigit saxa.' The 'sling' of v.^{40} is a gloss on 'staff,' just as 'scrip' is a gloss on 'shepherd's bag.' The slingstones might be carried either in a bag (so David, 1 S 17^{40}) or in the bosom of the outer garment (so the Roman slingers). Abigail (1 S 25^{29}) predicts that God will take the lives of David's enemies out of the bag or purse (צְרוֹר ẓĕrōr) in which He holds the lives of men, and will 'sling them out,' i.e. cast them away. In Zec 9^{15} hailstones are spoken of as God's slingstones (tr. 'and [His] slingstones shall devour and subdue'; cf. v.^{14} 'His arrow shall go forth as the lightning'). On the difficult verse Pr 26^{8} 'As he that bindeth a stone in a sling' (מַרְגֵּמָה margēmah), see Toy in Internat. Crit. Comm. and RV ('a heap of stones').

SMITH.—חָרָשׁ an artificer, a workman, 1 S 13^{19}, Is 54^{16}; חָרַשׁ בַּרְזֶל a smith (lit. a worker in iron), Is 44^{12}; מַסְגֵּר (lit. locksmith?) 2 K $24^{14.16}$, Jer 24^{1} 29^{2}. The name smith is common to several metal workers: the goldsmith, the silversmith, the coppersmith, and the ironsmith. The most important of these in ancient times was the coppersmith. Though iron seems to have been known at a very early period, it did not come into common use. Copper, being more easily worked, was the universal metal for tools, arms, and all kinds of utensils. Alloyed with tin it became hard, and was capable of taking a sharp edge: thus it was suitable for knives, swords, spears, axes, etc. The coppersmith is still a very important workman in Syria, for almost all domestic utensils are made of that metal. Pans, pots, trays, caldrons for boiling the grape juice, are made of copper. The goldsmith and silversmith are next in importance, and their methods of working are almost the same as the pictures on the tombs in Egypt show to have been followed by the ancient Egyptians. The silversmith is usually also the tinsmith of a Lebanon village.

Iron ore of the very best quality is abundant in the Lebanon range, and has been worked for ages by the smiths. The forests around supplied the fuel, and the iron obtained was similar to what is known as Swedish iron. It was probably from this iron that the smiths of Damascus made their famous steel. Nearly every village in Syria has its smith, whose business it is to make and repair ploughs, pickaxes, hoes, and the tools for the masons and carpenters. He makes shoes also for horses, mules, donkeys, and for the oxen used for ploughing. The fuel of the smith is charcoal, and two very large circular bellows keep up a steady blast. Smiths in ancient as well as in modern times were noted for the strength of their arms, Is 44^{12}.

The discovery of the smith's art is ascribed in Gn 4^{22} (J) to Tubal-cain (which see) the son of Lamech (see Dillmann, ad loc., and Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 214). A smith at work is graphically portrayed in Sir 38^{28}.

SMYRNA (Σμύρνα) was an ancient city in the west of Asia Minor, situated at the head of a gulf which runs up about 30 miles into the country. It was at first a colony of Aeolic Greeks, but was taken by an attack from the Ionian colony of Colophon and transformed into an Ionian city.

[*] Cf. 'Teretes lapides de funda vel fustibalo destinati' (Vegetius, i. 16).

The original Aeolic and Ionian Smyrna was captured by the Lydians, who broke up its constitution as a Greek city about the end of the 7th cent. B.C.; and it existed as a mere Oriental town or series of villages for more than three centuries, till Lysimachus (301–281) refounded it as a Greek city, in a new situation about 3 miles south-west from the ancient site. It has continued ever since an unbroken history as one of the greatest cities of Asia.

Smyrna was a faithful ally of Rome, from the time when the great Italian republic began to interfere in the affairs of the East, choosing that side before Rome had become all-powerful, and remained true to it even during the Mithridatic wars, when a Smyrnæan assembly, hearing of the distressed condition of Sulla's army, stripped off their own clothes and sent them to clothe the soldiers; and it was accordingly favoured in the Roman policy, though it suffered during the Civil War after the death of Cæsar. That early appreciation of the value of the Roman alliance was undoubtedly due to the position of Smyrna as a great trading city: the exact circumstances are unknown to us, but Smyrna must have been as early as B.C. 200 brought into such relations with the general Mediterranean trade that its interest lay in supporting Rome against Carthage and the allied Seleucid kings of Syria, and against Rhodes (just as the old friendship of Massilia and Rome was due to their common dread of the competition of Carthaginian merchants).

Smyrna was the port at the end of one of the great roads leading from the inner country, Phrygia, Galatia, etc., across Lydia towards the west. It was also the harbour for the whole trade of the fertile Hermus Valley, and was probably hardly second even to Ephesus as an exporting city. Its great wealth is attested by its abundant coinage. It was the chief city of a conventus, and was one of those cities that were dignified with the title of metropolis. It vied with Pergamus and Ephesus for the title of 'First (city) of Asia' (πρώτη Ἀσίας); and the contests between the three great cities were carried to a great height, as each invented new titles for itself or appropriated the titles of the other. In one case, at least, their jealous rivalry led to an appeal to the imperial decision.

In A.D. 23 the cities of Asia obtained permission to found a temple in honour of Tiberius and his mother Julia Augusta, and in 26 several contended for the privilege of having the temple within their walls. The pleadings of the different cities which claimed that honour throw considerable light on the state of the great Asian cities under the early Roman emperors, though only a very brief report has been preserved by Tacitus (Annals, iv. 55, 56). The claim of Pergamum was rejected because it already had the temple dedicated by the province to Augustus: that of Ephesus because it was sufficiently weighted by the worship and the temple of Artemis: that of Laodicea, Tralles, etc., because they were not sufficiently great. Halicarnassus was carefully considered, but at last the choice lay between Sardis and Smyrna. Sardis relied especially on its past history, and quoted, amidst other evidence on its side, a decree passed in its honour by the twelve ancient Etruscan cities. But the Smyrnæans could appeal to their faithful friendship and alliance with Rome; and they mentioned that they had dedicated a temple to the goddess Rome in B.C. 195, before the eastern cities had learned by experience that Rome was the one supreme power in the world. The claim of Smyrna was preferred to that of Sardis, thus marking the superior dignity of the former in the province. The temple was erected by the provincial council (see ASIARCH) in Smyrna, which henceforward could claim the Imperial Neokorate, i.e. the title of temple-warden (νεωκόρος) of the emperors. The title was not so much prized in the 1st cent.; and the earliest proof that Smyrna had assumed it is in A.D. 98–102. A second and a third Neokorate were afterwards granted to Smyrna (as to Pergamum and Ephesus)—the second by Hadrian (though not mentioned on coins till the reign of his successor Pius), the third by Severus towards the end of his reign (along with the same compliment to Ephesus)

In the Roman time Smyrna was perhaps the most brilliant and splendid of the cities of Asia. No other city of the province could vie with it for the handsomeness of its streets, the excellence of the paving, and the skill with which it was laid out in rectangular blocks; but it was badly drained, and the streets were liable to be flooded in rain. It stretched along the southern shore of the gulf, not far from its eastern extremity. On the west a hill which overhangs the sea was enclosed within its walls; and on the south a still loftier elevation called Pagos, 'the hill,'[*] 460 ft. high, served as its acropolis, and afforded a strong line of defence for the walls of Lysimachus. The modern city stretches beyond the ancient walls on the east side, but leaves out part of the ancient city on the west. On the lower ground west from Pagos, about the south-western extremity of the city, was the 'Ephesian Gate,' whence issued the ancient road to Metropolis, Ephesus, and the south generally.

Another gate near the modern station of the Hermus Valley Railway is still called the Black Gate (Kara Kapu). The most splendid street in ancient Smyrna was called the Golden Street; it led perhaps from the temple of Zeus on the hill over the sea to the temple of Cybele on the hillock east from Smyrna called Tepejik (if, as is probable, the temple stood there), issuing from the city probably through Kara Kapu.

There was, in addition to the mooring-ground in the open gulf, an inner harbour nearly land-locked which was sufficiently commodious for ancient vessels. It was in the heart of the modern city; and the Bazaars now occupy part of its area. In A.D. 1402 the entrance to it was blocked by Tamerlane with a mole, to facilitate his assault on the stronghold of the Rhodian Knights beside the sea. Even before that, it had probably been a good deal neglected in the troubles and the weak government that prevailed for centuries; and afterwards under Turkish rule the harbour became more and more choked up, till in the 18th century it finally disappeared.

Smyrna has suffered much from earthquakes. A severe one occurred in A.D. 180, and great shocks seem often to be felt in the latter part of a century. The last was in 1880.

There was no specially famous cultus at Smyrna. The 'Mother of Sipylos' was worshipped in a great temple, which probably stood on the already mentioned mound outside the city on the east side; the priestess of the goddess in front of the city (ἱέρεια Προπόλεως) is mentioned in an inscription; and the Meter Sipylene is a common type and legend on the coins of Smyrna. But her cultus was common to other cities round Mt. Sipylos, and the Smyrnæan worship did not become famous and important like those of Ephesus, Magnesia, etc. The temple of the Nemeseis, or Fates, and a Hieron of the Kledones, in which divination was practised from chance words or phrases or acts, are mentioned; but it seems very probable that those two foundations may have been only a single holy place. According to the legend, the two Nemeseis had appeared to Alexander the Great in a dream, and ordered him to rebuild Smyrna. In Smyrna alone was the ordinary singular conception of Nemesis doubled as a pair of divine figures.

Smyrna was one of the cities claiming to be the birthplace of Homer. The poet is often represented on its coins; and there was a building in or near the city, called the Homereion. Tradition connected him with the sacred river, called Meles. The descriptions of the river by Aelius Aristides, and its sacred character, show that it was not any of the varying streams, dry in summer and torrents in the rainy season, which have been identified by different authorities as the Meles (especially the stream on the eastern skirts of the modern city, crossed by Caravan Bridge on the great road leading to the east). The Meles was the unvarying stream rising in the splendid sacred springs called Diana's Bath, more than a mile east from Caravan Bridge, and flowing in a steady uniform stream through a partly artificial channel (as Aristides says) into the gulf. The whole character of the localities, both springs and channel, has been changed by modern engineering operations.

The Church of Smyrna has had an honourable history. The message sent to it among the letters to the seven Churches, Rev 2 and 3, is more uniformly laudatory than those sent to the other Churches; even Philadelphia is hardly praised so highly as Smyrna, and the others are all blamed in varying degrees. But the Smyrnæan Church was apparently kept pure by continual suffering: the Church was poor and oppressed: it was not exposed to the dangers of riches, but was rich spiritually. The Jews of Smyrna are described as bitterly hostile. Few or none of them seem to have adopted Christianity, and they are described as not being really Jews, but merely a synagogue of Satan. This probably means both (1) that the Gentile Church of Smyrna represents the true stock of Abraham, while the Jews say they are Jews, claiming the name, but losing the reality of Jewish inheritance; and (2) that the Jews in the city had given way to the temptations of luxury and civilization, and degenerated from Jewish purity and religion. It is an interesting point that, in an inscription of the 2nd century (CIJ 3148), we find mentioned as one of the classes of the population 'the erstwhile Jews' (οἱ ποτὲ Ἰουδαῖοι), an enigmatic phrase which probably means 'those who formerly were the nation of the Jews, but who have lost the legal standing of a separate people and are now merged in the numerous class of resident strangers, sprung from various parts of the empire.'*

[*] Pagos is, indubitably, an ancient name; but the hill appears also to have had the special name Mastusia, alluding to its shape as seen from the sea (though the likeness to a breast is seen to be illusory when one goes round it, or ascends).

In the popular outburst which led to the martyrdom of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna in A.D. 155,† the Jews are described as playing a prominent part. The ASIARCH Philippus, who was presiding at the games (which therefore must have been those called Κοινὰ Ἀσίας, celebrated by the provincial council called the Koinon, and held at the various metropoleis in turn), was very unwilling to authorize the deed, and without his permission it could not have been carried out in the stadium on the occasion of the games; but the popular clamour constrained him. The Jews were active also in fetching and arranging the wood to burn the aged bishop. The view that the Jews of Smyrna are described in the Apocalypse as degenerate from the pure religion of their race seems to be confirmed, when we observe that Polycarp's martyrdom occurred on a Saturday afternoon, and the Jews, who were so active against him, must have appeared in the stadium at games which should have been an abomination to them on the Sabbath day.

It is a noteworthy coincidence, which may be intentional, that the Divine Sender of the message to Smyrna, the city which had been destroyed and after 340 years refounded, calls himself 'the first and the last, which was dead and lived again.' The various titles which the Sender of the messages to the Seven Asian cities assumes in each case have sometimes at least an obvious relation to the circumstances of the city to which the message is addressed: that is evidently the case at THYATIRA, and may be in other cases, though we cannot trace the relation. Here, however, it seems very clear. That, of course, is not inconsistent with the equally obvious relation of the title to the immediate circumstances of the Smyrnæan Christians as described in Rev $2^{10. 11}$ 'Fear not the thing which thou art about to suffer; behold, assuredly, the devil is about to cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation for a term of ten days [i.e. a time not unlimited, but with an end fixed]. Be thou faithful unto death; and I will give thee the garland of life [i.e. the prize which consists in life]. As your city was destroyed, and lived again more glorious than before, so I who died and lived again will give to thee [each individual Christian is singled out and addressed], if thou be true to death, the reward of the true life (τῆς ζωῆς).'

On the other hand, it seems highly improbable that there is here intended any 'allusion to the ritual of the pagan mysteries which prevailed in that city' (as is suggested by Rev. J. W. Blakesley in Smith's DB iii. p. 1335): 'the story of the violent death and reviviscence of Dionysos' was not specially characteristic of Smyrna, or likely to be specially familiar to the Smyrnæan Christians. It seems quite unnatural that the Divine Sender of the message should be represented in a character designed to recall that of Dionysos.

It is probable that the writer had in his mind the prize of victory (as in the Greek games), when he spoke of the 'garland of life.' It is indeed quite out of keeping with his usual custom to take a metaphor from such a source: he was not, like St. Paul, brought up in Greek surroundings and accustomed to draw his illustrations from the social life of the Greek cities. But that special metaphor had entered so completely into current language that the writer was hardly conscious of its source: he was probably thinking more of St. Paul's garland of righteousness (2 Ti 4^8), St. Peter's garland of glory (1 P 5^4), and above all St. James's garland of life* (1^{12}), than of the athlete's garland. At the same time it is possible, and even probable, that another pagan usage was also in his mind. The worshipper, while engaged in the service of a deity, wore a garland of the kind sacred to that deity,—myrtle in the service of Aphrodite, ivy in that of Dionysos, wild olive in that of Zeus Olympius (out of which, indeed, developed the victor's garland in the Olympian games), and so on. The meaning then would be: 'Be thou faithful to death, and I will give thee the garland of my service, which is of life.' Yet the idea of prize or reward seems inseparable from the passage; and it is only through the victor's garland that the stephanos acquired that connotation. Probably both ideas are united in this passage. The magistrates of hieratic origin, called Stephanephoroi, who were found in Smyrna and the other Asiatic cities generally, are not alluded to in this passage (as has been suggested): such an allusion lends no point to the words.

Again, we notice that, whereas Sardis, the city whose impregnable fortress had twice been captured while its people slept and neglected to watch, is advised to 'be watchful,' Smyrna, the city which boasted of its faithfulness to the Roman alliance, is counselled to 'be faithful [not now to an earthly power, but to God].'

Throughout the messages to the Seven Cities it is evident that the writer knew the circumstances of each city, and alluded to many facts of its present or past life. The references to past history are not gathered from reading and literature. The facts alluded to are of that marked type which would be universally known in each city, and would be appealed to by orators addressing popular assemblies.

The Church in Smyrna is addressed rather as separate from (and persecuted by) the city, than as forming part of the city and characterized by its qualities and sharing in its works (like Sardis and Laodicea). Only the faithfulness and the resurrection of the city are alluded to as proper to the Church. In its separation from and superiority to the society by which it was surrounded lay the glory of the Smyrnæan Church; and life is to be its reward for its faithfulness and its patient endurance. Life is the dominant tone in the letter to Smyrna, death in that to Sardis, weakness and indecision in that to the Phrygian LAODICEA. It is remarkable how later history has confirmed the prophecy and the character ascribed to the Church.

Smyrna had a chequered history during the Turkish wars; and it was the last independent Christian city in the whole of Asia Minor. It was thrice captured by the Seljuk Turks in the end of the 11th and beginning of the 12th cent., but was recovered by the Byzantine government; and the emperor John III. Ducas Vatatzes, who resided frequently at Smyrna or at Nymphaion, rebuilt the castle on Mount Pagos (1221–1254). Early in the 14th cent. it passed into Mohammedan possession, and formed a part of the dominions of Aidin, the lord of Guzel-Hissar, 'the Beautiful Castle' of Tralles; but the Knights of Rhodes seized the lower city, and strengthened the fortifications of the harbour, though the castle on Pagos overhanging the city remained in Turkish hands. Two Osmanli Sultans, Amurath I. and Bayezid, besieged the city and castle of the Knights, but without success. At last in 1402 the hosts of Tamerlane captured the castle; and after he retired the city passed quietly under the power of the Seljuk chiefs of Ayasaluk (Ephesus) and Guzel-Hissar, until they were reduced by Amurath II. under the Osmanli sway.

The last stronghold of Christianity in Asia Minor, Smyrna still is more occidental in character and more solidly flourishing than any other city of Turkey. It is called by the Turks, accordingly, Giaour Ismir, Infidel Smyrna. The

* See Mommsen in Historische Zeitschr. xxviii. p. 417. The meaning 'who were once Jews, but have abandoned their religion,' seems quite impossible: renegade Jews would not be called so in an inscription which mentions them in a complimentary way.

† The date, as fixed by Waddington, is nearly, but not absolutely, certain. Harnack considers Waddington's reasoning to be entirely erroneous, but accepts the date on different grounds (Chronol. der altchristl. Litt. i. pp. 355, 721).

* Zeller's idea, that St. James imitated this passage of the Apocalypse, seems not acceptable.

Mohammedans number less than a quarter of the population, which totals over 250,000: more than a half is Greek: there are large Jewish and Armenian quarters: colonies from all the chief countries in Europe, from the United States, and from Persia, also are settled there. The views from the sea, and from the summit of Mount Pagos, are among the most exquisite in the whole Mediterranean lands; and the prosperity within the city is, in comparison with all other Turkish towns, plain to the eye. As in the message to the Church, so at the present day, life is the prominent note.

In the early ecclesiastical system Smyrna was a bishopric under the authority, probably, of Ephesus; but, soon after, it was raised to be independent and autokephalos. In the later Notitiæ it appears as a metropolis, having six bishoprics subject to it—Phocæa, Clazomenæ, Magnesia ad Sipylum, Archangelos, Sosandra, and Petra.

LITERATURE.—Though Smyrna has been so frequently visited by European travellers of every kind, very little has been written on its history, and no proper study has ever been made of the literary and monumental evidence on the subject. The account given in Sir Charles Wilson's Handbook to Turkey (Murray) is the best, though necessarily very brief. In the Historical Geography of Asia Minor, Ramsay, there are only some inadequate notes, pp. 107–109, 115, 116. An old book in French, by Slaars, on Smyrna, published there, is practically unprocurable. An article by Arist. M. Fontrier, in Bulletin de Corresp. Hellénique, xvi. pp. 379–410, on le Monastère de Lembos (five miles east of Smyrna and one south of Bunar-Bashi) is by far the best study that has been written on the subject. Numerous picturesque descriptions of the beauty of the scenery may be found in the books of travellers and tourists.

W. M. RAMSAY.

SNAIL.—Two Heb. words are tr^d 'snail' in AV. 1. חֹמֶט ḥōmeṭ, σαῦρα, lacerta (Lv 11^30). There seems to be no foundation for the AV 'snail.' Other ancient VSS besides the LXX and Vulg. understand the word as referring generically to the lizard. It is in a list of those animals, and prob. one of them. RV tr. it by 'sand-lizard,' which is Lacerta agilis, L., a species of wide distribution. This rendering, however, is a mere surmise.

2. שַׁבְּלוּל shabbĕlūl, κηρός, cera (Ps 58^8). The Heb. is Shaph. form from the root בָּלַל bālal, similar to the Arab. balla, 'to moisten.' The rendering 'wax,' of the LXX and Vulg., is amplified by the expressions ἔπεσε πῦρ, supercecidit ignis (from a confusion of נֵפֶל אֵשֶׁת with נָפַל אֵשׁ). Nevertheless, the modern VSS are unanimous in the rendering 'snail.' The allusion to 'melting away' is explained in two ways: (a) that a snail, in moving from one place to another, leaves a slimy track, which was popularly referred to the dissolution of its body. The Arab. popular name for the snail, bizzâḳ, 'the spitter,' is derived from this characteristic; (b) Tristram explains it by the fact that, in the dry season, snails attach themselves to rocks, trees, shrubs, or the soil, if possible in a moist situation, or at least one sheltered from the direct rays of the sun. If, however, a snail be long exposed to the sun, it will be dried up in its shell. Tristram thinks that this explains the metaphor of the text.

A large number of species of land and fresh-water snails are found in Palestine and Syria. They emerge from their hiding-places after the early rains, and are collected by the natives, and boiled and eaten with great relish.

G. E. POST.

SNOW (שֶׁלֶג; Aram. תְּלַג [Dn 7^9]; Gr. χιών)* is mentioned in Scripture with a degree of infrequency corresponding to the rarity of its appearance in Palestine proper. Of an actual fall of snow we read only twice in the biblical narrative—in 2 S 23^20 = 1 Ch 11^22, where Benaiah, one of David's mighty men, is described as going down and slaying a lion in a cistern on a snowy day; and in 1 Mac 13^22, where the horsemen of Tryphon, the usurper king of Syria, were prevented from attacking Simon at Adora (or Adoraim) by reason of 'a very great snow' which fell in the night.

Snow is unknown on the seaboard of Philistia, Sharon, and Phœnicia, and seldom whitens the ground inland below an elevation of 2000 feet. In the Ghôr and the plain of Jericho it never falls. South of Hebron it is rare. Along the summits of the central ridge of Palestine and on the high tableland east of the Jordan snow falls nearly every winter.

The snowfall at Jerusalem, which is 2500 ft. above sea level, may be taken as typical of the whole central ridge. A table is given by Dr. Chaplin in the PEFSt (vol. for 1883, p. 32), covering the winters from 1860–1861 to 1881–1882. Out of the twenty-two seasons to which his report refers there were eight when no snow fell, four of these being consecutive (1863, 1864, 1865, 1866). It is not wonderful that in 1864–1865 (see JERUSALEM, vol. ii. pp. 585, 586) the water supply from the chief springs entirely failed. From Dr. Chaplin's table we learn that the last few days of December, the months of January and February, and the first fortnight of March make the period within which the snow falls in and around Jerusalem. In 1870 there was a fall of nearly two inches on April 7th and 8th, but this was a very remarkable and extraordinary occurrence. 'For the most part,' says Dr. Chaplin, 'the snow is in small quantity and soon melts, but heavy snowstorms sometimes occur, and the snow may then remain unmelted in the hollows on the hillsides for two or three weeks. The deepest snowfall was in Dec. 28 and 29, 1879, when it measured 17 inches where there was no drift. In Feb. 1874 it was 8¼ inches deep, and on March 14, 5 inches.' Sir J. W. Dawson (Egypt and Syria, p. 113) reports that at the Jaffa Gate in Jan. 1884 there were snowdrifts 5 ft. deep. Wallace (Jerusalem the Holy, p. 252) mentions that three heavy falls of snow occurred during Jan. and Feb. 1898, when the weather was exceptionally cold, and much suffering was endured by the people.

Galilee, with a general elevation of 2000 to 2500 ft., is less liable to snowfalls. But sometimes these are heavy. In March 1884 a party riding through N. Galilee was overtaken by a snowstorm which covered the ground to the depth of several inches. It lay during the night, and when the members of the party set out next day after a comfortless encampment the snow still lay white over the landscape, and its glare was almost blinding as the sun poured down his rays in a blaze that threatened sunstroke.

The snow of Lebanon was proverbial (Jer 18^14, Ca 4^15). It is 'the white mountain,' probably because the snow never fails altogether from its summits (for another explanation of the name see LEBANON, ad init.). On the highest cultivated lands the snow covers up the wheat sown by the peasantry and protects it from the cold in winter. The lofty dome of Hermon is white all the winter, and through the summer broad patches and long streaks of snow are to be seen upon its widely-extended mass.

Snow is an emblem of refreshment in Scripture. It may be the glowing aspect of the distant mountain tops that is in the mind of the psalmist when, speaking of the scattering of Jehovah's enemies and the consequent elation of the people, he says, 'Then fell snow on Zalmon' (Ps 68^14; see Delitzsch, in loc.). Lebanon and Hermon with their snowy sides have a delightfully refreshing aspect as the inhabitants of the sultry lowlands look up to them from afar. 'The cold of snow in the time of harvest' (Pr 25^13) may refer to the sight of snow upon the mountain, but more likely to the snow which is preserved and stored to make cooling drinks in the heat of summer. Just as snow from Lebanon and Hermon was carried as a luxury in Jewish times to Tyre and Sidon and Tiberias, so it is today used in Beyrout and Damascus for mixing with beverages. 'Water like snow' is still the beverage most grateful to the fellahîn or to the thirsty traveller. Snow-water is mentioned for its cleansing properties (Job 9^30; but the text is doubtful, see Dav. ad loc.); and the rapidity with which the snow disappears in the heat of the sun is noticed by the sacred writers (Job 6^{16} 24^{19}). Snow by reason of its rarity and beauty is one of the wonders of God's power (Job 37^{6}, Ps 147^{16}); the hail and the snow are conceived to be stored in the heavens for use by God in the productiveness of nature (Is 55^{10}), and in the accomplishment of moral ends (Job $38^{22.\,23}$; cf. Jos 10^{11} and 1 Mac 13^{22}). To be prepared against its coming, seeing that it keeps its season so precisely, is one of the virtues of the ideal woman (Pr 31^{21} 26^{1}). Snow is taken to express whiteness in the realm of nature—the whiteness of wool, hoary hairs, leprosy, milk (Rev 1^{14}, cf. Dn 7^{9}, Ex 4^{6}, Nu 12^{10}, 2 K 5^{27}, La 4^{7}). Snow is the chosen Scripture emblem of stainless moral purity. We are perhaps not at liberty to say it is used of the transfigured Christ (Mk 9^{3}), because the best MSS omit ὡς χιών. But it is taken to describe the purity of the Nazirites of Zion (La 4^{7}), of the Ancient of Days (Dn 7^{9}), of the Angel of the Resurrection (Mt 28^{3}), of the Risen Lord (Rev 1^{14}). As against the defilement and condemnation and persistence of sin, it describes the righteousness, forgiveness, and complete acceptance of the penitent believer (Ps 51^{7}, Is 1^{18}).

* The verb שָׁלַג occurs in Ps 68^14 and is tr. in LXX by χιονοῦσθαι. שֶׁלֶג is tr. by δρόσος in Pr 26^1, and in Pr 31^21 χρονίζῃ appears to be a corruption of χιονίζῃ.

SNUFFERS, SNUFFDISH.—In three passages of the Priests' Code mention is made of two utensils connected with the golden candlestick, named respectively מֶלְקָחַיִם melḳāḥáyim, and מַחְתּוֹת maḥtôth, and rendered by AV in Ex 37^{23} 'snuffers' and 'snuffdishes,' in 25^{38} Nu 4^{9} 'tongs' and 'snuffdishes' (so RV also in Ex l.c.).* The maḥtôth bear the same name, and were probably of the same shape, as the censers or fire-pans (so Tindale, 1530, 'snuffers and fyrepanns'). In them were deposited and removed from the sanctuary the burnt portions of the wicks (see CENSER and TABERNACLE, section on the Candlestick). The melḳāḥáyim, as the etymology and the dual form show, was clearly a snuffers (Vulg. emunctoria, forcipes, LXX, Ex 38^{17}, Nu 4^{9} λαβίδες),† resembling in shape a pair of tongs, like the Roman forceps (illustrs. in Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant.^{3} i. 872), since the same word is used of the tongs with which, in Isaiah's vision, the live coal was lifted from the altar-hearth (Is 6^{6}). It was used to trim and adjust the wicks of the lamps, like the acus (the pin for pushing up the wick) which figures in representations of Roman lamps. In later times we hear of a wool or flax comb, reduced to a single tooth, being used for this purpose (Mishna, Kelim xiii. 8 end). The same instrument (melḳāḥáyim) is mentioned (1 K 7^{49}) in connexion with the lamps of Solomon's temple, in a late addition to 1 K 7 (for $7^{48\text{-}50}$ see KINGS, vol. ii. p. 864^{a}, the commentaries of Kittel and Benzinger, and esp. Stade's essay cited there), and its parallel 2 Ch 4^{21}, in both passages tr^{d} 'tongs' in AV and RV.

It will thus be seen that in RV 'tongs' is now the uniform rendering of melḳāḥáyim in all the passages where it occurs, 'snuffers' being reserved for another word מְזַמְּרוֹת mĕzammĕrôth (from זָמַר to prune, trim), also mentioned among the temple furniture (1 K 7^{50} = 2 Ch 4^{22}, 2 K $12^{13\,[\text{MT}\,14]}$, 25^{14} = Jer 52^{18}). This, as the etymology again shows, also denotes some species of scissors or snuffers for trimming the lamp-wicks. From a survey of the passages cited in this art. it would appear that mĕzammĕrôth is the older term of the two, melḳāḥáyim being found first in P, and in the later additions influenced by it, in which indeed both terms occur side by side. In all these, further, the material is given as gold, and even 'perfect gold' (2 Ch 4^{21}), while in the older and historical sources the material is bronze (cf. 1 K 7^{45}).

SO (king of Egypt [Miẓraim]; סוֹא מֶלֶךְ מִצְרַיִם, LXX Σηγώρ, Vulg. Sua).—According to 2 K 17^{4} (AV and RV), Shalmaneser, 'king of Assyria, found conspiracy in Hoshea (king of Israel); for he had sent messengers to So, king of Egypt, and offered no present to the king of Assyria.' This was the cause of the invasion that ended in the captivity of Israel. Kings of the Ethiopian dynasty (25th) were reigning at this time in Egypt, and it has been supposed that one of these, either Shabaka or Shabataka, was intended by 'So.'

From cuneiform sources, however, we learn that there was at this time a certain Pir'u, king of Muṣri, and that in B.C. 720, shortly after the fall of Samaria in 722, Sib'i, tartan (commander-in-chief) of Muṣri, was sent by him to the help of Hanno, king of Gaza, against Sargon. It was formerly thought that 'Pir'u, king of Muṣri,' must be 'Pharaoh, king of Egypt,' Muṣri corresponding in general to the Hebrew Miẓraim; but Winckler has recently shown that this Muṣri must be distinct from Egypt, and belong rather to North Arabia, in the country of the Nabatæans. He finds the same Muṣri also in the Bible under the name Miẓraim, and identifies the biblical 'So, king of Egypt' (Miẓraim) with Sib'i, the tartan of the North Arabian Muṣri, proposing to read סבא sb' for סוא sw' (So) (see his art. 'Pir'u, king of Muṣri,' in Mittheil. d. vorderas. Gesellsch. 1898, 5).

The identification of So with Shabaka or Shabataka seems impossible. Shishaḳ of the 22nd dynasty, who invaded Judah and Israel in the reign of Jeroboam, is indeed entitled in the Bible מֶלֶךְ מִצְרַיִם 'king of Miẓraim,' as were the later 'Pharaohs,' Necho and Hophra. But the position of the somewhat obscure 25th dynasty with regard to the throne of Egypt was peculiar. Tirhaka, who was the last important king of Shabaka's dynasty, is entitled מֶלֶךְ כּוּשׁ 'king of Cush (Ethiopia)' in 2 K 19^{9}, and in the cuneiform 'king of Cusi'; we might expect, therefore, to find the other kings of that dynasty bearing the same title 'king of Cush,' rather than 'king of Egypt,' if referred to in any Hebrew or Assyrian record. This is a slight additional argument in favour of Winckler's theory. To the Egyptians themselves every king of Egypt in these later times, whether the Persian Darius, the Macedonian Alexander, the Roman Augustus, or the Ethiopian Tirhaka, was known as the 'Pharaoh,' and this is the title which they all bore in Egyptian legal documents. To the rest of the world Shabaka, the Ethiopian conqueror of Egypt and the founder of the 25th dynasty, presumably would be known as 'king of Ethiopia.'

SOAP, SOPE (בֹּר, בֹּרִית; ποία) is a general name for the class of substances obtained by decomposing fats or oils by an alkali such as soda or potash. Fats and oils are compounds of certain 'fatty acids' with glycerine, and in the process of 'saponification' the alkali combines with the acid to form a soap, while the glycerine is set free. Soaps dissolve readily in water, imparting to it a peculiar slippery or greasy feeling, forming a lather easily, and adding greatly to its cleansing powers.

According to Pliny (HN xxviii. 51), soap was an invention of the Gauls, who prepared it from tallow and ashes. They had two kinds of it, the hard and the liquid. Soap-making is the chief industry of modern Palestine. It is carried on in Jaffa, Nâblus, Jerusalem, and elsewhere, and the product is exported along the coast, and even to Egypt and Asia Minor. Olive oil is used, and the poorer qualities of it especially are turned to account in this way. The alkali employed is potash, and is locally known as kŭly. It is obtained by burning certain saliferous desert plants, the chief of which is Salsola kali. This alkali resembles cakes of coarse salt, and contains many impurities, and these accumulate to form great rubbish heaps in the places where soap is made. The potash obtained from the ashes is in the form of a carbonate. This is dissolved in water, and made caustic by treatment with lime. The solution or 'lye' is then boiled, the refuse from the oil-press being used as fuel. Olive oil is added, and after repeated boilings and additions of oil the solution is allowed to cool, when the soap sets in a solid mass.

---

* The American Revisers, however, prefer 'snuffers' in all three passages.

† But Ex 25^{38} and elsewhere ἐπαρυστήρ and ἐπαρυστρίς, a funnel or other appliance for feeding the lamps with oil.

'Soap' (AV 'sope') appears twice in EV (Jer 2^{22}, Mal 3^{2}). In each case it is the translation of בֹּרִית, a word connected with the root בָּרַר 'to cleanse.' The previous clause in Jer 2^{22} refers to נֶתֶר or mineral alkali (see NITRE). LXX translates בֹּרִית in both places by ποία ('grass'). These facts suggest that vegetable alkali is to be understood rather than soap in the strict sense. The carbonate of potash contained in the ashes of plants has detergent properties similar to those of washing-soda.

Another word, בֹּר, from the same root, usually rendered 'cleanness,' is tr. 'lye' in RVm in Job 9^{30}, Is 1^{25}, on the supposition that it means the same thing as בֹּרִית, vegetable alkali or a solution of it.

SOBER, SOBRIETY.—Both 'sober' and 'temperate' are used in AV in the narrower meaning of 'not drunk' or 'not drunken,' and in the wider meaning of 'moderate,' 'reasonable.' The earliest sense of 'sober' is 'not drunken' (from Fr. sobre, Lat. sobrius, i.e. se-ebrius), and that is now its only meaning; but it early adopted the wider signification, as Piers Plowman, B. xiv. 53—

> 'Be sobre of syghte and of tonge,
> In etynge and in handlynge and in alle thi fyne wittis.'

For an example of sober = not drunk, take Tindale's tr. of Nu 6^{18} 'And the absteyner shall shave his heed in the door of the tabernacle of witnesse, and shall take the heer of his sober heed and put it in the fyre which is under the pease offerynge.' Soberly (Wis 9^{11}, Ro 12^{3}, Tit 2^{12}), soberness (Ac 26^{25}), and sobriety (1 Ti $2^{9.\,15}$) are all used in both senses. Cf. Tindale, Pent. (Prologe), 'Behold how soberly and how circumspectly both Abraham and also Isaac behave them selves amonge the infideles'; Tindale, Expos. 127, 'With their fast they destroy the fast which God commandeth, that is, a perpetual soberness to tame the flesh'; Ac 26^{26} Rhem. 'I speake wordes of veritie and sobrietie'; Ro 12^{3} Rhem. 'For I say by the grace that is given me, to al that are among you not to be more wise than behoveth to be wise, but to be wise unto sobrietie.'

The words rendered 'sober,' etc., or 'temperate,' etc., in AV and RV, are the following:—

1. (a) νήφω, 1 Th $5^{6.\,8}$, 2 Ti 4^{5}, 1 P 1^{13} 4^{7} 5^{8} (all 'be sober' in AV except 2 Ti 4^{5} 'watch'; in RV all 'be sober'). In every case the Greek word has the wider meaning of 'moderate.'
   (b) νηφάλιος, 1 Ti 3^{2} (AV 'vigilant'), 3^{11} (AV 'sober'), Tit 2^{2} (AV 'sober'; all 'temperate' in RV). In all these cases the meaning of the Greek is 'not drunken.'
2. (a) σώφρων, 1 Ti 3^{2} (AV 'sober'), Tit 1^{8} (AV 'sober'), 2^{2} (AV 'temperate'), 2^{5} (AV 'discreet'; all 'sober-minded' in RV).
   (b) σωφρόνως, Tit 2^{12} (AV and RV 'soberly').
   (c) σωφρονέω, Mk 5^{15} = Lk 8^{35} (AV and RV 'in his right mind'), Ro 12^{3} (φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, AV and RV 'to think soberly'), 2 Co 5^{13} (AV 'be sober'), Tit 2^{6} (AV 'be sober-minded'), 1 P 4^{7} (AV 'be sober'; RV in last three 'be of sober mind').
   (d) σωφροσύνη, Ac 26^{25} (AV and RV 'soberness'), 1 Ti $2^{9.\,15}$ (AV and RV 'sobriety').
3. (a) ἐγκράτεια, Ac 24^{25}, Gal 5^{23}, 2 P 1^{6} bis (AV and RV always 'temperance,' RVm always 'self-control').
   (b) ἐγκρατής, Tit 1^{8} (AV and RV 'temperate').
   (c) ἐγκρατεύομαι, 1 Co 7^{9} (AV 'contain,' RV 'have continency'), 9^{25} (AV and RV 'be temperate').

It thus appears that in RV 'sober,' 'sober-minded,' etc., represent σώφρων and its derivatives, as well as νήφω; 'temperate' is the tr. of νηφάλιος and of the derivatives of ἐγκράτεια; while for ἐγ. itself 'temperance' is retained from AV, with the marg. 'self-control.'

For the difference between ἐγκρατής and σώφρων see Page on Ac 24^{25}.

SOCO, SOCOH (שׂוֹכוֹ, שׂוֹכֹה 'branches'; Soccho, Socho).—The form of the name varies in the LXX (see below), and quite needlessly in AV. RV has Socoh everywhere except in 1 Ch 4^{18} and 2 Ch 28^{18}, where it has Soco.

1. A town in the lowland of Judah, mentioned with Adullam and Azekah (Jos 15^{35} B Σαωχώ, A Σωχώ). The Philistines, before the battle in which Goliath was slain, assembled at Socoh, and camped between Socoh and Azekah, at Ephes-dammim (1 S 17^{1}; Jos. Ant. VI. ix. 1). It was in the district of Ben-hesed, one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4^{10}); and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11^{7}; Ant. VIII. x. 1). In the reign of Ahaz it was taken by the Philistines (2 Ch 28^{18}).

Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) mention two villages—one in the mountain, the other in the plain, or an upper and lower Socoh—which were 9 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem, and were called Socchoth (Σοκχώθ). Socoh was passed by St. Paula on her way from Jerusalem to Eleutheropolis (Horræi, Ep. Paul. xviii.). This place is now Khurbet Shuweikeh (a diminutive of Shaukeh, the Arabic form of Shoco), on the left bank of Wâdy es-Sunṭ, 'the Valley of Elah.' The position, strong by nature, was of strategical importance, for it commanded one of the great highways from the coast to the hill-country of Judah. Beneath Shuweikeh, the Wâdy es-Sunṭ makes a great bend, and runs westward instead of from south to north. And here, at the foot of the highland district, the roads from Jerusalem and Hebron unite, before running onwards down the valley to the plains of Philistia. The important part played by Socoh in the wars between the Jews and the Philistines is clearly indicated in the Bible narrative (Rob. *BRP*² ii. 21; PEF Mem. iii. 125; Guérin, Judée, i. 201, 332).

2. A town in the hill-country of Judah, named with Jattir, Dannah, and Debir (Jos 15^{48} B Σωχά, A Σωχώ). The Soco of 1 Ch 4^{18} is apparently the same place. It is now Khurbet Shuweikeh, to the S.W. of Hebron, and near Eshtemoa. There are some insignificant remains (Rob. *BRP*² i. 494; PEF Mem. iii. 410).

At Socoh, according to the Talmud, was born Antigonus,—the first Jew known to have taken a Greek name,—who was noted as the disciple of Simon the Just, and the master of Sadok, the reputed founder of the Sadducees. It is not, however, known of which of the two Socohs he was a native (Neubauer. Géog. du Talmud, p. 121).

SODI (סוֹדִי, perh. = סוֹדְיָה 'intimacy of Jah').—The father of the Zebulunite spy, Nu 13^{10} (B Σουδεί, A Σουδί).

SODOM (סְדֹם, Σόδομα).—One of the five 'cities of the Plain' in the time of Abraham and Lot, destroyed by fire from heaven (Gn 19^{24}) for the wickedness of the inhabitants.* Its position, in the opinion of the present writer, was on the Arabah north of the Dead Sea not far from GOMORRAH (which see). Weighty authorities, however, can be cited in favour of a site at the S. end of the Sea (Dillm. Genesis, 111 f.; Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 187 ff.; G. A. Smith, HGHL 505 ff.; Blanckenhorn, ZDPV xix. (1896) 53 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 3, 146; Buhl, GAP 117, 271, 274; see also art. ZOAR). The wickedness of the Sodomites appears to have been so heinous and debasing as to have become proverbial (Gn 13^{13} 18^{20}, La 4^{6}, Is 3^{9}, cf. 2 P 2^{6}, Jude ^{7}). The term 'Sodomite' (קָדֵשׁ) is used in Scripture to describe offences against the laws of nature which were frequently connected with idolatrous practices (cf. Dt 23^{17}, 1 K 14^{24} 15^{12}, 2 K 23^{7}; see art. SODOMITE). The fate of Sodom and Gomorrah is referred to by our Lord as a warning to those who reject the offer of the gospel (Mt 10^{15}; cf. Jude^{7}, 2 P 2^{6}). A spiritual or typical meaning is applied to the word in Revelation (11^{8}).

SODOMITE (קָדֵשׁ, lit. 'sacred'; fem. קְדֵשָׁה, inadequately tr. by EV 'harlot,' see note in RVm at Gn 38^{21}).—The Eng. word is derived from SODOM [in 2 Es 7^{36} 'Sodomites' of AV is used in lit. sense for 'people of Sodom' (so RV)], where unnatural offences prevailed. But the Heb. ḳādēsh and ḳĕdēshāh have in view not ordinary immorality but religious prostitution, i.e. 'immorality practised in the worship of a deity and in the immediate precincts of a temple' (Driver, Deut. 264, where see references to authorities for the widespread existence of this practice). Such ἱερόδουλοι of either sex were not tolerated in Israel by the Deuteronomic law (Dt 23$^{18.\ 19\ (17.\ 18)}$). The ḳĕdēshîm are said to have been banished from Judah by Asa (1 K 15^{12}). References to them are found also in 1 K 14^{24} 22$^{47\ (46)}$, 2 K 23^{7}, Job 36^{14}, while we meet with ḳĕdēshôth in Gn 38$^{21f.}$ and Hos 4^{14}.

SODOMITISH SEA, THE (mare Sodomiticum), 2 Es 5^{7}.—A name for the Dead Sea. One of the signs of the times to come there given is that 'the Sodom sea shall cast out fish (cf. Ezk 47^{9} for the belief that fish could not live in its waters), and make a noise in the night which many have not known.' This is the only passage in the Bible or the Apocr. which directly connects the lake with the Cities of the Plain; and even here the name may be derived from the closeness of Sodom to the lake, and not from the incorrect theory of that city having been submerged by the Dead Sea.

SOJOURNER.—See GER.

SOLEMN, SOLEMNITY.—Derived through Old Fr. solempne from Lat. sollemnis (from sollus, entire, and annus, a year), 'solemn' means properly that which occurs annually, and is thence applied to any stated or regular occurrence. Thus Mt 27^{15} Wyc. 'But for a solempne day (Rhem. 'upon the solemne day') the justise was wonte to delyvere to the puple oon bounden'; Lk 2^{41} Wyc. 'And his fadir and modir wenten eche yeer into Ierusalem, in the solempne daie of pask' (Rhem. 'at the solemne day of Pasche'). And then, as that which was stated, especially when public, was frequently grand or ceremonious, 'solemn' assumes this meaning; thus Shaks. Tit. Andron. II. i. 112, 'A solemn hunting is in hand'; Macbeth, III. i. 14, 'To-night we hold a solemn supper, sir.' Such an occasion might be merry or sad, according to its nature; whence Chaucer, Prologue, 209—

> 'A Frere ther was, a wantoun and a merye,
> A limitour, a ful solempne man.'

Chaucer uses the word simply in the sense of 'public' in Persones Tale, 105, 'The spyces of Penitence been three. That oon of hem is solempne, another is commune, and the thridde is privee.'

These examples illustrate the use of the word in AV. In all its numerous occurrences it signifies 'stated' or 'public,' having no Heb. word corresponding to itself, but being used along with assembly or meeting for עֲצָרָה or עֲצֶרֶת (see Driver on Am 5^{21}); with feast or day sometimes (as Nu 10^{10}, La 1^{4}, Hos 2^{11}) for מוֹעֵד* (prop. stated time, then used esp. of stated sacred seasons [see Lv 23^{2} RVm 'appointed seasons']) 'solemn feast'; also thrice in AV (Nah 1^{15}, Mal 2^{3}, Ps 81^{3}) for חַג, and (with keep) for חָגַג Dt 6^{15} [RV omits 'solemn,' harmonizing with Lv 23^{39}].† It is easy to understand how the modern sense of 'serious,' 'grave,' or 'gloomy' arose, but in AV that sense is never present.

The expression 'with a solemn sound' occurs in Ps 92^{3} ('Upon the harp with a solemn sound'), on which de Witt remarks, 'Heb. higgāyōn, from the verb hāgāh, which is imitative of any low, suppressed sound, and especially applicable to the soft trill of the harp. The English Bible has the rendering "solemn sound," which does not at all represent the meaning of the word.' Not now, for the next verse says, 'For thou, LORD, hast made me glad'; but 'solemn' once expressed gladness as readily as gravity. Elyot (Governour, i. 41) speaks of the theatre as 'an open place where al the people of Rome behelde solemne actis and playes.'

In accordance with the meaning of 'solemn,' solemnity always means a sacred or ceremonious occasion. It is the tr. of ḥāg, a feast, in Is 30^{29} ('in the night when a holy solemnity [RV 'a holy feast'] is kept'); and of mô'ēd, a (sacred) season, in Dt 31^{10} (RV 'set time'), Is 33^{20} (RV 'solemnity,' RVm 'set feast'), Ezk 45^{17} (RV 'appointed feast'), 46^{11} (RV 'solemnity,' RVm 'appointed feast'). The word also occurs in Sir 50^{19} 'the s. of the Lord' (κόσμος Κυρίου, RV 'worship of the Lord,' RVm 'Gr. adornment'); and 2 Mac 15^{36} 'in no case to let that day pass without s.' (ἀπαρασήμαντον, RV 'undistinguished'). Cf. Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, V. i. 376—

> 'A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
> In nightly revels and new jollity.'

And so also solemnly means sacredly or ceremoniously, Gn 43^{3} 'The man did solemnly protest unto us' (AVm 'Heb. protesting he did protest'); 1 S 8^{9} 'Howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them'; 2 Mac 14^{4} 'of the boughs which were used solemnly in the temple' (τῶν νομιζομένων θαλλῶν τοῦ ἱεροῦ). Cf. Fuller, Holy War, 338, 'His [the prince's] clothes are such as may beseem his Greatnesse, especially when he solemnly appears, or presents himself to forrein Embassadours.'

SOLOMON (שְׁלֹמֹה; BA Σαλωμών, Luc. Σολομών and Σαλομών, NT and Josephus Σολομών).—The third king of Israel, a son of David and Bathsheba.

1. The Name.—Another name Jedidiah (יְדִידְיָה 'beloved of Jah'; B 'Ιδεδεί, A Ἐλεδεδιά, Luc. 'Ιεδδιδιά) was given him by the prophet Nathan as a pledge that the Lord would be specially gracious to him, and that his father was restored to the Divine favour. As that name, however, occurs only once (2 S 12^{25}), we may infer that it never came into common use. Not improbably it may have been deemed too sacred for such use. The name Jedidiah has the same root as David, viz. דוד 'a primitive caressing word.'‡ Wellhausen and others conform the Heb. text of 2 S 12^{25} to the Vulg. and represent David as the originator of the name. The hypothesis is unlikely considering the difference of the relations of David and Nathan to J″ at the time when the name was given, and that the name was a sacred one and the vehicle of a Divine message. Cheyne (art. 'Jedidiah' in Enc. Bibl.) not only alters the text but makes for it a new context, and so arrives at the original and remarkable result that Jedidiah was David's first son by Bathsheba, and that he called his second son by her not Shĕlōmōh, but 'Shillūmō (שִׁלְמוֹ, i.e. 'his compensation') because of Jedidiah.' According to that finding, Solomon was never called Jedidiah. Nor was he entitled to the name of Solomon. His real name was Shillumo, although no Hebrew king is known to have borne that name. It is difficult to see where, on the hypothesis of Cheyne, the consolation of David could come in. Nor is it probable that any Hebrew king would call his son by the name Shillumo. Shillūmah is only used in the OT once (Ps 91^{8}), and it is in the sense not of compensation but of retribution, the reward of the wicked (so shillūm in Hos 9^{7}, Is 34^{8}). Shillūm and shalmônîm are also each used once (Mic 7^{3}, Is 1^{23}) of 'rewards' in the sense of bribes.

According to one reading of 2 S 12^{24}, it was Bathsheba that gave her son the name of Solomon. She may have done so. In the OT more instances are mentioned of the names of children being given by their mother than by their father. In a number of cases the names are said to have been given by both parents, and that may have been so as regards Solomon, although the evidence for David's participation in the act is positive, and that for Bathsheba's only problematical. According to one account of David's naming of Solomon, he is represented as having acted under the belief that God had expressly directed him to give the child the name he did. The Chronicler (1 Ch 22^{9}) describes him as telling his successor that he had himself proposed to build a temple to J″, but that the word of J″ had forbidden him because of the blood he had shed, while promising him that the work would be accomplished by a son who would bear the name of Solomon, and have a reign of peace and quietness. Whether that statement be historically accurate or not cannot be decided by the merely historical evidence in our possession. There is, however, no internal impossibility in the account of the state of mind ascribed to David. On the contrary, that is psychologically quite natural. The name Shĕlōmōh (Solomon) means 'peaceful,' 'pacific,' like the Gr. Irenæus and Ger. Friedrich. And when Solomon was born, David was a man whose strength had been exhausted in warfare, and who was keenly sensible of the blessings of peace both for a king and a kingdom. Hence it was altogether natural that at that period of time he should have given the name Solomon to a son on whom he placed high expectations and for whom he desired a happier life than his own, and very conceivable even that he may have felt that God directed him to name his child as he did. The name was certainly one which indicated well a prominent and distinctive feature of both the character and reign of Solomon. Although he ruled as an absolute monarch, allowed no rivals, and did not hesitate to crush dangerous adversaries, he was not naturally cruel, and had no taste for war. He was a man of peace—the most peace-loving, perhaps, of the Hebrew kings; and under his sway there was for about forty years in Palestine, not absolute peace indeed, either as regards contentment within or cessation of hostility from without, but such peace as the Hebrew nation had never known before or was ever to know again.

2. The Sources.—The chief sources of information regarding the life and reign of Solomon are contained in the books of Kings and Chronicles. The narrative in Kings (1 K 1–11^{43}) is closely connected with a section of the books of Samuel (2 S 11–20). The latter is also a continuous narrative. It leads steadily up to the story in Kings, and shows in a graphic and picturesque way what obstacles blocked the way of Solomon's accession to the throne, and how unlikely it was that he would have reached it had J″ not specially loved and favoured him. Along with the narrative in Kings it forms a whole in which there is both unity of plan and similarity of style. Both of our oldest sources are far from being contemporary documents. The record in Kings is historically much the more valuable; but the compilation even of Kings cannot have been completed until about 400 years after the death of Solomon. The compilation of Chronicles was not completed until at least three centuries later.

The author of the account in Chron. made use of the account in Kings, and added to it only little information of a strictly historical character. The author of the account in Kings refers (1 K 11^{41}) to an older account 'the book of the annals of Solomon.' The author of the account in Chron. refers (2 Ch 9^{29}) to (a) 'the words of Nathan the prophet,' (b) 'the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite,' and (c) 'the vision of Iddo the seer.' See artt. KINGS and CHRONICLES. Through the hands of what authors and editors Kings and Chron. passed before they reached their present form no one knows, and even the process by which they became what they are has been only vaguely ascertained. The loss of older records than those which we possess is all the more to be regretted, as both Kings and Chron. were written largely under the influence of religious motives and with a view to religious edification. Merely to record events and trace their connexions, causes, and course of movement had no interest for the authors of them. What they were chiefly concerned with was how they might make known the hand and voice of God in His dealings with Israel, and with her friends and foes. The authors of the accounts in Samuel, Kings, and Chron. were manifestly men of limited views, men of their time, and much influenced in what they wrote by the feelings and beliefs prevalent in their social medium. They are entitled, however, to be credited with honesty and piety in intention. Their account has its faults. Although they assign a comparatively large space to Solomon, they give us no very precise or vivid description either of his private life or public career, and no distinct view of the order of succession of events in his reign. They may not be wholly to blame for that, nor may it be much to be regretted that they did not succeed better. Seemingly, the character of Solomon was one exceptionally difficult to portray. Saul and David were far more interesting personages, and it is natural that they should have been presented in a far more lifelike manner. Solomon is left by his biographers an imposing but very indistinct figure. Was that, however, not just as it should be? Was not want of reality his great want? If so, could he have been more truly and wisely represented than he was? The accounts given of him in both Kings and Chron. are priestly in tone and tendency, but that in Chron. is much more so than that in Kings. The general view given of the character and reign of Solomon in the latter is far more discriminating than that in the former. While in Kings the glory of Solomon is dwelt on with patriotic pride, the mischievousness of his conduct is also clearly set forth, whereas in Chron. what tends to glorify him is alone dwelt on, and what was unworthy of his reputation, judged of from a Levitical point of view, is either passed over unnoticed or very slightly indicated. There are no traces, however, of conscious dishonesty in the Chronicler, no grounds for holding him to have stated what he did not believe, while it is of great advantage to have two accounts which so far agree and so far differ. The Chronicler assumed certain preconceptions current in his age as to the history of his people to be unquestionably true, and wrote his history in conformity with those preconceptions. That, however, is what all historians do, even the most advanced and critical. History cannot be written without preconceptions, and preconceptions cannot but lead to conclusions which must appear to those who do not accept them falsifications of the historical data. The Chronicler's pride in the glory of Solomon and in the position attained by Israel under him, the exaggerated importance which he assigned to priests and priestly things, his prodigality as regards number, and other peculiarities, are themselves most instructive, because characteristic of him not as an individual merely, but also as a representative of the time and society to which he belonged. His estimate of the conduct of Solomon does not substantially differ from that given in Kings. It amounts to a severe condemnation—one all the more severe coming as it does from a writer so biassed in his favour—of the evil which he had done notwithstanding his vast means and opportunities of doing good.

The fragments of ancient historians quoted by Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 6), by Eusebius of Cæsarea (Præp. Ev. ix. 34), and by Clemens Alex. (Strom. i. 386) add little, if anything, to our knowledge of Solomon beyond what is stated in Kings and Chronicles. The narrative of Josephus himself in Ant. VIII. i.–viii. depends almost entirely on the Biblical records. Where he deviates from them, he is rarely to be trusted. It is noteworthy that he describes Solomon as a powerful sorcerer. That had already become in his time a generally accepted belief among the Jews, and probably was not confined to them. It is especially as a sorcerer and lord over the elements, animals, aphreets and jinn, that he is renowned in the East. The Oriental imagination has run riot in the invention of legends regarding him.*

The writings long attributed to Solomon, to be found in the OT or the Apocrypha, cannot in the present state of opinion among Biblical critics as to their authorship be assumed to supply materials for his biography. He may have been the author of a few of the Psalms and a number of the Proverbs, but to prove him so and to establish which are his is difficult. The SONG OF SONGS cannot be his, but it has a historical value dependent neither upon its date nor its authorship, but on its testimony to the impression which Solomon's character had left on certain Jewish minds. The WISDOM OF SOLOMON, which professes to have Solomon for author, shows what impression he had left on a very different class of minds at a still later date. As to the relation of ECCLESIASTES to Solomon, see art. in the present work and in Enc. Biblica; cf. also Sir 42^{13-23}. Considerable sidelight has been cast on the Solomonic age in Israel by archæological and historical investigations, but it has not so much increased our knowledge of Solomon himself as of his buildings, the topography of his capital, the geography of his kingdom, the ethnology and ancient history of it, and the state of the countries with which the Israel of his time was brought into contact,—subjects which cannot be dealt with in this article. Modern criticism of the Biblical sources has dispelled many erroneous views regarding Solomon's life and reign; but it has, of course, not increased, and cannot be expected to increase, that knowledge of positive facts regarding them, which is the great desideratum.

Or.*, Herbelot's Bibl. Or. 333, and the historians Abulfeda, Tabari, and Ludolph (Hist. Eth.) may also be referred to. M. D. Conway in his Solomon and Solomonic Literature (Open Court Pub. Co., Chicago, 1900) deals with the Solomon mythology as a whole in an ingenious but often very arbitrary way. He considers 'the external and historical data insufficient to prove certainly that an individual Solomon ever existed' (p. 1).

3. Birth, parentage, and training.—The account of the birth of Solomon in 2 S $12^{24.25}$ conveys the impression that he was the second child of David and Bathsheba. The lists of their children in 2 S 5^{14}, 1 Ch 3^{5}, and 1 Ch 14^{4}, on the other hand, seem to imply that he was their fourth child, their youngest son, and that Shammua (or Shimea), Shobab, and Nathan had been previously born to them, as in all those lists his name is mentioned last. No quite satisfactory explanation of the apparent discrepancy has yet been given. The likeliest, perhaps, is that Solomon was mentioned last as being the most important member of the family group, the heir to his father's throne.

Nathan, by his rebuke of David, lost none of his influence with either him or Bathsheba, and continued to be the friend of both. He prophesied good for their child, and strongly supported his cause at the moment when it was most in danger. Owing to that and the vagueness of a phrase in 2 S 12^{25}, he has very generally been held to have had the charge of Solomon's education. There is, however, no real foundation for the opinion. Scarcely any information is given us regarding Solomon previous to his elevation to the throne. It may safely be inferred from what he was in manhood that his education had not been neglected in youth, and that he must have been very receptive of learning and eager to excel in accomplishments; but there is nothing to indicate that he was trained under any prophet, or that he was in sympathy with anything distinctive of prophetic teaching or prophetic ideals of life. There is no trace of Nathan, or any other prophet, having had any influence over him when king. The prophetic ministry almost disappeared during his reign. What prophets there were in Israel in his day were opposed to his policy. Far more probably he was educated in his father's palace. In various respects the court of David must have been the best school possible for the education of David's successor, while in others one most apt to develop the defects so conspicuous in Solomon's after-life. The atmosphere of a court presided over by David, and agitated by the internal dissensions and conflicting passions to which despotic power and polygamy combined necessarily gave rise, cannot have been favourable to his healthy moral growth. There is no definite information given us as to how far or in what ways he was influenced by his mother; but there can be no reasonable doubt that her influence was considerable. To have retained the hold which she had upon David and the rank which she held among his wives, she must have been more than merely 'a very beautiful woman' (2 S 11^{2}). She must have been also a talented and sagacious one. That she was in close alliance with Nathan, that Adonijah sought her aid on his behalf in the belief that her son would refuse nothing that she asked, and that Solomon received her with the utmost reverence when she presented herself before him, are indications of fact which all point in one direction. We may accordingly infer that she had considerably contributed to the formation of Solomon's character.

4. Adonijah's rebellion.—There is very little further information given regarding Solomon previous to his accession to the throne. The account in 1 Ch 22^{2-19} describes David's preparation for the building of the temple, and records his charges to Solomon and the princes. If it be in its proper place in the book—a point on which there is room for difference of opinion—it clearly shows that Adonijah's rebellion was inexcusable. There is, however, nothing elsewhere to correspond to it, nor are there any means afforded us of verifying what needs verification in it. The rebellion of ADONIJAH was what necessitated the elevation of Solomon to the throne before his father's death. Adonijah was then, perhaps, his father's eldest son, and may naturally have considered himself to have had on that ground a preferential claim to the throne. There was at that time, however, no authoritative law or settled precedent to regulate the succession.

Adonijah himself does not seem to have rested his claim on right or precedent, but on the goodwill of the people. 'Thou knowest,' he said to Bathsheba when obviously trying to make the most of his own cause,—'thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is become my brother's: for it was his from the Lord' (1 K 2^{15}). That is a very intelligible view, and all the more so that we know the people of Israel in the time of David and Solomon unquestionably felt that they had some right to consideration in the appointment of their kings. The Northern tribes unmistakably showed that when they rejected Solomon's only son. It is none the less very misleading to speak of Adonijah as 'the rightful heir' to the throne, as Stade and some other critics do. The 'rightful heir to the throne' in an absolute monarchy such as Israel had become under David, was the son nominated by the reigning monarch. It has been so in all such monarchies; and wherever polygamy has prevailed in these monarchies, younger sons have been often appointed to the exclusion of the eldest. The present Shah of Persia is an instance of 'a rightful monarch,' although he has an older and, it is said, exceptionally able brother. The appointment of the youngest son to the throne was very common in the despotisms of India.

Adonijah, it would seem, was 'a very goodly man,' captivating in his manners, fond of display and magnificence, ambitious, and scheming. He made it quite apparent that he wished to be king, assumed royal honours, and gained over to his side powerful allies, in Joab the general of the army, Abiathar the priest, and the princes of the royal house. In a word, he began to play the rôle of the ill-fated Absalom. The conspirators may possibly have deemed that his seniority of birth or superiority of qualifications gave him a right to reign. They may also have possibly deemed that it was expedient for him to ascend the throne at once owing to David's bodily weakness. But they were certainly engaged in a real and formidable conspiracy kept secret from the king, and meant to set him aside and to thwart his wishes. Their attempt does not seem to have been either skilfully planned or strongly supported in popular feeling. The account given of it and of its failure in 1 K 1^{5-50} distinctly conveys that impression.

As soon as divulged, the whole plot came to naught.*

5. Commencement of reign and first acts.—David soon afterwards died, and Solomon succeeded him without opposition. The year in which he began to reign has not been determined, nor are there yet known data for doing so exactly. He is said both in Kings and Chron. to have reigned forty years; but that may be a round, not an exact, number. If exact, however, we may assign about B.C. 970 as the time at which he began to reign, since there are good reasons for considering B.C. 930 as about the first year of Jeroboam's reign—the year in which Solomon died.

The Jewish and Arabic tradition that Solomon was only twelve years old when he began to reign, obviously originated in misconception of the meaning of the words in 1 K 3^7 'I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in,' etc.; words not to be taken literally, but as a humble confession of inadequacy, owing to youth and inexperience, for the great task of royalty. The generally received view that he was about twenty years old when he began to reign cannot be far amiss. According to Josephus, Solomon began to reign when he was fourteen years of age; but, in the same sentence he tells us he reigned eighty years, and died at the age of ninety-four (Ant. VIII. vii. 8). He does not mention the source of his information.†

The first concern of Solomon as king naturally was to make his seat secure. The Chronicler characteristically says nothing regarding the way in which he established himself in his kingdom. The whole account, however, in 1 K 2^{13}–3^{8} seems worthy of credence. It represents Solomon as acting with great decision and vigour, and yet as not inflicting punishment beyond what was deemed necessary. He struck only at the heads of the conspiracy which had been formed against him. Considering that he was an Oriental ruler, not his cruelty but his clemency was exceptional. David is not recorded to have advised the taking of any strong measures against Adonijah, and Solomon had granted him a pardon accompanied with a stern warning. Very naturally, however, and probably quite correctly, he interpreted his request to have Abishag for a wife as a proof that he had not abandoned his pretensions to the throne. Bathsheba, it has been argued, would not have communicated the request to her son if she had deemed it treasonable in intention. Perhaps not, but perhaps also she did not act in earnest for the good of the son of Haggith. Abiathar was leniently dealt with in consideration of his past loyalty. David, according to 1 K 2^6, had advised the putting to death of Joab; but, even if he did not do so (see art. JOAB), Solomon could not have been expected to spare his life. Joab was the most dangerous enemy he could possibly have in all Israel. He was so resolute, so able, so much a favourite with the army, that even David had not been able to keep him in check. Not inferior, and seemingly even superior, to David as a commander, there was no one left in Israel to compare with him in military ability. His successor Benaiah was a valiant warrior, and an efficient tool for an absolute ruler to have at hand, but there is no evidence that he was a great general. Joab could neither have respect for the character of a man like Solomon, nor sympathy with his policy; indeed a reign like that of Solomon could hardly have been possible so long as Joab was at the head of the Hebrew army. The view of Guthe and others, that David and Solomon hoped that the putting of Joab to death would avert the vengeance which his crimes might otherwise bring upon the house of David may be correct, but it is not necessary to account for his death. Resentment and policy are sufficient to account for it. They also account best for the way in which Shimei was dealt with. It does not appear that he was implicated in the conspiracy, but he had been a bitter enemy of David, was suspected of being still disloyal and hostile to the house of David, and, on account of his influence with the Benjamites, was deemed dangerous to the peace and comfort of the new monarch.

6. Convocation at Gibeon, dream and request.—The way in which Solomon dealt with the enemies whom he had recently feared could not fail greatly to 'strengthen him in his kingdom.' He not only thereby got rid of them, but showed to his subjects that young as he was he was neither weak nor foolish, but a shrewd and capable man who could effectively discharge the functions of a king, and might be hoped to act neither capriciously nor cruelly. To have gained so great a triumph at the very commencement of his reign was enough to secure his popularity, for with the populace of all times and places 'nothing succeeds like success.' When he felt himself secure on his throne he resolved to make manifest his gratitude to J″, and proceeded to do so on a scale indicative of his taste for magnificence and display in worship, as in other things. He called a convocation of his captains, judges, governors, and heads of houses, at the ancient city of Gibeon, where was a famed bāmāh, 'a great high place,' and there, surrounded by his dignitaries, he offered in thanks to God a thousand burnt-offerings—'a thousandfold holocaust'—on the brazen altar which stood before the sanctuary and could be seen from afar. On the following night the king dreamed that J″ appeared to him and asked what He should give him, and that he replied by asking 'an understanding heart to judge aright' the great people entrusted to his charge while so young and inexperienced. He dreamed also that, because such had been his request, God promised him not only what he asked for—wisdom and knowledge—but also wealth and honour, and, conditionally, however, on conformity to the Divine law, length of days. The dream was naturally accepted by the king as a Divine communication. To Solomon there seems to have never been vouchsafed any clearer or higher form of Divine revelation than the dream.

7. Solomon's judgment.—According to his biographer in Kings, he was soon afforded an opportunity of displaying the wisdom which he had asked for and received. From Gibeon he returned to Jerusalem, where the ark of the covenant was now located in the tabernacle erected by David on Mount Zion, and there also presented offerings to J″, and likewise made a feast to all his servants. At Jerusalem he was forthwith called to pronounce a decision between two harlots who both claimed the same live child while each affirmed that a dead one was her neighbour's. The way at which he at once arrived at the truth immediately made him famous, and has greatly helped to maintain his reputation for wisdom ever since. It showed an instinctive insight into the workings of the human heart very remarkable in so young a man, and a keenness of practical discernment of a kind invalu-

* Wellhausen, Stade, and other eminent critics represent Nathan and Bathsheba, Zadok and Benaiah, as conspirators, and the choice of Solomon by David as the result of a palace intrigue. It is possible to think so, but the supposition appears to the present writer to be merely conjectural. As to what is related of David's advice to Solomon in 1 K 2^{1-12} and 1 Ch $21^{6\cdot19}$ and 28–$29^{1\cdot22}$, see the art. DAVID in the present work, and Enc. Bib., and the commentators mentioned under heading of Literature.

† Perhaps 1 K 3^{14} sufficed to suggest to him the eighty years' reign and ninety-four years of life. It is not unlikely, however, that earlier Jewish authors may have written to the same effect. The promise of length of days was a merely conditional one, and Solomon did not fulfil the condition. Stade rightly holds it as certain that Solomon must have reigned over thirty years, but inconclusively infers from 1 K 15^1 and 2 Ch 12^{13} that he could not have reigned forty years (see his GVI i. 307).

able in one whose chief duty was to act as the supreme judge in all disputed cases throughout Israel. That 'all Israel heard of it, and feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment,' may well be believed. That there was nothing miraculous in it may as reasonably be admitted. Innumerable examples of the same kind of wisdom as remarkable and as well authenticated might easily be given. Far more wonderful stories of a similar kind are told of Solomon himself, but they are entirely fictitious. The story, as told in 1 K 3^{16-28}, can alone be regarded as historical narrative. Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 2) seems to have had no other source of information, yet he gives a very distorted version of it. He represents the king as proposing to divide both the dead and the live child, and the people as privately laughing at the proposal as that of a mere youth.*

8. Solomon's policy dependent on David's.—The task which fell to Solomon was that of building up a kingdom on a foundation already laid and on lines already drawn. A reign like his was only made possible by what Samuel, Saul, and David had accomplished. Samuel, the last of the Judges, was also the first of them whose influence extended over all Israel, and was powerful enough to reconstruct the theocracy on a monarchical basis. Saul, by his struggles with the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Amalekites, rendered comparatively easy the consolidation of all the tribes of Israel into a nation under David. It was David, however, who made the policy of Solomon feasible, who indicated both by his counsels and example how it could be carried into effect, and who enabled him to start with a sufficiency of the means necessary to enter on his schemes of ambition and to revolutionize the manners and the ideals of Israel. Solomon seems to have done little which his father had not initiated: both imitated the doings and methods of Oriental despots.

9. His military policy.—Solomon had not the genius requisite to extend his kingdom. He seems to have had no military taste or talent; and certainly the glory of the conqueror he but little sought and little won. He was content to maintain and develop what he had inherited, and to abstain from dangerous adventures. The weak condition of the surrounding States would have presented to an ambitious warrior-king a strong temptation to attempt to create a powerful Semitic empire, which, if unified and vivified by faith in J″, might have anticipated Islam by a millennium and a half and given the history of Israel a very different direction. Yet Solomon, far from being a feeble or incapable monarch, was an able, shrewd, and enterprising one, who knew well how to magnify his office, further his interests, and attain his ends. He must have had very exceptional administrative talent, and he applied it to military as well as civil organization. Not otherwise could he have preserved for forty years the security and unity of a nation so recently and loosely constituted; kept down its strong disruptive tendencies; and prosecuted a policy which must have been obnoxious to the majority of his subjects. Although he did not increase his territory, he kept a firm hold of it, and made his sphere of influence much wider than his father's had been. His troubles with HADAD, REZON, and JEROBOAM prove nothing to the contrary. The account of them given in 1 K 11^{9-40} is placed—obviously with a view to religious edification—in the closing period of his reign, instead of at or near its commencement; and the information which it conveys, although it may be received as trustworthy so far as it goes, is scanty, and cannot be supplemented either from other Biblical or non-Biblical sources. It does not appear that Solomon's adversaries gained much advantage over him. Hadad was doubtless, and very excusably, as troublesome a neighbour to him and his people as he could be, and did them all the 'mischief' in his power; but there is no evidence that he became king of Edom, or that Edom under him secured independence. The fact that the port of Elath remained in Solomon's hands showed that the king of Israel was the overlord of Edom. As regards Rezon ben-Hadiada, he may have made himself master of Damascus even in the lifetime of David. There is no evidence of David's having had an acknowledged and effective suzerainty over Syria. And, besides, although we are told that Rezon 'was a foe to Israel all the days of Solomon,' it does not appear that he succeeded in seizing any portion of Israelitish territory. Jeroboam's attempt to stir up sedition against him can still less relevantly be referred to as evidence of his weakness, seeing that it was a failure, and Jeroboam did not venture to return from Egypt until he heard that Solomon was dead.

Solomon left out of his military calculations the possibilities neither of invasion from without nor of insurrection from within. He strengthened his capital by the construction of fortifications which David had only begun or merely contemplated. See art. MILLO. He established fortified cities, well-garrisoned and well-provisioned, at well-chosen strategic points (see HAZOR, MEGIDDO, GEZER, BETH-HORON, BAALATH, TAMAR). He thus guarded the kingdom against attack at all its more vulnerable points, as well as increased the safety of the sacred city. By adding to his army a force of 12,000 horsemen and 1400 war chariots, he must have greatly increased its efficiency. The innovation was unpopular among the ultra-conservative and superstitious portion of the community, but it was a real improvement. In the plains of N. Palestine, on the borders of Philistia, and in most directions beyond the national boundaries, cavalry could not fail to be of great advantage. The Canaanites had employed it with success against the Israelites in the time of the Judges. Before its adoption by Solomon it had come into use in all the neighbouring States. Once introduced, it was adhered to so long as Israel and Judah retained their independence.

* There is no mention of the incident in Chronicles. The story told by Diodorus Siculus of Ariophanes, king of Thrace, in general character resembles very closely that of Kings. On the death of the king of the Cimmerians, three young men appeared before Ariophanes claiming to be the only son of the deceased king, without producing adequate evidence for the truth of their claims. Ariophanes ordered them to hurl a javelin at the corpse of their alleged father. Two consented, but one refused, and he was declared to be the true son and heir of the deceased monarch. Another parallel is the account which Suetonius gives of a judgment of Claudius (Lives of the Twelve Cæsars). A woman refused to acknowledge that a young man who claimed to be her son was so. In the absence of other means of deciding on which side was the truth, the emperor ordered the woman to marry the youth, and so obliged her to acknowledge that the latter was her son. Most of the Oriental parallels have a manifestly mythical and fabulous setting. In some of them, however, the resemblance is so close as to amount almost to verbal repetition. See Benfey's Pantschatantra, i. 894–896, ii. 544, also Kleine Schriften, 3rd Abt. 171 ff.; Eng. tr. of the 'Kah-Gyur' (Trübner's Or. Ser.)—the tale of Visākhā; Weber's Indische Streifen, iii. 60 (also T. Steele's An Eastern Love Story, Trübner, 1871, pp. 218 f., 248 f.); Reinh. Köhler, GGA, 1872, pp. 1219-1221; Fausböll, Buddhist Birth Stories, tr. by Rhys Davids, vol. i. xiv–xvi; and Rev. de l'Histoire de Rel. xxxviii. (1898), art. by Leclère, 'Une version cambodgienne du Jugement de Salomon,' 176–187. In the last-mentioned version, a mother, her child, a female ogress in woman's form, and a Buddhist Solomon, 'the noble Mohosoth,' are the parties. To the questions whether the stories of the judgments of Solomon, Ariophanes, and Claudius are legendary or historical, and whether the judgment of Solomon originated in the Indian stories or had its origin in India, definite answers do not seem to have been as yet arrived at.

tional alliances. He immensely increased his power and influence by the treaties which he formed with the rulers of neighbouring States. The most advantageous of them was that formed with Hiram, king of Tyre—the continuation of an alliance formed in the time of David, but utilized by Solomon to an immensely greater extent than by David. Without it Solomon could not have given effect either to a commercial policy or to his desire to build the temple and beautify Jerusalem. It was for the manifest benefit of both the contracting parties. To Hiram it ensured, in case of attack from the landward side of his kingdom, the aid of a powerful army in its defence; an abundant supply at all times of such commodities as corn, oil, and wine; an enlarged traffic with the Hebrews by way of Joppa; and the opening up of the Yâm Sûph (so-called Red Sea), and of the ocean beyond it, to the enterprise of his mariners and merchants. To Solomon it was equally advantageous. It enabled him to enter into mercantile copartnership with Hiram, and in conjunction with him to have ships trading both in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. Whatever may have been the exact position of TARSHISH and OPHIR, Solomon must have had vessels on both seas. If Elath and Ezion-geber were open to him, Joppa or Dor was still more so. He was not the man to make a foolish bargain, or to prefer doing business on a small to a large scale. That he derived annually from his foreign trade as much revenue as his historians (1 K 10[14], 2 Ch 9[13]) state is very difficult to believe. The trade, however, may well have been a very lucrative one. And, obviously, without the aid of Hiram and his subjects Solomon could have found neither the ships nor the men necessary to him for engaging in it. Nor was he less dependent on the skill and tastes of Phœnician artists and artisans for the construction and ornamentation of the buildings on which his desires were set, and to which he was to owe so much of his fame in future ages. His own subjects were incapable of supplying workmen of the kind needed, whereas the Phœnicians were famous for their proficiency in architecture and the plastic arts. It was chiefly from Phœnicia that Hebrew art was derived. In that sphere the influence of Egypt on Israel was not direct, but through Phœnicia.*

Next in importance to the Tyrian was the Egyptian alliance (1 K 3[1]). The Pharaoh with whom Solomon entered into alliance is not named in the Bible, but must have been one of the last of the Tanite Pharaohs (perhaps the last—Pasebchanu II., called by Manetho Ψουσενής). Solomon obtained a daughter of the Pharaoh for his wife, and received with her as a dowry the town of Gezer, which her father had captured. Gezer was a valuable gift, and the marriage itself seems to have flattered the pride both of Solomon and of his subjects. In the age of the Chronicler and of the Jews of later times the marriage came to be regarded by the pious as disastrous, but there is no trace of such a feeling in the older historical sources. The first great edifice which Solomon caused to be built was not the temple of J″, but a palace for the Egyptian princess. The daughter of Pharaoh was always the chief personage in his harem. In all probability she had received a much more comprehensive and refined education and training than his Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite, Sidonian, and Hittite wives and concubines. His own tastes, indeed, were of a kind which would have disposed him to imitate the style of life of a Pharaoh, but they must have been strengthened by his marriage with a Pharaoh's daughter. However explained, his ideal of kingship was the ideal which had for ages been conspicuously exemplified in Egypt. Like the Tyrian alliance, the Egyptian alliance was uninterrupted throughout his reign, and of the latter as of the former he would seem to have taken full advantage.* That he bought droves of horses and large numbers of chariots in Egypt and sold them at high prices to Hittite and Syrian kings may be fairly inferred from 1 K 10[28. 29] and 2 Ch 1[16. 17], if by Mizraim in those verses Egypt be meant.† He also promoted and protected the carrying and caravan trade, which extended almost from the Nile to the Euphrates. He saw that the geographical position of Palestine—between the Mediterranean, Red Sea, and the Desert—gave him command of the chief highways of Asiatic commerce, and power to secure to himself a share of the profits of the greatest markets of the then known world (those of Egypt and Chaldæa), fully recognized the importance of trade and commerce, and acted accordingly. Therein lay, perhaps, his greatest originality as a Hebrew ruler. His predecessors—the Judges, Saul, and David—could not do so, continually engaged as they were in fierce struggles with their enemies in and around Palestine. The general result of their struggles made his wider and more humane views and schemes of policy possible and so far realizable; but to himself belongs the credit of their inception and prosecution.‡ Looked at in itself, his foreign policy must be pronounced on the whole a reasonable one. And it had good results. It was a policy of peace; it saved his subjects from the miseries of war; it enriched certain classes and benefited in some degrees other classes; it made the Hebrews better acquainted with the greatness, the wealth, and the state of civilization of the world around them, widened their views, corrected sundry prejudices, suggested improvements, and stimulated activity. It was, perhaps, the chief factor in making the Solomonic age the period of greatest material progress in the history of Israel. Yet it is quite possible to estimate too highly the external policy of Solomon, while quite impossible to estimate it aright without viewing it in relation to his internal policy. There is no evidence that it was disapproved of by his subjects, and he did not enter into, what would have been abhorrent to them, any alliance with the Canaanites; but it was the expression merely of the king's will, not of the national desire, and when the king died no one thought of continuing his policy. On the contrary, so long as the nation retained its national existence, it tended increasingly to self-isolation.

* In the Histories of Phœnicia by Kenrick, Rawlinson, Movers, Pietschmann, in Renan's Mission en Phénicie, in CIS ii. tome 1 and 2, and in Perrot and Chipiez' Hist. de l'Art, much information is to be obtained as to the relations between the Phœnicians and the Hebrews. The reigns of Hiram and Solomon appear to have been contemporary almost all through, as the former is said (Menander, fr. 1) to have begun to reign when nineteen years old and to have been fifty-three years old when he died. The enumeration given in 1 K 7[13ff.] of the qualifications of the Hiram who was Solomon's chief architect and artist, indicates what the Phœnicians could teach the Hebrews during the reign of Solomon.

* Neither the general Histories of Antiquity nor the special Histories of Ancient Egypt make any appreciable addition to what the Biblical historians tell us of the connexion between Israel and Egypt during the reign of Solomon. The lack of information is strange.

† Winckler holds that by Mizraim a N. Syrian Muṣri is meant (Alttest. Untersuch. 168 ff., and Altor. Forsch. i. 24–41, 337, 338). Kittel, Benzinger, and others have accepted his view. Valuable, however, as his new facts are in themselves, they do not prove his Muṣri to be the Mizraim of Kings and Chronicles.

‡ According to Eupolemus, as quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix.), David began the maritime trade. The statement appears to be merely a conjecture suggested by the fact recorded in 2 S 8[14], 1 K 11[15. 16], and 1 Ch 18[13], that David conquered the kingdom of Edom. Possibly David foresaw and suggested the use to which his conquest might be put. It is very unlikely, however, that at so late a stage of life he should have begun such an enterprise, and still more unlikely that, if he had begun it, he should not have got the credit of it.

terest, particularly when compared with the lists of those of David in 2 S 8[16-18] and 20[23-26], although of too general a nature to be definitely referable to any particular period. The comparison will show that David in the later years of his life had gone far in the direction followed by his son, and that between them they had effected a great revolution—economic, social, and political—in the national life of Israel. The old tribal system had been undermined and shattered, and a monarchical despotism of the only kind known in the East—one none the less a despotism in reality for being a theocracy—had been built up. The will of Solomon was practically the supreme law of his people, and neither priests nor prophets ventured to oppose it or to attempt to limit it. Throughout his reign all power in Israel was centred in himself and carried into effect by his officials. The list of his sārîm (princes or chief ministers) in 1 K 4[2-6] does not contain the name of a single individual who can be supposed to have been an independent adviser. The name of Abiathar should not be in it, as he was a degraded and banished man during Solomon's reign. The sons of Nathan mentioned were much more probably the king's own nephews, the sons of his brother Nathan, than the sons of the prophet Nathan [but see vol. iii. p. 488[b]]. There was no prophet among Solomon's princes, nor any man not directly and entirely dependent upon him. We are not told that he made any direct attack on the old tribal systems. It seems erroneous to represent as such his division of the territory of Israel (that of Judah was exempted) into twelve districts, over which were appointed twelve 'officers' (nizzābîm), each bound to provide in regular monthly succession victuals for the king and his household, and provender for his horses and dromedaries. Those districts were not coextensive with the tribal territories. The officers to whom they were assigned did not displace the tribal chiefs, and had only a definite specific duty to perform. They were merely 'purveyors' or 'providers' for the king, his annonæ curatores. But, although the old tribal system and its chiefs may not have been assailed, the claims of the monarchy were asserted and its powers exercised independently of them. The tribal system and the monarchy coexisted under Solomon, but the latter was so dominant that the king could introduce what changes he pleased. Tribal and personal privileges, rights, and liberties were at his mercy. Doubtless the nation realized only slowly that such was the case, and how dangerous a state of things it was. The monarchy had been a great success, and was regarded as a sacred institution. The king was 'the Lord's anointed.' The new king was young, beautiful in person, a rarely brilliant, attractive, and imposing personality; to outward seeming a perfect king. He was well aware that a great trust had been assigned to him, and he set a high value on equity in judgment and orderliness in administration. Many of his innovations must have been improvements. Some of his enterprises were largely successful. For a season the sun of prosperity shone so brightly on his reign that there may well have been great contentment and rejoicing in Israel. 1 K 4[20. 25. 34] may be regarded as echoes of that time. But disillusionment was bound to come, and gradually came as what was radically evil in the government of Solomon gradually displayed itself. Entrusted with unlimited power, he yielded to the temptation to abuse it, and to enjoy it mainly for what he deemed his own honour and advantage. His policy, although not uninfluenced by worthy and pious aspirations, must be pronounced essentially selfish. The chief motives of it were the love of pleasure and power, of wealth and splendour and fame; its main object was to promote his own interest, to enrich and glorify himself, and to strengthen and magnify the Davidic dynasty. To obtain his ends he required to have recourse not only to measures obnoxious to chiefs of tribes, elders of cities, and holders of landed property, but to such as were most oppressive to the poorer classes. He reduced the Canaanites to slavery, and employed 160,000 of them in quarrying stones and bearing burdens. From the Israelites he exacted less labour; but they, too, were constrained to give personal services and to submit to heavy exactions. Thirty thousand of them were required to work by relays of ten thousand, every third month, in the forest of Lebanon. The statement to the contrary in 1 K 9[22] and 2 Ch 8[9] is an instructive, patriotic gloss, inconsistent with the general narratives either in Kings or Chronicles. The Hebrews under Solomon were no longer a free people. While not slaves in the strict sense of the word, they were subject to forced labour, 'the levy,' the maṣ—a term as hateful to them as were its equivalents, corvée or Frohn, in mediæval Europe. David had introduced the form of servitude denoted by it (2 S 20[24]), but Solomon greatly increased it. The favouritism which he showed towards Judah in connexion with it must have made it all the more offensive to Israel, while it was doubtless one reason why Judah did not join Israel in the revolt against Rehoboam. The evils of the 'levy' could not fail to make themselves increasingly felt in the course of the building operations which were so conspicuous a part of the king's domestic policy. One of his chief aims was to have a strong and magnificent capital. It was a very reasonable aim within proper limits, but these he failed to recognize. To render Jerusalem as far as possible impregnable, and to make it a capital worthy of Israel and of being the centre of its political and especially of its religious life, was manifestly desirable. The fortifications and the temple of Jerusalem were for the benefit of all Israel. Like so many kings of his type, however, Solomon failed to see that there should be limits set to expensive building. He did not adequately realize that the territory of Israel was a very small one, and that, although he and those around him were rich, the general population—one in a transitional stage from pastoral to agricultural—was not. The cost of the superb buildings erected for himself and his dependants, added to the provisioning of a household containing many thousands of persons, the supply of what was required besides food to gratify the desires of his wives and concubines, and the expenditure on his splendid pageants, must have been an enormous burden on his subjects. No truly wise king would have persisted in such a policy. The natural result of it was just what actually happened. Whatever Judah thought, all Israel felt his yoke to have been intolerable; and when his son refused to lighten it, cried out, 'What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David' (1 K 12[16]). Solomon was responsible for the disruption of the united kingdom of Israel and Judah, and for the consequences of it. That disruption, which led to the loss of the independence of both, was the natural result of the policy on which he acted throughout a forty years' reign.

12. The foregoing observations raise the question, What really was the wisdom which the Biblical historians attributed to Solomon? Certainly it was not wisdom in the higher significations in which the term is used either in the OT or the NT. There is teaching in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and a few of the Psalms as to a

'wisdom' which is nowhere in Scripture attributed to Solomon. The wisdom of Solomon as described either in Kings or Chron. has very little in common with the wisdom inculcated by St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. James. Further, in what the Biblical writers say of the wisdom of Solomon there is nothing which implies that it included any of the supernatural attainments attributed to him in Jewish, Arabian, and Persian traditions, or even of any scientific or philosophic knowledge properly so called.* And it must be added, that although they ascribe his 'wisdom' to God, a gift in answer to prayer, they do not represent piety—the fear and love of God—as a prominent feature in his 'wisdom.' While declaring him to be the wisest of all men, they do not represent him as an especially devout or righteous man. In that respect David, notwithstanding his many defects and crimes, was regarded by them as far superior to him. So much, then, as to what the wisdom of Solomon was not. As to what it was, it comprehended at least the following elements:—(a) Possession of the qualities of mind—the quickness and accuracy of discernment and the practical sagacity—which are most indispensable to one who constantly requires to decide readily and correctly on which side truth and justice lie in disputed cases. Those qualities were of the utmost importance to a Hebrew king. Judicial functions had been the chief function of the 'judges,' and continued to be so of the kings. The king was the chief justice of the realm. David in his later years had been blamed for neglecting his judicial duties. The prayer of his son, on his accession to the throne, was for the knowledge and wisdom which would qualify him for the fulfilment of those duties. The judgment which he pronounced on the dispute between the two harlots was regarded by the people as evidence that his prayer had been granted. Seeking justice was by the Hebrews held to be sacred, inasmuch as it involved 'inquiry of God.' Almost all the Oriental legends regarding Solomon's wisdom which are not utterly extravagant are those which give the same kind of instances. An excellent and able judge, however, may not be an eminently good and wise man. He may be sadly lacking in true wisdom. (b) Possession of comparatively extensive knowledge and varied culture for a man of the time in which he lived. That Solomon was widely observant and inquisitive, interested in all that came under his notice and was likely to add to his knowledge, and that he could talk instructively on a great variety of subjects,—on trees and plants, beasts and fowls, creeping things and fishes, etc.,—must be admitted. 'The largeness of heart (rōhabh lēbh), even as the sand that is on the seashore,' ascribed to him in 1 K 4^{29} [Heb. 5^{9}], means merely, if properly understood, a comprehensiveness of mind, a many-sidedness of intelligence, of great and indefinite extent. There is nothing exaggerated or incredible in the phrase, which may perhaps have suggested what has been so finely said of Plato: 'His pliant genius sits close to universal reality, like the sea which fits into all the sinuosities of the land. Not a shore of thought was left untouched by his murmuring lip' (Ferrier, Inst. Met. p. 165). The wisdom of Solomon was wisdom at a very different stage from the wisdom of Socrates or Plato; but they may have been alike in implying 'largeness of heart,' universality of intellectual interests and activity. (c) There have also to be included in the wisdom of Solomon skill in propounding and solving riddles, in putting and answering hard and abstruse questions, and the faculty of expressing himself in mĕshālîm, similitudes and parables, and proverbial or gnomic sentences which sum up in a pithy and memorable form the findings of prudential sagacity and moral reflexion. 1 K 4^{32} states that he 'spake three thousand proverbs.' One reason given for the visit of the queen of Sheba to his court was her desire to test the report which she had heard of him by 'proving him with hard questions.' The Phœnician historians quoted by Josephus (Ant. VIII. v. 3) relate that the Hebrew and the Tyrian king entered into a contest to determine which of them could solve riddles best, and that the former was at first successful, and won largely from his opponent, until the latter got the assistance of a very acute youth called Abdemon, when Solomon was always defeated, and had to pay much money back to Hiram (see art. RIDDLE). In the time of Solomon, Israel passed from its heroic and imaginative age into a positive and practical one, resembling the stage in Hellenic history in which originated the practical maxims of the Greek 'sages' and the verses of the Greek 'gnomic' poets. The result in Israel was the rise of a new way of thinking and the beginnings of a new kind of literature, the whole development of which must have been greatly influenced by the character and reign of Solomon. How much, if anything, he personally contributed by speech or writing to the 'Wisdom literature' we do not know, and yet perhaps the whole of it, Biblical and Apocryphal, may be not inappropriately termed Solomonic. At the same time no one has probably been so overpraised for 'wisdom' as he, and that alike by Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians.* See, further, art. WISDOM.

13. Solomon is represented as excelling all contemporary kings in wealth as well as in wisdom. His father is said to have left him for building the temple 'one hundred thousand talents of gold and a thousand thousand talents of silver' (1 Ch 22^{14}), a sum calculated to be equivalent to £1,025,000,000 sterling.† His annual revenue in money is stated (1 K 10^{14}, 2 Ch 9^{13}) to have amounted to 666 talents of gold, equal to £4,095,900 (see art. MONEY, vol. iii. p. 420^{b}); and besides payments in money he received large payments in kind, both from his own subjects and from foreigners. Hence he was able to spend vast sums in luxury and display. His great ivory throne, which came to figure so largely in Oriental tradition, was overlaid with pure gold; the shields of his bodyguard and the utensils of his palace

* The knowledge of the language of birds attributed to Solomon in Jewish, Arabic, and Persian traditions was in Greek mythology ascribed to Tiresias. The Rabbis represented Solomon as the originator of the science and philosophy of the Greeks, Romans, and their successors. Aristotle was supposed to have gained his knowledge of natural history by appropriating Solomon's MSS when Alexander entered Alexandria. The Spanish theologian J. de Pineda, in lib. iii. pp. 111–208 of his De Rebus Salomonis, attributes to him mathematical, physical, astronomical, botanical, economic, ethical, and political writings, as well as many scientific discoveries. Theophilus Gale, Phil. Gener. § 8, maintains that Pythagoras and Plato got their symbolical and the Stoics their ethical philosophy, Hippocrates his knowledge of medicine, Aristotle of animals, and Theophrastus of plants—ex Salomonis schola. How greatly exaggerated, down even to recent times, has been his knowledge of theology may he learned from many of the commentaries published on the 'Song of Solomon,' and even from the 'headings' of our AV of that book.

* For an admirable comparative study of Hebrew and Greek proverbial literature see H. Bois, La Poésie Gnomique chez les Hebreux et les Grecs: Salomon et Theognis, Toulouse, 1866. A careful comparative study of Hebrew and Egyptian proverbial wisdom is a great desideratum. Wisdom books akin to the Proverbs of the OT, and partly to Ecclesiastes, were produced in Egypt from about B.C. 3500 until about A.D. 200. It cannot reasonably be supposed that in the age of Solomon they were wholly unknown to the Hebrews. The sayings in the oldest of them — the Instructions or Maxims of Ptahhotep — often strikingly resemble those in Proverbs. Before and during the reign of Solomon Egypt was open both to Greeks and Jews. It does not follow that any of the Hebrew Wisdom books were composed in the time of Solomon.

† Prideaux's estimate, long generally accepted, was considerably less, viz. £833,000,000. Yet he added, 'the sum is so prodigious, as to give reason to think that the talents whereby the sum is reckoned were another sort of talents of a far less value than the Mosaic talents, of which an account is given in the preface' (Old and New Testament Connected, p. 5).

were all of gold. Silver, we are told, was nothing accounted of in his days; he made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones. Such is the account given us of his wealth. What are we to think of it? The statement as to the sum amassed by David for the building of the temple is, of course, incredibly large. The amount of annual revenue assigned to Solomon is not so, although very large. Probably it may have been his income merely for an exceptional year or years. That he was the wealthiest king known to his Hebrew contemporaries may well be believed. But even what is said of his wealth in Kings and Chron. suggests that he was only rich after the fashion of Oriental kings. His golden targes, golden utensils, and throne overlaid with gold, seem to imply that he could find little productive use for his gold. Gold came into circulation as money among the Hebrews only in the time of David, and probably it was little used by them as such in the time of Solomon. Various peoples have passed through a stage in which a pound of gold was willingly exchanged for a pound of silver or even of copper. The Shahs of Persia and Emirs of Scinde were not wealthier than are European monarchs, although they had, as a rule, vastly more treasure in the form of jewels and the precious metals. The value of the material of money depends largely on its purchasing power and rapidity of circulation. Had Solomon's silver, and still more had his gold, much of either? It is not likely that they had. Although he may have made silver as stones 'in Jerusalem,' there is nothing to indicate that it was plentiful outside of Jerusalem. There was gold in abundance at the court and among the king's officers and favourites, but there is no evidence of its having reached the farmers and peasants of Palestine. Probably in the form of money most of it got into the hands of the Phœnicians and other foreign traders. By the great extension of the royal domains during his reign, Solomon must have increased his real wealth more than by the importation of gold; but such enrichment of himself implied the impoverishment of his subjects, and that in a country of very small extent, and of which the real prosperity mainly depended on agriculture. The money spent on magnificent buildings must have been to a large extent wasted. We may believe, therefore, almost all that we are told about the wealth of Solomon, and yet believe also that even his economic policy was foolish, and tended to national bankruptcy and the ruin of his dynasty.

14. Closely connected with the wisdom and wealth of Solomon was his 'fame' and 'glory.' The 'fame' of Solomon denoted by the Hebrew words shēm (1 K 4^{31}), shĕmûʿah (1 K 10^{7}, 2 Ch 9^{6}), and shēmaʿ (1 K 10^{1}, 2 Ch 9^{1}),—name, hearing, report,—was, like all fame, an external thing, 'a fancied life in others' breath.' The 'glory' of Solomon, although denoted in the NT by the same term (doxa) as 'the glory of the Son of Man,' was a very different kind of glory. It was not glory of the highest order, the glory of essential excellence, but a superficial glory attainable by striving after effect, by the lavish display and expenditure of wealth, by showy talents, by courting popularity, and the like. The glory which Solomon sought for he obtained in an extraordinary measure in his lifetime, and it grew in the course of ages to the most extravagant proportion. Orientals are fond of display and pomp, and doubtless, at least for a lengthened period, Solomon, with his good disposition and brilliant gifts and conspicuous success, must have seemed to his subjects an almost ideal king. He gave Israel a place among the nations which it had never previously held, secured to it peace and prosperity, perfected its organization and administration, and so transformed, adorned, and enriched Jerusalem as to make it appear the central city, the joy and pride of the whole earth. Not only to the Hebrews but to all the peoples of the Semitic world he must have seemed the foremost monarch of the age. His intellectual gifts and acquisitions were so displayed as to cause him to be regarded as a paragon of wisdom, one whose knowledge and judgment had never been equalled, a sage and ruler superior to all others on the earth. Hence we are told many princes and renowned men came from afar to visit him, to see the grandeur of his court, to hear the wisdom of his words, and to pay him homage and present him with gifts. Of all his visitors, the queen of SHEBA naturally made the greatest impression. She was a much more exalted personage than the princes and sheikhs with whom the Israelites were familiar. She came from 'the uttermost parts of the earth' (Mt 12^{42}); came in high state 'with a very great train with camels that bare incense and very much gold and precious stones' (1 K 10^{2}); came, it would appear, attracted purely by the fame of the wisdom, and especially of the religious wisdom, of Solomon; and departed leaving magnificent gifts, confessing that what she had heard was not half of what she had found to be true, and thanking and blessing the God of Israel.

The above is, in substance, all that is related of the famous visit of the Sabæan queen to Solomon; and it is also the origin and basis of all that has been fabled about herself and her visit by the Rabbis, Arabs, Persians, and Abyssinians. Many modern critics pronounce even the Biblical account of it (1 K 10^{1-13}, repeated in 2 Ch 9^{1-12}) to be manifestly legendary. And it may be a legend. There is no historical evidence to the contrary except the clear and positive statement made by Kings. But it is certainly not manifestly legendary. Wellhausen, Stade, Klostermann, Benzinger, and other eminent critics all content themselves with mere assertion to that effect.

The fame of the glory of Solomon was largely posthumous. Great as it was among his contemporaries, the whole course of subsequent Hebrew history tended to increase it. After his reign the Hebrew people passed through stages of humiliation and affliction while clinging tenaciously to the belief that they were God's elect and had a glorious future before them. To endure the present, they were always providentially constrained to magnify the past. The more they sank, the more they comforted themselves by thinking of what they had been and imagining what they could be. And the age of Solomon was the golden age of their history, and Solomon himself their most brilliant and renowned king. Hence there was in the OT an idealization of kingship founded on the character of the personality, life, and reign of Solomon, and impelled and guided by a truly Divine inspiration which has been of immense significance to the world. It forms a large and precious portion of Messianic prophecy. The initial impulse to the close connexion of Solomon with it may, perhaps, have been Nathan's promise to David (2 S 7^{11-16} and 1 Ch 17^{10-14}) that J″ would raise up to him a seed that should build up the house of the Lord, and whose kingdom and throne would be established for ever. As soon, however, as we go further we find ourselves in an altogether unreal world. Jewish Rabbis indulged in the most extravagant exaggerations as to the gifts and glory of Solomon. Christian writers followed suit, and showed themselves almost as credulous and inventive.

15. Religion of Solomon.—The Biblical historiographers who have treated of the reign of Solomon regarded him as having fallen far short of his father in piety. While pronouncing David a man according to God's own heart (1 S 12^{14}, 1 K $11^{33.38}$), they have so spoken of Solomon's death (1 K 11^{43}, 2 Ch 9^{31}) as to have given rise to a long controversy among the Church Fathers as to his salvation.*

---

* St. Augustine and the Latin Fathers generally pronounced against, and St. Chrysostom and the Greek Fathers in favour of, belief in his salvation. Calmet, in his Dict., s.v. 'Salomon, Nouvelle Dissert. de la salut du Salomon,' has collected the opinions. Dante unites him in Paradise with the four great schoolmen, and makes Aquinas thus describe him:—

> 'The fifth light,
> Goodliest of all, is by such love inspired,
> That all your world craves tidings of his doom:
> Within there is the lofty light, endowed
> With sapience so profound, if truth be truth,
> That with a ken of such wide amplitude
> No second has arisen.'
> —Par. x. 108-114 (Cary's tr.)

The third line is the rendering of Dante's:

> 'Che tutto il mondo
> Laggiù ne gola di saper novella.'

Now, that Solomon's piety was not so warm and intense as David's is what no one will question, yet that it was in some respects superior may well be maintained, and can even scarcely be denied by any one who attempts to judge of David and Solomon from a Christian standpoint. With good gifts and great qualities, David had terrible defects. While intensely real, his faith in J″ was comparatively crude and unenlightened. Hence his piety was compatible with such horrid deeds as his conduct towards Uriah, his allowing the innocent sons of Saul to be 'hung up unto the Lord in Gibeon' (2 S $21^{6.9}$), and his ruthless treatment of the Moabites (2 S 8^2) and Ammonites (2 S 12^{31}).

The memory of Solomon is unstained by such acts. His faith in J″, however otherwise inferior to David's, was so much more rational and ethical as to save him from much which David did. He too had faith in J″, but a considerably different faith, and one implying a higher and worthier conception of J″. The general tendency of his reign was towards spiritual enlightenment. The Solomonic age was not one of spiritual decadence on the whole, but a distinct spiritual advance in important respects on the age of the 'judges' and of the first two kings; and doubtless Solomon contributed more to its being so than any other person. The interest of revelation required a Solomon as well as a Samuel, Saul, or David. David's significance as a king in relation to the Messiah was as a victorious warrior; Solomon's as the prince of peace—no inferior honour. There is no warrant for reckoning Solomon among the sceptics. The son of David could not fail to have been taught to revere and honour J″. The commencement of his reign was marked by a display of ardent piety towards J″, and the expression of humble dependence on His guidance. Throughout his reign he acted as temporal head of the Hebrew theocracy, as chief of the ministers of J″ in Israel. He delighted in the offices of Divine worship. Some have denied, but without apparent proof, that he took part in what have been called distinctly priestly acts—slaying the victims and offering incense. All the other acts of worship—all those which the Hebrew prophets deemed most sacred and spiritual — he is clearly recorded to have performed. In connexion with the building of the temple, he showed his anxiety to render to J″ a worthy expression of gratitude for His kindness towards David and himself. His prayer at the dedication of the temple, the substantial authenticity of which there seems to be no reason to doubt, is one of the grandest devotional utterances to be found in pre-Christian devotional literature.

Solomon evidently desired to render the service in the temple beautiful and impressive, the temple itself the chief and central sanctuary in the land, and Jerusalem not only the royal residence and national capital, but the holy city. He thereby, however, displeased those who disliked changes in religion and preferred the old simplicity and rudeness of worship to innovations. They included probably most of the uncultured tribesmen of the north. The seer AHIJAH was at their head. They may have had a considerable amount of truth and reason as well as piety on their side, but not more than the innovators—Solomon, the priests, and all others who were in favour of progress. The changes introduced by Solomon tended to further the spiritual education of the Jewish people, to suggest to receptive minds among them larger and worthier thoughts of God, and to contribute to the permanence and progressiveness of religion in Israel.

16. Alleged Apostasy of Solomon.—The age of Solomon was in the main one of intellectual liberation and religious enlightenment, although to many of his subjects it may have appeared one of scepticism and impiety. That the king abandoned his faith in J″ and became an idolater is difficult to believe, while it is easy to conceive how the fama to that effect may have arisen. Solomon built altars for his foreign wives, and allowed them to worship their national gods on earth brought from their native lands and in the language and forms of devotion which were familiar and sacred to them. He did not allow them to proselytize or to attempt to act the part which was afterwards played by Jezebel; and it is even very unlikely, seeing that they were all members of his own household, that he permitted either the cruel or the licentious acts sometimes practised in the worship of certain of their deities. But to Ahijah and his partisans toleration of any worship in Israel except that of J″ appeared tantamount to apostasy from J″, and the worship of a strange god. They necessarily saw therefore in Solomon's conduct proof that his heart was turned away from J″ and given to the foreign gods whom he allowed his wives to worship. They judged of it by a crude and immoral conception of J″, while Solomon himself must have seen in it no treason against J″, and believed it to be reasonable and right. The religious toleration granted by him to his wives was an almost inevitable consequence of his policy of alliances with foreign rulers through marriages. There was, however, apparently no opposition given or offence taken by his subjects either to his polygamy or his marriage with foreign women. They seem to have regarded his multitude of wives complacently as a sign of his wealth and grandeur. In his polygamy he only followed the example, and probably the advice, of his father. Nor was his offence marriage with foreign wives, although he is not recorded to have married any of his own subjects. Perhaps few of them would have been considered suitable wives for so great a king, and marriages with them could have had no political advantages. It was his religious toleration per se which was condemned, and held to imply disloyalty to J″ and the worship of other gods.

That he should have been guilty of the apostasy and sin alleged seems incredible and inexplicable on any supposition except one, viz. that his mode of life had left him prematurely worn out both in body and mind, so as to be, even in the fifth decade of his age, in a senile condition, and hardly responsible for his actions. That is little if anything more than a supposition. Yet it seems to be hinted at by the author of 1 K 11^{1-8}, who writes as if willing to excuse and yet unwilling to express himself plainly, when telling us of Solomon's 'cleaving in love to many strange women,' and that 'his heart was turned away after strange gods when he was old' (say over fifty years of age). The erotic element in the Song of Songs, so far as it refers to Solomon, is also, perhaps, in this connexion not to be overlooked. The apocryphal book Sirach, while otherwise glorifying Solomon in the most generous manner, distinctly singles out for condemnation his sensuality as 'what stained his honour and polluted his seed, brought wrath on his children, divided Israel, and made Ephraim a rebel kingdom' (42^{19-23}). The censure was fully deserved. However numerous and attractive may have been the gifts and good qualities of Solomon, he had two great faults—self-love and self-indulgence. He was blind to the claims of self-sacrifice and self-restraint, and hence was no wise man in the highest sense, but merely the wisest fool of his day. His harem may suffice for proof. If his wives and concubines together really amounted to a thousand women, it would seem to have been the largest of which there is any record in history. It was doubtless monstrously large, and 'eunuchs' were among the attendants in it. Yet Solomon had only one son, and that son was Rehoboam—'ample,' as Ben Sira says, 'in foolishness and lacking in understanding, who by his counsel let loose the people' (Sir 47[23]). God's violated law of married love clearly avenged itself on Solomon and condemned his polygamy.

17. Close of Solomon's Career.—Before his death Solomon had largely lost the popularity which he had enjoyed in the earlier years of his reign. He had overtaxed and overburdened his subjects, and made a lavish and wasteful use of the national resources, and the selfishness which led him to do so had defeated its own ends. He had given offence, in a considerable measure, perhaps unnecessary offence, to the prophets and their adherents and to the Ephraimites generally. But the fame he had acquired could not be forgotten, and he had done too much for Israel to be despised or assailed. His reputation was a part, and a large part, of that of the nation. Hence none of his 'adversaries rose against him.' The recollection of what he had been protected him even against his bitterest enemies among the Ephraimites; and Ahijah himself preached the very strange doctrine that God desired Solomon's sins to be overlooked for David's sake, and Rehoboam punished for the transgressions of Solomon (1 K 11[27-36]). But, even although left unmolested, he must surely, when he began to realize that death was not far away, have looked back on his lengthened reign with great dissatisfaction. He had abundant cause for contrition and regret. He had not been a good shepherd of his people. He had sought his own glory far more than their good. He had preferred low aims to high, and could not fail to be conscious thereof. He had impoverished and oppressed large numbers of his subjects. He had not made Israel a thoroughly consolidated nation, as he might and should have done. He had talked wisdom and practised folly. He had through selfishness failed to take advantage of the precious gifts and grand opportunities for usefulness which J" had granted him. He had professed piety and preached righteousness, yet dishonoured God, degraded himself, and set an evil example to others by his luxury and licentiousness. Looking seriously over his past, he could not but realize that, with all its appearance of splendour, it had been essentially, so far as he was concerned, a deplorable failure, a vanity of vanities, whatever might be made of it by an overruling Providence. He may have been spared the misery of foreseeing that immediately on his death his son would be so foolish as to provoke a disruption of the kingdom, and therefore bring innumerable woes both on Judah and on Israel, but he can hardly have failed to forecast that troublous times for the monarchy were approaching. Throughout almost the whole of his reign the relations between Israel and Egypt had been friendly; by the time of his death the Pharaoh Shishak was meditating war, and five years later he captured Jerusalem, plundered Solomon's temple and palace, and left Rehoboam to substitute shields of brass for his father's shields of gold. The disruption of Israel and Judah was fatal to both, and Solomon even more than Rehoboam was responsible for it. It is not surprising, therefore, that both in Kings and Chronicles, when his death is recorded, he should, notwithstanding all the glory he had gained, receive no word of commendation. All that is said is that 'he slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David his father; and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead' (1 K 11[43], 2 Ch 9[31]).

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (עַבְדֵי שְׁלֹמֹה; LXX usually δοῦλοι Σαλωμών [but see ad fin.]).—In the two lists of exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon with Zerubbabel, the sons of Solomon's servants are first mentioned immediately after the Nethinim (Ezr 2[55-57], Neh 7[57-59]), and then included with them, as though they were subdivisions of the same class: 'All the Nethinim, and the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred and ninety-two' (Ezr 2[58], Neh 7[60]). At Neh 10[28] the sons of Solomon's servants appear to be included amongst the Nethinim. At Neh 11[3] they are again mentioned along with them; but the parallel list of 1 Ch 9[2] contents itself with using the more familiar of the two titles, as though the person who inserted this list did not distinguish between Nethinim and sons of Solomon's servants. As to their position and functions it will therefore be sufficient to refer to art. NETHINIM.

It is clear from Ezk 44[8f.] that non-Israelites were employed for many menial duties connected with the temple service. The caste of foreigners thus referred to may have originated from the body of forced labourers whom Solomon is said to have used in building the temple and other structures (1 K 9[20. 21]). These would not unnaturally be called Solomon's slaves or servants. After the temple was finished, some of them might be retained for the inferior offices of the house of God, and the title originally bestowed on them would cling to them. In succeeding generations the composition of the class would vary from a number of causes: some families would die out, others would be added from prisoners of war and other sources. Nor is there any difficulty in conceiving of them as holding together in the Exile. We can readily imagine members of the minor orders in the Roman Catholic Church doing so in like circumstances. Torrey (Comp. and Hist. Value of Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 40) thinks that the mention of them is simply an instance of the Chronicler's determination to connect every institution belonging to his own day with David and Solomon. But it may fairly be argued that the very lowliness of the title 'Solomon's slaves' is in favour of its genuineness. No body of men would have been willing to bear it if it had been arbitrarily imposed from without in the days of the second temple. But if it were inherited, the disagreeable connotation would be worn off in the process of time.

The remark made respecting the family names of the Nethinim must be repeated here. They indicate a foreign origin. There can have been only a small number of persons in each of the families, as will be seen by dividing the total number by that of the families. The spelling of the names varies slightly in the two lists, but there is no ground for the distinction Pochereth of Zebaim (Ezr 2[57]) and Pochereth Zebaim (Neh 7[59]) in AV; in both places RV rightly reproduces Pochereth-hazzebaim. The Pesh. differs from MT in two points. At Ezr 2[57]—but not at Neh 7[59]—it gets rid of Solomon's servants entirely, reading ܥܒ̈ܕܝ ܟܗ̈ܢܐ: ܥܒ̈ܕܝ ܦܘܠܚܢܐ; LXX B has υἱοὶ

'Αβδησέλ, v.^{55}, and υἱοὶ 'Αβδησελμά, v.^{58}. At Neh 11^{3} it makes them dwell at Jerusalem, not in the cities of Judah. J. TAYLOR.

SOMEIS (Σομεεΐς, AV Samis), 1 Es 9^{34}=Shimei, Ezr 10^{38}.

SOMETIME, SOMETIMES.—These forms are used indiscriminately in AV, and (except Sir 37^{14}) always in the sense of 'once upon a time,' 'formerly.' The Gr. is always ποτέ. RV changes in every case: in Wis 5^{3}, Col 3^{7}, Tit 3^{3}, 1 P 3^{20} into 'aforetime'; in Eph 2^{13} 5^{8} into 'once'; in Col 1^{21} into 'in time past.' For the indiscriminate spelling, cf. Melvill, Diary, lx., 'He tuik him to rest, and passed ouer that haill day, sum tyme in rest, as it seimed, and sum tymes in paine.' For 'sometime,' meaning 'formerly,' cf. La 1^{1} Cov. 'Alas, how sitteth the cite so desolate, yt some tyme was full of people?'; and for 'sometimes,' Shaks. Rich. II. I. ii. 54, 'Thy sometimes brother's wife.' Abbott (Shaks. Gram. p. 51) thinks this is the meaning also in Merch. of Venice, I. i. 163—

> 'Sometimes from her eyes
> I did receive fair speechless messages.'

In the mod. sense of 'occasionally' the only example in AV is Sir 37^{14} (Gr. ἐνίοτε). But that meaning was quite common at the time. Thus Elyot, Governour, ii. 225, 'Some tyme it [fides] may be called faythe, some tyme credence, other whyles truste'; Tindale, Expos. 30, 'Centurion is a captain of a hundred men; whom I call sometime a centurion, but for the most part a hunder-captain.' I. THE OLD TESTAMENT AND JEWISH WRITINGS.—The history of the term 'Son of God' in the pre-Christian period is the history of a gradual heightening and concentration of meaning in connexion with the culminating point of biblical revelation. The use of the term is at first rather poetic or rhetorical than in the strict sense theological. It is applied to a number of objects in such a way as to invest them with a special dignity and value, or to hint at a special relation of nearness and appreciation on the part of God; but it did not denote any essential partaking in the Divine nature. Only in Christian times does this latter sense come to attach to it.

1. OLD TESTAMENT.—In OT the phrase, or something like it, is used of angels, of human judges, of the theocratic king, of the theocratic people, and of the Messiah. It is this last use which is taken up and further developed in Christianity.

(a) In the first passage that meets us, Gn $6^{2\cdot 4}$ (ascribed to the 9th cent. document J), the term is applied to the race of demigods or angelic beings which is conceived as existing before the Flood.

This passage proved rather a stumbling-block to the later Jewish exegesis, and was variously explained. The main body of Septuagint MSS (א B are not extant) tr. literally οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ θεοῦ (so also Theodotion). A group, including A, paraphrases this (in v.^{2} but not in v.^{4}) as οἱ ἄγγελοι. Aquila tr. still more literally οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν θεῶν, leaving an opening, as it would seem, for some such sense as that given in the next paragraph. Symm. interprets less equivocally οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν δυναστευόντων, as though the reference was to the profligate sons of the upper or ruling classes. So most Jewish commentators; some, however, with Field (Hexapla, i. 22), make the 'sons of God'=the descendants of Seth, and the 'daughters of men'=the descendants of Cain. But there can be little doubt that the sense is as in Job 1^{6} 2^{1} 38^{7}; cf. Ps 29^{1} 89^{6}, and Dn 3^{25}.

(b) In one remarkable verse the title seems to be applied to judges or rulers (Ps 82^{6}), 'I said, Ye are gods; and all of you sons of the Most High' (cf. v.^{1}; also Jn 10^{34}). And in a number of places 'judges' are in some way or other equated with 'gods' (Ex 21^{6} RVm and AV, $22^{8\cdot 9}$ RVm and AV, 1 S 2^{25} RVm and AV; in all these places 'God' in RV is lit. 'gods,' 'ĕlōhîm, according to the familiar idiom).

The origin of this latter usage is not quite clear. It appears to be connected with the fact that judicial or quasi-judicial decisions were given in early times in the form of oracles at some sacred place and in the name of the deity.

It is a further question whether or how far Ps 82^{6} was suggested by this usage. That it was so suggested was the older view; and Duhm (e.g.) still explains of the Hasmonæan princes; Baethgen, of heathen rulers. But some recent writers, not without precursors in the earlier days of criticism, take more literally: e.g. Cheyne, of the 'patron angels' of oppressive heathen nations; Wellhausen (ad loc.) and Smend (AT Theol. p. 394 ff.), of the gods of these nations. Most commentators compare Ps 58, reading 'O ye gods' in v.^{1}.

(c) Of more importance, and indeed on the direct line of Messianic promises, is the designation as applied to the theocratic king. For this the leading passage is the assurance given by Nathan to David, 'I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son' (2 S 7^{14}). Many other places point back to this, esp. Ps $89^{26\cdot 27}$. But these will meet us again under (e).

(d) Closely associated with the application to the theocratic king is that to the theocratic people. For this we go back primarily to Ex 4^{22} 'Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, my firstborn,'—an announcement that seems to have been present to the mind of the prophet Hosea when he wrote, 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (Hos 11^{1}).

(e) If the title 'son' is given both to the theocratic king and to the theocratic people where these are clearly distinguished from each other, still more inevitable was it that the same title would belong to them when the two ideas coalesce into one, as they do in the passages that may be called more directly Messianic. Conspicuous among these are Pss 89 and 2.

Ps 89.—This psalm is based upon the promises of 2 S 7, but also in v.^{27} clearly takes up Ex 4^{22}. Hence, while it is agreed that both king and people are in view, opinions differ somewhat as to the degree of prominence to be assigned to each. Cheyne (Comm. on v.^{39}) has 'no doubt that the Davidic king (or rather 'the Davidic royalty') is meant.' But 'the Davidic house has long been overthrown, and the fate of the nation has a more practical interest for the writer, whose description partly fits the king, partly the people, now become the heir of the old Davidic promises.' In OP p. 118 he pronounces more decidedly for the 'post-exile Jewish Church' in the Persian period (Artaxerxes II. and III.). Strack points out a close resemblance to the state of things under Josiah; Duhm, to that under Alexander Jannæus (c. 88 B.C.). Wellhausen, like Cheyne, explains of the community, which 'in the history of the theocracy succeeded to the place formerly occupied by the kings.'

Ps 2.—Even more central in its bearing upon the history of Christian thought is Ps 2, esp. v.^{7b} 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee'; i.e. from the day of thine enthronement I have adopted thee for my own son. Opinion is leaning rather more than it did to the view expressed by Cheyne, that this psalm has not 'a contemporary historical reference' (Cheyne himself thinks that the writer 'throws himself back' into the age of David or Solomon, to which, according to Strack, he belongs). What might be called the most modern view is concisely stated by Wellhausen (PB, 'Psalms,' ad loc.): 'The Messiah is the speaker, and the whole psalm is composed in His name. It is not merely the hopes concerning the future to which he gives expression; it is the claims to world-wide dominion already cherished by the Jewish Theocracy. All the heathen are destined to obey the Jews; if they fail to do so, they are rebels. The Messiah is the incarnation of Israel's universal rule. He and Israel are almost identical, and it matters little whether we say that Israel has or is the Messiah. . . . On the day when JHVH founded the Theocracy, He gave it the right to unlimited earthly dominion. This right is involved in the very idea of the Theocracy. Zion, as being the seat of the Divine rule, is, ipso facto, the seat of universal rule.'

It will be seen how the most advanced science of our time is by degrees giving back a full equivalent for the old naïve conception that would make the passages above quoted direct unmediated predictions of the personal Messiah. As applied to the Messiah these prophecies are not unmediated. The steps are one thing, the shrine to which they lead is another. The Scriptures of which we have been speaking mark so many separate contributions to the total result; but the result, when it is attained, has the completeness of an organic whole. A Figure was created — projected as it were upon the clouds—which was invested with all the attributes of a person. And the minds of men were turned towards it in an attitude of expectation. It makes no matter that the lines of this Figure are drawn from different originals. They meet at last in a single portraiture. And we should never have known how perfectly they meet if we had not had the NT picture to compare with that of OT. The most literal fulfilment of prediction would not be more conclusive proof that all the course of the world and all the threads of history are in one guiding Hand.

2. JEWISH WRITINGS.—Ps 2, as it has been rightly observed, stands at the head of a long line of subsequent development. The conception of the Messiah as also 'Son' became a fixed part of the tradition, not perhaps quite so widely extended as might have been expected,—it does not figure at all largely in the Talmud,—and yet sufficiently attested in those forms of Judaism which present the nearest affinities to Christianity.

(i.) The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.—The title 'Son' as applied to the Messiah occurs only once in the Book of Enoch (105^2) in a passage the origin and date of which are uncertain. It does not occur at all in Apoc. of Baruch. But in 4 Ezra (2 Esdras) it seems to be fairly well established. This book is lost in the original (Gr. or Heb. ?), but is preserved in no fewer than five versions, Lat., Syr., Æth., Arab. (two forms), Arm., which are commonly supposed to rank in this order, though the subject has not yet been thoroughly investigated.

The text printed in our Bibles is from the Latin. In $7^{28.\,29}$ this version has evidently passed through Christian hands; Syr. has twice and Arab. once 'my Son Messiah,' Æth. once 'my Servant Messiah' (perhaps = παῖς), and Arm. once 'the Messiah of God.' From this rough statement, which can hardly be pursued into close detail, it will be seen that there is some doubt. In 13^{32} and ^{37} Lat. Syr. Arab., and in 13^{52} Lat. Syr. identically, and Æth. Arab. approximately, all have 'Son,' which, however, does not appear in the Armenian. A like relation is found in 14^9, where Lat. Syr. Æth. codd. Arab. have 'Son'; Æth. codd. 'sons,' while Arm. drops and paraphrases. The edd., including Hilgenfeld and Gunkel in Kautzsch, Apokr. u. Pseudepig. d. AT, read 'Son' in all these places; but the reading cannot be regarded as quite secure (cf. Drummond, Jewish Messiah, pp. 285–288).

The strongly Messianic passage in Ps-Sol $17^{23\text{-}51}$ has not the title 'Son,' but clearly borrows from Ps 2 in v.^{26}.

(ii). The Talmud.—Apart from the above instances there is not much evidence for the Messianic interpretation of Ps 2 in the Rabbinic literature. Dalman (Worte Jesu, p. 222) gives three examples of this, one dating c. 240 and another c. 350 A.D.

Two other comments quoted by him are of some interest. The Midrash on Ps 2^{12} concludes thus: 'To whom is this like? To a king who is wroth with his subjects, and the subjects go and make their peace with the king's son, that he may make peace for them. Then when the subjects go to give thanks to the king, he saith to them: Would ye give thanks to me? Go and give them to my son; since, but for him, I should long ago have blotted out the people. So saith God to the nations of the world when they would give thanks to him. Go thank the children of Israel, for without them ye would not have continued for a single hour.'

A late comment in Midr. Tehill. ii. 7 is expressly directed against the Christian interpretation: 'From this passage (Ps 2^7) an answer may be given to the Minim (Christians) who say the Holy One—blessed be He—has a Son, and thou canst reply to them: it does not mean "A Son art Thou to Me," hut "Thou art My Son"; like a servant whom his master encourages by saying to him, "I love thee as my son!"' Although this is set down as 'very late,' it is just the interpretation that would be natural to a Jew.

II. THE NEW TESTAMENT.—In passing over to NT it is important to observe that we should not form an adequate conception of the significance of the title 'Son of God' if we were to confine ourselves to the use of that title alone. It is true that it occurs in some central passages, and true that in these passages the phrase is invested with great depth of meaning. But we should not adequately appreciate this depth, and still less should we understand the mass and volume of NT teaching on this head, if we did not directly connect with the explicit references to the 'Son of God' that other long series of references to God as pre-eminently 'the Father,' and to Christ as pre-eminently 'the Son.' These two lines of usage are really convergent. And we must first consider them separately before we bring them together. It has seemed best first to collect and sift the evidence before seeking to penetrate further into its meaning.

1. THE GOSPELS.—(a) Use of the term 'Son of God.'—The use of this term is perhaps more sparing than we might suppose. And the number of instances on which we can really lay stress will be found to shrink somewhat on examination.

(i.) Incidental uses.—Only in the Fourth Gospel (5^{25} 9^{35} [var. lect.] 10^{36} 11^4) is the title 'Son of God' used by our Lord expressly of Himself. And although three at least of the places in which it is described as used of Him are of salient importance, this is not the case with others. Instances like Mk 1^1 (where the reading is also not quite certain), Jn 3^{18} 20^{31} belong to the evangelists, and are therefore evidence for a later stage of belief than that of the narrative. And we must allow for the possibility that to this later stage are really to be assigned words such as those ascribed to the Baptist in Jn 1^{34} and to Nathanael in Jn 1^{49}. Nor can we be too confident as to the exact wording of the discourses or sayings in Jn 3^{18} 5^{25} 9^{35} [v.l.] 10^{36} 11^4. St. John, even more than the other evangelists, was so intensely absorbed in his own belief in the Godhead of Christ that it was natural to him to antedate expressions which really would be exceptional at the time to which they are referred. Even in the First Gospel (Mt 14^{33} 26^{63}) the absence of the phrase from the Synoptic parallels must cast some doubt upon its originality.

On the other hand, in the cases of the demoniacs (Mk 3^{11} ‖ 5^7 ‖) and of the centurion at the Cross (Mk 15^{39} ‖) the attestation indeed is excellent, but we cannot deduce anything very tangible (see below, 3 (a)).

(ii.) St. Peter's Confession.—We cannot be surprised if by an application of similar critical methods some scholars (e.g. Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 224) should also cancel the phrase in the more important connexion of Mt 16^{16}. Here, in the version of Matthew, Peter's confession runs: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'; where Mark has only, 'Thou art the Christ,' and Luke 'The Christ of God.' And no doubt it follows from this that the Marcan document had no more than our present Gospel. Still this passage is not really on all fours with the others that have come before us. For the context clearly proves that Matthew had before him some further tradition, possibly that of the Logia, but in any case a tradition that has the look of being original. Whether this originality extends to the whole phrase may be more than we could assert positively, but to the present writer it appears to be probable that it does. We should more easily understand the apostolic use of the title 'Son of God' if there had been precedents for it on important occasions like this, when it is represented as receiving the sanction of Christ Himself. The whole phrase as it stands, including the epithet 'living God,' calls up such a host of OT associations, and at one step sets the confession so conspicuously in its place amid the whole series of biblical revelations, that we may be loth to let it go.

(iii.) The voice from heaven at the Baptism and Transfiguration.—The next two places that we have to deal with are encircled, like the last, with critical considerations. It may be well first to state the textual facts, so that the reader may have the evidence fully before him.

Mk 9^7 καὶ ἐγένετο φωνὴ ἐκ τῆς νεφέλης· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητος, ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ.

Lk 9^{35} καὶ φωνὴ ἐγένετο ἐκ τῆς νεφέλης λέγουσα· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἐκλελεγμένος, αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε.

We may also compare Ac 13^{33} . . . ἀναστήσας Ἰησοῦν, ὡς καὶ ἐν τῷ ψαλμῷ γέγραπται τῷ δευτέρῳ (v.l. ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ ψαλμῷ γέγρ.)· Υἱός μου εἶ σύ, ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε. Cf. He 1^5 5^5.

The main question here is as to the reading of Lk 3^{22}: ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε is clearly Western, with strong Latin support, though even here the whole family is not included, e f going the other way; the absence of Syriac evidence is also important. The natural inference would be that the reading, although, no doubt, very ancient, was not really primitive. And when we think how strong the temptation would be to assimilate the text of the Gospel to that of the psalm, and how readily this latter text would fall in with ideas that are known to have been current in the 2nd cent., the presumption against its originality is increased. In any case Luke is the only Gospel affected. The agreement of Matthew and Mark is sufficient guarantee that the reading found in them was found also in the common Synop. document. Luke can at most represent only a separate tradition, which hardly in this instance carries with it so much weight as the others.

If the common reading is to be preferred, then the first half of the words presents a coincidence with Ps 2^7, the second half with Is 42^1. The words heard at the Transfiguration also present a general resemblance to Ps 2. That psalm is directly quoted in Acts and Hebrews.

β. The nature of the Manifestations.—It is characteristic of the OT prophets that the revelations made to them sometimes took the form of remarkable sights and sometimes of remarkable sounds. At least these are the terms in which they are described to us; what exactly were the psychological phenomena corresponding it is beyond our power to say. They belong to the peculiar experience of the Hebrew prophets. The Jewish notions about the Bath Ḳôl are an extension of the same idea (Weber, Jüd. Theol.^{3} p. 194 f.).

It is natural to suppose that the manifestations at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration were similar in kind. It is possible that they were known only to Jesus Himself, perhaps in the one case also to the Baptist, and in the other to one or more of the apostles who possessed the prophetic endowment. Through such a channel as this the Divine approval of the Son was in all probability communicated to men. The significance of this Divine testimony will come before us later.

(b) The correlative terms 'Father' and 'Son.'—We are told (Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 156) that it is contrary to Jewish usage to speak of God as 'Father' absolutely without some such addition as 'who is in heaven.' The only exceptions occur in prayers. It also appears that great care and reserve were used in the application of this title generally. The Targums, where they have occasion to refer to it, adopt a paraphrase.

In this respect the Gospels show a marked contrast. Our Lord does, indeed, make use of the Jewish form (which is found most frequently in Matthew, but cf. also Mk 11^{26}, Lk 11^{13}); and it is probable enough that the real instances of this use may have been more numerous than would appear from our Gospels.

At the same time the Christian use goes far beyond the Jewish limitations. And besides the general use as applied to the disciples, there is a special use in which our Lord reserves it in a peculiar manner to Himself. He nowhere speaks of 'our Father,' numbering Himself with His followers. The Lord's Prayer is not an exception, because it is a form prescribed to the disciples, and constructed entirely for them. The prayers of the Son to the Father are different.

On the other hand, our Lord constantly speaks of 'my Father,' whether with (Mt 7^{21} 10^{32} 15^{13} 16^{17} $18^{10.\ 19.\ 35}$) or without addition. And this use apparently goes back even to His childhood (Lk 2^{49}).

The use in question is illustrated in a number of ways. So in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, where the 'beloved son' (Mk 12^6), who is also 'heir,' is distinguished from all other messengers. So again in the parable of the Marriage Feast, which the king makes for his son (Mt 22^2); where, though the parallel in Lk 14^{16} may point to this description as added later, the instance just given would at least show that it lay near at hand; and some further support is given to it by the part played by the 'bridegroom' in the parable of the Ten Virgins.

In any case the whole argument of Mt 17^{25} turns on the distinction between 'son' and 'stranger.' And the point of the discussion about Ps 110^{1} (Mk 12^{35-37}) is just to prove that the Messiah is not 'son of David' in the same sense in which other members of his lineage are spoken of as sons. We shall have occasion to come back to some of these passages presently.

We observe in our Lord's use of the titles 'Father' and 'Son' in connexion with Himself an ascending scale. First, there are the places where He speaks of God as His heavenly Father, or Father in heaven, after ordinary Jewish usage (Mt 7^{21} etc., see above). Then there are the places where He speaks of God as 'my Father' without addition, which are too numerous to need specification. Then we come to a smaller number of passages in which 'the Son' and 'the Father' are at once opposed and associated. And lastly, there are the cases in which mention is made of 'the Father' and 'the Son,' where the correlation is not expressed but implied. The last two classes of passages alone will require some discussion.

The classical passage in the Synoptic Gospels for the correlative use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' is, of course, Mt 11^{27} ||. By the side of this we have Mk 13^{32} || [v.l.] and the important and much debated verse Mt 28^{19}.

Dalman (see pp. 231–235) allows the first of these passages to stand, explaining it as a figurative application of the relation of 'father and son.' The relation of Jesus to Him whom we call 'the Father' is such a relation, and therefore implies mutual knowledge. But the other places, he thinks, bear too close a resemblance to the theological language of the Early Church; and he would set them down, in their present form, to the reflex influence of that language. He questions the use by our Lord Himself of either phrase as a theological term. And this kind of view is, no doubt, widely spread in critical circles.

Now, in the first place, we note that the passages just referred to are not the only evidence for bringing the use in question within the cycle of Synoptic language. We may fairly add to these for this purpose Ac $1^{4.7}$ 2^{33}; for not only is the author of Acts the author also of one of our Synoptic Gospels, but it is probable that these early chapters are based upon a document that is very much upon the same level with the sources used in the Synoptics.

Next, we observe that if the use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' as theological terms belongs to the Early Church, it at least goes back to the very first moment at which we possess contemporary evidence for the vocabulary of that Church, and indeed to a date which is not more than 23 years from the Ascension (see 1 Th 1^{1}). And at the time when we thus first meet with it the use is no novelty, but already firmly and deeply rooted, a thing generally understood in all the Pauline Churches, and, so far as we can see, without any hint of question or dispute beyond their borders. As we shall have to illustrate this more at length in the next section, we need not pursue the point further.

These facts demand an explanation. How are we to account for the rapid growth within some 23 to 26 years of a usage already so fixed and stereotyped? Where is the workshop in which it was fashioned, if it did not descend from Christ Himself? When we think of the way in which the best authenticated records of His teaching lead us up to the very verge of the challenged expressions, it seems altogether an easier step to regard them as the natural continuation of that teaching than to seek their origin wholly outside it. Of the two alternatives the former seems not only in other ways the more satisfactory, but really the easier and the more critical.

2. THE REST OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The same two convergent lines of doctrine may be traced in the rest of the NT as in the Gospels. Here again we have two groups of passages, the one introducing the title 'Son of God,' and the other speaking rather of 'the Father' and 'the Son.' And here again we find the two groups approach and mutually support each other.

The main difference between the Gospels and the rest of the literature is that, whereas we have seen that in the Gospels there is an ascending scale of expression, corresponding to the gradual unfolding of the new conception in the course of the history, in the Epistolary and other books (which though, as writings, for the most part earlier than the Gospels in point of composition, are later than them in the stage of development to which they have reference),—in these books the process reflected in the Gospels is seen as complete. Both titles, or sets of titles, 'Son of God' and 'Father and Son,' have come to represent definite theologumena. Their content is fixed, and carries with it a distinct doctrinal meaning. The climax to which we have been advancing has been reached, and now simply perpetuates itself. The point gained is not lost again.

(a) The title 'Son of God.'—We open the Epistle which stands at the head of the collection in our Bibles, and the state of belief implied in it is revealed to us in the very first verses (Ro 1^{1-4}). We read there that the main subject of the Gospel, or new announcement to mankind, is just this, 'the Son of God.' And the nature of the announcement respecting Him is, that while on one side of His Being He satisfies the conditions expected in the Jewish Messiah by His descent from David, on another side of His Being He is defined or marked out as attaining to a higher designation still. He is nothing less than 'Son of God.' And the incontrovertible proof of His higher nature is to be seen in His victory over death by the Resurrection.

The term 'Son of God' is evidently by this time chosen and established as the standing formula to express what we mean by the Divinity of Christ. If in the OT the term did not necessarily imply Divine origin in the strict sense at all, that state of things has once for all been left behind; and this particular formula has been fixed upon by the Christian consciousness as the shortest and most decisive expression for the proposition in which its whole faith centres.

The inference which we thus draw from the opening verses of Ep. to Romans is confirmed on all hands, and shown to hold good for every branch of the Church. We need not stay to illustrate it further from such passages as Gal 2^{20}, Eph 4^{13} for the Epp. of St. Paul. But Ac 9^{20} shows that to preach 'that Jesus is the Son of God' was a current way of describing the gospel. A like result follows from 1 Jn 3^{8} (where 'the Son of God was manifested' is a name for what was afterwards called 'the Incarnation'), and 1 Jn 4^{15} $5^{5.10.13}$ prove clearly that the confession of Jesus as the Son of God was the cardinal point in the Christian faith. Somewhat more indirectly the same conclusion follows from He 4^{14} 10^{29} and Rev 2^{18} (taking up the description of 1^{13-16}). The Gospel of St. John ($1^{14.18}$) identifies the Only-begotten with the Logos of God.

(b) The titles 'Father' and 'Son.'—In the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel we are in the region of high theology. But the fundamental assumptions of the Epistles (Pauline, Petrine, Johannean, Hebrews) are on the same plane. From the first we have in the greetings of such as begin with greetings frequent reference to the standing correlatives 'the Father' and 'the Son.' There never was a time within the range of this literature when the two correlative terms were not understood and accepted as part of the essential vocabulary of Christianity.

When, therefore, we read in Mt 28^{19} the command to baptize in the name of the Father and the Son, this combination is one proved to have been in common use less than 25 years after the command is said to have been given; and the complete triad is proved to have been recognized very little later.

We repeat that the matured form in which these conceptions are found in the earliest Epistles seems to us abundantly to justify not only the few places in which they enter into the Synoptic Gospels, but, in principle at least, the more numerous places in which they occur in the Gospel that bears the name of St. John (see below, 3 b i).

Note on the use of παῖς θεοῦ.—We must reckon with the possibility that παῖς (θεοῦ) in Ac $3^{13.26}$ $4^{27.30}$ was intended to be taken in the sense of 'Son.' It certainly has this sense in a number of places in the Apostolic Fathers (see below, III. 1). It is, however, more probable that (as in Mt 12^{18}) the earlier writers distinctly have in view the 'Servant of Jehovah' of Is 42^{1} etc. Only when the preaching of the gospel left Jewish ground and began to spread among peoples ignorant of Heb. were the two senses wholly confused. This process, indeed, was rapid; and the effect was so far good that it blended with the conception of Christ as 'Son' a quantity of valuable teaching relating to the 'Servant' which was most truly applicable to Him (though under another name), and which, but for this, might have met with less attention. On the passages in Acts see esp. an excellent note by Knowling on Ac 3^{13}; cf. also what is said by the same writer on 'St. Peter's Discourses,' p. 119 ff.

3. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THESE TITLES.—We have now collected most of the data bearing upon our subject. The next step must be to consider their significance under the different conditions in which we have found the titles used. In other words, we shall have to ask what they really meant, in the fulness of their meaning, (a) for the contemporaries of Jesus, both Jewish and non-Jewish; (b) for Jesus Himself; (c) for the apostles, looking back upon and interpreting them.

(a) For contemporaries, Jewish and non-Jewish.—(i.) The populace.—Not much can be extracted from the witness of the demoniacs (Mk 3^{11} ‖ 5^{7} ‖). If we read into it a higher meaning than the words conveyed to the mind of the speaker, it could only be by assuming a providential action outside the working of ordinary laws. The prophecy of Caiaphas (Jn 11^{49-52}) is perhaps sufficiently parallel to justify us in introducing this; and it is a common belief that, where the human will is most dormant, Divine influences are felt most readily. But, looked at psychologically, the confessions of the demoniacs could not mean more than that they believed themselves to be in the presence of the expected Messiah.

(ii.) The centurion.—In spite of the divergent report of the words of the centurion at the cross in Lk 23^{47}, there can be little doubt that the common source of the Synoptic narrative is rightly reproduced by Mark and Matthew, 'Truly this was the Son of God.' As, however, there is no obvious reason why Luke should have altered this, and as there are other details in the history of the Passion for which he appears to have independent authority, it is possible that another version of the words may have reached him; and that version may have as good a chance of being true as that which competes with it. If the words 'Son of God' were really used, the sense attaching to them would depend to some extent on the nationality of the centurion, in regard to which we are in the dark. Probably what was in his mind would be an undefined feeling of awe, and a consciousness that events were happening that transcended his experience and apprehension.

(iii.) The ruling classes.—The question was directly put to our Lord by the high priest, 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' (Mk 14^{61}). And the assenting answer was treated as blasphemy. Still, it would not follow that this was taken as an assertion of full Divinity. It probably was taken as a claim to be the Messiah. But if the Jews in general thought of the Messiah as superhuman indeed, but not strictly Divine, the high priest (unless it were by such an overruling as we have considered above) is not likely to have meant more than this. The claim might well seem so audacious as to amount to blasphemy even without this aggravation (cf. Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 266), more especially as it includes the prophecy of a second coming as Judge.

(iv.) The disciples.—The highest point of recognition of our Lord's true nature was no doubt reached in St. Peter's confession. We have seen that there is some presumption (the extent of which we would not exaggerate, though it seems to us real) that St. Peter did actually use the words attributed to him by Matthew. If so, 'the Son of the living God' would be stronger still than the more common phrase without the epithet. Not only (as we have suggested) does this at once bring before the mind a whole mass of most central OT teaching, but by the very fact of varying from and adding to the current phrase it prepares us for a variation from and addition to the meaning. 'The Son' is emphatically taken out of the common category of all others who may be described as 'sons.' And, 'the Son of the living God' is as much as to say 'the Son of Jehovah Himself,' the God of Revelation and Redemption, and the expression of His Personal Being. We are on the way towards the ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως of He 1^{3}.

(b) For Jesus Himself.—But the question that concerns us most is, of course, What sense did the title and its equivalents bear for Jesus Himself? And here again we shall have to regard the question from several distinct points of view. We shall do well to look at it, (i.) in the light of our Lord's own filial consciousness; (ii.) in the light of the external testimony borne to Him by the Father; (iii.) with reference to the two distinct things, Messiahship and Divinity; (iv.) and lastly, with reference to the extent to which the Divine Sonship is to be carried back behind the Incarnation.

(i.) The filial consciousness of Jesus.—We have expressed our reluctance to speak too freely of the human consciousness of our Lord (art. JESUS CHRIST, ii. 603). But there can be no question that the central constituent in that consciousness was the complete and unclouded sense of the filial relation, evidenced at once by perfect mutuality of knowledge between the Son and the Father, and perfect submission and response on the part of the Son to the Father's will. On this head it may be said that critics of all shades are agreed (see, e.g., Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 281 f., with numerous authorities quoted on p. 282; also Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 127 ff.).

But, that being so, it is rather strange that the references to this filial relation in the Synoptic Gospels should be so comparatively few. It is indeed implied in the many places in which (as we have seen) Jesus speaks of 'My Father' in a sense peculiar to Himself. But, apart from these, there are but two conspicuous passages in which the relation in question is described. On the side of action we have the supreme 'obedience unto death' of Mk 14^{36} ‖ 'Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; remove this cup from me: howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt': with which we may compare the intimacy of inward converse throughout the Passion (Lk 23^{34}. [v.l.] ^{46}). And on the side of knowledge we have the one great passage, Mt 11^{27} 'No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' It is in consequence of this relation that 'all things have been delivered' unto the Son by the Father (ib.), and that whosoever receives the Son receives really the Father who sent Him (Mk 9^{37} ‖).

In the Synoptic Gospels, with these few exceptions, the filial relation is rather felt as an underlying presupposition of the narrative than directly expressed in it. But when we turn to the Fourth Gospel, what has been hitherto of the nature of incidental comment or implication becomes nothing less than a standing theme, worked out in great variety of detail.

The Son is come forth from God, from the Father (Jn 13^{3} $16^{27.28}$); He is not come of Himself, but is sent by God (8^{42} 17^{8}); and as He comes forth from God, so also He returns to God (13^{3} 16^{28}). He is come in the Father's name (5^{43}); not to seek His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him (5^{30} 6^{38} 14^{31} 17^{16}); to do that will is the support and stay, the ruling function, of His whole being (4^{34}). It follows that the Son does not seek His own glory but the Father's (7^{18} 8^{50} 17^{4}); and, as the converse of this, He does not glorify Himself, but is glorified by the Father (12^{28} 13^{32} 17^{5}), though the Father is glorified in the Son. The acts of the Son are really the acts of the Father, the natural expression of that perfect intimacy in which they stand to each other ($5^{19.20}$ 8^{29} $10^{25.37.38}$). The reciprocity between them is complete, it is seen in the perfection of their mutual knowledge (7^{29} 8^{19} 10^{15} 17^{25}); so that the teaching of the Son is really the teaching of the Father (7^{16} $8^{26.28.38}$ $12^{49.50}$ $14^{10.24}$ 15^{15}). [It is important to note that the after-teaching of the Spirit comes under the same description; He too will 'not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak' (16^{13}; cf. 15^{15})]. Hence the life and character and words of the Son, taken as a whole, constitute a revelation of the Father such as had never been given before (6^{46} 14^{7-10}; cf. $1^{14.18}$). The great fundamental fact is that the Son is in the Father and the Father in Him (10^{38} 14^{11} 17^{21}); or, in other words, the Son and the Father are one (10^{30}); a claim which the Jews appear to have understood, for they accused our Lord of 'making himself equal with God' (5^{18}).

It was but another aspect of His filial relation that the Son was the object of the Father's unwavering and unfailing love (Jn 3^{35} 5^{20} 10^{17} $15^{9.10}$ $17^{23.24.26}$; cf. 11^{41} 14^{23}); that the Father bears witness to Him (5^{37} 8^{18} 12^{30}) [and we observe here again that the witness which is borne to the Son by the Father is also borne by the Spirit (15^{26})]; or, to use a summary Jewish expression, 'him the Father, even God, hath sealed' (6^{27}). Nor is it surprising that the prerogatives of the Father are committed to the Son (3^{35} 13^{3} 16^{15} 17^{7}), more particularly the prerogative of judgment ($5^{22.27}$ 9^{39}), and the power of both possessing and imparting life (5^{26} 11^{25} $14^{6.19}$ 17^{2}; cf. 1^{4}); or that the Son is to be honoured as the Father is honoured (5^{23}; cf. $15^{23.24}$); or that mankind are invited to 'come' to the Son as the source of all highest nourishment (4^{14} 6^{35} 7^{37}), and as the way to the Father ($6^{37.44.45}$ 14^{6}).

It is open to us, if we will, to think that in this collection of sayings there is an element—possibly a somewhat considerable element—that represents not so much what was actually spoken as enlargement or comment embodying the experience and reflexion of the growing Church. It is open to us, if we will, to think that the part played by such sayings in the Gospel is proportionately greater than they would have seemed to bear to any average disciple who had heard the Lord. That it should be so would be perfectly consistent with the Gospel being the work of an apostle. It would be the natural and deliberate result of his setting himself to write a πνευματικὸν εὐαγγέλιον, the object of which was not so much to furnish a photographic reproduction of the events as to fill up gaps and deficiencies in the records of preceding evangelists. But, when every deduction is made, the fact remains that sayings of this character there most certainly were; and not only so, but on the showing of the most critical of critics they supplied the real keynote to the whole history. A scientific examination of the Gospels, whatever else it brings out, brings out this, that the root-element in the consciousness of Jesus was a sense of Sonship to the Divine Father, deeper, clearer, more intimate, more all-embracing and all-absorbing, than ever was vouchsafed to a child of man.

(ii.) The testimony of the Father.—We have spoken so far of what might be called the subjective consciousness of Jesus. As much at least as this not only follows from the logic of the history, but is distinctly revealed to us—in the Synoptic Gospels sufficiently, in the Fourth Gospel abundantly. But to this subjective conviction on His part the narratives tell us that there was also added an objective confirmation. The confirmation was given in the two voices at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration (Mk 1^{11} ‖ 9^{7} ‖), and also —if we take in St. John—by the voice heard at the visit of the Greeks (Jn 12^{28}). How are we to explain these utterances?

If the narratives are well founded, we are not limited in our explanation by any inquiry as to the current contemporary interpretation of such texts as Ps 2^{7}, Is 42^{1}, Dt 18^{15}, however much the words said to have been spoken contain reminiscences of or allusions to those texts. For the hearing of the voices was what might be called a prophetic hearing. The probability is, as we have hinted above (p. 572^{b}), that just as on the third occasion, while the crowd said, 'It thundered,' or 'An angel spake to him,' either in the first instance the Baptist, or in the second instance the three apostles, or perhaps in all three, Jesus Christ Himself alone was aware of something that conveyed a more articulate sense than this. But in any case the sense thus conveyed was conveyed to the spiritual ear by a method analogous to that of prophetic inspiration.

And if, on the occasions in question, the Spirit of God did intimate prophetically to chosen witnesses, more or fewer, a revelation couched partly in the language of the ancient Scriptures, it would by no means follow that the meaning of the revelation was limited to the meaning of those older Scriptures. On the contrary, it would be likely enough that the old words would be charged with new meaning—that, indeed, the revelation contained in them, though linking on to some message of the past, would yet be in substance a new revelation.

We have seen that the ancient Scriptures of which we are speaking contributed, each in its way, to create that Ideal Figure which, in dimensions varying with the apprehending eye and mind, hovered before the imaginations of the contemporaries of Jesus. To Jesus Himself it reached the fullest dimensions of which it was capable. And we may assume that to His mind the announcement 'Thou art my Son' meant not only all that it had ever meant to the most enlightened of seers in the past, but, yet more, all that the response of His own heart told Him that it meant in the present.

It might well content us to put into the words this, and no more. But it is possible, and we should be justified in supposing—not by way of dogmatic assertion, but by way of pious belief—in view of the later history and the progress of subsequent revelation, that the words were intended to suggest a new truth not hitherto made known, viz. that the Son was Son not only in the sense of the Messianic King, or of an Ideal People, but that the idea of Sonship was fulfilled in Him in a way yet more mysterious and yet more essential; in other words, that He was Son, not merely in prophetic contemplation but in actual transcendent fact, before the foundation of the world.

(iii.) Messiahship and divinity.—This last possibility brings us to the question, which in any case we shall have to face: What exactly is the meaning of the title 'Son of God'? There is no doubt that it means the expected Messiah,—that at least. But how much more does it mean than that? In particular, does it mean the Son as incarnate, or does it go behind and beyond the Incarnation?

We reserve the last part of this question for a moment. In the meantime we must attempt to define rather more exactly the relation of the title 'Son of God' to the conception of the Messiah. In the popular mind, at the period with which we are concerned, the two things would be simply identical. But, as we so constantly see, our Lord was not content merely to take a popular idea with the conventional stamp upon it. In His hands the popular idea is nearly always remoulded, renewed, brought into harmony with some fresh and powerful reality, and reissued with the signature of that reality.

He had done this with the title SON OF MAN. For the author of the Similitudes in the Book of Enoch and for those who inherited his tradition, the Son of Man was just the Messiah as Judge. But our Lord went back to the original sources of the title, Dn 7^{13} and Ps 8^{4}; and He thus brought it into living contact with the conception of Man as Man. In His lips it was the Messiah as Man, the perfect Man, in the sense of being more man—more completely embodying in Himself the essence of all that went to make man, more utterly in touch with everything in man—than any who had ever borne the name of man before.

So, too, with the title 'Son of God.' Its meaning was very far from being exhausted by the holding of a certain office or function, such as that of the Messiah. For Jesus the phrase means the absolute fulness of all that it ought to mean—the perfection of Sonship in relation to God; in a word, just all that sum of relations and habitudes of feeling and thought and action that we have seen so amply set before us in the Gospel of St. John. It is the picture of a mind lying open without flaw or impediment to the stream of Divine love pouring in upon it, and responding to that love at once with exquisite sensitiveness and with entire completeness. It is indeed the very perfection of what we mean by religion and the religious attitude of the soul to God.

It thus appears that in the mind of Christ the Jewish conception of the Messiah parted in two directions—one covering all the relationships of man to man, and the other in like manner covering all the relationships of the perfect Man to God. It parted in these directions, and it was resolvable into the two complementary ideals to which they led. And as a matter of fact the life of Christ on earth was the consummate realization of those ideals. [Compare with the above an admirable paragraph in Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 281 f.].

The Jewish title 'Messiah' had upon it the stamp of something local and temporary; and as such it has lost much of its interest for the modern world. But the two other titles of which we have been speaking imply what is neither local nor temporary, but as permanent as Humanity itself. It is therefore specially under these titles that our Lord most freely revealed Himself.

There is, however, something in the title 'Messiah' which although present was not quite so prominent in the other two. They convey to us as fully as it could be conveyed what Jesus was in Himself. But they do not bring out in the same relief the historical mission that He had in the first instance for His contemporaries and through them for all after-ages. The wonderful birth, the wonderful works, the crucifixion, the resurrection, and the ascension may be viewed as aspects of the work of the Son of Man and of the Son of God,—they are aspects of the work of salvation and of the coming forth from and return to the Father,—but as enacted in space and time they might be more appropriately described as belonging to the manifestation of the Messiah.

What deeper implications are there in the title 'Son of God'? Were the 4th cent. Fathers right in claiming that He who bore this title was not only in the full sense 'Son' but in the full sense 'God,'—that to be the Son of God implied identity of nature or of essence?

We may say with confidence that a Sonship such as is described in the Fourth Gospel would carry with it this conclusion. How could any inferior being either enter so perfectly into the mind of the Father or reflect it so perfectly to man? Of what created being could it be said, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father'? We need not stay to pick out other expressions that admit of no lower interpretation, because the evangelist has made it clear by his Prologue what construction he himself put upon his own narrative.

But, although this conclusion can really be made good independently of the next and last point that we have to consider, it is to some extent mixed up with it, and it may be well to pass on to this point.

(iv.) Pre-existence.—When we use the title 'Son of God,' how much does it cover? Is it strictly and properly applied to the incarnate Christ, or does it extend backwards before the Incarnation? In other words, does it, or does it not, imply pre-existence? We cannot discuss this question adequately without taking in the rest of the NT. We may, however, provisionally ask what inference would be drawn from the Gospels.

And in regard to these there is no doubt that in the great majority of cases the words would be satisfied by a reference to Christ as incarnate. All the instances in the Synoptic Gospels would come under this head. On the other hand, it is equally little open to question that in the Fourth Gospel Christ is conceived as pre-existent. Nothing could be more explicit than the opening verse. Christ as the Logos was in the beginning with God, and was God. But does this hold good of Him also as the Son? That is more debatable. We have to look about somewhat for expressions that are free from ambiguity. Perhaps there are not any.

The clearest would be the verse Jn 1^{18} (which belongs to the evangelist), if we could be sure that the common reading is correct: 'the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father,' seems to speak of this pre-existent condition (=πρὸς τὸν θεόν of v.^{1}) as though it belonged to Him as Son. But then we are confronted by the well-known question of reading. It must be enough to refer to the elaborate note in WH, and to Dr. Hort's dissertation (1876), with which the present writer, so far as his judgment goes, would express his agreement. But the reading would then be not 'the only-begotten Son,' but 'God only-begotten.' Places like $3^{13.}$ [v.l.] ^{31}, which are unambiguous as to pre-existence, do not clearly connect it with 'the Son.' Indeed the first of these introduces somewhat unexpectedly not the 'Son of God,' but the 'Son of Man,' who must be the Son incarnate. At the same time the terms 'Father' and 'Son' are so correlative that the frequent occurrence of such phrases as 'My Father which sent me,' 'Not any man hath seen the Father save he which is from God,' 'I speak the things which I have seen with my Father,' would seem to suggest that the relation of Father and Son existed before the Son became incarnate. At any rate the great emphasis on the two terms would seem to show that the relation to which they point is not a passing phase, but something that goes deep down into the essence of being.

Or perhaps the case might be stated thus. The burden of proof really seems to lie with those who would refuse to associate the idea of pre-existence with that of Sonship. The many examples in which the term 'Son' is used without any such implication go but a very slight way to exclude it where it is really suggested. In the case of St. John there is a clear presumption that it is so suggested; while in the Synoptic Gospels it is probable that the writers had not reflected upon the subject at all, and did but reproduce a portion of our Lord's teaching upon it. The decision as to how far the Johannean presentation is to be accepted will depend upon the general estimate of the Fourth Gospel as a historical authority. To the present writer it seems in this instance, as in so many others, just to supply what the other Gospels lead us to the verge of without directly supplying.

(c) For the apostles.—We have seen that the apostolic writers freely make use of the title 'Son of God' as a formula to express their Christian faith, or, as we may say in other words, in order to bring out their belief in the Divine side of the nature of Christ. What they meant would be very similar to the well-known exordium of the Second (so-called) Epistle of Clement: 'Brethren, we ought so to think of Jesus Christ as of God (ὡς περὶ Θεοῦ), as of the Judge of quick and dead.' The phrase, in each case, is vague; to define it more exactly will be the work of centuries; but the frame or mould has been provided by which the work of those centuries is to be circumscribed.

The principal question that meets us is the same as that with which we have just been dealing in regard to the Gospels. Does the term 'Son of God,' as used by the apostles, contain any implication of pre-existence, or is it limited to Christ as incarnate?

Here again by far the greater number of passages are ambiguous; if they do not suggest pre-existence and pre-existent relations, they also do not exclude them. There are, however, two passages that bear upon the question more directly.

One is the opening of the Ep. to the Hebrews: 'God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets . . . hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, through whom also he made the worlds; who being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high.'

Two ways of taking this passage are possible. On the one hand, if we argue strictly, it may be urged that there is but one principal clause in the sentence, to which all the other subordinate and relative clauses are referred. This principal clause speaks of the Son [of God]. It would therefore follow that all the relative clauses point back to Him as Son. That is to say, that as Son He 'made the worlds'; as Son He is the effulgence of the Divine glory, the image of the Divine substance; as Son He upheld and upholds all things. That would carry back the Sonship to the time before creation, and would make it an attribute pertaining to the essence of Christ's Godhead.

But, on the other hand, it may be questioned whether we ought in this case to argue strictly. Because the relative clauses refer to the Son, it does not quite necessarily follow that they refer to Him as Son. It may be urged that the main contrast in the passage is between the previous revelations through the prophets and the final revelation through the Son, i.e. the incarnate Son, and that this contrast dominates the whole passage, many parts of which do indeed point to the Son as incarnate ('whom he appointed heir of all things,' 'when he made purification of sins,' 'sat down at the right hand'). The other clauses, which imply pre-existence, would then be referred to the Son not strictly as such, but by a slight and quite natural laxity of language to Him who [afterwards, in view of His incarnation] came to be specially called 'Son.' This second way of taking the passage is not really stretched beyond what is common enough in language, though the first would be more accurate.

The other passage is Col $1^{(13).\,15}$ 'the Son of his love . . . who is the image (εἰκών) of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation' (πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως). Now, it is true that in biblical usage the leading idea in πρωτότοκος is that of the legal rights of the firstborn, his precedence over all who are born after him (cf. Ro 8^{29}). But in a context like this, in view of the defining genitive πάσης κτίσεως, it seems wrong to exclude the idea of priority as well (πρὸ πάσης κτίσεως γεννηθείς, Theodrt.; otherwise Haupt, Gefangenschaftsbriefe, p. 27). There is not a direct allusion to Ps $89^{27\,(28)}$, though it is very possible that the Messianic application of that verse led by several steps to the use of the term here. It brings in another cycle of expressions which help to carry back the conception of sonship from the historic to the prehistoric stage. See, further, Lightfoot, Col. ad loc.

Ro 8^3, where the Son does not become the Son by being sent, but is already 'God's own Son' (emphatic) before He is sent, tends the same way.

In the Epp. of St. John there is nothing quite conclusive. We are really at the same level as in the Gospel. But, as there, the absolute use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' and of 'God the Father' (1 Jn 2^{22-24} 4^{14} 5^{12}, 2 Jn $^{3.\,4.\,9}$, cf. 1 P 1^2, Jude ^{1}) suggests a conception of Sonship which dates back behind the historic manifestation. On Jn 1^{18} see above.

Note on the origin of the Christian use of the title 'Son of God.'—In his able and interesting but far too confident and sweeping book, Die Anfänge unserer Religion (Tübingen u. Leipzig, 1901), p. 295, Prof. Wernle of Basel commits himself to the proposition that 'from the OT and from Rabbinism there is no road that leads to the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ.' He allows that the title 'Son of God' is strictly Jewish, but he appears to think that the further step 'Son of God = God' was taken upon Gentile ground, through the lax ideas brought in by the converts from paganism, and their readiness to admit new divinities to the Pantheon. Against this, indeed, ought rightly to be set the fact that the first lesson that they learnt on coming over to Christianity was the great lesson that God is One. But it was not really left to the Gentile Christians to crown an edifice that was incomplete without them. Wernle himself evidently feels that St. Paul had already gone far by identifying Christ with the 'Lord' of OT. He is obliged further to say that in his Christology St. Paul is not really a Jew, and to set down this side of his teaching to a supposed 'mythological tendency' which he himself is unable to account for.

It is one of the ground fallacies of Wernle's book to attribute far too much to the initiative of St. Paul. If the deification of Christ had been really due to him, and if in carrying it out he had been acting in opposition to the sense of the Christian community, we should most certainly have heard of it. But it is quite beyond question that Christ Himself was accused before the Sanhedrin of an extreme form of blasphemy, and that it was upon that charge that He was condemned (Mk 14^{61-64} ‖). In the Fourth Gospel we are expressly told that the Jews regarded the claim of Christ as 'making himself equal with God' (Jn 5^{18}). It is, however, another of Wernle's ground fallacies to treat especially the Jewish element in this Gospel with great one-sidedness (see Synopt. Frage, p. 255, a real blot upon an otherwise excellent book).

The only at all contemporary attempt known to the present writer to distinguish radically between υἱὸς θεοῦ and θεός is in Clem. Hom. xvi. 15, 16 (cf. x. 10). It is characteristic of the teaching of that curiously isolated production. At a later date the distinction became the main fulcrum of Arianism.

III. THE EARLY CHURCH.—We might sum up at the point we have reached; but it seems better to pass on a few steps beyond the close of NT, which is not a real break.

1. The sub-Apostolic Fathers.—In the sub-Apostolic writings we find a state of things very similar to that which we have just left behind. There is no doubt a certain amount of usage in which the term 'Son' may be appropriately explained of the Incarnate.

Such would be, e.g., Ignatius, Smyrn. i. 1, 'persuaded as touching our Lord that he is truly of the race of David according to the flesh, but Son of God by the Divine will and power, truly born of a virgin.' This is clearly modelled on Ro 1^4 (similarly Barn. v. 9, 11).

But even in this writer there are instances where a less restricted sense would seem to be intended, as in the Trinitarian passage, Magn. xiii. 1, 'that ye may prosper in all things . . . in the Son and Father and in the Spirit' (ἐν υἱῷ καὶ πατρὶ καὶ ἐν πνεύματι); and in Rom. inscr., '[the Church] which I also salute in the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father' (υἱοῦ πατρός). We seem to have here the absolute use of 'Father' and 'Son' as correlative to each other, without reference to the Incarnation. Cf. Magn. vi. 1, 'Jesus Christ, who was with the Father before the worlds and appeared at the end of time'; if the Fatherhood is pre-mundane, the Sonship must also be pre-mundane.

All ambiguity is removed in Barn. vi. 12, where we have the first express reference of the plural in Gn 1^{26} to 'the Son,' 'For the scripture saith concerning us, how he saith to the Son: Let us make,' etc. (cf. v. 5). The strange reading 'Son of God,' foisted into the free quotation of Ex 17^{14} in Barn. xii. 9, can hardly be adduced, because Joshua is regarded as a type by anticipation of the Incarnate.

Another quite clear passage is Herm. Sim. ix. 12. 2, where the Son of God, eo nomine, is described as 'anterior to all creation, so that he became the Father's adviser in his creation' (ὁ μὲν υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ πάσης τῆς κτίσεως αὐτοῦ προγενέστερός ἐστιν, κ.τ.λ.). This evidently takes up the πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως of Col 1^{15}, assuming the doctrine if not actually referring to the words.

Of the group of passages in Patr. Apost. where παῖς is certainly used in the sense of 'Son,' one at least, Ep. Diogn. viii. 9–11, refers unequivocally to the pre-Incarnate, 'having conceived a great and unalterable scheme, he communicated it to his Son alone' (ἀνεκοινώσατο μόνῳ τῷ παιδί). The state of the case appears to be, that while in Patr. Apost. the title is still predominantly referred to the incarnate state, the writers have no sense of being confined to this, and are quite prepared to go beyond it.

When we come to Justin all distinction is obliterated, and the Son is frankly identified with the Logos; Apol. ii. 6, 'But to the Father of all, who is unbegotten, there is no name given. . . . And his Son, who alone is properly called Son, the Word, who also was with him and was begotten before the works, when at first he created and arranged all things by him,' etc. (ὁ δὲ υἱὸς ἐκείνου, ὁ μόνος λεγόμενος κυρίως υἱός, ὁ λόγος πρὸ τῶν ποιημάτων καὶ συνὼν καὶ γεννώμενος, κ.τ.λ.). Here we not only have 'Son' and 'Word' used as convertible, but a special stress is laid on the idea of 'generation' as involved in 'Sonship,' which a little later in Origen took shape in the doctrine of the Eternal Generation (de Princ. I. ii. 4, 9). Before this, in Ignat. Eph. vii. 2, both words γεννητός and ἀγέννητος (v.l. γενητός and ἀγένητος) had been applied to Christ, but with quite untechnical freedom (cf. Lightfoot, ad loc., and ii. 90–94; also Robertson, Athanasius, pp. 149, 475 n.).

The passage of Justin is very important as a landmark. From that time forwards what might be called the metaphysical treatment of the title 'Son' becomes more and more common until it reaches its climax in the writers of the 4th century.

Note on the meaning of 'Son' in the Apostles' Creed.—There arose in Germany in the years 1892–1894 a rather sharp discussion about the Apostles' Creed, begun by Harnack and taken up by Zahn, Kattenbusch, Cremer, and others. This also produced in England an admirable little volume of lectures by Dr. Swete (The Apostles' Creed, Cambridge, 1894), which gives a concise account of most of the points at issue. Among these was the question as to the interpretation of the term 'Son' in the Creed, which Harnack wished to limit to the historic, as contrasted with the prehistoric, Sonship. Dr. Swete perhaps (p. 26 ff.) a little overstates both Harnack's contention and the strength of the arguments against it. And yet that contention is really too sweeping, though the point made by Kattenbusch in his recently completed larger work (Das Apost. Symbol, ii. 566 f.), that the clause τὸν γεννηθέντα ἐκ πνεύμ. ἁγ. κ. Μαρίας τῆς παρθ. shows that the historic γέννησις was in the author's mind, appears to be valid. It is true that the first interest in this paragraph of the Creed is in historical facts. But at the same time, as Kattenbusch also very rightly observes, there is no antithesis to the Christology of Pre-existence. The question is not really raised; and yet, as we might perhaps put it, the conception of Sonship is left open on that side. We are reminded that the Creed is in its origin Western and not Oriental. And for Western thought more especially, the denial of a purely natural birth may be taken to imply pre-existence.

It should be added that recent research places the origin of the Creed with confidence in the first half of the 2nd cent., and many would say in the first quarter; so that it would be strictly parallel to the Apostolic Fathers.

2. Marcellus of Ancyra.—One episode in the controversies of the 4th cent. has a not inconsiderable reflex bearing on the interpretation of NT.

Marcellus of Ancyra was one of the keenest supporters of Nicene doctrine. He seems, however, to have asserted it on different grounds from those commonly brought forward. The position he took up was in the first instance biblical. We have seen that the Arians exploited in their own interest the title 'Son.' They inferred from it the posteriority and inferiority of Him by whom it was borne. Marcellus appears to have met them by saying that the use which they made of the title was unwarranted and indeed altogether wide of the mark. According to him, the title 'Son' had no reference to origin or to the pre-existent relation of Christ to the Father. The proper term to denote this relation was in his view not 'Son,' but 'Logos.' It appears to be a mistake to say that he denied the 'Trinity' or the distinct hypostatic existence of the Logos, though some of his speculations were not quite easily reconcilable with this. But his main contention was that 'Logos' was the proper name of the pre-Incarnate and 'Son' of the Incarnate, and that the biblical writers observed this distinction, the only apparent exception being cases in which the title 'Son' was used 'prophetically.' Eusebius of Cæsarea, who replied to him, marshals an imposing array of no fewer than thirty separate designations which he maintains to have been also used of the Son before the Incarnation; but they are nearly all wide of the mark, and it must be confessed that on this ground the victory rests rather with his opponent (see Euseb. de Eccl. Theol. i. 17–20, Migne, Pat. Gr. xxiv. 856–896; and on the whole controversy, esp. the monograph by Zahn, Marcellus von Ancyra, Gotha, 1867; and Moberly, Atonement and Personality (London, 1901, pp. 208–215).

Conclusion.—From what has been said, it will be seen that the assertion of Marcellus in regard to the biblical usage was really very much in the right direction, though—as is so often the case with the ancients, when they have got hold of a right principle in criticism or exegesis—it is rather too sweeping and unqualified.

As compared with Marcellus and the modern revivers of his opinion, our own conclusion from the evidence passed in review would be, that while it is undoubtedly true that the biblical writers and the other early Christian writers before Justin, start from the Incarnation and are thinking primarily of this, their thought does not necessarily end with it. It seems to point backwards into the dim past behind it. Certainly there is no sharp line of demarcation restricting the meaning of the title to the incarnate state and no other. The writers are so far from guarding themselves against any reference beyond the Incarnation that they seem rather naturally to suggest it. The Son is so called primarily as incarnate. But that which is the essence of the Incarnation must needs be also larger than the Incarnation. It must needs have its roots in the eternity of Godhead. [See esp. a very instructive and carefully balanced discussion in Moberly, Atonement and Personality, pp. 185 ff., 211–215].

LITERATURE.—The most important literature will have been sufficiently indicated in the course of the article. The works to which the writer himself owes most are Dalman's Worte Jesu (Leipzig, 1898), and H. J. Holtzmann's Neutest. Theologie (Freiburg i. B. u. Leipzig, 1897). To these should now be added Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums (admirably translated under the title What is Christianity? London, 1901), which has a very suggestive treatment of the subject, though too impatient of formulated doctrine; and the portion of Moberly, Atonement and Personality, just referred to. Younger students should not fail to have recourse to Dr. Swete's Apostles' Creed (Cambridge, 1894).

W. SANDAY.

SON OF MAN.—1. An expression occurring in both OT and NT, and used in the following applications. (1) A poet. synonym of 'man,' found in parallelism with 'man' (the word for 'man' in the two clauses being in the original a different one). See the occurrences in § 6; and add Ps 144^{3b} (for בֶּן־אֱנוֹשׁ; ‖ אָדָם). (2) In Ezek. the title under which the prophet is regularly addressed by J″, $2^{1.3}$ $3^{1.8}$ and upwards of 90 times besides. Ezek. has a profound sense of the majesty of J″; and the expression is no doubt intended to mark the distance which separated the prophet, as one of mankind, from Him. The title is borrowed from Ezek. in Dn 8^{17}. (3) In the vision in Dn 7 the glorious being whom Dan. sees brought 'with the clouds of heaven' to the Almighty, after the fourth beast (representing the empire of the Seleucidæ) is slain, to receive an everlasting and universal dominion (v.^{14}), is described as 'one like unto a son of man' (Aram. כְּבַר אֱנָשׁ). The expression means simply a figure in human form. What the figure was intended to denote has been the subject of much controversy. At an early date (see § 11) it was undoubtedly interpreted of the Messiah, and the same view has been largely held down to the present time (e.g. by Ewald, Riehm, and Behrmann); but in the author's own interpretation of the vision (vv.$^{18.22.27}$) the 'saints of the Most High' take the place of the 'one like unto a son of man'; and this constitutes a strong ground for concluding that he himself understood by it the glorified and ideal people of Israel (see, further, the present writer's Comm. on Dan. p. 103 ff.). The same expression in Greek (ὅμοιος υἱῷ ἀνθρώπου: see RV) is applied also in Rev 1^{13} 14^{14} to the risen and glorified Christ.

2. 'The Son of man' (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου) is a designation of Christ, though one confined to the Gospels and Ac 7^{56}, and, except Ac 7^{56} (where it occurs in Stephen's dying exclamation [*]), found only in the mouth of Christ Himself (the quotation in Jn 12^{34} forming no real exception).

3. The following is a synopsis of the occurrences in the Synoptic Gospels, in the order given, or suggested, by St. Mark:—

Mt 18^{11} (‖ Lk 19^{10}, though in a very different connexion), in Mt 25^{13} the words 'in which the Son of man cometh,' and in Lk 9^{56} the clause 'For the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them,' are not in the best MSS; cf. RVm on Mt 18^{11}, Lk 9^{56}.

The occurrences in the Fourth Gospel are Jn 1^{51} $3^{13.14}$ $6^{27.53.62}$ 8^{28} 9^{35} (ℵBD: cf. RVm), $12^{23.34}$ (see 3^{14} 8^{28}), v.^{34} 13^{31} (11 [or 12] times). None of these occurrences are parallel to any of those in the Synoptists. See, further, § 23.

occasions,* of which 8 are reported by the three Gospels, 13 by two, and 19 by one. No instance is, however, reported in Mark which is not in one (or both) of the other two Gospels. The occasions fall naturally into two great groups: (1) those in which the reference is to some aspect or other of the earthly work of Christ, in the time of His humility (including, in particular, His sufferings and death); (2) those in which the reference is to His future coming in glory. It is important to bear in mind the fact of these two applications of the expression; for it has some bearing upon recent discussions of the subject. On the crucial passage, Mt 16^{13}, see § 19.

5. Before, however, we can proceed to examine the meaning of the title, a prior question must be considered, which has assumed, within recent years, great prominence. Jesus, it is not doubted, spoke, at least as a rule, not Greek but Aramaic; a proper method, therefore, it is urged, requires that we should begin by inquiring how the title would be expressed in Aramaic, and what meaning it would there possess. And when we proceed to translate back ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου into Aramaic an unexpected and startling result discloses itself, which has involved students of the NT in great perplexity.

6. Let us first, for clearness, explain briefly the usage of the expression in Biblical Hebrew.

In Biblical Hebrew, בְּנֵי אָדָם or בְּנֵי הָאָדָם 'sons of man' (or 'of men,'—אָדָם being a collective term) occurs frequently,—though not so frequently as (הָ)אָדָם alone, and chiefly in poet. and later Heb.,—to denote mankind in general (Gn 10^{5}, 1 S 26^{19}, 2 S 7^{14}, Ps 11$^{4\,(5)}$ 12$^{1.\,8\,(2.\,9)}$ 14^{2} etc.).† The sing. בֶּן־אָדָם 'son of man' (i.e. not son of an individual man, but son (i.e. member) of the genus man) also occurs, viz. (a) in the address to Ezekiel 2$^{1.\,3}$ 3$^{1.\,3}$, and more than 90 times besides (so also Dn 8^{17}; cf. Enoch 60^{10} 71^{14}); (b) occasionally in poet. parallelism with אִישׁ or אֱנוֹשׁ Nu 23^{19}, Is 51^{2} 56^{2}, Jer 49^{18} (=v.^{33}=50^{40}= (nearly) 51^{43}), Ps 8$^{4\,(5)}$ 80$^{17\,(18)}$ 146^{3} (‖ נדיבים 'nobles'), Job 16^{21} (‖ גֶּבֶר 'man')‡ 25^{6} 35^{8}.

7. In Aramaic אדם is not found.§ The term which, speaking generally, corresponds is אֱנָשׁ, אֱינָשׁ (in some dialects contracted, without difference of meaning, to נָשׁ), in the status emphaticus (corresponding to the def. art. in Heb.) אֱנָשָׁא, אֱינָשָׁא (contr. נָשָׁא). 'Ĕnāshā (nāshā) mostly denotes 'man' in a general or collective sense, though it occurs occasionally (p. 582^{b}) in an individual sense: 'ĕnāsh (nāsh), on the other hand, not infrequently possesses an individual sense, and also often sinks to express nothing more than τις, or 'one' (as in 'every one,' 'no one').

In some Aramaic dialects, however, though not in all, 'son (or sons) of man (men)' is common—in prose, and not merely, as in Heb., chiefly in poetry—in the ordinary sense of man (or men), the distinctive force of bar, 'son,' being no longer felt. The following are the main details of this usage:—

(a) Judæan Aramaic.—In Biblical Aramaic, the plur. בְּנֵי אֲנָשָׁא 'sons of men' occurs Dn 2^{38} 5^{21} ('driven from the sons of men,'—interchanging with 'driven from men' (אנשא), 4$^{25.\,32.\,33\,(22.\,29.\,30)}$): elsewhere 'ĕnāshā is used, 2^{43} ('the seed of men'); 4$^{16\,(13)}$ ('changed from (the heart of) men'); 4$^{17.\,25.\,32\,(14.\,22.\,29)}$ 5^{21}; 4$^{25.\,32.\,33\,(22.\,29.\,30)}$ (just quoted); 7^{8} ('eyes like the eyes of men'); Ezr 4^{11} (אֱנָשׁ determined by the foll. gen.). 'Ĕnāsh occurs in the indeterm. sense of 'a man,' 5^{5} 6$^{7.\,12\,(8.\,13)}$ ('of any god or man'), 7$^{4.\,14}$; and in 'every man,' 'no man,' 2^{10} 3^{10} 5^{7} 6$^{12\,(13)}$, Ezr 6^{11}.* Bar 'ĕnāsh, 'a son of man,' occurs only in the passage, of which more will be said below, Dn 7^{13} 'one like unto a son of man.'

In the Targ. of Onḳelos the plur. בני אינשא occurs Gn 6^{1} 11^{5}, Nu 23^{19}, Dt 32$^{6.\,26}$: the sing. bar 'ĕnāsh does not occur at all, 'man'—where it is not expressed by גְּבַר, גַּבְרָא (vir)—being represented always by 'ĕnāsh, 'ĕnāshā.

In the Targ. of Jonathan (on the prophets) the plur. בְּנֵי אֱינָשָׁא occurs at least 20 times (as 1 S 15^{29} 16$^{7.\,7}$ 24^{10} 26^{19}); 'ĕnāsh frequently (as Jos 1^{5} 2^{11} 8^{17} 10^{8}); bar 'ĕnāsh only Is 51^{12} [cod. Reuchl., in ed. Lag., בר אדם] 56^{2}, Jer 49$^{18.\,33}$ 50^{40} 51^{43}, Mic 5^{6}—in each case being suggested directly by the Hebrew.

(b) In Nabatæan Aramaic (some 30 inscriptions, chiefly sepulchral, mostly of 8–14 lines each, dating from B.C. 9 to A.D. 75),† bar 'ĕnāsh does not occur at all. Ĕnōsh, ĕnāsh occur pretty frequently, very much as in Daniel, in 'every one,' 'no one,' etc. (see CIS II. i. 197^{7} 206$^{3.\,6}$ 209$^{5.\,6}$ 210$^{3.\,5}$ 212^{7} etc.).

(c) Galilæan Aramaic.—In the Palest. Talm. (3–4 cent. A.D.) bar nāsh (determ. bar nāshā) occurs with great frequency, and means simply a (single, individual) man, as חד בר נש 'a certain man (did so and so),' הוא בר נשא 'that man,' הדין בר נשא 'this man,' and in a weakened sense, with a neg. or כל 'all,' as 'he went out ולא אשכח בר נש and found no one,' כל בר נש ובר נש (=late Heb. כל איש ואיש) 'every one.'‡ Obviously, in all these cases it would be absurd to render bar-nāsh(ā) by 'son of man.'

In the Palest. Lectionary (the 'Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum,' ed. Erizzo, 1861, ed. Lagarde, in his Bibl. Syr. 1892), of the 5th cent. A.D., the usage is similar: barnāsh standing regularly for 'a man' (as חד ברנש=ἄνθρωπος or ἄνθρωπός τις, Lk 2^{25} 4^{33} 6^{6} 10^{30} 15^{11} etc.); and barnāshā (determ.) for ὁ ἄνθρωπος, as Mt 4^{4} 12$^{35.\,35}$ 26$^{24.\,24}$, Lk 8$^{29.\,33.\,35}$ etc.

The same usage prevails in the Palest. Targums on the Pent.§, and on the Hagiographa (c. 7th cent. A.D.): see, for instance, bar nāsh in Lv 2^{1} 4^{2} 5$^{1.\,2.\,4.\,21}$ etc. ('if a man do so and so': Onḳ. in all such passages אינש), Ps 80^{18b} (for בן אדם) 115^{4} 118$^{6.\,8}$ 144$^{3a.\,4}$ etc.;‖ and bar nāshā in 'that man,' Lv 7$^{20b.\,21b.\,27b}$ 17$^{4.\,9}$ 19^{8} etc. (Onḳ. always אינשא), Ps 8$^{5.\,5}$ 56^{12} 60^{13} 119^{134}.

(d) In Syriac, barnāsh, barnāshā, in the meaning 'man,' are very common. Examples: for אָדָם Ex 13^{13}, Is 44^{13}, Jer 2^{6} 10^{14}, Ezk 1$^{8.\,10.\,26}$ 10$^{8.\,14}$, Dn 7^{8}; for ἄνθρωπος, Curet. and Pesh., Mt 4^{4} 12$^{12.\,43}$ 15$^{11.\,11.\,18}$ 19^{6}, Pesh. Mk 8$^{36.\,37}$, Jn 2^{25} 7$^{22.\,23.\,23}$, and (in 'every man') Ro 2^{9} 3^{4} 12^{18} 16^{19} (εἰς πάντας), and elsewhere.¶

8. It thus appears that bar nāsh(ā) is a common Aramaic expression, in which the force of the 'son' has been so weakened by time as virtually to have disappeared, so that it practically means nothing more nor less than man (homo, Mensch,—not vir). The natural Aramaic original of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρ. would, however, seem to be barnāshā. If, now, our Lord spoke Aramaic, and denoted Himself by this expression, what meaning can He have intended to convey by it? To this question, which is by no means a simple one, different answers have been given.

(1) C. B. E. Uloth, who, it seems, was the first to set himself to answer it, came to the conclusion that Jesus called Himself 'the man,' meaning by the expression to point to His creaturely frailty and humility.

(2) Eerdmans argued that the expression was not in the days of Christ a Mess. title, and was not used by Him as such. In opposition to the prevalent Mess. expectations, Jesus called Himself 'the man,' meaning it to be understood that He was a man, and not more. Translated literally into Greek, it was not understood, and under the influence of apocalyptic phraseology (Dn 7^{13} etc.) made into a title of Christ.[*]

(3) Wellhausen, in 1894 and 1897, also considered that Jesus intended by the term to speak of Himself as 'the man,' meaning, however, by the expression the one who completely fulfilled the idea of man, and who as such was in specially close relation to the Father; and the early Christians, not understanding how He could have so described Himself, in translating rendered barnāshā falsely by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου instead of by ὁ ἄνθρωπος: the expression was thus brought into connexion with Dn 7^{13}, and so became a standing Messianic designation of Christ.[†]

(4) Arnold Meyer[‡] called attention to the fact that in Aramaic, in particular in the Aramaic spoken in Galilee, it was not unusual for a person to speak of him- (or her-) self as 'this man,' 'this woman' (ההוא גברא, ההיא איתתא),[§] and also that there are, even in the OT, passages in which, though the general term 'man' is used, the reference is clearly to the speaker (Job 3^{23} 16^{21}); and he applied this principle to the explanation of at least some of the passages in the Gospels: sometimes, in using the expression, Jesus spoke of men in general (as Mk 2^{28} 'Therefore man is lord of the sabbath,' 12^{32}), sometimes He pointed by it to Himself (as Mk 2^{10} 'that ye may know that a man hath authority on earth to forgive sins,' Mt 8^{20}, 11^{19} 'a man came eating and drinking,' etc.): the early Greek-speaking Christians, translating it by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, combined with it associations derived from Dn 7^{13}. This explanation does not carry us very far. It is true, it might in the abstract (see § 22) be adopted for some of the passages cited; but otherwise the expression used in the Gospels is not, as in the Galilæan phrase quoted, 'this man'; nor does Meyer make any attempt to show how in the numerous other passages concerned, the predictions of sufferings and the eschatological utterances, the expression 'a man' could have been naturally employed by Christ (cf. Fiebig, p. 74 f.).

(5) Lietzmann, as the result of a careful examination of the existing evidence, literary and philological, rejecting the solutions of his predecessors, reached the startling conclusion[‖] that 'Jesus never applied to Himself the title "son of man" at all, because it does not exist in Aramaic, and upon linguistic grounds cannot exist,'—on account, viz., of the fact mentioned above, that barnāshā, though it is lit. 'the son of man,' in actual usage means simply 'the man,' so that the distinction made in the Greek between ὁ ἄνθρωπος and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου could not have existed in Aramaic (both expressions being translations of the same word, barnāshā). The evangelical tradition which attributes to Christ the use of this title is consequently false. The title arose in Greek: υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου, as a translation of barnāsh in such passages as Mk $2^{10.28}$, sounded strange; it was consequently, under the influence of Dn 7^{13}, turned, under the form ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀ., into a title of Christ, first in the apocalyptic discourses declaring His future παρουσία, and afterwards more generally in other discourses (pp. 91–95). And Lietzmann supports this conclusion by various subsidiary arguments, of which the principal are: (1) the fact that 'the son of man' was no accepted Messianic title in the age of Christ; (2) the absence of the expression from the writings of St. Paul, which, he claims, is scarcely conceivable had it really been used habitually by Christ; (3) its absence likewise from the literature of the sub-apostolic ages, the Didache, Clement, Polycarp, the Shepherd of Hermas, etc., after a review of which Lietzmann finds it to be first alluded to by the Gnostic sect of Ophites (pp. 62–69), Marcion (c. 120–150 A.D.), and Ignatius (Ephes. xx. 2, τῷ υἱῷ ἀνθρώπου καὶ υἱῷ θεοῦ). And Wellhausen, though for long he could not bring himself to such a tour de force ('Gewaltstreich'), was forced ultimately to agree with Lietzmann. The sense in which he formerly (see above) supposed Christ to have used the expression he now considered to be too abstract, and could consequently find no alternative left but, bold as the step might appear, to deny that Christ used the expression at all. The title originated in Dn 7^{13}, being attributed first to Jesus in the eschatological passages (cf. Mk 13^{26}, where, as Wellh. observes, 'the son of man' is not expressly identified with the speaker); and its adoption afterwards as a general self-designation of Jesus was perhaps facilitated by a misapprehension of passages such as Mk 2^{28}, in which barnāshā, though meant generally, was interpreted as referring specially to Christ.[*]

The general conclusion that Christ had not Himself used the title had been reached before, though without the use of the argument based upon the Aramaic, by Volkmar in 1870, and especially by Oort (in De Uitdrukking ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀ. in het NT, 1893), who, though he allowed that Jesus might have used the expression as a symbol of the future kingdom, argued that He did not use it as a self-designation; it was introduced first as a personal title by the early Christians from apocalyptic literature, and was ascribed afterwards to Jesus Himself by the evangelists.

9. Such a conclusion, conflicting, as it does, with all the direct evidence that we possess on the subject, could not be accepted, except upon the clearest and strongest grounds; and it is not surprising to find the leading NT scholars on the Continent, including even those who approach the Gospel records from a thoroughly critical standpoint, opposed to it. The principal objections may be thus summarized. (1) The variations between this title and the personal pron. presented by many of the parallel narratives (see the Table), show, indeed, that there are occasions on which we cannot be sure whether the term was actually used by our Lord or not, and it might be admitted (see § 22) that there were even other passages in which it had been attributed to Him incorrectly; but that an expression which in the Gospels is attributed solely to Him, and is never used by the evangelists themselves, should in reality have been never used by Him, but have been introduced into the Gospels entirely by the evangelists, implies an inversion of the facts which is hardly credible. (2) The attribution of the expression to Christ does not depend upon isolated texts in individual Gospels; it has in many cases, as the Table shows, the support of the double, and even of the triple, Synoptic tradition. (3) Exactly the same usage is found, moreover, in the independent tradition represented by the Fourth Gospel; and, as Dr. Drummond [§ 24] remarks, 'there seems to be no particular reason for its appearance in this Gospel, except the fact that it was at least believed to be a common expression in the mouth of Jesus.' Direct personal reminiscences unquestionably underlie both these traditions; and, as the same authority further remarks, 'the apostles must have known whether their Master spoke of Himself in the way recorded in the Gospels or not; and the Gospels are sufficiently near apostolical sources to make us pause before admitting that the Church is responsible for the appearance of so striking a characteristic' as this title in the mouth of Christ. (4) Even assuming that the title was introduced into the eschatological passages in the manner supposed, it is difficult to conjecture a motive for extending the usage to a number of other passages of an entirely different character (Baldensperger [§ 24], p. 254). (5) As regards the supposition that the ascription of the expression to Christ was due to the early Church, Dr. Drummond observes: 'The Church was more likely to omit than to insert the phrase. Reliance is placed on the silence of Christian writers to show that the phrase was not known. The Gospels conclusively prove that it was known; and to imagine that it was a favourite expression just during the period when the Gospels were composed, and that before that time it was not known, and after that time it was not in common use, is to construct history to suit the hypothesis. The Church would have preferred some title apparently higher and more dignified.' (6) St. Paul, it is urged, never uses the title. But neither do the evangelists in speaking of Christ, and yet their own narratives show that they were acquainted with it, and believed it to have been used by Christ. Unless Ac 7^{56} is to be eliminated as unhistorical, along with the numerous occurrences of the title in the mouth of Christ found in the Gospels, it must have been known at the time of Stephen's martyrdom as a designation of Jesus; for otherwise there would be no sufficient cause in Stephen's exclamation to account for the fury of the Jews (Drummond). Schmiedel, moreover,* argues at length that the use made of Ps 8 in 1 Co 15^{27} and He 2^{6-9} presupposes the acquaintance of the apostles with the expression as a designation of Christ; the fact that they do not use it more frequently is not difficult to explain. They wrote largely for converts from heathenism, who would be liable to misunderstand it; and they naturally chose by preference terms which would give prominence to the Divinity of Christ. The case would be similar with the sub-apostolic writers. Barnab. 12^{8-10}, however, which, it had been alleged, was proof that the writer was unacquainted with the title, had been wrongly explained (as Lietzmann afterwards admitted †).

10. All these considerations would, however, undoubtedly have to yield, if it were philologically certain that 'the son of man' could not have been an expression used by our Lord. The reasons adduced in support of this conclusion are, beyond question, weighty; we must consider carefully whether they are conclusive.

In the first place, it must be clearly understood that we have no actual knowledge of the Aram. original used (presumably) by Christ. We have no records of the Galilæan dialect as early as the first cent. A.D.; and hence the Aram. original of 'the son of man' is a matter not of actual knowledge, but of inference. Three possibilities must be kept in view. (1) Wellh. says that barnāsh(ā) in the sense of 'man' is common to Aramaic dialects in general; but this statement is in excess of the evidence; its occurrence in the exceptional passage Dn 7^{13} (in which a semi-poetical expression would be but natural) is not proof that it was in general use in that sense in Bibl. Aramaic; and it is not found in other passages of Dn. (as $7^{4.8}$), in which, if it were as commonly in use as it is in the Jerus. Talm., it might be naturally expected. It does not occur in the Aram. of Onk., and occurs but rarely in that of Jon. (§ 7 a); and though Wellh. (pp. vi, 195) explains its absence from these Targums by the fact that their authors adhered closely to the Heb. (in which, as pointed out in § 6, the sing. 'son of man' is of rare occurrence), yet it is not certain that this explanation is the correct one. The Pal. Targ. on the Psalms and Job, and the Pesh., are also in general literal translations, and yet bar nāsh(ā) occurs in both frequently (cf. above, § 7 (c), (d)).

Onk. uses regularly אינש for 'soul' (=person), Lv 2^{1} $4^{2.27}$ $5^{1.2.4}$ etc.; and אינשא ההוא for 'that soul,' Gn 17^{14}, Ex 31^{14}, Lv $7^{20.21.27}$ 19^{8} 20^{6} and elsewhere. In all these passages pseudo-Jon. uses as regularly 'barnāsh,' 'barnāshā.' So in Dt $8^{3.3}$ (for האדם) pseudo-Jon. has בר נשא, while Onk. has אינשא; and in the expression 'the work of man's (or men's) hands' אדם is rendered by barnāsh(ā) in the Palest. Targums (Ps 115^{4} 135^{15}, 2 Ch 32^{19}), but by 'ĕnāshā in Onk. (Dt 4^{28}) and Jon. (2 K 19^{18}, Is 37^{19}). Similarly אנוש is rendered in the Pal. Targums by barnāsh(ā), Ps 8^{5} $9^{20.21}$ 103^{15} 104^{15} etc., but by 'ĕnāshā in Jon. (Is 13^{7} 24^{6} 51^{12} 56^{2}). Cf. also Ps 118^{8b} (Pal Targ.: בר נש) with Jer 17^{5} (Jon.: אינשא). So Fiebig, p. 11.

It is true ('ĕ)nāshā is used mostly as a collective term; but Wellh.'s argument (p. v) to show that it is used so always, and that consequently, unless bar ('ĕ)nāsh(ā) were in use, there would have been no means of expressing the idea of (a single, particular) man (homo) in Aram., is surely not conclusive; for in Onk. אינשא ההוא, as has been just shown, occurs repeatedly in the sense of that man (comp. in Heb. the analogous individual and collective applications of איש). So Fiebig, p. 11.

The Aram. dialects do differ from one another in details of linguistic usage; * and though barnāsh(ā) is common in the Galilæan dialects of the 3rd or 4th cent. A.D., it may not, as Dalman points out, have been equally common in the 1st cent.; and if usage had not at that time obliterated the distinctive force of the first part of the compound, bar nāshā might have been used by Christ in the sense of 'the Son of man.' It must, however, be allowed that Fiebig [§ 24] has made it probable (pp. 33–36, 59 f.) from quotations in the Jerus. Talm. that bar nāsh(ā) = 'man' was current in Galilee in the 2nd cent. A.D.

(2) In the Sin. (Curet.) and Pesh. versions of NT, 'the Son of man' is, for distinction from the barnāshā which stands for ὁ ἄνθρωπος, always represented by b'rēh d'nāshā † (lit. his son, that of man,—the pleonasm being an idiom very common in Aram. ‡),—grammatically (Nöld.) 'a more strongly determined form of barnāshā.' If in the Aram. spoken in the time of Christ barnāsh(ā) was really in common use in the sense of 'man,' there does not seem to be any sufficient reason why, if our Lord desired to express the idea of 'the Son of man,' He should not have made use of this expression. There would be nothing unsuitable in its being an unusual and emphatic one; and that there was some Semitic expression bearing this meaning appears, as Hilgenfeld has pointed out,§ from the fact that in the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews, which Jerome himself translated from Aramaic (or, as he elsewhere says, from Hebrew), there was a saying of Christ, addressed to James, which (in Jerome's tr.) reads, 'Frater mi, comede panem tuum, quia resurrexit filius hominis a dormientibus.' ‖

From a communication printed by Dr. Drummond,¶ it appears that Prof. Nöldeke also is disposed to agree with Wellhausen. To differ from Prof. Nöldeke on a point of Aramaic or Arabic usage would be to court certain error; but from the terms in which he expresses himself, it does not seem that he means to pronounce an absolute philological veto against the position that Jesus may have spoken of Himself in Aramaic as 'the Son of man.'

(3) No doubt our Lord, as a rule, spoke in Aramaic; but, as Prof. Sanday has remarked to the present writer, it is quite possible that He may, upon occasion, have spoken also in Greek. In this case, which is more than a mere abstract possibility, the expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου may actually have been sometimes heard upon His lips.

11. Origin and meaning of the term as used in NT.—Here we must first consider the question whether the term is used in previous or contemporary Jewish literature, and, if so, in what sense. In Dn 7^{13}, as has been already remarked, the 'one like unto a son of man' denoted originally, in all probability, the glorified people of Israel; but the expression was undoubtedly interpreted at an early date of the Messiah. The most remarkable evidence of this is afforded by that part of the (composite) Book of Enoch (ch. 37–70), which is commonly known as the 'Similitudes,' and which is attributed generally to the 1st cent. B.C. (see vol. i. pp. 707^b–708^a). Enoch is here represented as carried in his vision into heaven, where he sees the 'Head of Days' (a title of the Almighty suggested by Dn 7^{13}) surrounded by an innumerable company of angels (40^1), and beside Him the Messiah, sitting on 'the throne of his glory' ($62^{2.3.5}$ $69^{27.29}$), and executing judgment upon wicked men and angels. The Messiah is often spoken of as the 'Elect One' (Is 42^1); but in ch. 46 he is introduced in terms which more particularly concern us here—

46^1 'And there I saw One who had a head of days (i.e. an aged head), and his head was white like wool (Dn 7^9), and with him was another one whose face was as the appearance of a man, and his face was full of graciousness, like one of the holy angels. [2] And I asked the angel who went with me, and showed me all the hidden things, concerning that son of man, who he was, and whence he was, and why he went with the Head of Days. And he answered and said unto me, [3] This is the son of man who hath righteousness, with whom dwelleth righteousness, and who reveals all the treasures of that which is hidden, because the Lord of Spirits hath chosen him, and his lot before the Lord of Spirits hath surpassed everything in uprightness for ever. [4] And this son of man whom thou hast seen will arouse the kings and the mighty ones from their couches, and the strong ones from their thrones, and execute judgment upon them.'

The judgment is described most fully in ch. 62—

62^2 'And the Lord of Spirits seated him (the Elect One) on the throne of his glory, and the spirit of righteousness was poured out upon him, and the word of his mouth slew all the sinners [Is 11^4], and all the unrighteous were destroyed before his face. . . . [5] And their countenance will fall, and pain will seize them, when they see that son of man sitting on the throne of his glory. . . . [9] And all the kings and the mighty and the exalted and those who rule the earth will fall down on their faces before him, and worship, and set their hope upon that son of man, and will petition him and supplicate for mercy at his hands.' But it will be too late: the 'angels of punishment' will take them in charge, and carry them away to their appointed doom. But the righteous will be saved on that day; [14] 'and the Lord of Spirits will abide over them, and with that son of man will they eat and lie down and rise up for ever and ever.' Cf. 69^{27} 'And he sat on the throne of his glory, and the sum of judgment was committed unto him, the son of man, and he caused the sinners and those who have led the world astray to pass away and be destroyed from off the face of the earth.'

The 'son of man' of the 'Similitudes' is thus an august, superhuman being, who is seated on his throne beside the Almighty, and exercises in particular the functions of judge. This representation, it is to be observed, though based, no doubt, upon that of Dn 7, is not identical with it: in Daniel it is God who is the judge; the 'one like unto a son of man' appears upon the scene only after the judgment is completed, and he comes, not to exercise judgment, but to receive a kingdom.

It has been much disputed whether 'the son of man' is a title in the Similitudes or not.

The expressions used are, 'that (zeku or we'etu) son of man' (46^2 48^2 62^5 [see Charles, or Beer, in Kautzsch's Apokryphen, ad loc.], vv.$^{9.14}$ 63^{11} $69^{26.29.29}$ 70^1 71^{17}), 'this son of man' (46^4), and 'the son of man' (46^3 [see Dillm. Æth. Gram. § 194] 62^7 69^{27}). On the one side, it is argued, Enoch sees in his vision a human form (46^1), which is afterwards (46^2 etc.) referred to as 'that (or this) son of man,'—'son of man,' rather than simply 'man,' being (presumably) employed, partly on account of Dn 7^{13} (which the context shows to be in the writer's mind), partly as being a rather more distinct and individual term. 'The son of man' of 46^3 62^7 69^{27} might similarly be nothing more than an expression referring back to 46^1; and the same, it is urged, might be said even of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, if, as is possible (see esp. Charles, Eschatology, p. 214 f.), this were the Greek which lay before the Ethiopic translator.* On the other hand, the somewhat marked prominence of the term is an indication that some significance attaches to it; else why does the writer not say 'the Elect one' (as $49^{2.4}$ $51^{3.5}$ $52^{6.9}$ al.), or 'the Anointed one' (as 48^{10} 52^4)?

On the whole, it may probably be fairly said, as is claimed by Baldensperger ([§ 24], p. 246), and admitted by Dr. Drummond (p. 544), that the expression, even if not a title in Enoch, is next door to becoming one, and that the step of making it a title is one which at any time afterwards might be readily taken. If, however, the view of 'the son of man' adopted in this art. (§§ 17, 21) be the correct one, it will be seen to be a matter of indifference whether the expression was a 'title' in Enoch or not.

The reader ought, however, to be aware that it can hardly be said to be certain that the 'Similitudes' are of pre-Christian origin; though this is the view taken by the great majority of critics, who urge in particular that, had they been written (or interpolated) under Christian influence, the allusions to the historical Christ would have been more definite. See Schürer^2, ii. 626 (^{3}iii. 201 f.).

12. Another passage, which, though of post-Christian date (probably A.D. 81–96), seems to show no traces of Christian influence (see vol. ii. p. 766^a), and deserves to be quoted in the same connexion, is 2 (4) Es $13^{3ff.}$. Here Ezra is represented as seeing in a dream the sea disturbed by a wind, and a 'man,' who is declared afterwards (v.^{26}) to be God's appointed judge and deliverer (i.e., though the word itself is not used, the Messiah), ascending out of it—

'And I beheld, and, lo, this wind caused to come up from the midst of the sea as it were the likeness of a man, and I beheld, and, lo, that man flew with the clouds of heaven [cf. Dn 7^{13}]: and when he turned his countenance to look, all things trembled that were seen under him.' In the sequel, the same 'man that came up out of the sea,' as he is termed (v.^{5}, cf. vv.$^{25.51}$), destroys by a 'flaming breath,' proceeding out of his mouth, the multitudes which assemble against him, and calls back to the land of Israel the ten tribes (vv.$^{10f.12.39-49}$).

Here then at least the Messiah is described, with evident reference to Dn 7^{13}, as a 'man.'

Dr. Charles has called attention also to 4 Es 6^1 in the Syr., Eth., and Arab.† versions (the world to be judged finally—first by [Arab. on account of] a 'man' [Syr. ביד ברנשא],—or, to judge from the Eth. vers., by a 'son of man,'—and afterwards by God: see Hilgenf. Mess. Jud. pp. 223, 275, 334); but the statement is inconsistent with 6^6, and is open to the suspicion of being a Christian interpolation (cf. Hilgenf. p. 54 n.).

13. In spite, however, of the usage of the 'Similitudes,' and of 2 Es $13^{3ff.}$, it seems clear that 'the Son of man' was no generally accepted title of the Messiah in the days of Christ. Dalm. (Die Worte Jesu, 197–204) shows that nothing exists in Jewish authorities in favour of such a supposition. The same conclusion is supported by the testimony of the Gospels. 'It is inconceivable that the Lord should have adopted a title which was popularly held to be synonymous with that of Messiah, while He carefully avoided the title of Messiah itself' (Westcott). The reply that He used it enigmatically is not to the point; for though He might have signified by it something different from the popular conception of the Messiah, it would still (ex hyp.) have been the Messiah, which those who heard Him would have understood Him to mean. Upon the same supposition, moreover, His use of it could not but have excited the hostility of the Jews, of which, however (in this connexion), the Gospels afford no trace: the 'blasphemy' of Mt 26^{65}=Mk 16^{64} consisted evidently not in His use of this title, but in the Divine prerogatives predicated of Himself as the bearer of it. The most that might be supposed is, that though not generally current as a title of the Messiah, it was familiar in that sense in the particular circle to which the 'Similitudes' belonged (above, vol. ii. 622^b, cf. 616^a).

* The Eth. zeku and we'etu not infrequently, in translations from the Greek, represent the Greek art. (Charles, l.c.; Dillm. Æth. Lex. col. 1057, 919). They are not, however, used in the Eth. NT in the tr. of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. (Dr. Charles, in his tr. of $69^{26.29.29}$ 70^1, has not represented the Eth. 'that').

14. In considering the meaning of the title, it ought to be clearly understood that it is not anywhere explained in the NT, so that whatever view of it be adopted must be a matter of conjecture and inference. To the same cause is due what is generally allowed to be the great difficulty of the question, and also the wide divergence of the conclusions which have been reached regarding it. The question is further complicated by the fact that there are two possible starting-points for the investigation: is the name a mere title, taken, as it were mechanically, from Dn 7^{13}, and so a mere periphrasis for 'Messiah'? or does the significance of the title lie in the four words of which it consists, and is the meaning which our Lord intended to convey by it to be ascertained by an analysis of these words? Or may the interpretations suggested by these two opposite points of view be in any way combined? Or, on the other hand, whichever of these interpretations be adopted, does it logically render the other unnecessary and superfluous [cf. § 20. 12]? Still further difficulties arise when the details of its usage in the Gospels are considered, as, for instance, the very different predicates associated with it; and further divergent conclusions are arrived at, corresponding to the view taken by the individual critic of the chronology of our Lord's discourses, and other questions of Gospel criticism.

15. Two main views may be said to have been advocated. According to one view, the title has no meaning of its own,[*] it is intended simply to point to the 'one like unto a son of man' in Dn 7^{13},[†] and so to express, directly and distinctly, the Messiahship of Jesus. According to the other view, the title, though it may have been chosen with an eye to Dn 7^{13}, expressed primarily the thought that Jesus was, in some special sense, a man above other men, the supreme representative of humanity, and only indirectly, especially towards the close of His ministry, suggested in addition the thought of His Messiahship. High authorities can be quoted for both these views. Thus Holtzmann writes (NT Theol. 1897, p. 247), 'The title certainly originates in Dn 7^{13}. Jesus adopts Daniel's view of the future kingdom: close beside this is in Daniel the figure of the "one like unto a son of man" who receives the kingdom from God, and in whom therefore it was natural for Jesus to see Himself prefigured: even though in Daniel the figure symbolized only the kingdom (and not its head), still here was the person who would establish it: Jesus, by His adoption of the title, implied that it would not be established apart from Himself.' He did not, however, this being the sense of the title, use it before Peter's confession (pp. 250 top, 260, 263 [cf. below, § 19]). 'Jesus,' Holtzmann continues, 'throws into the title whatever is characteristic of His mission and ministry. He makes it the exclusive designation of the person who is to represent and realize the ideas expressed by it. Just because He is conscious that this mission brings with it earthly privation and suffering, and even death, the "Son of man" becomes the subject of predications relating not only to future glory, but also to earthly humiliation and death. Thus Jesus is, and is called, the "Son of man," on the one hand wherever by forgiving and healing, by teaching and suffering, He proclaims, represents, or extends the kingdom; on the other hand, and especially, when, coming in glory, He completes it. As the kingdom is a present as well as a future reality, so the title "Son of man" bears reference to His work in the present not less than in the future' (pp. 250–3, abridged).

Upon this view the first art. (ὁ) points to Dn 7^{13} (Holtzm. p. 264 n.; Schmiedel, p. 264), the second (τοῦ) results simply by a kind of attraction, from the presence of the first (Schmiedel, l.c.; Winer, Gramm. § 19, 2*b*–4).

16. In what is here said of the use of the title, there is much that is, of course, perfectly just; but to the view taken of its origin there seem to be objections. In the vision of Daniel the 'one like unto a son of man' is represented as a glorified, heavenly being, and the kingdom is a triumphant kingdom. No account is taken of the long period during which, as a matter of history, the kingdom was gradually and slowly to extend itself among men; it has been finally and universally established in the earth (7^{14}). Now, if the passages in which our Lord first used the expression had been those in which He describes His future advent in glory, there would have been a direct point of contact with the vision in Daniel, sufficient to account for the title being adopted from it; but, as it is, it is impossible, without most arbitrary treatment of the Gospel narratives, to suppose that to have been the case; and thus, with the passages in which He is actually represented as first using it, and which all deal with various aspects of His life in humility upon earth, there is no point of contact in Daniel at all. As Westcott (Speaker's Comm. on St. John, p. 34) says, 'It is out of the question to suppose that the definite article simply expressed "the prophetic son of man." The manner in which the title is first used excludes such an interpretation.' There is nothing, viz., in the manner in which the title is first used—or indeed chiefly used—in the Synoptic Gospels, to suggest a reference to Daniel, or to lead to the supposition that our Lord intended by His use of it to bring before His hearers the transcendent, heavenly being represented in Daniel. A being, conscious, indeed, of his authority and of the high mission entrusted to him, but presenting all the outward marks of earthly humility, and only in the future destined to assume heavenly majesty, is surely what the title denotes in the Gospels. Holtzmann's identification of the kingdom pictured in Daniel, not with the kingdom of Christ in its final glory, but with the kingdom at the time of His founding it during His earthly ministry, is not natural. There is equally little, not to say less, to suggest that the title is borrowed from the 'Similitudes' of Enoch. It is also difficult not to think (in spite of Holtzm. p. 253 f.) that it is intended to express primarily, and also more fully and distinctively than even Holsten (§ 20. 11) allows, some meaning directly involved in the words of which it consists (analogous, for instance, to that of its correlative, the 'Son of God').

17. The other main view may be stated substantially, as is done by B. Weiss (NT Theol. 1884,

[*] Schmiedel, p. 264: 'The name is given [viz. by Dn 7^{13}]; what it signifies is matter not for an analytical judgment, but for a synthetical one,' i.e. it is to be ascertained from 'predicates defining the work or office of the Messiah.' Cf. Holtzm. p. 253 bottom, 264 n.; Wellh. p. 214.

[†] Cf. H. A. W. Meyer on Mt 8^{20} (altered in the 8th ed. by B. Weiss).

§ 16). (1) Our Lord adopted this title just because it was not a current title of the Messiah. In view of the expectations of a personal Messiah which prevailed at the time, Dn 7^{13} could certainly in His day be interpreted only of the Messiah; but, even so, He could not assume that this particular passage would be so generally known that the expression, 'the Son of man,' would be at once understood as referring to it. The case would be different if we could presuppose the use made of Daniel in Enoch; but, even if the pre-Christian origin of the 'Similitudes' be granted, it is far from clear that they were familiarly known in the circles in which our Lord's ministry principally lay. Only when Jesus in the eschatological passages directed attention to Dn 7^{13} could the title be understood generally as a Messianic designation. This view of His use of the title agrees with the manner in which, during all the earlier part of His ministry, He avoided any direct announcement of His Messiahship, in order not to lend encouragement to the unspiritual ideas attaching to the popular conception of the Messiah. (2) For His hearers the idea expressed by the title would be that He was not a 'son of man' like all others, but that He was 'the son of man,' one who, in virtue of His character and personality, held a unique position among men. It did not designate merely His humanity (for this must have been evident to all who saw Him), but it marked Him out as in some sense a special or representative man. (3) Christ's statements respecting the 'Son of man,' the functions, office, and divinely appointed destinies assigned to him, point to one who has a mission higher than that of an ordinary prophet, *i.e. in*directly to one who is also the Messiah. They speak of Him, for instance, as in various ways proclaiming or establishing the kingdom of God. He has authority to forgive sins; and He gives His life a ransom for many. He is contrasted with John the Baptist, who is merely a forerunner. The sufferings of the Son of man are divinely appointed (δεῖ,—Mk 8^{31} ‖ ‖, al.), because it is implied in the OT that God's plan of salvation would not be finally realized upon earth without the suffering and death of the servant of God by whom it would be accomplished. (4) Lastly, in the prophecies of the Second Advent, our Lord alluded so clearly to Dn 7^{13} that though He does not expressly identify Himself with the 'one like unto a son of man' there spoken of, those who heard Him, and who identified the figure in Daniel with the Messiah, could not but conclude that He meant by the term that particular 'son of man' who was to be the Messiah.[*]

Upon this view the second art. (τοῦ) is generic or collective (Winer, § 27. 1; Gn $6^{6.7}$ 8^{21} 9^{6}, 2 S 7^{19}, Mk 2^{27}, Jn 2^{25}), the first art. (ὁ) specifies the individual of the genus meant (Weiss, § 16*b*).

18. This opinion, that the title, viz., even though it may have been suggested by Dn 7^{13}, was nevertheless intended, and even intended primarily, to express in some manner the relation of Jesus to humanity, has been largely held (see § 20; and the references in Holtzm. pp. 254, 255). It has, however, been objected to it that if the title denoted the 'ideal' or 'representative' man, the predicates affirmed of it could be only those which were involved in the idea itself,—i.e., to speak technically, were the predicates of analytical, not of synthetical judgments, which obviously is not the case with the predicates affirmed of the 'Son of man' in the Gospels. This would, no doubt, be true if the title were understood to be a designation of the 'ideal' man, but not if (abandoning this abstract expression) it be understood to designate a particular, individual man, embodying in their highest perfection the attributes of humanity. And this is the sense in which Weiss and Westcott (§ 20), for instance, understand the title. There will then be no difficulty in understanding the predicates affirmed of the 'Son of man' as synthetical judgments: they will result, in other words, not from an analysis of the idea of 'man,' but from the experience, present or future, of the particular individual actually denoted by the term. As Holtzmann, though himself preferring the other view, writes (p. 254), 'The possibility is by no means excluded that the conception of the Messiah was rooted in the idea of man, and that Jesus, in choosing this designation, instead of others that were open to Him, intended thereby to express His relationship to humanity.'

The fact just mentioned has been made the ground of a further objection to the same opinion. As has just been shown, if we start from the idea of 'man,' none of the predicates applied in the Gospels to the 'Son of man' can be obtained from an analysis of that idea. But if we start from the equation (given by Dn 7^{13}) 'Son of man' = 'Messiah,' then all these predicates become analytical judgments; they are, it is said, derivable, at least largely, from the idea of 'Messiah' itself; they are expressions, not of Jesus' conception of 'man,' but of His conception of His Messiahship.[*] And hence it is concluded that the term was used by Him as properly and primarily signifying 'Messiah.' It may be doubted if this conclusion necessarily follows from the premises. If the term denoted Jesus primarily as a Man above other men, a Man with a unique position and mission, this position and mission would, from another point of view, be also those of the 'Messiah'; and the predicates describing different aspects of His work and ministry would accordingly be those belonging to Him as 'Messiah.' The offices and functions ascribed to the 'Son of man' in the Gospels are deduced by Weiss, starting from the idea of 'man,' not less naturally than by Holtzmann, starting from the idea of 'Messiah.'

19. Two questions, intimately connected, remain to be considered, which also, as will appear, have a bearing upon the question of the origin of the title. At what period in His ministry did our Lord first use the title? And in what sense was it understood by those who heard it? Or, to put the possible alternatives unambiguously, did it veil or reveal His Messiahship? It is clear that our Lord only declared His Messiahship gradually. The question put by Him to the disciples at Cæsarea Philippi, and Peter's reply (Mt 16^{13-16} = Mk 8^{27-29} = Lk 19^{18-20}), particularly when taken in connexion with our Lord's comment in Mt 16^{17}, make it evident that up to that time He had not openly declared Himself as the Messiah; and the prohibitions in Mt 16^{20} = Mk 8^{30} = Lk 9^{21}, and Mt 17^{9} = Mk 9^{9}, cf. Lk 9^{36}, show that He still did not wish the fact to be known to the people generally. In the Synoptic Gospels there are, however (see the Table, § 3), 9 passages in Matthew, 2 in Mark, and 4 in Luke, in which the title 'Son of man' is ascribed to our Lord before the occasion at Cæsarea Philippi. If, then, the title was a current Mess. title, or even if His hearers, when He used it, were likely at once to perceive a reference to Dn 7^{13}, it is clear that He must, by His use of it, have revealed His Messiahship, from virtually the beginning of His ministry, both to His disciples and to the people at large. This, however, as we have just seen, was inconsistent with His avowed purpose. Hence those who believe that it was a current Mess. title are obliged to get rid of those passages in the Gospels which represent our Lord

[*] The views of Bruce, Kingdom of God ^{2} (1890), 172–78, and of Stevens, NT Theol. (1899), 51–53, while somewhat differently put, do not differ materially from that of Weiss.

[*] Holsten [§ 10. 11], pp. 36–39; cf. Lietzmann, 14, 15, 24.

as using it before Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi. Matthew (in whom most of the passages occur) is the evangelist who, generally, displays the least regard for historical sequence, and sometimes groups incidents and sayings together merely on account of material resemblances; he even represents the disciples as owning Jesus to be the 'Son of God' (14^{33}: no ‖ in Mk 6$^{51f.}$ Jn 6^{21}) before the confession at Cæsarea Philippi. Hence there is no difficulty in supposing that Mt 10^{23} 13^{41} (in which, whatever view be taken of the meaning of the title, the predicates applied to it, describing the Second Advent, show that the Messiah is referred to) are placed too early in our Lord's ministry;* and the same supposition might be reasonably made (upon the assumption that 'the Son of man' was a Mess. title) in the case of some other passages, as Mt 8^{20} 12^{40};† but it is difficult to think that Mk 2^{10}=Mt 9^{6}=Lk 5^{24}, Mk 2^{28}=Mt 12^{8}=Lk 6^{5}, [Mk 3$^{28f.}$=] Mt 12^{32}=Lk 12^{10}, can be so misplaced. Nevertheless, those who believe 'the Son of man' to be an explicit Mess. title are obliged to assume this (cf. § 20. 12), or else to hold either that Jesus never used the title at all, or (so Holtzm. p. 263, cf. 256 f.) that, on at least the three last-named occasions, He spoke of 'man' in general (see, further on these passages, § 22).‡

The second of these alternatives we have already found ourselves unable to accept; but does either the first or the third suffice to remove the difficulty? Is it really credible that our Lord first used the expression of Himself, after Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi? Is not the familiar manner in which He used the title, if not in the question put to Peter (Mt 16^{13}, but not Mk 8^{27}, Lk 9^{18}), yet directly after it (Mk 8^{31}, Lk 9^{22}), without exciting any comment or surprise, sufficient evidence that it must have been often used by Him previously, and that it was an expression which, whatever special ideas it may have been intended to convey, was well understood to denote Himself? These considerations, as it seems to the present writer, constitute a strong argument against the supposition that it was a current Mess. title, or even (without supposing as much as this) that it was adopted by our Lord as a Mess. title, for the purpose of proclaiming His Messiahship.

The title, we thus seem forced to conclude, was used by our Lord in His Galilæan ministry; but it did not suggest to those who heard it Mess. associations, until it came to be connected with predictions of the Second Advent; it thus did not reveal, but veil, His Messiahship. Christ's use of the term was pædagogic. It veiled His Messiahship during the earlier part of His ministry, till the time was ripe for Him to avow it openly.§ By His adoption of it, He found a means, on the one hand, of not denying even in public His consciousness of His unique mission, and, on the other hand, of lending no countenance to the crude and illusory hopes which attached to popular ideas of the Messiah (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 429).

20. The following summary (which makes no pretension to be exhaustive) may be useful to the reader, partly as illustrating, especially when taken in connexion with the views that have been already stated, the great diversity of opinion which has prevailed—and in part prevails still—with regard to the meaning of the title, partly as exemplifying the lines along which attempts have been principally made to solve the problems which it presents.

1. Neander (Leben Jesu, 1837, 129 ff.; Eng. tr.^{4} p. 99). The title denotes Jesus on His human side, as One belonging to humanity, who in His humanity has done so much for it, through whom it is glorified, and who has realized most completely the ideal ('Urbild') of humanity.

2. Baur (Z. Wiss. Theol. 1860, 274–292; NT Theol. 1864, 77–83). Not at the time a current title of the Messiah, but chosen by Jesus in opposition to prevalent Jewish conceptions of a victorious, earthly Messiah. It emphasized His humanity, His subjection to the needs and experiences of ordinary men; and denoted Him also as one who made all the deepest human interests His own, and had the wide human sympathies expressed, for instance, in the Beatitudes. It was suggested by Dn 7^{13}; and Jesus adopted it as a title, which, while possessing no popular Mess. associations, was adapted to express the Mess. idea in its higher significance.

3. Hilgenfeld (Z. Wiss. Th. 1863, 327–334; cf. 1894, 16 f.). Not a current Mess. title. Suggested by Dn 7^{13}, but used by Jesus with the object of giving prominence to His humanity, and of emphasizing the humility and external lowliness which in His person were combined with the exalted dignity of the Messiah. It thus in a veiled manner pointed to His Messiahship. Jesus, by uniting spiritual loftiness with earthly lowliness, 'transfigured' the popular Jewish idea of the Messiah.

4. Weizsäcker (Evang. Gesch. 1864, 426–431). Not a current Mess. title (for, if it had been, Jesus would have been attacked for appropriating it); and adopted by Jesus, not from Dn 7^{13}, but from Ezekiel, to designate Himself specially as a prophet. The Mess. sense, derived from Dn 7^{13}, was attached to it only at a later period of our Lord's life.

5. Holtzmann (in 1865; Z. Wiss. Th. 212–237). Not a current title of the Messiah (for else Jesus would have been attacked for using it), but borrowed by Him as a Mess. title from Dn 7^{13}, 'the expression used by Dn. reflecting itself in His consciousness in a universal and human sense.' It thus denoted Him not merely as the Messiah, but as 'the bearer of all human dignity and rights,' as 'one who held a peculiar and central position among the υἱοὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων.' Not being a current Mess. title, it was a riddle to those who heard it, and served to veil, not to reveal, His Messiahship.

6. Keim (Der Gesch. Christus, 1865, p. 105 f.; Jesus of Naz. tr. iii. 79–92). The title had a double aspect: on the basis first of Ps 8$^{4f.}$, though afterwards also of Dn 7^{13}, it expressed Jesus' sense on the one hand of His human lowliness, on the other hand of His Messianic dignity: in particular, He intended by His use of it to show that even in His capacity as Messiah He was part and parcel of humanity, and to teach His disciples that it was pre-eminently His vocation to serve and suffer for humanity.

7. Wittichen (1868). In Dn 7^{13} the 'son of man' represents the ethical character of the future Isr. dominion, as opposed to the worldly heathen dominions; this idea is, however, first embodied in an individual in Enoch, from which book Jesus adopted the title. He designated Himself by it as the perfect representative of the idea of man, especially on its ethical side, and at the same time as the Messiah, the chosen organ for the fuller realization of this idea in the world. The idea as presented in Enoch is spiritualized and morally deepened by Jesus, and also combined by Him with associations derived from the OT 'servant of Jehovah.'

8. Westcott (l.c. 1880). The title is a new one, not derived from Dn 7^{13}; and it expresses Christ's relation not to a family, or to a nation, but to all humanity. There is nothing in the Gospels to show that it was understood as a title of the Messiah. The idea of the true humanity of Christ lies at the foundation of it. He was the representative of the whole race, in whom the complete conception of manhood was absolutely attained, and who exhibited all the truest and noblest attributes of the race. Cf. Stanton, The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, 1886, p. 246: 'It is clear that Christ by His phrase represented Himself as the head, the type, the ideal of the race.'

9. Wendt, 1890 (The Teaching of Jesus, ii. 139–151). Not a current Mess. title. Dn 7^{13} suggested the combination of creaturely frailty and lowliness with high dignity; and so Jesus, when He used the title, taught that He was a frail human creature, and yet showed that He remembered the proph. word that the Mess. dignity was to belong to 'one like unto a son of man.' It was no announcement of His Mess. claims, but rather propounded a problem for His hearers to reflect upon.

10. J. E. Carpenter (The First Three Gospels, their Origin and Relations, 1890, pp. 118–120, 244–257, 372–388). Jesus never used the expression to designate Himself: He employed it only in the eschatological passages, and in these it was used by Him symbolically to denote the establishment of God's kingdom of righteousness upon earth. The primitive Church understood the expression in a personal sense, and then ascribed it, as a Mess. title, to Jesus Himself.

11. Holsten (Z. f. Wiss. Theol. 1891, pp. 1–79). The title, though not a current Mess. one, was understood by Jesus in that sense, as appears from the fact that He always uses it to express some aspect of the work or activity of the Messiah (cf. Holtzmann: § 15). It was adopted from Dn 7^{13}, though this passage gave only the outer form, the contents being supplied by the experience and knowledge of the historical Jesus (as teacher, sufferer, redeemer, etc.): only thus did He convert 'the visionary form of a Messiah, which He found in Daniel, into His own living Mess. personality' (p. 68, cf. 60). He would

* Some other passages in Matthew, involving the avowal of Jesus' Messiahship, though not with the use of this title, are also probably ante-dated; cf. Holtzmann, p. 259.

† In Lk 6^{22} [contrast Mt 5^{11}], 7^{34}=Mt 11^{19}, Holtzmann (p. 251) doubts whether the title (which he regards as Mess.) is original.

‡ Fiebig, however [§ 24], thinks that in these cases it was simply misunderstood (as='man,' 'a man') by those who heard it.

§ Keim. Similarly Baur, Hase, Lange, Ritschl, Harnack, and others, as cited by Holtzmann, p. 261 n. 1, 262 n. 5.

not, however, have appropriated the title, had He not desired to designate Himself as a member of the genus 'man,' and also recognized Himself as the member of the genus referred to in Dn 7^{13} (p. 47). The difficulty (cf. § 16) of understanding how Jesus could have denoted Himself, under the conditions of His earthly life, by a term suggesting only the transcendent Being of Daniel, is met by the supposition (which, however, lacks support in the text of Dn. itself) that the 'one like unto a son of man' in Dn 7^{13} is really to be conceived as having been brought before God, and invested by Him with power and greatness, out of a previous state of earthly humility and weakness (pp. 61, 67 f.). The title was used by Jesus in His Galilæan ministry (Mk 2^{10} etc.); for though He Himself understood it in a Mess. sense, this was not necessarily placed upon it even by scripture-students, esp. if His own appearance and manner of life did not suggest it: it would be taken naturally by those who heard it, including, up to the time of Peter's confession, even the disciples, to signify simply 'the man.' And this would agree with His own purpose of keeping for a while His Messiahship a secret (pp. 20, 22, 31 f., 70 f.).

12. Baldensperger (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu im Lichte der Mess. Hoffnungen seiner Zeit^{2}, 1892) emphasizes strongly the prevalence of apocalyptic conceptions in the time of Christ. He rejects emphatically the opinion that the title concealed Jesus' Messiahship, and also the view that it was intended to express any aspect of His humanity. It was (through the influence of Daniel and Enoch) a known Mess. title in the time of Christ; and Jesus adopted it with the express object of proclaiming His Messiahship. It was a triumphant designation of the Messiah; and Jesus connected it with declarations respecting His humiliation and sufferings for the express purpose of showing (in opposition to current Jewish ideas) that these were integral elements in His conception of the Messiah. As, however, it was an open proclamation of His Messiahship, He cannot have used it before Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi: the passages in the Gospels which imply that He did this must be chronologically misplaced. Baldensperger closes with a severe criticism of Holsten for admitting in again 'by a back-door' (see above, No. 11) any reference in the title to the humanity of Jesus, which he had himself shown to be out of the question, as well as unnecessary, in view of the direct derivation of the title from Dn 7^{13} (pp. 182–189); and of Wendt for discovering in the expression anything of the nature of creaturely weakness or humility (pp. 189–192).

13. J. V. Bartlet (Expos., Dec. 1892, 427–443). The title may have been suggested by Dn 7^{13}; but as used by Jesus it denotes Him as the ideal representative, partly of humanity in general, partly of the Kingdom of God in particular, especially under those aspects of character which belong to the suffering servant in Deutero-Isaiah.

14. Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1898, 191–219; cf. Exp. Times, x. 438–443). Not a current Mess. title, but adopted by Jesus from Dn 7^{13}, and very probably also with the thought of Ps $8^{4f.}$ at the same time, because He was the destined Messiah. It veiled His Messiahship behind a name which emphasized the humanity of its bearer. It implied that He was in some sense a man 'above other men,' but not that He was the 'ideal' man —a conception foreign to Jewish thought, and not at all suggested by the teaching of Jesus. He avoided the term 'Messiah' on account of the false ideas associated with it by the Jews: the 'son of man' in Daniel, on the other hand, was one who was not to win the kingdom by his own strength, but to receive it at the hands of God, and might have to do this through suffering and death: Jesus thus assumed the title as 'a frail child of man, whom God would make Lord of the world.' Probably not used before Peter's confession; the passages in the Gospels which imply that it was, being chronologically misplaced.

15. Gunkel (Z. Wiss. Theol. 1899, 582–590) agrees that in Aram. the term meant only 'the man,' but thinks that there may have been an esoteric eschat. tradition underlying both Daniel, Enoch, and other apocalypses, in which (like other apoc. expressions, as 'the end,' 'the woes,' the 'elect,' ὁ κατέχων, etc.) 'the man' (perhaps orig. 'the man of God,' or 'of heaven') may have come to be used conventionally as a mystic synonym of 'the Messiah': Jesus might thus have adopted it as a self-designation; to outsiders it would mean simply 'the man,' and might be understood, for example, of an ancient prophet, returned to life (Mt 16^{14}); by the initiated, it would be understood to be a covert title of the Messiah.

16. J. Drummond, 1901 [see § 24]. The term is used elastically: starting from Dn 7^{13} Jesus may have regarded it as a typical expression for the ideal people of God, with which associations derived from the 'servant of God' in Is 52^{13}–53^{12} would readily connect themselves: conscious Himself of His Messianic calling, He would naturally regard Himself as the Head of this ideal class. The central idea of the expression would thus be that of the true servant of God,—pre-eminently Himself, but not necessarily and uniformly exclusive of others (so, e.g., in Mt 8^{20} 12^{31}, Mk $2^{10.28}$,—in Mt 11^{18} the expl. 'a man' [§ 8. 4] may be adopted). The eschat. passages may be visions of the spiritual conquest of the world by a Divinely commissioned humanity, personified as 'the son of man.'

21. Most of these opinions contain elements of truth; but the divergence as regards the fundamental idea denoted by the expression is remarkable. Still those views which see in the title some relation to humanity decidedly predominate. The present writer must own that he is most attracted by the views of Westcott and Weiss (to which those of Neander, Baur, and Holtzmann in 1865 lead up). The expression, understood in the natural sense of the words, denotes one who, though a Man, holds nevertheless a unique position among men; and this, it seems to him, is the proper starting-point for investigating its meaning, and discovering the further ideas (if any) attaching to it. He cannot think that the title was first used by Christ in the eschat. passages, or even after Peter's confession: whatever its special significance may have been, it must have been an expression heard frequently upon our Lord's lips, and the disciples must have first become familiar with it in comparatively neutral or colourless passages, not in those foretelling either His future sufferings or His future glory. The title may have been borrowed by our Lord from Dn 7^{13}; but He did not, at least when first using it, intend to bring before His hearers the figure there portrayed: He adopted it as a mere shell or form, suggestive of His humanity, into which He threw a new import and content of His own: more special associations derived from Dn 7^{13}—perhaps, also, in Mt 16^{27} 19^{28} 25^{31} from Enoch [*]—came first to be attached to it in the eschat. passages. Ps 8, with its strikingly-drawn contrast between the actual lowliness and the ideal dignity of man, may also well have contributed to the adoption of the title by our Lord. The title, as it seems to the present writer (though he would avoid such expressions as the 'ideal' or 'representative' man), designates Jesus as the Man in whom human nature was most fully and deeply realized, and who was the most complete exponent of its capacities, warm and broad in His sympathies, ready to minister and suffer for others, sharing to the full the needs and deprivations which are the common lot of humanity, but conscious at the same time of the dignity and greatness of human nature, and destined ultimately to exalt it to unexampled majesty and glory. He would in general endorse cordially what is written on this subject in vol. ii. p. $623^{a\text{-}b}$ (cf. also p. 850^{b}).

22. We append a few remarks on some particular passages in which the title is used.

a. Mt 8^{20}=Lk 9^{58} ('the foxes have holes,' etc.). As Schmiedel remarks (p. 293), Meyer's 'a man' (i.e. Jesus) [†] is exegetically impossible; Lietzmann's 'man' (generally) [‡] is out of the question. The contrast is evidently between the external lowliness and the inherent dignity of Him who in a special sense was the 'Son of man.'

b. Mt 9^{6}=Mk 2^{10}=Lk 5^{24}. There is no necessity, for the purpose of understanding this passage, to suppose that the title was a Mess. one. Jesus, in order to meet the objection, 'Who can forgive sins, but God only?' heals the paralytic, thereby showing that He holds an extraordinary commission from God upon earth sufficient to satisfy the Jews that He is justified in claiming also to possess authority to forgive sins. The passage, it is true, is one in which an Aram. original 'that a man hath authority on earth to forgive sins' [§] would be quite possible, and yield a suitable sense,—the word, though in form general, being meant to be limited to Jesus Himself; but, if 'the Son of man' be admitted as a title of Jesus elsewhere, there is, of course, no necessity for having recourse to the supposition here.

c. Mt 12^{8}=Mk 2^{28}=Lk 6^{5}. Here in Mk we read: '(v.^{27}) And he said unto them, The sabbath is made for man, and not man for the sabbath: (v.^{28}) so that the son of man is lord even of the sabbath,'—the statement that the son of man is lord of the sabbath being based upon the premises contained in v.^{27}. But in the premise, 'the sabbath is made for man,' 'man' is evidently meant generally, so that the only logical conclusion from it is, not that a particular man, but that man generally,—or, at least (since, from the nature of the case, the worldly, unspiritual man would not be thought of), the religious man, who weighed reasons, and could judge how to use rightly what was instituted for the benefit of man,—is 'lord of the sabbath'; Jesus, by His argument, though He would *in*clude Himself, would not *ex*clude others. And such a conclusion would be in agreement not only with the general teaching of Christ, but with the context, which shows that Jesus is defending not His own action, but that of His disciples. Hence, as Schmiedel also allows, the supposition that 'the son of man' has arisen out of a misinterpretation, or false limitation, of the Aram. barnāshā,* is here certainly plausible. At the same time, it is possible that the argument is, 'The sabbath was made for man; and therefore the Son of man, as holding a unique position among men, and knowing what their welfare requires, may, for a sufficient reason, dispense with the obligation to observe the sabbath' (cf. Stanton, 247 f.). It must, however, then be supposed that the action of the disciples in plucking the ears of corn had been implicitly authorized by Jesus.

Mk 3^{28-30}.	Mt 12^{31}.	Mt 12^{32}.	Lk 12^{10}.
28 All sins and blasphemies shall to the sons of men be forgiven, wherewithsoever they blaspheme:	Every sin and blasphemy shall unto men be forgiven;	And whoso speaketh a word against the son of man, it shall be forgiven him;	And every one who shall speak a word against the son of man, it shall be forgiven him;
29 But whoso blasphemeth against the Holy Spirit hath not forgiveness for ever (εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα), but is guilty of an eternal sin. 30 Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.	but the blasphemy of the Spirit shall not be forgiven.	but whoso speaketh against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age (αἰών) nor in that which is to come.	but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Spirit it shall not be forgiven.

Here Mt $12^{31.\,32}$ certainly wear the appearance of being duplicate versions of one and the same saying, v.^{31} agreeing with Mk $3^{28f.}$, and v.^{32} with Lk 12^{10}; and the contrast expressed in Mk $3^{28f.}$ Mt 12^{31} between 'men' in general and the Holy Spirit becoming in Mt 12^{32} Lk 12^{10} one between the 'Son of man' and the Holy Spirit. It is not difficult to understand how these duplicates might have arisen out of different recensions of the original saying, of which one read בני נשא ('men'), and the other בר נש ('a man,'—intended in a general sense).‡ According to Wellh. the version in Mk 3^{28} Mt 12^{31} is the original, the contrast (as Mk 3^{30} shows) being between blasphemy against men and blasphemy against the Holy Spirit [cf. 1 S 2^{25} RV]; Jesus, therefore, if this view be correct, never declared blasphemy against Himself to be pardonable. Schmiedel, in his acute discussion of these passages, replies that although no doubt Mark, as a rule, has the greater originality than Matthew, that is not the case universally [cf. vol. ii. p. 241^{a}]; and in the present instance the words of Jesus in Matthew 12^{32} = Lk 12^{10} (in which He distinguishes between Himself and the Holy Spirit), has, upon intrinsic grounds, a far higher claim to originality than the remark of the narrator in Mk 3^{30} (which makes blasphemy against Jesus tantamount to blasphemy against the Holy Spirit); while the declaration that blasphemy against Himself was pardonable is one which no evangelist would have ventured to place in Jesus' mouth, had He not really uttered it. Mt 12^{32} is not necessarily a parallel recension of 12^{31}, or superfluous beside it; it would be perfectly in place if it stated with explicit reference to the 'Son of man' what is indeed implicit in v.^{31}, but is not there expressed explicitly. Mark 'may have had before him, not indeed our Matthew, but Mt $12^{31f.}$ in a similar form, and have re-cast v.^{32}, on account of its seeming inconsistency with reverence for Jesus, in a form influenced by the phraseology of v.^{31}.' But the correctness of the comment in Mk 3^{30} must, upon this view, be given up; and indeed (Schmiedel) it is not certain that Mk $3^{28f.}$ (=Mt $12^{31f.}$) is historically connected with the preceding narrative; the parallel in Lk (12^{10}) stands in a very different connexion. The impossibility of questioning the originality of Mt 12^{32} = Lk 12^{10} thus constitutes to Schmiedel a conclusive argument against explaining the variations between the Synoptists here by means of the Aramaic.

23. In the Fourth Gospel the title is still found only in our Lord's mouth; but it is lifted into a higher plane, and, in agreement with St. John's predominant point of view, is used commonly in more distinct connexion with His Divine nature. It is thus applied to Him not only with reference to events in His life on earth as a man, but also with reference to His pre-existence with God.* The uniqueness of the 'Son of man' consists in His having 'come down from heaven' (3^{13}), whither also He will return again (6^{62}), and in virtue of which those who 'work' that they may appropriate Him, and who further eat His flesh and drink His blood, have eternal life ($6^{27.\,53}$, cf. vv.$^{50.\,51.\,58}$). While on earth, He remains in constant spiritual intercourse with His Father in Heaven, as those whose eyes are opened may see by His life and works (1^{51}). He will be 'lifted up' on the cross in order that those who believe in Him may have eternal life ($3^{13f.}$), and that men may perceive who He is (8^{28}); and His approaching death is the hour of His glorification (12^{23} 13^{31}). The multitude understood Him to claim to be the Messiah; and ask (12^{34}) to have it explained to them how, if the Son of man is thus to be 'lifted up,' He can be the Messiah who is to 'abide for ever' (as head, viz., of an earthly kingdom). In 9^{35}, according to the reading of ℵBD, the unique position occupied by the 'Son of man' is attested by the importance attached to

i. NAME OF THE BOOK AND ITS PLACE IN THE CANON.—'Song of Songs,' which is the exact rendering of the Hebrew title of this little book, does not mean 'a song of the songs (sc. of Solomon),' as Ibn Ezra and Kimchi supposed, but, by a not uncommon periphrasis for the superlative, is equivalent to 'the finest song,' that which is superior to all other songs, that which unites in itself the excellences of everything that is called song. The title, which, as we shall find, did not originally stand at the head of the book but was introduced afterwards, thus contains a significant expression of opinion regarding the composition. It is explicable only on the ground of the view which a later age thought it necessary to hold as to the real sense of a work which had now gained a place in the Canon of the OT. Nay, it is only the prevalence of the same view that will explain how the Song ever found entrance at all into the circle of Sacred Writings.

This pregnant title corresponds with the high estimate of the book expressed by R. Akiba (cf. Jadaim, iii. 5), about the end of the 1st cent. A.D.: 'God forbid! No one in Israel has ever doubted that the Song of Songs defiles the hands [i.e. that it is a holy canonical book †], for the whole world is not worth the day on which the Song was given to Israel. For all the Writings [i.e. the Hagiographa] are holy, but the Song of Songs is a holy of the holies.' Henceforward this idea of the incomparable value of the book continued to be the only prevailing one amongst the Jews, and thus passed over also into the Christian Church.

ii. METHODS OF INTERPRETATION.—The above Talmudic citation shows, however, that this high estimate of the Song of Songs did not succeed in establishing itself without opposition. The question whether they 'defile the hands' received a vacillating answer especially in regard to the Song and Ecclesiastes. And it is easy to account for this. The plain language of the book, soberly interpreted, does not suggest that we have to do with a work of high religious value or with a sacred poem. It was necessary to wrest the language and to assume that a deeper sense underlay the literal meaning, before one could justify the presence of such a book and gain an abiding place for it amongst the Sacred Writings.* What we hear of is earthly love, that of betrothed or married persons, and nowhere does the natural eye detect a single indication that would call it away from this and compel it to see in the figures presented to it images of a higher love. But at the time the step was taken of admitting the Song into the Canon, there can be no doubt that amongst those scribes whose influence was greatest in the collecting of the Sacred Writings, it had long been the custom to find in this exquisite work an allegory, and in the bond of love there presented to see the bond of love between J″ and Israel. Sufficient inducement to such an interpretation was supplied by Scripture itself, for at least since the time of the prophet Hosea the representation of the covenant between J″ and His people under the figure of the relation between husband and wife had become frequent and popular. When in consequence of the allegorical interpretation the book had been received into the Canon, objections to its being allowed to remain there could, of course, arise only from the strong impression which its language makes upon the reader, and the removal of such objections was facilitated in proportion as the allegorical interpretation obtained acceptance. The latter interpretation was bound to triumph in the end, for the more the true conception of the origin and character of Scripture was lost and a false notion of its inspiration came in, the more did the need make itself felt that all writings received into the Canon, the Song included, should be viewed and interpreted in such a way as to entitle them to rank as holy writings inspired by God's Spirit.

One result of the triumph of the allegorical interpretation, and of the extravagant estimate of the book (so well illustrated by the above words of R. Akiba), was the introduction of the liturgical use of the Song into the Jewish Church. Canticles, along with Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, made up the five Megillôth ('rolls') which were read to the congregation at certain festivals. The liturgical use of Canticles deserves all the more careful consideration, because it helps us to decide what view of its contents was entertained by the Jewish congregation in the earliest times. For undoubtedly the contents of each book were intended to be brought into close connexion with the festival at which it was read. Now, Canticles was appointed to be read on the 8th day of the Feast of the Passover.† But this feast commemorated the time when J″ delivered His people from the oppression of a strange lord in order to unite them to Himself at Sinai by an everlasting covenant. J″ then is the beloved, and the people of God or the congregation of Israel are His loved one.

† Ruth is read on the 2nd day of the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost, Lamentations on the 9th Ab (i.e. the anniversary of the burning of the temple by the Chaldæans), Ecclesiastes on the 3rd day of the Feast of Tabernacles, and Esther on the 13th Adar (the opening day of the Feast of Purim).

According to the paraphrase of the Targum, the poem portrays the history of Israel from the Exodus to its redemption and glorification in Messianic times, when the full and final union of J″ with His people shall be realized. This is certainly a profound interpretation, and one, too, which could find its roots in the Prophetic literature (cf. Hos 1–3, Jer $2^{1ff.}$ $3^{1ff.}$, Ezk 16, Is 50^1 $54^{5ff.}$ etc.). But this explanation puts difficulties in the way of the plain natural understanding as soon as it is sought to apply it to individual features of the poetical representation. These everywhere indicate too strongly that what we have to do with is really earthly love and a product of erotic poetry.* The consciousness of this had certainly not been lost even by the Jews. It was felt that one required ripeness of religious and moral insight and strength in order to understand the Song not in a false and morally pernicious fashion, but according to its hidden deeper meaning. Thus we must explain the Jewish regulation, reported to us by Origen and Jerome, that no one was to read the book till he was 30 years of age (the age, according to Nu 4^3, at which the Levite is ready to enter upon his sacred duties).

The allegorical interpretation, which had been adopted by the Jews, gained acceptance also in the Christian Church, chiefly through Origen's exposition of the Song, and all through the Middle Ages this continued to be the prevailing interpretation. Nay, until quite recently it has maintained its supremacy in the Roman Catholic Church, and has found defenders even in the Churches of the Reformation. The allegorical interpretation, indeed, speedily assumed here a mystical character. It was supposed that one could discover in the poem a (prophetical) description beforehand of the loving relation between Christ and His people or between Him and the individual believing soul, and of the yearning desire of the latter for loving union with the Lord. The most notable witness to this allegorico-mystical view is to be found in the 86 sermons of St. Bernard, which, however, do not extend beyond Ca 3^1. Of course there are particular features in the poem which give abundant scope for mystical fancies. It was only with the Reformation that an era dawned which created the conditions necessary for a more correct understanding of the Song. It should not, indeed, be forgotten that Theodore of Mopsuestia, who belonged to the exegetic school of Antioch, had long before sought to do justice to the literal sense of the Song, by teaching that it treats simply of earthly love. But he stood alone with his interpretation over against the prevailing allegorical view, and was anathematized for holding it at the fifth Œcumenical Council at Constantinople (A.D. 553). Even in the Churches of the Reformation a more natural understanding of the Song made its way at first very slowly. In general the allegorical interpretation, borrowed from the Jews, and subjected to Christian modifications, continued to reign: especially within the Reformed Church was there a tendency to adhere closely to the explanation of the synagogue, and to see in the Song a prophetical pre-description of the development of the history of the Church.†

A unique view, which deservedly gained no adherents, was put forward by Luther: 'Solomon intends by these discourses of the lover and his beloved to show that, where obedience and good government are, God dwells and kisses and embraces His bride by His word; in short, he means to sing the praises of obedience as a gift of God.'‡—It was still a dangerous thing, even in the century of the Reformation, to depart from the traditional allegorical interpretation. Seb. Castellio of Geneva learned this to his cost when, on account of having seen in the Song a 'geistlich Buhllied,' and having pronounced it unworthy to stand in the Canon, he was accused (not, it is true, simply for holding this opinion) by Calvin and banished from Geneva (1544).—A more decided movement in favour of an interpretation corresponding to the original sense of the poem, was inaugurated by Hugo Grotius († 1645). Even he, to be sure, does not yet break absolutely with the traditional view, for he does not simply reject an allegorical exegesis, but, primarily and according to the literal sense, the Song is for him concerned only with earthly love, in fact the love of Solomon for the Egyptian princess, his wife.*—The number of those who understood the subject to be earthly love and rejected the allegorical interpretation continued to grow; in particular the pioneers of the critical study of the OT, men like R. Simon, Clericus, Whiston (Cambridge), belonged to this category. The first to oppose the allegorical interpretation by weighty arguments was J. D. Michaelis (in his edition of R. Lowth's De sacra poesi Hebræorum prælectiones, Göttingen, 1758–61, Notes, p. 603 ff., he even excluded the Song from his translation of the Bible). But to J. G. Herder belongs the credit of having helped to its triumphant recognition the only true view of the fundamental character of Canticles as a product of genuine and pure erotic poetry. In his work, entitled Lieder der Liebe, die ältesten und schönsten aus dem Morgenlande; nebst 44 alten Minneliedern (1778), he contends that the book is a collection of separate love-songs of an impassioned and morally pure character, and this view of his has continued to gain adherents (Reuss, Budde, et al.; see, further, below) down to the most recent times.

But the allegorical interpretation also found champions not only among Roman Catholic, but also among Protestant theologians. In itself this is not at all surprising, for any one who took his stand upon the ground of the old orthodox doctrine of inspiration would feel compelled to do justice to the simple fact that the Song is included in the Canon. He would have to bring it into relation with the system of revealed truth, and discover revelation, that is, prophecy, in its contents as well; for in no other way could he explain its reception into the Canon. Accordingly, we find, on the one hand, a movement in the direction of the old Jewish interpretation. So, in particular, Keil (Einleitung, 1853, p. 373) holds that in Canticles 'in dramatico-lyric responsive songs, and under the allegory of the betrothed love of Solomon and the Shulammite,' we have portrayed 'the loving intercourse between the Lord and His people in their ideal character resulting from Israel's choice to this privilege, according to which all disturbing of this intercourse by unfaithfulness on the part of Israel only leads to an establishing more firmly of the covenant of love, through return to the true covenant God and His unchangeable love.' But, as he himself expressly notes, Keil does not mean by this that we can discover in the Song a literal reflexion of the actual 'history of the covenant relation' or 'an allegorical veiling of the principal features of the theocratic history.' On the contrary, it is the loving intercourse of the Lord 'according to its Divine idea' that is portrayed. In this way Keil obtains for the Song a Messianic character in so far as it describes a relation 'which was first realized through Christ.' Accordingly, he insists also upon the inspired character of the book, which is 'no product of the soil of the natural development of the theocratic God-consciousness, but, like the prophetical Psalms, one due to the supernatural working of the Holy Spirit in the mind of Solomon, and so constructed that the mutual love of king Solomon and the ideal Shulammite undergoes transfiguration and becomes an allegory of the marriage of the Heavenly Bridegroom with His elect bride on earth.' Of course Keil considers that this allegorico-prophetical view is amply supported by the above-mentioned Biblical description of the covenant relation between Jahweh and Israel under the figure of a marriage union. —The same principle of interpretation lay at the root of Rosenmüller's original view (cf. Keil and Tschirner's Analekten, i. [1813] p. 138 ff.; for his later view see preceding col., note*), as well as at that of Hengstenberg (Das Hohe Lied, 1853) and others.†—Another set of interpreters refer the contents of the Song (in a Messianic sense) to the mission of the kingdom of Israel to heathendom (H. A. Hahn, 1852), or of Christ to the presently divided Church, which is to be brought back to the perfection which belonged to it in the apostolic age (G. F. Goltz, 1850).

The attempts to convert the Song into a political allegory may be pronounced completely mistaken. For instance, it has been supposed by J. L. Hug (1813) to be a fancy poem in which the longing of the ten tribes for a reunion with king Hezekiah is set forth under the figure of the love relations of the Shulammite with Solomon. According to G. P. C. Kaiser (1825) the Song of Songs is 'a collective song, addressed to Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, as the restorers of a Jewish constitution in the province of Judah.'

---

* According to another interpretation, Canticles portrays Solomon's love to Wisdom. (The last representative of this view is Rosenmüller, in his Scholia in Vet. Test.; the Peshiṭta substitutes חָכְמָה for שִׁיר in the title of the book). Are we to infer from Wis 8^2 that the author of the Wisdom of Solomon already held the same view?

† As a notable representative of this view we may specify Cocceius (†1669), whose federal theology this view of the Song suited admirably.

‡ Cf. Köstlin, M. Luther, sein Leben u. seine Schriften^{2}, i. p. 610 f.

* The form in which Grotius states the traditional view is worthy of note: 'Creditur autem Salomon, quo magis perennaret hoc scriptum, ea arte id composuisse, ut sine multa distortione allegoriæ in eo inveniri possent, quæ Dei amorem adversus populum Israelit. exprimerent. Ille amor typus cum fuerit amoris Christi erga ecclesiam, Christiani ingenia sua ad applicanda ad eam rem huius carminis verba exercuerunt, laudabili studio.'

† E. Rupprecht (Einleit. in d. AT, 1898, p. 353 ff.) still walks quite in the footsteps of Hengstenberg.

The allegorical interpretation has all along started with presupposing the internal unity of the poem, and has uniformly seen in Solomon its author and its hero. On this view of the Song, moreover, the dramatical element in its construction, which makes itself felt not indistinctly, is preserved, even if it is not always recognized. Over against not only the allegorical explanation but also that view of the Song which breaks it up into separate songs or fragments of songs in the fashion so brilliantly inaugurated by Herder, another manner of interpretation began to gain always wider currency and acceptance. This agreed with the second of the views just named, in holding that it is earthly love that is the subject of the Song, and with the first in maintaining the literary unity of the poem. It ceased to search in Canticles for deep secrets of revelation, prophetico-symbolical glances into the development of the kingdom of God, and preferred to take its contents realistically, as the reflexion of a historical occurrence. What the poem lost in this way of the value which the allegorical interpretation had sought to impose upon it, was richly compensated by the ethical significance which it gained upon the new theory. The man who led the way in this mode of interpretation was J. C. Jacobi (in his anonymous work, Das durch eine leichte Erklärung von seinen Vorwürfen gerettete Hohelied, 1771). He saw in the Song a panegyric on conjugal fidelity, for he considers that its subject is the steadfastness with which a wife who had been carried off from her husband maintained her fidelity to the latter, in face of the seductive attempts of Solomon. Afterwards the adherents of this system of interpretation deviated from Jacobi in one point. They saw in the heroine of the poem, not a married woman, but a virgin, who, in spite of all the insidious arts of Solomon, remained true to her lover or betrothed, and who finally received the reward of her faithfulness in her union with her beloved.

Those who, in spite of differences in detail, which it is impossible to describe more fully here, held the same general view (just described) of the Song, were not all agreed also in regarding it as a dramatic poem. Some took it to be an epic poem; others, in view of its strongly pronounced lyric character, would have it that it is a collection of ballads, or even an operetta, with choruses, duets, and solos. But the majority of the adherents of the above theory, especially amongst the most distinguished exegetes, took the view that the Song is a drama, or it might be a melodrama. We may specify such names as Ewald (1826, 1867), Umbreit (1828, 1839), Hitzig (1855), Renan (1860), even Delitzsch (see, further, below), Stickel (1888), Oettli (1889), Driver (1891, etc.), Bruston (1891). Amongst many others the present writer has given in his adhesion to this opinion (1893). But as to the internal structure of the poem there is by no means complete agreement, although the differences that exist are no evidence, as has been supposed, that there is nothing in the dramatic theory. The absence of scenic indications in the text, and the necessity of inferring simply from the contents, or the form of expression, who is the speaker in particular sentences or sections, are quite sufficient to account for the surprising differences in the dramatic arrangement of the Song proposed by different exegetes. These differences are, of course, due also in large measure to the very great difficulties that beset the exposition of the Song of Songs.

The main difference amongst the adherents of the dramatical theory is the following. Starting with the primary assumption that Canticles is a dramatic poem, exegetes, in answering the question as to the principal dramatis personæ, part company in two quite different directions. Delitzsch (1851, 1875), and, in essential agreement with him, Zöckler (in Lange's Bibelwerk, 1868), and von Orelli (in PRE ^{2} vi. p. 245 ff., art. 'Hohes Lied Salomos,' 1880), hold, in harmony with the traditional view, that, apart from certain subordinate figures, there are only two principal persons to be recognized, namely, Solomon and the Shulammite, and that, where a shepherd is spoken of, Solomon is here also to be understood.

The poem is supposed to describe the bond of love between the two, from the first moment of mutual burning passion (1^2–2^7), and mutual seeking and finding (2^8–3^5), down to the realization of the desire for love in the marriage union (3^6–5^1); and then, after a passing estrangement, the mutual return (5^2–6^9), the praise of the charms and beauty of the bride now raised to be queen (6^{10}–8^4), and the confirming of the love covenant in the home of the Shulammite (8^{5-14}). Delitzsch, however, finds in the whole poem a deeper idea expressed. He says (Comm.^{2} p. 5): 'the Shulammite is a historical person . . . a country maiden of lowly rank, who by her physical beauty and purity of soul awakened in Solomon a love which elevated him above the wantonness of polygamy, and gave him a personal experience of the Paradise idea of marriage as this is expressed in Gn $2^{23f.}$ with reference to the first created woman. It is this personal experience that he celebrates, at the same time idealizing it in the manner of poets by stripping off the husk of all that is accidental, and presenting the kernel and essence. . . . The Song is a protest against polygamy, although only to the extent that one could expect from the Mosaic standpoint.' He finds in the Song a reflexion of the μέγα μυστήριον of Eph 5^{32}. But he claims for it, not only a historical and ethical but also a typico-mystical significance. Solomon is to him a type of Christ, and accordingly he sees in the love relations between Solomon and the Shulammite 'the mysteries of the love of Christ and His people shadowed forth' (p. 5), remarking at the same time that the typical exegesis must bear in mind that type and antitype do not exactly coincide, and the mystical that 'the heavenly stamps itself, indeed, upon the earthly, and yet is poles asunder from it.'—Von Orelli differs from Delitzsch only in so far as he holds the subject of the Song to be 'not marriage as a permanent bond and condition, but betrothed love which finds simply its climax and goal in the marriage union' (l.c. p. 252). Accordingly in 3^6-5^1, upon his view, there cannot be already an allusion to the marriage union, as Delitzsch holds. In his typical view of the Song, Orelli is otherwise essentially at one with Delitzsch (l.c. p. 249).

Apart from the fact that such exegesis as the above is dominated by considerations supposed to be involved in the history of revelation, there are serious objections to the view that there are only two principal persons in the Song, and to the identifying of the shepherd with the king. Above all, it is hard to comprehend how the Shulammite, even after her marriage has taken place, should continue to treat and to address the king as shepherd, and should even inquire (1^7) where he pastures his flocks. To discover 'an essential feature of the spiritual beauty' of the Song in the circumstance 'that the ideal virgin loves him, not as king, but loves in him the shepherd, and longs to share with him the innocent simplicity of her former manner of life, a desire to which he joyfully yields,' is possible, indeed, but in the highest degree unnatural, and may be regarded rather as an outcome of a mystical deepening of the sense of the Song than as the result of a sober interpretation of the actual words of the text.

Far more support has been accorded, and rightly so, we consider, to the view represented above all by Ewald. According to it, besides Solomon, the king who is courting the love of the Shulammite, we must distinguish a shepherd who was the real object of her passion, and the beloved of her heart.

The fascinatingly beautiful Shulammite is supposed to have been met by the king on the occasion of a tour of his in the north of his kingdom ($6^{11ff.}$), and placed in his harem. The king seeks by enticing flattering speeches to win her love, but from the very first meeting (ch. 1) she gives him to understand to whom her heart belongs. While the king then presses her with ever renewed words of love and admiration, the emotion of love thus stirred within her pours itself forth in words addressed to her lover far away. Nay, in the intensity of her feelings, she imagines she sees him come from afar to her prison, she hears his words meant for her ($2^{8ff.}$ $4^{7ff.}$ $5^{2ff.}$), and in a dream seeks for him by night in the streets ($3^{1ff.}$ $5^{2ff.}$). Even the prospect of becoming the favourite wife of the splendid monarch cannot shake her fidelity to her absent lover, and even when the king imagines he has gained his point she remains firm, and refuses to entertain the idea of allowing any one to enjoy her love but the object of her heart's affections (3^6–5^8). A last attempt of Solomon to win her heart fails (chs. 6. 7). Finally, the king magnanimously gives her back her liberty, and in her home in union with her beloved shepherd she finds the consummation of her happiness. On this view, the Song reaches its ideal goal in the impassioned eulogium on true, pure love in $8^{6f.}$.*

It is quite true that, even upon this interpretation, which at all events does fuller justice to the text than the traditional view adopted anew by Delitzsch, there are still difficulties enough in points of detail. But it is questionable whether these difficulties are sufficiently great to make this explanation inadequate alike from the formal and the material point of view, and thus to demand its rejection. The present writer does not think so.

The principal difficulty is in the so-called Third Act (3^{6}–5^{1}). The question is whether the conclusion (5^{1}) is intended to mark the longed-for marriage union as actually consummated. Hitzig held that this question must be answered in the affirmative, and supposed the marriage in view to have been one that Solomon contracted with a woman of Jerusalem, but not with the Shulammite. Bruston is also of opinion that in this Third Act we have to do with the marriage of the king to another—in fact, as he thinks may be gathered from 4^{8}, with a Tyrian princess. This actually accomplished marriage with another woman would thus place on a still higher level the invincible fidelity of the Shulammite. But there is really no necessity to take the Shulammite's words in 4^{16b} as formally different from her words in ch. 1. She is thinking in both passages, not of the king, but of her true lover, and it occasions no difficulty, but only marks the climax of the conflict that the king believes, of course, that the object of his desires is now about to yield to him, whereas, as the very next scene shows, such an idea has never entered her mind. Ewald himself held that from 4^{8} onwards we have again words of her lover, which the Shulammite imagined she heard, as in $2^{8ff.}$; he even supposed that two lines have dropped out before v.^{8}, their contents being, 'Behold, my beloved, behold, there comes he! Hark how he speaks to me his words . . . ,' or the like. But it is unnecessary and hardly justifiable to suppose that a different subject speaks in $4^{8ff.}$ from the speaker in v.$^{1ff.}$†—Stickel, too, denies that $4^{8ff.}$ are words of Solomon, but he thinks to escape all difficulties by the strange assumption that in $1^{7.8}$ 1^{15}–2^{4} 4^{7}–5^{1} there are three scenes that are to be separated from the rest of the poem. In these he supposes a second pair of lovers, a shepherd and a shepherdess, to be introduced, who actually arrive at a marriage union, this interlude having the effect of setting Solomon's wooing of the Shulammite in a peculiar light.‡ Otherwise, the relation of Solomon to the Shulammite and her relation to him remain the same as on Ewald's theory. But this view of Stickel's, which destroys the unity of the poem, presupposes far too great skill in producing stage effects ('Bühnengeschicklichkeit') on the part of the author to be well founded.

A very important turn of opinion as to the literary character of the Song of Songs has been brought about in the most recent times. J. G. Wetzstein, who was for long Prussian consul at Damascus, and who has rendered much service in the way of increasing our knowledge of Oriental life and contributing to the understanding of the OT, availed himself of his opportunities of making acquaintance with the marriage customs in modern Syria. In this way he met with some things which are certainly calculated to throw light on certain portions of the Song of Songs. He published in Bastian's Zeitschrift f. Ethnologie (1873, p. 270 ff.), an article, entitled 'Die syrische Dreschtafel,' in which he describes the manifold uses made of the threshing-board, and amongst others its symbolical employment in the so-called 'king's week,' i.e. during the seven days' marriage festival (p. 287 ff.). It was partly from this article that the 'Bemerkungen zum Hohenliede' in Delitzsch's Commentary were taken, but the author contributed further important materials to the elucidation of the subject. To the same category belongs an earlier article by Wetzstein, entitled 'Sprachliches aus den Zeltlagern der syrischen Wüste,' in ZDMG xxii. (1868), p. 69 ff., containing valuable notes on a story written down from oral communication. The remarkable similarity between certain songs sung at modern marriage celebrations and certain portions of the Song of Songs, naturally enough forced upon him the conclusion that the latter is not 'a dramatic unity,' but rather a collection of 'beautiful nuptial songs' which were received into the Canon 'to furnish good models to the occasional poets whose productions may in Hebrew antiquity, as at the present day, have transgressed the bounds of decency and good taste.' The allegorical or mystical interpretation is held to have come in afterwards (cf. Delitzsch, Comm. p. 172, note). After Stade (Gesch. Isr. ii. [1888] 197) had referred approvingly to Wetzstein's 'most helpful contribution to the understanding of this quite unique book,' Budde, in an article on 'The Song of Solomon' in the New World (Boston, U.S.A. 1894, p. 56 ff.; cf. Preuss. Jahrbücher, 1894, p. 92 ff.), went in the fullest detail into Wetzstein's communications, and sought with their help to win its natural sense for the Song of Songs.* His arguments gained complete assent from Kautzsch ('Abriss der Gesch. d. alttest. Schrifttums' in the 'Beilagen' to his AT p. 210 f. [in the 'Sonderabdruck' of 1897, p. 134 f.]), and in specially emphatic, confident fashion from Cornill (Einleitung^{3}, p. 256: 'In this way the enigma of our book is definitively solved').† Whether this confidence is really justified is open to doubt. With reference to Budde's claim (l.c. p. 9) that he has cut away the roots of the dramatical interpretation of the Song by his explanation of 'Solomon' and 'the Shulammite,' which stand simply for bridegroom and bride, husband and wife, Bruston (cf. Le X^{e} congrès des Orientalistes et l'ancien Testament, Paris, 1895, p. 13 ff.) declares, 'I fear that this is a huge and extraordinary illusion,' a judgment with which the present writer agrees.

Budde attempts first of all to prove that by Solomon, or the king, the Song means not the real king Solomon, but that we have here only a type, a poetical designation of any and every bridegroom. In order to give a worthy title to the latter on his wedding day and in his wedding dress, the figure of Solomon is supposed to have been employed as that of the monarch whose riches and splendour had become as proverbial as his wisdom. The case is similar with the Shulammite. 'She is, indeed, no other than Abishag the Shunammite, but only as the representative of her qualities' (p. 8). The maiden from Shunem (the modern Sholam, a pronunciation to which the Heb. Shulammith also goes back), who was brought to the aged king David, and on whose account Adonijah had to die (1 K $2^{13ff.}$), was admittedly, according to the correct sense of 1 K $1^{3f.}$, the fairest virgin to be found in the whole land, and continued to enjoy this reputation in the memories of the people. Hence, argues Budde (p. 9): '. . . as the bridegroom is compared with king Solomon in his glory, or even named with his name, and would not exchange his fortune with Solomon, so for the beauty of the bride no less a woman could be named than the fairest of whom the ancients spoke, and one who was also a queen [Solomon may have, at least according to the legend, introduced her into his harem], which certainly was not an unwelcome fact. That she should be called the fairest of all is the right of every bride on her wedding day, however she may be outshone by hundreds at other times.'

The present writer has no difficulty in admitting that the situation may be understood in the above way, that is to say, that it is not necessary to presuppose absolutely that the Song of Songs is based upon an actual historical occurrence; but he fails to see how, on this view, the dramatical theory of the poem in its present form is wounded unto death. If Budde is right in holding that in later times the two outstanding figures in the popular recollection were employed as above described in the poetry of marriage celebrations, this very circumstance might also lead a poet to give a dramatic fashioning to the material supplied by 1 K 1. 2, and, in so doing, to utilize the further development the story had undergone in the popular memory. Now, Budde himself (p. 8) remarks that the circumstance that Solomon had his brother put to death on Abishag's account, may have given rise to the legend that he himself loved her and made her his wife, and that the execution of his brother was thus an act of jealousy. But if we admit the possibility of this, there is another possibility we should not leave out of account. In 1 K 2 we hear nothing of Abishag having really become the wife of Solomon. Why may not this circumstance have given rise in poetical legend to the conception that the lovely virgin refused to become Solomon's wife, nay even to the conception that her refusal was based upon her unconquerable love for a youth in her native district? Moreover, when the notion was once seized that she had not chosen to be the wife of Solomon, it was no great stretch of poetic fancy to assume that her first introduction into the apartments of David by his servants was not a willing one on her part, and the presupposition that from the first she succeeded in defending her honour finds its firm basis in the express statement of 1 K 1^4 ('and the king knew her not').

* The reader will find an exact account of the scheme of the Song proposed by Ewald, in Driver's LOT^{6} p. 440 ff.

† It may be noted that, in the opinion of the present writer, 4^{6} is not now in its original place. It is not till v.^{7} that the description of the charms of the Shulammite (vv.$^{1-5}$) closes. Perhaps v.^{6} should follow v.^{7}, and formed originally the connecting link with v.$^{8ff.}$.

‡ Cf. Stickel, Das Hohelied, p. 45: 'Antithesis, that indispensable art of the drama, by presenting so vividly the undisturbed happy shepherd's love in contrast with the sorely tried heroine of the Song, awakens warm sympathy with the latter, and a feeling of suspense and compassion,' etc. Further, this interlude is supposed to mark and fill up various spaces of time in the course of the main transaction.

We see then that the narrative of 1 K 1. 2 supplies, especially if we take into account the influence of inventive popular reminiscence, quite sufficient material for developing the story which the dramatical theory of the Song of Songs considers to be unfolded in it. It required at all events no very great gift of poetic construction to give a dramatical form to this material borrowed from recollections, in which all the points necessary for a simple dramatical development were contained and spontaneously offered themselves to the poet's notice. But, we repeat emphatically, this does not absolutely exclude the possibility that in later times it was customary in a poetical and symbolical form of address to call a bridegroom and a bride 'Solomon' or 'king,' and 'Shulammite.'[*] At the same time we think it only right and proper to emphasize the other possibility, that an unknown man, of a poetical turn and moved perhaps also by special circumstances, found in this very custom the motive for working up the material that lay to his hand. The one supposition does not exclude the other. The question whether we have really to do with a dramatical poem must be settled from the book itself, and in any case the matter is not so easily settled as Budde and those who agree with him suppose.

Budde finds 'the solution of the problem of our book' (p. 10) in the customs reported by Wetzstein in connexion with weddings amongst the Syrian Bedawin, namely, in the festive proceedings of the so-called 'king's week.' The book contains, according to him, 'songs' sung at the wedding festivities, during which bridegroom and bride (or husband and wife) are honoured for seven days as king and queen, whose throne is the threshing-board, set on the threshing-floor of the place and decked out with carpets and pillows. A principal element in these songs are the wasfs or lyrical descriptions of the physical charms and wedding attire of the young pair. Especially impressive, according to Wetzstein's account (cf. Delitzsch, Comm. p. 171), is the so-called sword dance of the bride on the evening before the bridal night. In this dance, which is accompanied by the song of a double chorus of men and women in praise of her physical beauty, she seeks in the light of the high-leaping flames of a fire to display to the bridegroom the charms of her person, brandishing all the time a sharp sword in her right hand, and holding a handkerchief in her left. The whole performance is an imitation of the dance that celebrates a victory. Now, as a matter of fact, the wasf sung during the sword dance corresponds in Canticles to $7^{1ff.}$ (as far at least as v.7). The wasf referring to the young wife (i.e. the queen) after the consummation of the marriage on the bridal night, on the first day of the 'king's week,' is found, according to Budde, in 4^{1-6}. It is put in the mouth of the young husband, and is partially repeated in 6^{4-7}. There is also a panegyric on the physical charms of the husband or king, the wasf referring to which is put in the mouth of the wife in $5^{9ff.}$, v.$^{2ff.}$ being supposed to be intended simply to serve as an introduction to this wasf with a pleasing dramatical movement. Next, according to this mode of interpretation, 3^{6-11} contains a description of the festive train of the gorgeously dressed bridegroom-king, and their joyous greeting to him on the morning after the bridal night, when the threshing-board has been placed and decked out as the throne; here the name 'Solomon' is, of course, not meant to be taken literally.[*] The 'sixty mighty men' are the 'companions of the bridegroom,' who, as Wetzstein with the approval of Budde suggests, were perhaps originally charged with the duty of protecting the festival against attacks, especially during the night (3^8, cf. Delitzsch, Comm. p. 170).[†] The 'daughters of Jerusalem' are of course, in the same way, not ladies of the royal harem, but virgins from the same neighbourhood as the bridal pair, who take part in a variety of ways in the wedding celebration.[‡] The circumstance that it is with Jerusalem in particular that they are brought into relation, proves, according to Budde, that the home of the wedding songs which are brought together in Canticles is to be sought in this city or its environs.

But now, as Budde further supposes, the passages just named have not, in their present order, the chronological succession demanded by the course of the marriage celebrations. At all events, the song that accompanied the sword dance ($7^{1ff.}$) must stand before $3^{6ff.}$, the greeting addressed to the approaching bridegroom-king. Budde suggests, however, that perhaps its proper place is after 3^{6-11} and before 4–6, if, as is possible, the subject of 3^{6-11} is not the procession to the throne on the day after the marriage, but the ceremonial arrival of the bridegroom at the marriage itself on the evening of the wedding day. (If 5^1 alludes to the coming actual consummation of the marriage covenant, the latter supposition appears to the present writer to be the only suitable one). From all this it follows, according to Budde, 'that the songs are brought together irregularly, and the last trace of an orderly arrangement thus appears.' It is a question, however, whether the premisses upon which this conclusion rests are in all respects correct. The present writer does not think so.

In the remaining portions of Canticles also there is of course, in Budde's opinion, no connexion to be discovered, but still less any progressive history. These passages, on the contrary, may be readily broken up into a number of songs, which, as Wetzstein's information showed, may have been used during the 'king's week' in praise of love in general, and of the love of the present pair in particular (Budde, p. 15 f.).

But, after the Song of Songs has been thus resolved into a number of separate songs, the question arises, What judgment is to be passed on the book in its present form? Was it originally nothing more than a collection of wedding songs, or was a species of editing carried out in the arrangement of them with the intention of establishing an internal connexion? Budde decides in the main in favour of the first of these alternatives, holding that we have to do, at least originally, only with a collection. Some one who felt an interest in this species of lyric poetry is supposed (like Wetzstein in our own day) to have written down these songs, and then the collection would be passed on to posterity in this form, perhaps without indication of their origin and without any exact distinction of the limits of the different songs. In this way the book would be exposed to the greatest danger of falling into disorder. Of course this is in itself a possible view. But that the question as to the origin of the book in its present form is not settled in this simple fashion, Budde is well aware. He finds here and there short pieces which possess, in his opinion, small poetic value, which he holds it to be impossible to bring into any connexion with the surrounding and originally independent songs and songlets. One trace of the later origin of these he finds, above all, in the circumstance that the composer of them misunderstood the real meaning, and in particular the symbolically intended expressions, in older passages and took these in a literal sense.

---

[*] By the way, Budde's view is not at all favoured by the circumstance that in the Song of Songs the Shulammite or the bride is never called 'queen.' The 'daughter of a noble' (7^1) does not take the place of this.

[*] This approach of the bridegroom is recalled, as Budde expressly notes, by the figure in Ps 19^6.

[†] Samson had thirty such 'companions' about him (Jg 14^{11}), who were headed by one who had the special title of the 'friend' of the bridegroom (cf. Jg 14^{20} and also Jn 3^{29}).

[‡] Their greeting addressed to the approaching bridegroom (3^{11}) finds a parallel in the parable of Mt $25^{1ff.}$

The most striking instance of this is discovered by Budde in 4^{8}, where the purely typical Lebanon of vv.$^{11. 15}$ is alleged to be converted into the real Lebanon and associated with other mountain heights. The author of 4^{8} is thus supposed to have been guilty of a crude misunderstanding, and it is declared that, when closely examined, the list of mountains is so little in place and yields so little sense, while the whole verse is so weak from the poetical point of view, that it is most natural to infer 'misunderstanding and insertion.' But this is a purely subjective verdict. It may reasonably be asked how any one was likely to introduce such an addition at this particular place. And what compels us to understand the names of the mountains here, 'the lions' dens' and 'the leopards' mountains,' literally and not symbolically? This symbolical sense is as suitable to them as it is to 'the clefts of the rock' and 'the covert of the steep place' in 2^{14}. Other sentences which are supposed to have originated in a similar way are found by Budde in 8^{14}, cf. 2^{16}. He also holds, strangely enough, that $2^{8a\beta\text{-}9a}$ is an addition introduced on account of v.^{16}, for plainly (?), he argues, the words 'Hark, my beloved!' (v.$^{8a\alpha}$) should be connected immediately with the words of v.^{9b} ('there he stands behind our wall'). But here again the question may be asked, Why should it have occurred to any one to insert the words in v.^{8}, which at least are so evidently poetical and out and out original?

A similar judgment is passed by Budde upon $8^{3. 4}$, cf. $2^{6f.}$; 8^{5} is due to a misunderstanding of 3^{6}. He makes a special allusion to $6^{1\text{-}3}$, arguing that what was intended in $5^{8. 9}$ to serve simply as a transition to the waṣf of the bridegroom is here transferred to the sphere of actuality, and that the figures borrowed from the plant-world (5^{13}) are likewise misunderstood and taken in their literal sense, the beloved becoming the gardener who has gone into his garden, etc. But, says Budde, if the Shulammite really knew this, why does she search so long for her lover and call for help to find him? Here, again, 'genuine phrases' like $1^{7f.}$ 2^{16} $6^{11f.}$ are supposed to have been worked up in a way opposed to their proper meaning. It is quite natural that Budde, with his view of the Song of Songs, can make nothing of these verses ($6^{1\text{-}3}$), which beyond a doubt are as genuine as $2^{7. 8}$. We must ask here once more, How can it have occurred to a later editor to introduce such sentences? What motive could have led him to do so?* Even Budde feels the above difficulty, but, for all that, he is unable to give a satisfactory answer to the question. 'What reasons led him [the redactor to whom we are supposed to owe these strange interpolations] . . what suppositions and intentions, of course we do not know.' Of course, if an author is to be held capable of such misunderstandings, it is difficult to give any satisfactory account of the motives that actuated him. And yet Budde repeats that one can recognize 'the plain effort' of the redactor 'to introduce movement and action where none were.'

The author of these later additions is held, then, to have meant to bring movement and action into the whole work. May he then have been guided by dramatizing aims? May it be that elsewhere too he is not without responsibility for the present form of the Song of Songs, but actually brought movement and action into the material of the work, i.e. that he perhaps worked up the latter from the dramatical point of view? These questions are very readily suggested by Budde's own words. True, he does not actually raise them, although he afterwards concedes that the additions just described (with which also may have been coupled trifling alterations and corruptions of the text) have given to the dramatical view of Canticles 'a certain justification from antiquity downwards, because separated matters were thereby connected and a certain movement and development brought in.' Of course he no longer gives the dramatical view the benefit of this excuse, now that he has shown what the Song of Songs really is.

It is interesting to note the manner in which Budde supposes it possible that the book assumed its present disordered form. It was originally, as we have been told, a collection of wedding songs. This collection came, of course in manuscript form, into the hands of a later writer, torn into single leaves and damaged. He supposed that he had before him not a collection of songs, but a literary unity, of whose contents and aim he had, however, 'only an obscure idea.' He attempted a restoration of the unintelligible work by putting together as he best could the separate leaves, and trying to amend the text by additions and supplements of the kind described above. But this is a very strange account of the matter, a real hypothesis of despair. There is one point, above all, to which exception must be taken. By way of supporting his general view of Canticles, Budde insists with much emphasis that the marriage customs, and of course also the peculiar character of the marriage songs, have continued essentially unaltered in Syria and Palestine from early times down to the present day. Now, how is it conceivable that an author living in Palestine (for it is there that we are supposed to look for the 'redactor') as early as the pre-Christian era should either have failed to recognize the contents and aim of songs which had been handed down for the most part without any corruption, or should have had 'only an obscure idea' of their true character? Might we not assume that this Judæan redactor would have recognized the so-called waṣfs as readily as Wetzstein has done? Here, then, Budde brings us face to face with a serious problem. The extremely mechanical explanation of the origin of the present Song of Songs, which he considers to be 'a satisfaction of all just demands,' appears to the present writer to condemn itself. And, as a matter of fact, Budde himself by the characteristics he assigns to the redactor points the way again past his own hypothesis to the dramatical view of the Song. His merit thus comes to be, not that of having cut the thread of life of the dramatical explanation, but—and it is a service not to be undervalued—of having laid the foundation, by the aid of Wetzstein's information, for a more correct opinion of the character, and perhaps even of the origin, of the Song of Songs.

The present writer recognizes, then, the possibility that older wedding songs (as, for instance, the waṣfs) are worked up in the Song of Songs. But this does not exclude the supposition that the Song in its present form is of a dramatical nature, and that its author (not a redactor or 'reviser') introduced 'movement and action' or 'development' into the material of which it is composed. At all events, this view is not set aside by simply pointing to passages in certain parts of the book which are marked by the characteristics of customary wedding songs, and which were perhaps taken over by the author ready made. If an examination of the separate parts of the book and a study of the connexion of the whole tend to show that everywhere, and not merely in the passages attacked by Budde, there is dramatical movement and expression, however great or small this may be, then the question is decided in favour of the correctness of the dramatical view, whatever may be urged to the contrary. Of course a dramatic poet who utilizes older material in his work cannot have the full credit of originality allowed him, but a dramatic poem is the result of his work all the same. Moreover, it is by no means certain that the Song of Songs contains foreign matter which did not proceed from the pen of one and the same writer; on the contrary, there are not wanting indications, both in thought and expression, which point to an identity of authorship for the whole work.*

As to the general view of Canticles that ought to be taken, there can be no doubt, in the judgment of the present writer, that it is a poem whose subject is love, or more specifically that it is a carmen nuptiale or wedding song. The crucial question, however, is whether the poem, viewed as a whole, sets out from a marriage as an accomplished fact,—in other words, whether its subject is married love,—or whether a marriage is the goal at which it aims, in which case it is intended to glorify betrothed love and fidelity. The present writer is convinced that the second alternative is the correct one, and hopes in what follows to substantiate this.

We have already pointed out (p. 592 f.) how the story which Ewald's interpretation discovers in the Song of Songs might be readily developed in the popular memory and by a poetically inventive disposition from the history of Abishag of Shunem. Budde, citing a word of Goethe's, reminds us that if we are to understand the poem which we call the Song of Songs, we must visit the poet's own land. This is what we propose now to do. If Budde himself had continued his journey further and looked more carefully around him, he might have discovered the story of two lovers, Habbâs and Ḥamda, which bears a very close resemblance to what we find in Canticles. The story is given by Wetzstein in the Arabic text with German translation (see ZDMG xxii. [1868] p. 74 ff.), and was taken down by him directly from oral communication. In any case, this beautiful love romance proves that under special circumstances even at the present day amongst the Bedawîn the possibility of love entanglements is contemplated, such as are presupposed in ancient times in the Song of Songs, if we adopt the dramatical view of Ewald and others. Ḥamda is said to have loved Habbâs, who lived far away and belonged to another tribe. Her heart remains true to this love, although, after long separation in time as well as place from him whom her soul truly loves, she is destined to become the wife of her cousin Ali, and the wedding day (or rather evening) with all its festal celebrations has arrived. Nay, she has not omitted even to tell her cousin, Ali's sister, how it is with her heart, and has given her such a description of her lover's stature, his physical excellencies, and his beauty that even she must have been able to pick him out of a crowd (cf. l.c. p. 103). And, in point of fact, the lover drawn from afar by his love comes, accompanied by a true friend (Ḥusein), while there is yet time to prevent the closing of the marriage bond between Ḥamda and Ali, and to win his true love for himself. And he does win her and takes her home.

---

* We shall see afterwards that, on a correct view of the Book of Canticles, these verses [$6^{1\text{-}3}$] show themselves to be unquestionably original.

* A careful reading of the book itself will readily supply the necessary evidence of this.

No one who reads this story, which is given in its most general outlines, will be able to avoid the impression that here there is partially the same problem before us as is presented in the Song of Songs. Budde (p. 4) insists again with much emphasis that in neither the modern nor the ancient East has a real betrothal and an intimate intercourse between the betrothed parties been permitted or possible prior to marriage, and that there is no place for such a natural growth of affection as the dramatical view postulates. Well, of course we must be on our guard against applying rules borrowed from the West and from the condition of things amongst ourselves. But the story communicated by Wetzstein shows that such affections, even if these are surrounded a little with the halo of romance, are still possible at the present day, and evidence may be brought from the OT itself to show that even in ancient times it was not an impossible thing for two young people (especially leading a country life) to make each other's acquaintance and fall in love, and then to gratify their inclinations by personal meetings, even if these had to be stealthily contrived.[*] The present writer must confess, then, that in his opinion no real objection to the dramatical view of the Song of Songs can be taken on the ground of the contents which this view discovers in the Song. Moreover, the structure which is formed out of these contents presents so close a parallel to the story communicated by Wetzstein, that one can only feel thus confirmed in one's opinion that Canticles is a dramatic poem, taking for granted, of course, that in the contents of the latter there is really a dramatical progress or structure discoverable. That this last assumption is well founded is our firm conviction ; and even Budde himself, as we have seen, is not so very far removed from this opinion, since he cannot deny that at least his assumed redactor (or 'reviser') sought to introduce movement and action into the older material whose peculiar character is supposed to have passed unrecognized by him. This, however, is tantamount to saying that he gave it a dramatic form, even if he did so in an imperfect fashion. Of course the objection that the Semites had no dramatic poetry at all (cf. art. POETRY, p. 9^a) has no force, for it starts by assuming as an axiom the very point whose universal application is disputed on the ground of the Song of Songs. The proof that the dramatical view of Canticles is the correct one cannot be offered, of course, through general considerations ; but it is offered, and that with tolerable certainty, if we succeed in formulating a theory of the contents and structure of the Song, which is natural on all sides and capable of explaining, at least in the main, all the particular phenomena exhibited by the book.

The ideal goal of the whole poem appears to the present writer to have been found, from Ewald downwards, in $8^{6.7}$. The real aim of the Song of Songs is to glorify true love, and, more specifically, true betrothed love, which remains steadfast even in the most dangerous and most seductive situations. The author, as we may perhaps assume with certainty, found the material for his work in the story of Abishag of Shunem (1 K 1. 2), and that in the form which we described above (p. 592 f.). She remained true to the beloved of her heart, she steadily repelled all the advances of Solomon, into whose harem she had been brought, and finally she triumphed (8^{12} and 8^{10b}), was conducted home and restored to her lover perfectly pure. The poem makes two presuppositions—one being that the Shulammite's heart belonged to a youth in her own home, and the other that meanwhile against her will she has been brought into the royal apartments (1^4). The dramatical exposition commences at the time when the first meeting of the king with the maiden is close at hand and actually takes place (1^9). The dialogue between the Shulammite and the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (the wives and maidens belonging to the royal harem, cf. $6^{8f.}$) in 1^{2-8}[*] serves to pave the way, in true dramatic fashion, for that meeting, and at the same time to explain the real inward disposition of the Shulammite towards the approaching royal suitor, which the poet henceforward makes her retain without wavering. If, now, we would understand aright the further structure of the poem, it must be observed that the scheme chosen by the author for the poetical disposition of his material is based upon the different stages in the courtship and the marriage festivities, down to that moment when alone the real victory of loyal love, the preservation of bridely honour in face of all temptations and assaults, was evidenced, and could be evidenced, namely, the morning after the bridal night passed with the real lover.[†]

The Song of Songs is in fact a love- or marriage-drama, but, by reason of the lyrical tone which rules in its various parts, we may more appropriately call it a melodrama.

If now, keeping in view the legend derived from the story of Abishag, and the progressive stages of the marriage proceedings, we look at the whole poem, it falls, alike in point of matter and form, into two nearly equal parts. The dividing point is reached in 5^1, where also the dramatic entanglement reaches its climax. Up till then the king is the suitor for the maiden's love, and in 5^1 the course of development leads to the point where everything appears to point to the certain consummation of the marriage bond in the coming night.* From the very first encounter (1^9–2^7) the king, as intended by the poet, goes away with the impression that the fair maiden longs with intense passion for union with him; he does not notice that the outbursts of passionate longing called forth by his words are meant not for him, but for another whom she loves. The reader or the spectator of the play can have no doubt on this point, for already in 1^{2-8} (cf. especially v.^{8}) it comes out clearly enough how the heart of the maiden is engaged, and the Second Act (2^8–3^5) confirms this in the strongest way by the two dream visions. The Third Act (3^6–5^1) corresponds to the first of the festal proceedings on the day (evening) before the bridal night. The king proceeds, in his wedding attire, surrounded by his trusty men, and amidst greetings from the women, to the house where the lovely maiden is detained. This answers to the joyous procession in state by the bridegroom and his friends to the place where the feast was celebrated, on the occasion of weddings amongst the common people. The equally pompous conducting of the bride in the evening to the same place and to the performance of the sword dance, which characterized popular weddings, is wanting here; nor is this surprising, since the bride is already in a place where she belongs to the king. We may probably assume also that a king's marriage was not celebrated in exactly the same way as that of one of the common people. The sword dance and other popular customs may have been wholly absent.† Of course this does not prevent the poet from introducing into his description certain features borrowed from these customs, simply because these were calculated to introduce movement into the material. Thus he makes the king draw near in all his splendour, with his sixty heroes and friends, and (5^1) even go in to the festive meal exactly after the fashion of popular wedding festivities.‡ On the other hand, the enticing sensually flattering words of the king in $4^{1ff.}$ convey the impression, since, as we have said, we can hardly think of the sword dance, that they are the transition link to the bridal night with its mysteries. The same inference is supported by the context, as far as the contents of 4^{16}–5^1 are concerned; from the Shulammite's reply in 4^{16b} to his longing desire to enjoy the fruits of the garden that is supposed to belong to him, the king has concluded that she waits for him in order to accord him the enjoyment of her love (whereas she is thinking of her true beloved), and in this, of course, mistaken assurance he calls his friends to give themselves up to the joys of the marriage festival. At this point the king disappears. This is not specially noted, indeed, but it was unnecessary that it should be, on a correct understanding of the story of the poem, and with an actual dramatical presentation of it. As in the story of Habbâs and Ḥamda related by Wetzstein, the fortune of the maiden turns at the last moment, just when the final consummation of the marriage union with the unloved one was imminent. The king has learned in the night shrouded with mystery that she does not belong and cannot belong to him, and he is magnanimous enough not to claim what only violence could procure. He has set her free, as Ali did with Hamda, and the next section (5^2–6^3) of the Fourth Act conducts us slowly away from the king's domain. The poet retains the scheme of the wedding celebration, but now we have to do with the celebration of the marriage of the Shulammite with the object of her heart's affections. Between 5^1 and 5^2, properly speaking, there intervenes a space of time, which, to be sure, required in the dramatical construction of the poem no further indication than the passing from one scene to another. In what will be conceded to be an extremely skilful manner the poet moves on to the goal of his task, by placing us in $5^{2ff.}$ at the same stage in the celebration of the marriage of the Shulammite with her lover as we had reached in 3^6–5^1 in connexion with the abortive attempt of Solomon. The passage 5^2–6^3, rightly understood, forms the introduction to the principal part of this Act, which reaches its climax in $8^{6.7}$. We hear in it the outpouring of the burning longing of the Shulammite for union with him whom she loves. The women, 'the daughters of Jerusalem,' by whom she is surrounded, are called on by her to assist her search for the beloved of her soul, who is portrayed in glowing colours. In this way a perfect movement is given to the action, which is conceived of after the model of a marriage celebration.

[*] In favour of such a possibility may be cited in the first place Jg $14^{1f. 7f.}$, and then legal enactments like Ex $22^{15f.}$, Dt $22^{23ff.}$; cf. also Gn $34^{1.2}$. It may be held as certain that even in ancient Israel, in spite of the strictness of morality, nay, perhaps even because of it, there was no lack of a genuine romantic side to love.

[*] The way in which the particular sentences are to be assigned to the respective speakers will be found exhibited in the present writer's work Das Hohe Lied, to which he begs to refer the reader.

[†] As bearing on this, the reader may be reminded of the legislative enactment of Dt $22^{13ff.}$. The cloth with its irrefragable proof of the virginity of a newly married woman points to a very serious transaction in the early morning after the bridal night. The practice forms even at the present day part of the proceedings in connexion with a wedding, and is described by Wetzstein ('Die syrische Dreschtafel' in Bastian's Ztschr. f. Ethnol. 1873, p. 290).

For the correct understanding of the further context it is necessary, above all, to take 6^{1-3} rightly. In 6^2 there is an allusion, expressed in a beautiful figure, to part of the festal procedure of the marriage evening having already taken place. The beloved has already gone down to enjoy the fruits of his garden (a plain allusion to 4^{16}), i.e. he has already gone to the place of the festival, and is present there with his escort. The ceremonial procession of the bridegroom, which was expressly mentioned in the case of the king in $3^{6ff.}$, is thus presupposed in the present instance. The search for the beloved, in which the women (6^1) are prepared to help the Shulammite, corresponds to the ceremonial conducting of the bride in the evening to the festal spot. 6^{4-10} [vv.$^{5b-7}$ are to be struck out as having been introduced by mistake from ch. 4] contain the songs which greet the approaching bride and describe in striking figures her unique overpowering beauty. $6^{11.12}$ are words of the Shulammite. She is apparently surprised at coming upon the festive company, she still acts as if she did not notice that the object of her search is in their midst. She had gone down, she says, to the nut garden to refresh herself by the enjoyment of it, i.e. she too has gone out to find her beloved and to enjoy his love, and has all at once come upon the crowd. We are to suppose now that she makes as if she would turn back, whereupon the chorus breaks out (7^1 [Eng. 6^{13}]), 'Turn round, turn round, O Shulammite,' etc. Then the short invitation and dialogue of this verse lead directly to the sword dance, in which the bride dances in a sense to her beloved and presents herself to him symbolically with all her charms, while the double chorus ranging itself behind her proclaims her physical attractions in a highly realistic waṣf. Now she is ready, as $7^{11ff.}$ show, to yield to the wishes of her beloved (7^{8-10}), and herself invites him to go with her where she will grant him her love. The last section of this Act, 8^{5-7},* shows the loving pair on their way to the house where the bridal night is to be passed; they are received by the festal chorus with the words of 8^{5a}, which find their echo in the alternating song of the lovers with its glorious panegyric on true love (vv.$^{6.7}$).

And now the moment had come when it must be shown whether the Shulammite had really maintained her love true and unimpaired, whether the lofty ode to love in which she had joined ($8^{6.7}$) was really suitable to her love. $8^{8ff.}$† transport us to the morning after the bridal night. In the space of time between v.^{7} and v.^{8} we are therefore to place not only the bridal night with its mysteries, but also the transition to the serious transaction early in the following morning (see above, p. 595, note †). The latter is brought directly before us in vv.$^{8-10}$, which proclaim the triumph of steadfast loyal love over all the difficulties and fears that have beset it. We hear in vv.$^{8.9}$ the brothers of the Shulammite declaring what they mean to do to their sister according as she has shown herself, in face of the seductive whispers of love, firm and inaccessible as a wall, or open and easily approachable like a door (i.e. easily led into inchastity). These, of course, are words which the brothers have spoken before the commencement of the severe period of probation and danger exhibited to us in the Song of Songs. We are thus vividly reminded of 1^6, and in point of fact—as is shown also by 8^{12a}, which in like manner looks back to 1^6—the author in his beautiful closing section, $8^{8ff.}$, attaches his words once more to the opening of the poem, thus indicating not only that this resolute maiden has succeeded in maintaining her childhood's purity, but also that the Song of Songs is really a well-rounded whole. The brothers have a direct interest in the issue of the test of their sister's virginity, and, besides, have the duty of maintaining the honour of the family. But while they are uttering the language of anxious expectation, which is finely put into their mouth, regarding the result of the test, the actual piece of evidence is brought forward (this we must suppose to be done between v.^{9} and v.^{10}), and in face of this irrefragable proof the Shulammite breaks forth in the confident triumphant words of v.^{10}. She has been found inviolate, she has kept herself as an impregnable fortress, there being perhaps in the last words of the verse a delicate allusion to Solomon, and the fact that even he had finally to recognize that this virgin was unimpressed by himself, his splendour, his allurements, and that he must thus let her go in peace. The words in v.^{12} connect themselves closely with v.^{10}; she has kept her own vineyard, i.e. herself, her honour, her love, for herself and her beloved; Solomon may rest content with the abundant resources he possesses for gratifying his love.

So ends the dramatical development of the material used in the Song of Songs. The present writer considers that in the scheme of interpretation just proposed everything proceeds in good order and exhibits a perfectly natural connexion. He thinks it well to say natural, because, as a matter of fact, the different parts of the Song correspond exactly in their progress to the various stages in a marriage celebration. Even the transition from the first to the second half of the poem is dramatically beautiful and essentially unconstrained, and, as deserves to be once more emphasized, has a remarkable resemblance to the turning-point in the narrative of the loves of Ḥamda and Ḥabbâs. So also in the progress from one Act to another or one Scene to another, everything has an unconstrained flow, there is nothing abrupt or unnatural. We may then be permitted to express our conviction that if the Song of Songs be taken in the sense above indicated, not only will it be found to be perfectly intelligible in every part of its contents, but it will also prove itself beyond question to be a dramatical unity and constructed with dramatical skill.—Whether this melodramatic marriage-play was ever actually performed, say at wedding celebrations, or whether it was simply the product of a poet's leisure (composed with a didactic aim), cannot of course be determined, but at all events it was capable of being so presented.

* It is impossible to understand the perfects in 5^1 as real preterites. They are perfects of certain expectation (perfecta confidentiæ, cf. Ges.-Kautzsch, Gram.^{26} § 106 n.). The misunderstanding of these perfects has been the occasion of much confusion.

† How kings married daughters of the people may be gathered from 2 S 11^{27}, while Ps 45 may give light in regard to the procedure when a foreign princess was concerned.

‡ The following of these popular customs also shows irrefutably that the call to eat and drink and intoxicate themselves refers not to the enjoyment of love, but to an actual banquet at which the friends, too, are to do their part.

* It may be noted that $8^{3.4}$ have been wrongly placed in their present position, where they do not at all suit the context. Their insertion after vv.$^{1.2}$ is readily intelligible on the ground of a certain similarity of thought in $2^{4ff.}$; but see the next note.

† In this last section the present writer regards v.^{11} as an archæological and in any case very prosaic gloss, occasioned by the 'thousand' of v.^{12}. In like manner v.^{14} is a later insertion by one who misunderstood the Song of Songs in so far as he believed that the Shulammite in the end became the wife of Solomon. In no other way can the strange invitation to the beloved be understood. The same hand which added v.^{14} may also through a similar misunderstanding have inserted vv.$^{3.4}$. In 8^{12}, which is unquestionably genuine, the Shulammite manifestly contrasts herself with the thousand wives of Solomon; v.^{13}, which we also hold to be genuine (cf. 2^{14}), closes the Song of Songs, but serves at the same time as an introduction to the merry songs, dances, and games which followed at a marriage feast, and which lasted for seven days.

iii. AUTHORSHIP, PLACE OF COMPOSITION, AND DATE OF THE SONG OF SONGS.—The title at the head of the work means, of course, to point to Solomon himself as the author of the poem, and down to the most recent times this view has been closely bound up with the allegorical interpretation and has been widely held. But it is out of the question, alike on the theory of Herder and on that inaugurated especially by Ewald. As a matter of course, the Solomonic authorship is excluded also if Budde's view be accepted. The present writer is equally compelled, in view of all that has been said above, to regard the traditional opinion as erroneous. Solomon is indeed partly the subject of the poem, but it is quite impossible that he himself should have composed it. And it is of course beyond our power so much as to hazard a conjecture as to who the actual author was.

Nor can much be said as to the place of composition. Budde has sought to infer from the mention of the 'daughters of Jerusalem' that the poetical material contained in the Song of Songs had its birthplace in Jerusalem or the neighbourhood of it. But every hint that can be utilized for locating the poem appears to point to the north of Palestine. There and nowhere else is the stage upon which the movement takes place in most parts of the poem that contain geographical allusions. This does not, however, imply that the actual composition of the poem must have taken place in North Palestine. It was extremely natural that, even if the author lived in Judæa, the locality of the dramatic poem should be fixed in the north, if its material was supplied by the story of Abishag of Shunem in the developed form explained above. In the first part, accordingly, we should find ourselves, of course, in the royal palace at Jerusalem, and this agrees admirably with $2^{8b.\ 17b}$, where it is presupposed that the place of residence of the Shulammite is separated from that of her beloved by a number of mountain heights. While there is nothing in the contents of the Song of Songs to justify any certain inference as to the place of composition, the present writer considers it probable that it was Judæa, perhaps even Jerusalem. This conclusion is perhaps supported also by the decision, so far as any such is possible, regarding—

The date. It has been supposed that the Song of Songs originated, if not in the Solomonic era, at least at a time not far removed from it. The lifelike conception of the conditions of that time, on the one hand, and the occurrence of Tirzah, the ancient capital of the Northern Kingdom, alongside of Jerusalem (6^4), on the other hand, are supposed to necessitate the fixing of the date of composition of the Song of Songs in the early decades after the reign of Solomon. Neither of these arguments, however, proves anything, for there is nothing in them but what is readily explicable even on the view of a late date, especially if we may regard it as settled that the author derived his material from the story of Abishag. Besides, it is very questionable whether the conceptions of local, personal, and other relations are so lifelike, and in general so accurate, as to permit or justify the inference that the poet lived near to the time with which he deals. Tirzah and other places that enter on occasion into his descriptions were, of course, not outside the sphere of knowledge even of a poet belonging to a later age.—The strongest objection, however, to placing the Song of Songs so early is presented by certain linguistic phenomena that characterize it. The form of the relative pronoun (שׁ) and other peculiarities of expression may, indeed, be explained on the view that the Song of Songs was composed in North Palestine, the language of which was doubtless dialectically different from that of Judæa, and more akin to the neighbouring Aramaic dialects. But the Persian loan-word פרדס (4^{13}) and the word אפריון (3^9), which in all probability is borrowed from the Greek φορεῖον, cannot possibly be explained at so early a period, but rather compel us to come down to the Macedonian era (cf. on this point especially Driver, LOT^{6} p. 449 f.). The poet was then in all probability a member of the Jewish community in Jerusalem, and lived at a time when, through contact with the Greek world, the adoption of Greek terms had become possible not only in the language of daily life, but also in literary usage. It is of course difficult, or rather impossible, to fix the terminus ad quem for the composition, and we do not intend to propose even a tentative date. One point, however, may be noted. The general tone of the whole poem appears to imply that the time when the Song originated was a time of peaceful, we might say happy, repose for the community, when love could unhindered follow after love and finally rejoice in the full possession of its object.—And now, perhaps, at last we may hazard a conjecture. It is true that purely dramatic poetry is in general alien to the Semitic mind, and, although we felt compelled to maintain the dramatical character of the Song of Songs against all objections, yet we found it necessary also to make our recognition of the presence in it of the lyrical element, which is the fundamental characteristic of all Semitic poetry, by calling Canticles a melodrama. The question naturally arises, Whence came the author's stimulus to compose this melodramatic poem? Was it from a wide contact with the Greek world? This appears to the present writer not impossible.

Biblica* (practically in agreement with Budde), which appeared since the above was written; and W. Riedel, Die älteste Auslegung d. Hohenl. 1898. SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN.—See THREE CHILDREN (SONG OF THE).

SONS OF GOD.—This expression is used in Scripture in two distinct senses. For one of these see articles ADOPTION, and GOD (CHILDREN OF). The other is found in six passages: Gn 6^2, Job 1^6 2^1 38^7 (all בְּנֵי (הָ)אֱלֹהִים; LXX in first three οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ, in last ἀγγελοί μου), Ps 29^1 $89^{7\,(6)}$ (both בְּנֵי אֵלִים; LXX υἱοὶ θεοῦ); cf. in the sing. Dn 3^{25} בַּר־אֱלָהִין, RV 'a son of the gods.' The meaning is 'sons of the 'ĕlōhîm or 'ēlîm' in the sense of members of that class or race (cf. 'sons of the prophets'=members of the prophetic guild) of which God Himself is the pre-eminent 'Ĕlōhîm (see A. B. Davidson's note on Job 1^{6}). Hence the expression is practically synonymous with 'angels' (cf. LXX above). The only passage where any difficulty has been felt (and that only for dogmatic reasons) about interpreting the phrase in this way is Gn 6^{2}. Onkelos, Beresh. rab., Saadya, Ibn Ezra, et al., take it to mean there 'sons of princes,' 'mighty men'; Theod., Chrys., Jerome, Aug., Luther, Calvin, Hengstenberg, et al., understand by 'the sons of God' the pious (Sethite) portion of the human race, which is opposed to the (Cainite) 'daughters of men.' Neither of these interpretations suits either the context or the usage of the Heb. phrase. The interpretation 'angels' is correctly taken in Jude ^{8} and 2 P 2^{4}, in the Books of Enoch and Jubilees, as well as by Philo, Jos. (Ant. I. iii. 1), and most of the older Church Fathers. J. A. SELBIE.

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING.—

The Heb. for 'soothsaying' is קֶסֶם, מִקְסָם, Gr. μαντεία, μαντεῖον, οἰώνισμα (the last term being also used to tr. נַחַשׁ 'augury,' Nu 23^{23} ‖ קֶסֶם). 'Soothsayer' is קֹסֵם, which in Is 3^{2} is rendered by στοχαστής. The Arab. ḳasama means properly 'divide or portion out.' Hence ḳismet is a man's apportioned lot or destiny. The word מְעוֹנֵן is another alternative expression not easy to distinguish from קֹסֵם (see below). The term יִדְּעֹנִי is always closely connected in the OT passages with אוֹב, and will be dealt with under 'Necromancy' in art. SORCERY. The other terms חַרְטֹם (see below) and the Aram. גָּזְרִין (Dn 2^{27} 4^{7} 5^{7}) do not possess a clear connotation.

Soothsaying, though separate from magic, is nevertheless very closely associated with it (see MAGIC). It may be defined as involving an abnormal mode of obtaining knowledge. Just as magic is the abnormal method of obtaining control over persons or events by means of some supernatural Divine or demonic agency, so soothsaying involves the corresponding abnormal method of obtaining information. The soothsayer is to be found in every primitive religion, and ancient Semitic culture formed no exception to the rule. The comparison of early Arabic religion with that of primitive Israel conducts us irresistibly to the conclusion that the Hebrew priest in early times was also a soothsayer. For the Heb. כֹּהֵן is the Arab. kâhin, 'soothsayer,' who owned the local shrine and kept watch and ward over it, and gave replies to the inquiring pilgrim. We thus observe how the priest and the prophet in primitive Semitic antiquity started from a common base and blended their functions. The priest offered sacrifices, and likewise gave answers to satisfy the worshipper who came to seek information and guidance. Both functions, that of sacrifice and that of divination, were united in one person. Indeed, as we know in the case of the soothsayer and prophet Balaam, sacrifices accompanied the declarations which he made * (Nu 22^{40} $23^{1. 4. 15. 17. 20}$). Accordingly, the combination of the functions of divination and sacrifice may be assumed to be characteristic of primitive Israel as it was of ancient Arabia. To the priest belonged the function of giving replies by (a) URIM AND THUMMIM, (b) by TERAPHIM, and, lastly, (c) by EPHOD.

Much obscurity invests the actual nature of all these objects. The most probable view is that the teraphim were ancestral images and of human shape (to which 1 S 19^{13-16} irresistibly points, cf. Gn $31^{19. 30}$), and that the ephod was a plated image used as a symbol of Jehovah. This seems clear from Jg $8^{26\text{f.}}$, in which we are told that Gideon made it of the gold rings captured from the Ishmaelites and Midianites. Both ephod and teraphim are mentioned together in Hos 3^{4}; and Ezk 21^{21} and Zec 10^{2} clearly prove that the teraphim were employed in the act of divination. Reference to the employment of the ephod is to be found in a series of ancient OT passages which describe the consultation of Jehovah in special emergencies. A series of interrogations was put to the deity, one following in logical sequence on the other, each capable of being answered in the alternative form of 'yes' or 'no.' Of this, perhaps the most instructive example is to be found in 1 S $23^{9\text{f.}}$, in which David inquires through the priest Abiathar by means of the ephod, and a series of categorical affirmative (or in other cases negative) replies are given (cf. 1 S $30^{7. 8}$, and Benzinger, Heb. Arch. pp. 382, 408). Obviously, information could be eked out by this process only very slowly, and in one case we read that Saul was compelled by the exigencies of war (1 S 14^{19}) to interrupt the tardy procedure of the priest as the tumult of the advancing Philistine army increased. Sometimes the omens were unfavourable for obtaining Divine answers (ib. 14^{37}). The close connexion which certainly subsisted between the ephod which was carried by the priest (1 S 23^{6}) and the divination which he practised, seems to point to the conclusion that the ephod was in some way a part at least of the apparatus of inquiry.* But it is not necessary to suppose that it was more than the symbol or idol which represented the deity whose presence gave validity to the whole procedure. The actual apparatus of soothsaying probably consisted in blunted arrows or, in primitive times, small twigs; and it is to this rude mechanism of inquiry that Hosea (4^{12}) refers under עֵץ (cf. Arab. عضون in Wellh. Reste ^{2}, p. 132) and מַקֵּל, while Ezk 21^{21} mentions the arrows.

Early Arabic cultus, as Wellhausen has pointed out (l.c. p. 141), bears an unmistakable family likeness to the Hebrew, and it is to ancient Arabic usage that we turn for the most instructive illustrations of our subject. Among primitive Arab warrior tribes, as in ancient Israel, campaigns were never conducted without constant resort to the kâhin or priest-soothsayer, who usually belonged to a family which owned the sanctuary and kept guard over its treasures.

Ordinarily the answer to the inquiry consists only in 'yes' or 'no,' indicated by one arrow for affirmative and another for negative. There might also be complicated alternatives. The arrows might be marked to meet every possible range of inquiry, and the arrow drawn forth or shaken out was the answer to the question. Soothsaying was constantly resorted to before a military expedition. It is said of nearly all the clan chiefs of the Ḳuraish that they consulted the lots before their departure to Badr, although Abu Sufian, for whose deliverance the expedition was made, had sent them word that they were not to begin by consulting the lots. Strictly speaking, this consultation takes place in the sanctuary before the idol (Wellhausen)

Among the Arabs, money was paid for divination, and sacrifices (as of a camel) preceded or accompanied the divining ceremony. In these respects we find close parallels in the Balaam narrative, to which allusion has already been made. Accordingly, in this episode we do not fail to note that the deputations were provided with money payment for the soothsaying (called קְסָמִים Nu 22^{7}), a feature in the story which reminds us of 2 K 5^{5}.

As the ancient Hebrews in early times called the soothsayer רֹאֶה or 'seer,' so the primitive Arabs called him a 'gazer.' When 'gazing' he would veil his face. Hence the epithet, dhûl chimar, or 'the (man) with the veil,' applied to several seers.† We naturally revert to the veil of the prophet Moses (Ex $34^{33\text{ff.}}$). Under the influence of the supernatural spirit or demon a series of short sentences would be uttered, of which four to six would be united together in a strophe by rhyme. This is called in Arabic Saj'^{un}, comp. the Heb. מְשֻׁגָּע applied to a prophet (2 K 9^{11}). This wild ecstatic condition often characterized the primitive Hebrew prophet in pre-exilic times (1 S $10^{10\text{f.}}$), and this became contagious, and affected those who witnessed it (1 S $19^{20. 23. 24}$, cf. 18^{10}). What the OT ascribed to possession by the spirit of God (Jehovah) the Arab in primitive times ascribed to the spirit or demon that dwelt in him. Among the Moslems a demon was called a shaitân (see under SATAN).

---

* 'In petitioning the deity a sacrifice was naturally offered. Through the sacrifice, which was rendered acceptable to the deity by the mediation of the priest, the desired answer to a question was obtained' (Morris Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, p. 331).

* So Moore, art. 'Ephod' in Encyc. Biblica.

† The root of the word for 'seer' in Arabic corresponds to the Heb. חזה.

The connexion between the jinn in early Arabia (and in later times the shaitân) and serpents throws light upon the serpent of Gn 3 as well as the שָׂרָף of Is 6². The jinn were considered to reside in serpents, and the name shaitân is applied to a serpent.* The jinn were not necessarily evil. Some might be well disposed to truth (Ḳoran, 46²⁸), like the great male serpent which met Moḥammed on the way to Tabuk (cf. Baudissin, Studien zur semit. Religionsgesch. i. p. 279 ff.).

These illustrations from ancient Arabic belief enable us to understand the use of the Heb. נִחֵשׁ for 'divine' (from נָחָשׁ 'serpent') and נַחַשׁ for 'divination' (2 K 17¹⁷ 21⁶, Dt 18¹⁰, Lv 19²⁶, Gn 30²⁷ 44¹⁵). This association of the art of divination with the serpent arose from a variety of causes. This reptile springs mysteriously from holes in the earth with the hissing or whispering sound characteristic of incantations (see MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 210ᵇ and footnote), and with a fascinating power of the eye which made it inevitable that a serpent should be regarded as the embodiment of a demon. Hence cunning and wisdom were ascribed to serpents (Gn 3¹, Mt 10¹⁶). Thus it was natural that the denom. Piel נִחֵשׁ came to be employed of the soothsayer, who was considered to be demon-possessed (like the sorcerer or necromancer, יִדְּעֹנִי and בַּעַל אוֹב).

Both in Arabia and in ancient Assyria the desire to know the course of future events in their bearing upon the interests of the inquirer, more especially with respect to the success or non-success of some enterprise, impelled him to find clues of information in the movements of nature, more especially of animals, since these were held to be possessed by demons. The Arabs believed that the animal is ma'mûr, i.e. is subject to some higher behest, and has open eyes to see (like Balaam's ass) when human eyes are without vision. The wolf, the dog, the hare, and the fox were omen-giving animals. Coming from the right hand, one of these animals would be hailed as portending good; from the left, bad (Wellh. p. 201 f.). Birds were especially considered to convey omens, viz. the raven, goose, starling, and hoopoe. The raven was the bird which heralded misfortune, especially the separation of friends from loved ones.

The cuneiform records exhibit the wide prevalence of a great mass of similar beliefs and practices in Babylonia, but with this difference, that the omen-tablets mark the distinctions in special cases with a wearisome excess of detail which we do not find in the simpler civilization of the Western Semitic lands, Palestine and Arabia. The omens may be divided into different classes: (1) those concerned with days and heavenly bodies; (2) those concerned with the features of human childbirth and also with those of birth-giving by animals; (3) omens concerned with movements of animals.—These will be found fully treated in Morris Jastrow's instructive work, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, chs. xix. and xx. The following is a good example of (1)—

> 'Sun and moon are seen apart (i.e. at different times);
> The king of the country will manifest wisdom.
> On the fourteenth day sun and moon are seen together;
> There will be loyalty in the land,
> The gods of Babylonia are favourably inclined,
> The soldiery will be in accord with the king's desire,
> The cattle of Babylonia will pasture in safety.
>
> On the fifteenth day the sun and moon are seen together;
> A powerful enemy raises his weapons against the land,
> The enemy will shatter the great gate of tbe city.'

Omens were likewise derived from the particular day of the month on which an eclipse takes place; from the appearances or disappearances of the planet Venus (Ishtar). In Rawl. iv. pl. 32, 33 we have a calendar of the intercalated month Elul. The deity is mentioned to which each day is sacred, and certain sacrifices are prescribed and precautions indicated. The 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days are called evil (limnu); see art. SABBATH, p. 319ᵃ; and cf. Schrader, COT i. p. 19 f., and Jensen in ZA iv. (1889) p. 274 ff.

(2) Varied forms of abnormal birth are specified, and the events which they portend—

> 'If a woman gives birth to a child with the right ear missing, the days of the ruler will be long. If a woman gives birth to a child with the left ear missing, distress will enter the land and weaken it.'
>
> The abnormal features in the birth of young lambs were carefully noted and interpreted—
>
> 'If the young one has no right ear, the rule of the king will come to an end, his palace will be uprooted, and the population of the country will be swept away. The king will lose judgment, tbe produce of the country will be slight, the enemy will cut off the supply of water. If the left ear of the young one is missing, the deity will hear the prayer of the king, the king will capture bis enemy's land, the palace of the enemy will be destroyed.'

(3) The number and variety of cases here as in (1) and (2) are endless.

> 'If a dog enters the palace and crouches on the throne, that palace will suffer a distressful fate. If a dog enters a palace and crouches on the couch, no one will enjoy that palace in peace.'
> The colour of a dog that enters a palace or of the locusts that enter a house, will affect the precise form of good which is portended by the occurrence.

The gods were constantly approached with questions involving the future interests of the State or affecting the fate of a military campaign. Knudtzon in his Assyr. Gebete an den Sonnengott für Staat und königliches Haus, has devoted a careful examination to these questions addressed to Šamaš the Sun-god, which are shown to follow a fixed pattern. First we have a series of questions which the god is petitioned to answer. The god is then implored not to be angry, and to protect the suppliant against errors unwittingly committed in the sacrificial rites—

> 'O Shamash, great lord, as I ask tbee, do thou in true mercy answer me.
> 'From this day the 3rd day of this month of Iyyar to the 11th day of the month Ab of this year, a period of one hundred days and one hundred nights, is the prescribed term for the priestly activity.*
>
> 'Will within this period Kashtariti, together with his soldiery, will the army of the Gimirri, the army of the Medes, will the army of the Manneans, or will any enemy whatsoever succeed in carrying out their plan, whether by stratagem (?) or main force, whether by the force of weapons of war and battle or by the axe, whether by a breach made with war-machinery or battering-rams or by hunger, whether by the powers residing in the name of a god or goddess . . . will these aforementioned, as many as are required to take a city, actually capture the city Kishsassu, penetrate into the interior of that same city Kishsassu. . . . Thy great divine power knows it. . . . Will it actually come to pass?'
> We observe that all possible contingencies are specified as in a lawyer's deed, and no loophole is left by which the deity may escape the obligation of a definite answer. (See Jastrow, p. 334 ff.)

How far Israel, and more particularly Judah, at the close of the 8th cent. became influenced by Bab. or Assyr. practices, it would be very difficult to say. That the older and more highly developed civilization of the Euphrates and Tigris should have affected the Palestinian tribes at this time is surely more than possible. In the 15th and earlier centuries B.C. that influence was powerfully felt throughout the Western border (mât amurri), as the Tel el-Amarna tablets clearly testify, and it spread into Egypt itself. Moreover, we may infer from certain indications that some influences from Bab. and

* Iblîs (=διάβολος) is not so frequently employed in the sing. as the plur. form of shaitân, which takes the place of jinn (plur.) (Wellh. l.c. p. 157 footnote).

* This expression is interpreted to mean that the priest is only asked to give a reply concerning the events of the hundred days specified in the text.

Assyr. divination not improbably found their way into the Southern kingdom. (1) We know that Ahaz was particularly susceptible to foreign religious influence, and did not hesitate to borrow from foreign courts (2 K 16^{10-18} 20^{11}). (2) The embassy of Merodach-baladan shows that the relations between Judah and Babylonia were intimate (2 K $20^{12\text{ff.}}$). (3) The proneness of Ahaz to alliance with Assyria at an earlier period may have opened the way for the entrance of Assyro-Babylonian traditions. (4) If we combine these facts with Is 2^6, where reference is made to the superstitious tendencies which prevailed in Israel, and where these are ascribed to the 'East,' we may find the true clue to the meaning of this term 'East.' The true reading here has been conjecturally restored by critics with some probability in the form כִּי מָלְאוּ קֹסְמֵי (קֹסְמִים) מִקֶּדֶם 'for they are full of soothsayers from the East,' which harmonizes with the parallel clause that follows. Teman (Edom) also had its soothsayers (Jer 49^7, Ob ^{8}). Was the source Arabia?

Egypt presented parallel phenomena. Divination and the practice of occult sciences prevailed in the plains of the Nile as much as in those of the Euphrates. In Egypt the division of time among the higher divine powers was carried to such an extent that even every hour of day and night was allotted to some goddess (though not to the superior deities). The character of the divinity determined the destiny of the period over which that divinity presided. By turning up the calendar of the days of the month it was thought possible to gain a glimpse into futurity, and decide whether a particular day was favourable or unfavourable; what should be done and what omitted; and what prospects awaited the child who was born upon it. We have an example of such a calendar in the papyrus Sallier iv. belonging to the 19th dyn., in which there are instructions covering several months of the year. We select the following in reference to one month—

'4th Paophi: unfavourable, favourable, favourable (i.e. of variable significance). By no means leave your house on this day. He who is born on this day, dies upon it through a contagious disease.

'5th —: unfavourable, unfavourable, unfavourable. By no means leave your house on this day. Do not approach any woman. On this day we should offer gifts to the god. The majesty of the god Month was satisfied on this day. He who is born on this day will die of love.

'9th —: favourable, favourable, favourable. The gods are in gladness, men in exultation. The foe of Râ has fallen. He who is born on this day dies of the weakness of old age.

'22nd —: unfavourable, unfavourable, unfavourable. Do not bathe in any water on this day. He who embarks on a vessel on the river on this day will be rent in pieces by the tongue of the crocodile.' *

To what particular mode of divination allusion is made in Gn 44^5, where the silver bowl with which Joseph practised the art is referred to, cannot be determined from ancient Egyptian sources. It has been supposed that some form of κυλικομαντεία or ὑδρομαντεία was in the writer's mind. The goblet was filled with water and the sun's rays were admitted, and, as the goblet was moved, the circles of light that were formed were closely observed (Iamblichus, de mysteriis, iii. 14), or the cup was marked with letters and a divining-ring touched them here or there, and conclusions were deduced therefrom (Amm. Marcellinus, 29); cf. Dillm. ad loc. These are, however, conjectures only.

The word employed in the passages dealing with the story of Israel in Egypt for 'soothsayer' or 'magician' (for the word expressed both) was חַרְטֹם, plur. חַרְטֻמִּים, Gn $41^{8.\,24}$ (E), Ex 7^{11} $8^{7.\,18}$ etc. 9^{11} (P), Dn 1^{20} 2^2, variously rendered in LXX ἐπαοιδοί, φαρμακοί ἐξηγηταί [in Dn 1^{20} σοφισταί, Theodotion ἐπαοιδοί]. The Heb. word is probably derived from חֶרֶט, stylus for graving words, since the arts of the magician or soothsayer were based, in the more elaborate systems of Babylonia and Egypt, upon carefully written rituals.

Dreams.—In ancient Arabic belief sleep was considered in a mysterious sense to be sacred, and subject to the control of demons.* 'All Arabs reverence a man sleeping; he is, as it were, in trance with God: in their households they piously withdraw, nor will they lightly molest him.' † It is not surprising, therefore, that the significance attached to dreams is a universal feature of antiquity. The ancient Egyptians believed in the significance of the dream as the state of mind through which deities entered into personal relationship with men and gave them guidance. Thus Râ Harmachis appeared to king Thothmes IV., when he rested in the chase near the Great Sphinx, and commanded him to have the statue dug out of the sand. A sure means of obtaining a prophetic dream was to betake oneself to one of the temples that were sacred to divinities who vouchsafed oracles, and there sleep. The temple of Serapis was one of the most celebrated of these shrines, like the temple of Æsculapius at Epidaurus, where dreams were bestowed in which remedies were communicated against disease. Sometimes as a last resort magic was appealed to in order to extort the dream from the reluctant deity. Wiedemann (Religion der altcn Aegypter, p. 144) cites one of the magical texts from a Gnostic papyrus of comparatively late date preserved in the Leyden Museum, entitled 'Agathocles' Recipe for sending a Dream,' which runs thus—

'Take a slaughtered cat, quite black, prepare a tablet, and write the following with a solution of myrrh and the dream which you wish to send, and put it into the cat's mouth: Keimi, Keimi, I am the great one who rests in the mouth Mommom Thoth, Nanumbre, Karicha, Kenyro, Paarmiathon, the holy Iau ieê ieu aêoi who is above the heaven [other names follow] put thyself in connexion with N.N. about this [i.e. the said dream]. If necessary, secure for me N.N. through thy power. Lord of the whole world, fiery god, put thyself in connexion with N.N. Tharthar, thamara thatha mommom thanabotha [other names follow]. Hear me, for I will pronounce the great name Thoth, whom every god reverences and every demon fears. My name corresponds to the seven (vowels) a e ê i o y ô iauôêeaô oueê ôia. I named thy glorious name, the name for all needs. Put thyself in connexion with N.N. . . .'

Here we find soothsaying passing over into magic, to which it stands, as we have already explained, so closely related. The apparently meaningless combination of syllables which the magician employs contains the names of deities. Compare the name Sabaôth, borrowed from the Jewish Holy Scriptures, to which a mysterious potency was ascribed. These must be reproduced in their exact original form. No translation was tolerated: not only did it render the charm inoperative, but brought down evils upon the magician (cf. art. MAGIC, ad fin.).

The Assyrians, like the Egyptians, attached great importance to dreams. Of this we have two interesting examples in the Rassam-cylinder of Ašurbanipal. In col. ii. 95 we are told that to Gyges, king of Lydia, Ašur revealed Ašurbanipal's name in a dream, saying: 'Embrace the feet of Ašurbanipal, king of Assyria, and thou shalt conquer thy enemies by his name.' On the same day on which he had seen this dream, Gyges despatched his horsemen to greet Ašurbanipal and narrate it to him. The inscription goes on to state that from that day forth he conquered the Kimmerians, who had attacked the people of his land (lines 95–105).—The other passage occurs in col. v. 95 ff. Ašurbanipal's troops feared to cross the Ididê, but Ištar of Arbela appeared to them in a dream, and said: 'I go before Ašurbanipal, the king whom my hands have made.' Confiding in this dream, his troops crossed the Ididê safely.

† Doughty, Arabia Deserta, vol. i. p. 249 ff.

It should be noted that one special branch of the art of the priest-soothsayer in Babylonia consisted in the interpretation of the manifold appearances in dreams. A considerable portion of the omen-documents in cuneiform consists of the rules laid down as to what the different features in a dream may portend.

> If a lion appears to a man, it means that a man will carry out his purpose. If a jackal, that he will secure favour in the eyes of the gods. A dog portends sorrow; a mountain goat, that the man's son will die of some disease; a stag, that his daughter will die, etc. (Bezold's Catalogue, pp. 1437, 1438, cited by Jastrow).

To this special function of the Babylonian temple officials we have reference in Dn 2^2, where they are summoned by Nebuchadnezzar to discharge the perplexing task of not only interpreting but also of first recalling a dream which the monarch had forgotten (cf. Gn $41^{8ff.}$). פּוֹתֵר is the proper word in Heb. for interpreter of dreams.

Divine revelation through dreams constantly meets us in the OT (Gn $20^{3.6}$ $31^{10.11}$ 37^6 $40^{5ff.}$ $41^{1ff.}$ 42^9, 1 K $3^{5.15}$, Dn 2^{19} 7^1, Nu 12^6, Job 33^{15}, Jg 7^{13}, and in NT Mt 1^{20} 2^{13}, Ac 23^{11} 27^{23}). Dreams were a legitimate mode of Divine manifestation, though we find warnings against the dreams of false prophets, as against magic and soothsaying (Jer $23^{28.32}$ 29^8, Zec 10^2, Sir $34^{1.2.5.7}$). It is worthy of note that among the Hebrews, as among the Egyptians, importance was attached to the dreams which came to a man who slept in a sanctuary or sacred spot. The dream of Jacob might be included among such visions (Gn 28^{12-19}), since the scene was at Bethel, the renowned sanctuary. The dream recorded in 1 K 3^{5-15} was vouchsafed to Solomon at the high place of Gibeon, where he had offered sacrifices.

Just as among the Arabs the art of soothsaying began to decline after the advent of Moḥammed and the monotheism which he taught,* so among the ancient Hebrews the prophetic teaching from the 8th cent. onwards constantly declaimed against the arts of the soothsayer, and the burden of this prophetic Tôrah became embodied in legislation (Dt $18^{10ff.}$, cf. Lv $20^{6.27}$). In Is 2^6 we find mention of [מְ]עֹנְנִים among the other modes of foreign Eastern superstition with which Judah by the time of Isaiah had become familiar. But in this special case the original source probably lay at Israel's doors, and the tradition was borrowed from the Canaanites. Of this we have clear evidence in Dt 18^{14}, and in the 'terebinth (oak) of diviners' (מעוננים MEONENIM) mentioned as a well-known sacred spot with a sacred tree (Jg 9^{37}). There is a similar 'soothsayer's tree'† (see MOREH) mentioned in Gn 12^6 (אֵלוֹן מוֹרֶה). To this we may find a parallel in the oaks of Dodona, sacred to Zeus, whose rustling branches were supposed to utter oracles (Odyss. xiv. 328); cf. 2 S 5^{24}. In Dt 18^{10} the מְעוֹנֵן stands in close conjunction with the 'diviner of divinations' (קֹסֵם קְסָמִים) and the מְנַחֵשׁ. The Greek equivalent of מְע׳ is κληδονιζόμενος, meaning one who judges from omens (κληδών); cf. Is 2^6. The etymology of the Hebrew Poel form עוֹנֵן is not easy to determine. To connect it with עָנָן 'cloud' has no foundation in the known practices of the ancient Israelites. More probable is the etymology which connects it with the root which is in Arabic غَنَّ 'to snuffle' (cf. the use of the Heb. מְצַפְצְפִים Is 8^{19} 29^4); scarcely probable is the suggestion of Wellhausen to regard this Poel form as a denominative from the subst. עַיִן 'eye.' Cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 274 footnote. The form of soothsaying which the word מְעוֹנֵן represents may have been akin to that which was practised by the Roman augurs or haruspices. In fact it is difficult to say how far the מְעוֹנֵן differed from the רֹאֶה or primitive Hebrew 'seer,' or from the קֹסֵם. As to the first, we do not know what was his mode of procedure, whether it consisted in the examination of the entrails or general appearance of the victim in the sacrifices, as was done by the Assyrian priests (Jastrow, l.c. p. 337) and the Roman haruspices or extispices. Or it may have taken the form of observing closely the movements of animals, as was done by the Philistine diviners (קֹסְמִים) in the case of the two cows yoked to the cart on which the ark of God was placed (1 S $6^{8ff.}$); or it may have consisted in observing the sounds produced by wind (as the sound among the tops of the balsam trees in 2 S 5^{24}) or the special action of rain or dew upon objects (cf. Jg $6^{36ff.}$).

The 8th cent., as well as the 7th, witnessed the wide prevalence of these arts as well as that of necromancy (Is $8^{19ff.}$). Probably the Assyrian invasions and the disasters which they entailed drove the panic-stricken people to resort to abnormal practices of magic and soothsaying.* From Is 3^2 we learn that the soothsayer held an important place in national life, and was regarded as one of the props of the social fabric. He takes his place by the side of the judge, prophet, and elder. The attitude of prophecy towards soothsaying was uniformly uncompromising and hostile (Mic 5^{12}, cf. Jer 27^9 and Is 57^3, this last passage being descriptive of the degenerate practices that still went on in Palestine after the return from the Exile). In Ezk $21^{21ff.}$ we have a vivid description of the king of Babylon standing at the crossways, shaking the arrows (βελομαντεία). We may assume that there were two arrows in the quiver, one bearing the name Jerusalem and the other Rabbah, and the result was determined by the particular arrow that was drawn out by the right hand or shaken out. He also inquires of the teraphim and looks into the liver. The reference to the teraphim is a Palestinian trait (the LXX γλυπτοῖς suggests עֲצַבִּים rather than תְּרָפִים). When we compare this with Is 47^{8-15} with its closing references to the soothsaying, we can clearly see that the latter writer had become yet more familiar with the practices in divination carried on in Babylonia, and portrays them with remarkable vividness:—'Thou art wearied with thy counsels; yes, let them stand by and save you, they who divide the heavens, who gaze at the stars, announcing month by month whence they (i.e. the events) are to come upon you.' The account given in the earlier portion of this article of the omen-tablets of Babylonia and the calendars of the days of the month, with its lucky and unlucky days, clearly illustrates the accurate delineation given us in Deutero-Isaiah. The phrase 'dividers of the heavens' (הֹבְרֵי שָׁמַיִם Kĕrê) contains a reference to the custom of the Babylonian astrologers of dividing the heavens into districts to take a horoscope (cf. Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia, p. 369 ff.). See also art. DIVINATION.

* For demonology and soothsaying were closely interwoven (as in the case of magic). Now, according to Moḥammedan ideas, the devils after Moḥammed's advent were prevented from mingling with the sons of God and learning the secrets of heaven (cf. SATAN and ref. to Book of Enoch). When so detected, the angels pelt them with meteorites and drive them away: see Sur. 3^{31} ad fin., $37^{7ff.}$; and cf. Wellhausen, *Reste*², p. 138.

† It is by no means certain that the Heb. אֵלָה, אֵלוֹן may not be used generally for 'tree,' like Syr. ܐܝܠܢܐ, ܐܝܠܢܐ.

* Cf. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 308, in reference to the mystic piacular rites of the 7th cent. B.C.

SOP.—A sop (Anglo-Sax. [soppa], from supan, to sup) is a morsel of food soaked in liquid. Cf. Chaucer, Marchantes Tale, 599—

> 'And then he taketh a sop in fyn clarree.'

The word was used by Tindale to translate ψωμίον (from ψωμ-ίζω, to feed) in Jn $13^{26\,bis.\,27.\,30}$, the only occurrences of the Gr. word. (Wyclif had already used it in $13^{26.\,27}$, giving 'bread' and 'morsel' in the other places. The Vulg. has buccella in $13^{27.\,30}$, but simply panis in $^{26\,bis}$, and the Rheims follows with 'bread' in $^{26\,bis}$, and 'morsel' in $^{27.\,30}$). The mod. meaning, 'something given to keep quiet,' is also found in early writers, as Howard, Committee, iv. 1, 'Why, you unconscionable Rascal, are you angry that I am unlucky, or do you want some fees? I'll perish in a Dungeon before I'll consume with throwing Sops to such Curs.'

SOPATER (Σώπατρος, Sopater).—A man of Berœa who in St. Paul's third missionary journey accompanied him from Philippi (Ac 20^4). He is called in the older MSS son of Pyrrhus. He was commemorated June 25 and July 12. See also SOSIPATER.

SOPE.—See the modern spelling SOAP.

SOPHERETH (סֹפֶרֶת; BA Σαφάραθ, ℵ Σαφαραθί, Luc. Ἀσοφέρεθ).—A family of Nethinim that returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 7^{57}. In the parallel passage, Ezr 2^{55}, the name appears as Hassophereth (הַסֹּפֶרֶת; B Ἀσεφῆραθ, A Ἀσεφόραθ, Luc. Ἀσωφέρεθ), and in 1 Es 5^{33} as ASSAPHION.

SOPHONIAS.—The form in which the name of the prophet ZEPHANIAH occurs in 2 Es 1^{40}.

SORCERY.—The subject of sorcery has already been treated in most of its aspects under MAGIC. There remain, however, certain features in this extensive department which are reserved for treatment in the present article.

The wide prevalence of sorcery in pre-exilian Israelite life is only partially revealed in the OT. That the underlying motive of the Brazen Serpent in Nu 21^{4-9} was the same as that of the winged colossal and human-headed bulls or genii (lamassu or lamaššu, cf. the cherubim in Gn 3^{24}, and Schrader, COT, ad loc.) which were set up at the doors of the Assyrian palaces to prevent the access of demons, of disease, or other calamity, seems to be fairly probable. In this connexion we must bear in mind the undoubted fact that the serpent was associated not only with demons to whom a destructive power belonged (cf. Gn 3 and Is 14^{29} 27^1 and Am 9^3),* but also with those endowed with beneficent powers. Moḥammed held that serpents might be inhabited by good as well as by evil jinn, and among the ancient Greeks the serpent was held to be sacred to the healing god Æsculapius. Also, as Robertson Smith reminds us, the South Arabs regard medicinal waters as inhabited by jinn, usually of serpent form (RS^2 p. 168, cf. 172). On this subject interesting facts have been collected by Baudissin, in his Essay on the Symbolism of the Serpent, in Studien zur sem. Religionsgesch. i. p. 257 ff. The brazen image of the serpent (נְחֻשְׁתָּן), worshipped in the reign of Hezekiah, and the occurrence of the name Naḥash among Canaanite peoples, point to the prevalence of the serpent-cult. See NEHUSHTAN.

Again, the law, to which the modern Jew pays so much deference, contained in Dt $6^{8.\,9}$, involves an ancient belief in the magic potency of written words and names, of which Lane (Modern Egyptians, 1871, i. pp. 7 ff., 319 ff.) gives valuable illustrations. The Shema', as well as the following precept, 'And thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy soul . . .,' were to be bound as a sign upon the hand, and for frontlets between the eyes. They were also to be written upon the doorposts of the house and on the gates. The Jews in the present day use the name mĕzûzah, which in the original Deuteronomic sense meant 'doorpost,' for the small metal case which contained a piece of folded parchment, upon which the words aforesaid were written, viz. Dt 6^{4-9} as well as Dt 11^{13-21}, in twenty-two lines. This would be placed at the right of the entrance, on the upper part of the doorpost. Like an amulet inscribed with words or names of mysterious potency, this piece of parchment was held to possess a magic and protective efficacy. See Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 76. The tĕphillîn or phylacteries, on the left arm and forehead, are of like character (see art. PHYLACTERIES).

Again we have an instructive example of the all-prevailing faith in magic in the case of the afflicted woman who came to Jesus in the midst of the crowd, believing that His garments were possessed of mysterious healing virtue (Lk 8^{44}, see Plummer, ad loc.). The same idea underlies the narrative of Ac 19^{12}, where we read that handkerchiefs and aprons were conveyed from St. Paul's person to the diseased, who were thereby cured, and the demons expelled. A man's clothing was supposed to convey with it some charm or efficacy from the owner. Moḥammed was besought to give his shirt that a dead man might be buried in it. The character of the wearer and his clothing were identified in some mysterious way. Probably in this way we are to interpret the reference to the mantle of Elijah (2 K 2^{13-15}, cf. ^{8}), and such expressions as 'robe of righteousness,' 'garments of salvation' (Is 61^{10}), 'of vengeance' (59^{17}), etc. See Wellhausen, Reste ^{2}, p. 196.

In Arabia sorcery was even employed in digging for treasure. Doughty relates a story that a Moor, who was regarded as specially proficient in magical arts, 'sacrificed to the jân in the night a black cock, and read his spells, and a great black fowl alighted beside him. . . . The earth rumbled, and rose as it were in billows, gaping and shutting, and in that earthy womb appeared an infinite treasure' (Arabia Deserta, ii. p. 103). But we hear even more frequently of counter-spells, whereby the demons were coerced or terrified into impotence. And this specially applies to the various diseases which the jân were supposed to inflict. The remedies are in almost every case magical in character, and were carried out by the physician called ṭabîb or wise man, who was, in fact, a magician. The methods of the magic-healing art were the same as those of the sorcerer who worked the evil. There was stroking and rubbing of the part affected; most frequently we have the tying of knots, spitting, and breathing.

> 'A young mother, yet a slender girl, brought her wretched babe, and bade me spit upon the child's sore eyes. This ancient Semitic opinion and custom I have afterwards found wherever I came to Arabia [cf. Jn 9^6]. Meteyr nomads in El Kasim have brought me bread and salt that I should spit in it for their sick friends.—Also the Arabians will spit upon a lock which cannot easily be opened' (Doughty, Arab. Des. i. p. 527). 'Another time I saw Salih busy to cure a mangy thelûl (riding-camel). He sat with a bowl of water before him, and, mumbling thereover, he spat in it and mumbled solemnly, and spat many times, and, after a half hour of this work, the water was taken to the sick beast to drink' (ib. ii. p. 164).

This strange custom may be combined with the prevalent notion that the more repulsive and disgusting the remedies, the more efficacious they were.

---

* Here Gunkel (Schöpfung u. Chaos) has shown that we have remnants of the old Babylonian chaos-myth (Tiâmtu, 'dragon of the deep').

> ‘They will take of the unclean and even abominable, and say, dawâ, “it is medicine.” These Bedouin give the sick to eat of the rakham or small white carrion eagle. Upon a day I found a poor woman of our menzil seething asses’ dung in the pot. She would give the water to drink with milk to her sick brother’ (Doughty, i. p. 255).

Magic devises strange remedies. The person of the king has a supernatural character (Frazer, Golden Bough ^{2}, i. p. 8 ff.), and it is owing to this belief that we constantly find the royal personality or his family invested with a priestly function. Thus in Arabia it was believed that hydrophobia was to be cured by royal blood, i.e. not merely the blood of the reigning monarch, but also that of the royal family. Even sorrow for the dead had its magic remedy. Dust from the grave of the deceased beloved one was to be drunk, mingled with water; and the same remedy was employed as an antidote to love-sickness, for a man who was in love was held to be possessed or bewitched. By the spells of a sorcerer, too, lovers may be parted.

It may here be remarked that the introduction of Islam did even less to destroy belief in magic than the growth of Jewish monotheism. We can only say in both cases (that of the Arab and of the Jew) that the belief in spirits entered, as Wellhausen says of the Arab (ib. p. 157), ‘upon another stage.’ ‘The old gods are deposed and degraded into the position of demons. The latter thereby change their character and become hellish creatures, bitterly hostile to Allah and his heavenly surrounding.’ They became Satans (Shaitâns), with Iblîs at their head, opposed to prayer and the cry of the muezzin, loving uncleanliness and dirt, and therefore debarred by washings and the burning of incense.

Consequently sorcery was just as prevalent after Islam as before it. Moḥammed placed the interior bark of the Samara tree on the arm of Dhul Bigâdain to render him invulnerable. Gum resin from this tree was constantly carried as an amulet. The ankle-bones of a hare are effective to ward off the jinn of the camp, the ghoul of the desert, and Satan himself. They are also effective in quelling fever. Similar efficacy belonged to the teeth of a cat or a fox. The magic of the knot-tying was encountered by the protective spell of the amulet. One species of amulet was called tangis (defiling), and contained dirt, bones of the dead, and other repulsive objects. Many amulets, however, consisted of ornaments, often precious stones, deemed on this account sacred. Their object seems to be to divert the attention of the demons from the wearer. Thus a mark on the face of a woman, or even tattooing, served this purpose; also the fragrant berries carried by children, the silver and gold plates worn by horses, and the bells carried by camels (cf. Zec 14^{20}), which diverted or scared away the demons by their sound. Cf. Wellhausen, Reste ^{2}, p. 164 ff.

Ancient Jewish magic, to which Blau has devoted a special treatise, presents many features which are analogous to those of early Arabia just described. Indeed it is by no means an easy problem to determine how much of the latter came from Jewish, Babylonian, and Aramaic sources, and how far the Jewish in turn became affected in very early times by Arabia.* There can be little doubt that the main source of Jewish tradition in magic and demonology, in and after the Exile, was Babylonia, and that Babylonia also influenced Arabia.

The magical effect of spitting, to which Doughty has referred (in the passages cited), was also an element in Jewish superstition. But what is most significant in Jewish sorcery is the belief in the magic power of words and names which was held almost universally, in the time of Christ, by the Jews in common with other contemporary nations. Passages from Scripture were considered to be especially effectual. These were constantly employed in bringing about cures. Thus the words in Lv 13^1 נֶגַע צָרַעַת and also Lv 1^1 were considered efficacious, though forbidden by Rab and Rabbi Chanina (Sanhedrin 101*a*). Ex 15^{26} was employed in healing wounds; but when, in addition to this, spitting was resorted to, this was regarded as a forbidden form of magic, and whosoever attempts it has no part or lot in the future life (Mishna Sanhed. xi. 1; Tosefta xii. 10). Of course special force belonged to the words, ‘For I, Jehovah, am thy healer.’ Unclean water has a magical influence, which can be increased or arrested by some incantation. Magic influence of a deterrent character was also attributed to iron. Iron has the power to ward off evil spirits and to break spells. Spirits stand in fear of iron (cf. Blau, p. 159; and Berakhôth 6*a*, cf. Tosefta vi. 13). The iron is cast between the graves, and the word hada is pronounced; for the graveyard has always been the place where sorcery is practised, since the spirits of the departed dwell there. Thither Canidia and Sagana, the sorceresses of Horace’s muse, repair in the moonlight (Sat. I. viii.); and Wellhausen (Reste ^{2}, p. 157) considers that close relations subsisted between jinn and spirits of dead men, the spirits of the departed becoming jinn.

The Talmud gives special recipes for turning a bad dream into one of good omen. One of these consists in repeating 9 verses (3 × 3) of the Bible. If a man sees a river in a dream, let him recite Is 66^{12} (in which peace is compared to a flowing stream) before he thinks of Is 59^{19} ‘When the enemy comes like a river.’ It is dangerous to drink water on Wednesday or Friday night. If, however, one is compelled to drink it, it is recommended that Ps 29^{3-10} should be recited, where the voice of Jehovah is mentioned seven times and also the waters, and it is said that Jehovah is enthroned above the flood.

Incantations were constantly employed in the art of healing. Most of these spells are derived from the teachers of the Talmud, who also practised the medical art. As the remedy was applied, the incantation was whispered in the ear of the patient. The head of the operating physician was anointed with oil, and, if any unbidden or uninitiated person heard the spell, its magical power was lost. Two examples of these magical remedies may be found in art. MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 211, and further illustrations will be found in Blau’s monograph, pp. 72–77, 156 ff., and Brecher’s Das Transcendentale, Magie u. magische Heilarten im Talmud, p. 198 ff.

Sorcery, in the narrower sense of magic employed with malignant or evil intent, would seek to accomplish such ends as causing one’s neighbour’s house to catch fire, bringing a hailstorm on his field, depriving his cows of milk, making his child die of illness, causing domestic brawls, or visiting himself with sudden death. In fact the ancients were accustomed to attribute all such disasters to a malignant demon, sorcerer, or witch; and the possession of any unusual physical or mental quality, especially an uncanny look about the eyes, would expose the male or female possessor of these characteristics to the unenviable reputation of being a sorcerer or sorceress. Especially old women of unusual ugliness were credited with dealings with the dark supernatural world. Even men distinguished by brilliant acquirements or clever play would be liable to the suspicion of sorcery.

* According to the Talmud (Sanhedrin 67*b*, 91*a*) the Arabs were regarded as endowed with magical powers. In the first passage it is related that an Arab sorcerer cut his camel in pieces and then restored it to life. In the latter passage it is stated that Abraham communicated to the sons of his concubines the unclean name, i.e. the names of deities potent in magic; cf. Blau, p. 48, and footnote 2.

The chief motives to sorcery were love and hatred, and the result was frequently death or unfaithfulness to the marriage vow. Magic was employed to win forbidden love. The chief means to compass this end was mandragora, which was universally regarded as an erotic plant (hence the Heb. name דּוּדָאִים Gn $30^{14f.}$). It was customary to recite verses from the Bible over this—a practice which the Talmud forbids (Shabbath 8*b*, 19). Tying of knots was sometimes resorted to in order to prevent childbirth. Cf. Ḳoran 113 (blowing on knots).

Simon ben Jochai had the reputation of being a magician, and tradition relates that when he withdrew from his cave, after residing there for thirteen years, he transformed every one upon whom he gazed into a heap of bones; and it is reported that he destroyed a heretic in this way (Pesiḳta 90*b*, 137*a*).

Amulets were employed as prophylactics, i.e. as a means of counterworking the evil influences of witchcraft and demons. The לְחָשִׁים, to which Is 3^{20} alludes as one among the articles of feminine attire, may be considered to be this simply and solely. These were not forbidden, though they partook of a magical character. It is only in cases where the amulets were heathen in origin that they were strictly forbidden. Thus in 2 Mac 12^{40} the amulets discovered on the slain came from the idol temple at Jamnia, and were on this account objectionable. The name by which the amulet was called in later Jewish literature is ḳĕmêa' (קָמֵיעַ). The ḳĕmêa' is mentioned with the tĕphillîn or phylacteries. Both were covered with leather. Similarly, the amulets of the Greeks and Romans were contained in capsules (bulbæ). The Jewish amulet consisted either of some inscribed object or of certain roots of plants, or, in some cases, of grains of corn bound up in leather.* It may here be remarked, in passing, that every vegetable was supposed to have a subtle connexion with a planet in heaven (see Blau, p. 160 f.). Anything offered with incense to the gods, or shavings from the Asherah tree, were considered to have a special healing virtue. Metal plates consisting of an upper and lower plate were constantly employed as amulets. A pearl wrapped up in leather was regarded as a healing remedy for cattle.

In all spells, charms, incantations, amulets, and other prophylactics, stress is always laid on the mysterious potency and significance of the name. Nomen involves omen. Name to the ancient Semite involves reality and personal power. And the superstitious dread of the ancient Greek who cried εὐφημεῖτε at solemn crises or functions, and of the Roman who under like circumstances said favete linguis, was founded on this same belief in the underlying dread potency of words or names to summon forth catastrophes. To this tendency the etymologizing efforts and plays on words in the OT are probably due, viz. to the endeavour to discover in the name a clue to the underlying power that shapes individual destiny. 'As his name, so is he,' says Abigail of her wrong-headed husband Nabal. 'Fool is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25^{25}). The combination of the name of deity with a newborn child was therefore quite explicable. Even the names of angels in later Judaism, like those of individuals, contained the name of deity (אֵל), e.g. Michael, Raphael, etc. Heaven and earth are perishable, but 'Thy great name liveth and abideth for ever' (Berakhôth 32*a*). Hence those names (especially of angels) which contain the name of deity possess a special potency.

Particular power was assigned to the mysterious tetragrammaton, which could be pronounced only on the Great Day of Atonement in the temple by the high priest. Hence it is called in the Talmud שֵׁם הַמְּפוֹרָשׁ (in Aramaic שְׁמָא מְפָרְשָׁא), the name pronounced (cf. Pael פָּרֵישׁ) then, and then only. This name later Judaism believed to have been inscribed on the wonder-working staff of Moses. The tĕhôm no longer overflows when a potsherd engraved with the tetragrammaton is thrown into it. Ashmodai (cf. APOLLYON), the prince of demons, was bound by a chain and a seal ring, on which was inscribed the Divine name (Giṭṭîn 68, bottom). By marking this name on the mouth of the idol calf of Jeroboam it was made to speak.

This mysterious and potent name was designated in Hebrew as הַשֵּׁם, by the Greeks τὸ ὄνομα, also called ἄρρητον—on magic papyri (see Wessely) ὄνομα κρυπτὸν καὶ ἄρρητον, or, as in the inscription of Hadrumetum (see art. MAGIC, and Deissmann, Bible Studies, 146 ff., 196 ff.), τὸ ἅγιον ὄνομα ὃ οὐ λέγεται (line 20), also τὸ κρυπτὸν ὄνομα καὶ ἄρρητον ἐν ἀνθρώποις (Dietrich, Abraxas, 195, line 7), or it is called τὸ τετράγραμμον ὄνομα τὸ μυστικόν. The Hebrew יְהֹוָה, יְהוֹ, יָהּ is reproduced in a variety of forms in Greek (see Deissmann, ib. p. 4). The manifold employment of the letters of the tetragrammaton, as well as of the seven vowels α ε η ι ο υ ω, played a considerable part in magic papyri; and it is impossible within the space at our disposal to enter into the maze of details on this subject, which may be found in Blau's treatise, pp. 141–146.

The belief in the power of words, especially those of Scripture, is exhibited by the custom of repeating a phrase, as, for example, the Shema', or sometimes in inverting the order of letters, as in the Gnostic gem referred to by Schwab (Vocabulaire de l'Angelologie, p. 303), in which is inserted Ονκλιαλιξ, which is the expression כי לאל קנא inverted. The belief underlying these inversions is that the reversal of the order effects the retreat or overthrow of the demons and of the sorcery they employ. According to Rabbi 'Akiba, special potency belongs to the letters of the alphabet to which special meanings by acrostics were assigned. Thus אלף = אמת למד פיך.

Belief in the power of the evil eye was just as prevalent in Semitic lands as in those of classical antiquity. Especially were women with an ugly squint or strange look or contracted heavy eyebrows considered to possess powers of the evil eye (see art. MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 208^{a}).

Tradition ascribed the belief in the power of the evil eye to Babylonia. Rab lived in Babylonia, where the evil eye is often found (Jerus. Shabbath $14c^{48}$; cf. Baba meẓia 107*b*, above). It is said of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, that after they were delivered from the fiery furnace they fell victims to the many eyes which were fixed on them. According to Baba bathra i. 18, Joshua commanded the sons of Joseph to conceal themselves in the wood in order that they might not be overpowered by the evil eye (Jos 17^{15}). Men of distinction were specially exposed to this evil. But the tradition prevailed that descendants of Joseph were exempt. Thus when the distinguished and handsome Rabbi Jochanan was asked whether he did not fear the evil eye, he replied, 'I am of the seed of Joseph, who are not injured by the evil eye' (Berakhôth 20*a*, below). It was recommended as a precaution, if one is about to enter a town and is afraid of the evil eye, to place the right thumb in the left hand and the left thumb in the right hand and say, 'I am N. son of N., and am descended from the seed of Joseph.' Another preservative was to look on the left side of the nose.

* On this subject of amulets consult Winer, RWB^{3} i. p. 56; Com. on Gn 35^{4} and Is $3^{18ff.}$; Hamburger, RE, Supplem.-Band, ii. pp. 8-11.

Horses were preserved from the power of the evil eye by hanging a fox's tail or a scarlet thread between the eyes. Children were more frequently provided with amulets than adults, and those they held in their hand (Shabbath 16*b*, 61*b*). Children have naturally a weaker power of resistance to evil influence or fascination than adults. Hence an inscribed card or leaf (πιττάκιον) or other kind of amulet was hung around the neck. A Jewish amulet would contain the letters of the name of Deity and various extracts from the Torah. It would also contain the name of the person to be protected.

Even articles of furniture or vessels were protected in this manner. Handles and pedestals were inscribed with the Divine name. Especially the bedstead was guarded in this way against enchantment. The blessing in Nu 6^{24-26} was intended to protect Israel against the evil eye. Indeed the Torah itself was designed by God as a defence against evil (Wayyiḳra rabba, c. 25, ad init.).

The magic of the evil eye is a topic avoided in the Mishna, and the attitude of orthodox Judaism towards the entire subject of sorcery was hostile, and in this respect coincided with the spirit and teaching of St. Paul, who regarded sorcery as belonging to the sphere of the ἐνέργεια τοῦ Σατανᾶ and φαρμακία as one of the products (ἔργα) of the flesh (Gal 5^{20}). This attitude of Judaism rested on the ancient precepts of the Torah, even the most primitive code (Ex 22^{18}, cf. Dt 18^{10}) containing prohibitions and death penalties directed against sorcerer and sorceress.

The causes of this ancient antagonism between religion and magic, which certainly existed, though far from universal, evidently lie in some fundamental distinction between the two, which we have already endeavoured to elucidate in the opening pages of the art. MAGIC. The subject has been ably discussed in Frazer's Golden Bough (i. p. 61 ff.), but not with complete success, since the writer refuses to admit what the researches of Tylor and others have made clear, viz. that ancient culture in all its manifold forms rests upon a primitive basis of animism, an interpretation of life whereby man surrounded himself with a cosmic society of personal agencies. Frazer considers that the few cases cited, 'in which the operation of spirits is assumed, and an attempt made to win their favour by prayer and sacrifice,' are exceptional. 'Wherever sympathetic magic occurs in its pure unadulterated form, it assumes that in nature one event follows another necessarily and invariably without the intervention of any spiritual or personal agency.' The final negative clause of this sentence, which we have italicized, lacks historic proof. The most ancient inscribed documents of human life, discovered in Babylonia and Egypt, point to the opposite conclusion, that in man's primitive condition magic was closely interwoven with a belief in gods and demons. That in some more recent examples of sympathetic magic the primitive elements of spiritual belief have disappeared, and nothing apparently * remains but the assumption that 'in nature one event follows another necessarily and invariably,' we may with certain limitations admit to be true. In some exponents of 'modern science' we observe a similar process of the attrition of a belief in or recognition of an ultimate Personal Cause which sustains 'nature's unchanging harmony.' But without the assumption of a primitive belief in personal agencies, how can we explain the constant employment of incantations and of formulæ, spoken or written, as well as the close relations which in ancient culture undoubtedly subsisted between magic and religion, the priest combining in his own person the normal functions of worship with those of soothsaying and magic? But our criticism does not in reality obscure the illuminating value of Frazer's statements, which we now cite.

> 'Its fundamental conception is identical with that of modern science. Underlying the whole system is a faith, implicit but real and firm, in the order and uniformity of nature. The magician does not doubt that the same causes will always produce the same effects, that the performance of the proper ceremony accompanied by the appropriate spell will inevitably be attended by the desired results, unless, indeed, his incantations should chance to be thwarted and spoiled by the more potent charms of another sorcerer. . . . The fatal flaw of magic lies not in its general assumption of a succession of events * . . . but in its total misconceptions of the nature of . . . that succession . . . In ancient Egypt the magicians claimed the power of compelling even the highest gods to do their bidding.'
> Hence arose a radical conflict between magic and religion.
> 'The haughty self-sufficiency of the magician . . . and his unabashed claim to exercise sway could not but revolt the priest. Sometimes, we may suspect, lower motives concurred to whet the edge of the priest's hostility. He professed to be the proper medium, the true intercessor between God and man, and no doubt his interests as well as his feelings were often injured by a rival practitioner.' †

We may here briefly advert to the prevalcnee of magic and sorcery in ancient Greece and in ancient Greek settlements. Aristotle (Probl. xx. 34) refers to the superstition of the evil eye (βασκαίνω and βάσκανος, βασκανία through the ὀφθαλμὸς κακός). This particularly affected children and cattle (Verg. Ecl. iii. 103). Theocritus (Idyll. ii. throughout, and vi. 39) clearly proves how prevalent sorcery was in the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. A century earlier Plato (Rep. ii. 364 B) describes the wandering beggars and soothsayers who go about to rich men's doors persuading them that they have power from the gods to avenge any man on his enemies, and can induce the gods to do their bidding by certain enchantments and magic knots (ἐπαγωγαῖς καὶ καταδέσμοις). Herodotus (in the 5th cent.), ii. 181, tells the story of Amasis, king of Egypt, who believed he had been spell-bound by his wife Ladica. The Greeks believed in and practised the magic κατάδεσμοι (καταδέσεις) or knots as much as the Hebrews their חֶבֶר (cf. Euripid. Medea, 1136–1230).

These κατάδεσμοι (Lat. diræ) were inscribed on their leaden tablets or on strips of papyrus or talc (Tacitus, Annals, ii. 69). The first actually known were discovered at Athens in 1811 by M. Fauvel, and two years later, in the public cemetery of the Piræus, by Mr. Dodwell. Recently they were found among the tombs in Cyprus (of the 1st cent. A.D.). The character of the inscription or incantation which is scratched, is mainly as follows: 'I bind with this spell (καταδῶ) So-and-so, his shop and all his property.' In the formula employed on one of the two Athenian leaden tablets the writer binds over his enemies by name to Hermes Cthonius, Γῇ κάτοχος, and Persephone. In the other we read: 'I bind over such-and-such persons to thee, Onesime.' Onesime may perhaps have been the occupant of the tomb where the tablet was discovered.

In addition to this method of writing the name of the enemy on a tablet and marking it with magical signs or characters, we have another,

---

[*] We say 'apparently,' because missionaries from Central Africa, where magic abounds (we refer particularly to the Rev. Harry Johnson), have informed the present writer that natives are very reticent with regard to their beliefs as to what underlies their practice. Moreover, belief in spirits they certainly possess.

[*] We prefer to omit here all reference to 'law.' The belief of ancient magic in the uniformity of nature can only have been of a very partial and rudimentary kind, viz. in the limited sphere of magical practice.

[†] Another contributing cause to the hostility of religion and of the priesthood towards magic was morally justifiable. Magic and the popular faith in it armed the sorcerer with awful powers over his fellow-men, which he often used for unscrupulous ends. Thus in early Rome we find a law in the Twelve Tables which forbids charming away a neighbour's crops by incantations (excantare).

which at once reminds us of Babylonia (cf. MAGIC). A waxen image of the obnoxious person was made and caused to melt away in order that that person might melt away likewise (sympathetic magic). Cf. Verg. Ecl. viii. 80; Horace, Sat. I. viii. 32; Theoc. Idyll. ii.

There is good reason to suppose that these magic practices were introduced from Babylonia into Greece through Persia. Æschylus and Sophocles show no trace of them, but Euripides alludes to the γόης and ἐπῳδός. In Antiphon (end of 5th cent.) we read of a love-potion or φίλτρον, while Plato speaks of magicians (Symp. 203 D) and of the Thessalian women who are said to draw down the moon (Gorg. 513 A).

Necromancy, or the special mode of obtaining aid or knowledge by the conjuration of the dead, was a form of divination and magic which may be appropriately treated under the head of sorcery, since the sorcerer or sorceress would likewise become the medium of communication with the departed spirit. Necromancy is a practice which is linked to the belief in the continued existence of spirits in the dark underworld or Sheôl. Hence among the ancient Greeks νεκυία, or the summoning of the dead for interrogation about the future, became locally associated with caves and volcanic regions, where communication, it was supposed, would be easily established with the lower regions. Such a spot, called νεκυομαντεῖον or ψυχοπομπεῖον, was the lake Aornos in Thesprotian Epirus (Herod. v. 92), Lake Avernus in Campania, and Tænarus in Laconia. There is, however, no clear proof that conjuration of the dead in Canaan was associated with any special spot. It seems rather to have been associated with the personality of the conjurer than with special places. Nevertheless we might expect that caves or dark spots, and more especially sepulchres, would be selected by the Canaanite necromancers for the practice of their rites.

The Heb. name for the spirit to whom the summons was given was אוֹב, a word which is probably no other than that which is used in Job 32^{19} for a skin-bag for holding water. The term would be applied to the spirit on account of the mysterious hollow sound which he was supposed to make, as though speaking from some hollow cavity.* This אוֹב or spirit was considered to reside in the necromancer, who was for the time identified with it. The term properly used to describe the necromancer was בַּעַל אוֹב, or for the female sorceress בַּעֲלַת אוֹב. We might compare the בַּעֲלַת כְּשָׁפִים of Nah 3^{4}. בַּעֲלַת אוֹב is the term applied to the witch of Endor (1 S 28^{7}), who summons Samuel from his grave at the request of Saul (vv.$^{12-14}$) and plays the part of clairvoyante as well.

Another obscure term frequently combined with אוֹב is יִדְּעֹנִי, and it is exceedingly difficult to say whether any actual distinction of meaning properly belonged to the use of either. The etymology of the latter word, corresponding to our English word wizard, suggests the divining function of the spirit inhabiting the necromancer, whereas אוֹב was rather a term which indicated the ventriloquizing and hollow tones of his utterance. The LXX usually render אוֹב or בַּעַל א׳ by ἐγγαστρίμυθος, once (Is 19^{3}) by ἐκ γῆς φωνῶν; whereas יִדְּעֹנִי, which they hardly understood, is variously rendered by τερατοσκόπος, ἐπαοιδός, and γνωστής (γνωριστής), and apparently in one instance (Is 19^{3}) by ἐγγαστρίμυθος. In Dt 18^{11} there is a curiously amplified phraseology which ought not to be pressed, viz. 'interrogator (שֹׁאֵל) of the אוֹב,' יִדְּעֹנִי, and the 'inquirer of the dead' (דֹּרֵשׁ אֶל־הַמֵּתִים). In this as in the preceding verse (v.^{10}) we have a fairly exhaustive phraseology, but each term employed does not cover an altogether distinct conception, but is more or less a synonym.

During the closing decades of the 8th cent., amid the dangers, apprehensions, and calamities occasioned by the Assyrian invasions, the people resorted in large numbers to these occult modes of inquiry. To this Isaiah refers in scathing terms of rebuke ($8^{19ff.}$). Instead of turning their faces heavenwards to Jehovah and to the words of the Torah committed to faithful prophets, many were saying in these degenerate days, 'Consult the conjurers of the dead and the necromancers, who chirp and whisper, Shall not a people inquire of their manes,* on behalf of the living, of the dead?'† To this pitiful and degrading appeal to popular superstition the prophet replies in tones of thunder: 'To the instruction and testimony!' The wide prevalence of necromantic practice is illustrated by a vivid simile employed by the same prophet. In a beautiful and graphic oracle (ch. 29) Jerusalem is threatened with all the horrors soon to impend over the city in the siege of Sennacherib: 'And thou shalt lie prostrate, speaking from the earth, and from the dust shall thy speech sound low, and thy voice shall be like a ghost (אוֹב) from the earth, and from the dust shall thy speech twitter' (v.^{4}).

Thus the higher prophetic teaching was as hostile in its attitude towards necromancy as it was towards magic and soothsaying; and this tone of reprobation is echoed in the stern penalties of death denounced against it in the legislation, Dt 18^{11} (cf. 1 S 28^{9}), Lv 19^{31} $20^{6.7}$. The attitude of the teachers in the Talmud is not so uncompromising. Though they regarded it as the work of the devil, they believed in the validity of the art of necromancy (Berakhôth 59*a*^{12}, Shabb. 152*b*). The dead can only be conjured in the first year after burial. It is said of Rab that he even himself inquired of the dead (Baba meẓia 107*b*).

LITERATURE.—This has been indicated throughout this article. On Jewish magic Blau's work is the main authority. On Greek magic consult Warre-Cornish's Concise Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq., 'Superstitio'; and Miss Macdonald in PSBA, vol. xiii. (Feb. 3, 1891), art. 'Inscriptions relating to Sorcery in Cyprus.' In this instructive art. there are useful citations from Wessely's Griechische Zauberpapyri. A good illustration is given of a recipe for a κατάδεσμος taken from his edition of Papyrus Anastasi in the British Museum. On the subject of magic in general Frazer's Golden Bough^{2} should be consulted, and A. Lang in Fortnightly Rev. Feb. and April 1901. The literature has been indicated already in art. SORE.—This word is used freely in AV as adj., subst., or adverb.

The Anglo-Saxon adj. sâr, meaning 'painful,' develops a subst. sâr, meaning 'a sore,' as that which caused the pain; from this subst. another adj. was formed, sârig, in the sense of 'sad.' Sâr became in later Eng. 'sore,' as bân became 'bone,' hâm 'home,' etc. Sârig became 'sorry,' the double r being a mistake, due to a fancied connexion with the subst. 'sorrow.' Between 'sorry' and 'sorrow' (Anglo-Sax. sorg) there is no etymological connexion.

Thus the adj. comes first, and its primary meaning is painful, which is the only sense it now retains. Job 5^{18} 'For he maketh sore, and bindeth up' (יַכְאִיב, LXX ἀλγεῖν ποιεῖ). But this literal meaning is rare, the word having early adopted the fig. sense of severe, grievous. The transition may be illustrated from Shaks. Tempest, v. i. 288—

---

* This derivation is, however, disputed by Nowack and others. Hitzig, in his Commentary (on Is 8^{19}), connects it with the Arabic آبَ (i.e. أَأَبَ, reversus fuit), and thus regards it as meaning 'returning one.' Cf. Baudissin, Stud. zur semit. Religionsgesch. i. p. 143 footnote. On the whole, we agree with Dillm. on Lv 19^{31} that the connexion with אוֹב, 'bag,' is the most probable. The interpretation of the word as connected with אֹיֵב, and as signifying 'enemy (of God),' is the least probable.

* Comp. the similar use of אֱלֹהִים in 1 S 28^{13}.

† These verses (i.e. $^{19.20}$) are without adequate reason declared by Duhm and Cheyne to be non-Isaianic.

> ‘Steph.—O touch me not; I am not Stephano, but a cramp.
> Pros.—You'd be king o' the isle, sirrah?
> Steph.—I should have been a sore one, then’— where there is a play on the word.

Is 27[1] ‘In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan’ (בְּחַרְבּוֹ הַקָּשָׁה, LXX τὴν μάχαιραν τὴν ἁγίαν); Ezk 14[21] ‘when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem’ (הָרָעִים, LXX τὰς πονηράς); Wis 10[12] ‘In a sore conflict she gave him the victory’ (ἀγῶνα ἰσχυρόν); He 10[29] ‘Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy?’ (πόσῳ χείρονος). Even when the reference is to suffering or disease, ‘sore’ almost always means severe rather than literally painful, as Dt 28[35] ‘With a sore botch’ (בִּשְׁחִין רָע). Cf. Udall, Erasmus, i. 20, ‘Making the law more heavy and sore’; Taverner's Bible, 3 Mac 3 [heading] ‘The kyng maketh a sore decree’; Lk 15[14] Rhem. ‘And after he had spent al, there fel a sore famine in that countrie’ (λιμὸς ἰσχυρός). In the passage just quoted Tindale and others have merely ‘great’ (AV and RV ‘mighty’), and it is probable that the word ‘sore’ itself often means no more than that. Cf. Is 24[19] Cov. ‘The earth shal geve a greate crack, it shal have a sore ruyne, and take an horrible fall.’ But this is most frequently seen in the adverb.

The adv. ‘sore’ (‘sorely’ occurs twice) never means in AV lit. ‘painfully,’ often, however, severely, grievously,* as 1 S 1[6] ‘And her adversary also provoked her sore’ (וְכִעֲסַתָּה צָרָתָהּ גַּם־כַּעַס); Mt 17[15] ‘He is lunatick, and sore vexed’ (κακῶς πάσχει, RV ‘suffereth grievously’). But the usual meaning is greatly, exceedingly (Germ. sehr), as Is 38[3]=2 K 20[3] ‘Hezekiah wept sore’ (וַיֵּבְךְּ חִזְקִיָּהוּ בְּכִי גָדוֹל, LXX ἔκλαυσεν Ἐζεκίας κλαυθμῷ μεγάλῳ). The adv. מְאֹד in Heb. is often tr[d] ‘sore,’ and σφόδρα occasionally (1 Mac 2[14] 6[8] 9[68] 16[22], Mt 17[6]) in Greek. Cf. Chaucer, Prologue, 148—

> ‘Of smale houndes had she, that she fedde
> With roested flesh, or milk and wastel-breed.
> But sore weep she if oon of hem were deed,
> Or if men smoot it with a yerde smerte.’

The phrase ‘lie sore on’ occurs in Jg 14[17]. See LIE in vol. ii. p. 113.

The subst. occurs rarely: Lv 13[42. 43], Ps 38[11] (נֶגַע a plague-spot); Ps 77[2] ‘My sore ran in the night’ (יָדִי נִגְּרָה, RV ‘my hand was stretched out’); Is 1[6] ‘wounds and bruises and putrifying sores’ (מַכָּה טְרִיָּה RV ‘festering sores,’ RVm ‘fresh stripes’); Lk 16[20] ‘full of sores’ (εἱλκωμένος); 16[21], Rev 16[2. 11] (ἕλκος). J. HASTINGS.

SOREK, THE VALLEY OF (נַחַל שׂוֹרֵק; B Ἀλσωρήχ,† A Χειμάρρους Σωρήχ; vallis Sorec).—The valley or wâdy (Heb. naḥal) in which Delilah lived (Jg 16[4]). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) connect the valley with Capharsorec, a village to the north of Eleutheropolis and near Saraa (Σαάρ), that is, Zorah (Sur'ah), the home of Samson's father. Capharsorec is now Khurbet Surîk, to the north of Wâdy Surâr, which is identified with ‘the valley of Sorek,’ and not far from Sur'ah.

The Wâdy Surâr is one of the great features of Southern Palestine. It rises to the N. of Jerus., near Bîreh (Beeroth), and, running between Neby Samwîl and Jerus., passes Kulônieh and 'Ain Kârim. It now becomes deep and narrow, and below 'Akûr is joined by Wâdy es-Sikkeh, which rises in the valley of Rephaim, close to Jerusalem, and passes Bittir. North of Khurbet 'Erma (one of the sites proposed for Kiriath-jearim) it becomes a narrow gorge with precipices on its northern side, and, a little lower, it emerges from the hill-country of Judah and enters the Shephēlah, or lowland. Here, in a fertile well-watered basin, it is joined by Wâdy Ghurab, which, after passing Kuryet el-'Enab (another proposed site for Kiriath-jearim), runs in from the N.W., and by Wâdy en-Najîl, which comes from the south. On the northern slopes of the basin are Zorah and Eshtaol, and between them ‘the camp of Dan’ (Mahaneh-dan), the early home and burial-place of Samson (Jg 13[25] 16[31]). On the southern slope is Beth-shemesh ('Ain Shems), prettily situated above the rich cornfields, and commanding a fine view down the broad fertile valley which runs past the vineyards of Timnath, Makkedah, and Jabneel to the sea.

The ‘valley of Sorek’ offers an easy and natural line of approach to Jerus. and the highlands of Judah. The Philistines followed it in the days of the Judges and of David; up it the kine, lowing as they went, dragged the cart with the ark to Beth-shemesh; and, at the present day, it is followed by the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem. In or near the basin, according to several authorities, were fought the battles in which the ark was taken by the Philistines, and in which the Philistines were defeated by Samuel (1 S 7).

In Hebrew the word sōrēḳ means a particular kind of vine, which produced a purple grape, and ‘the valley of Sorek’ may have derived its name from the growth of this vine in the vineyards that covered its slopes (PEF Mem. iii. 53; G. A. Smith, HGHL 218 ff.; Conder, Tent-Work, i. 172).

C. W. WILSON.

SOSIPATER (Σωσίπατρος, Sosipater).—In Ro 16[21] called a kinsman of St. Paul, i.e. a Jew, and joined with him in greetings at the close of the Epistle. The name is the same as SOPATER (Ac 20[4]), and the two may be identical, as Jason, another of those mentioned in Ro 16[21], may be identical with the JASON of Thessalonica (Ac 17[5]); two Macedonian Christians might naturally be with St. Paul at Corinth. The name Sosipater occurs in the well-known inscription of Thessalonica (CIG ii. 1967) giving a list of Politarchs, as also does that of SECUNDUS (Ac 20[4]). For later traditions see Acta Sanctorum, June vol. v., June 25, p. 4.

A. C. HEADLAM.

SOSTHENES (Σωσθένης). — A name occurring twice in the NT, but under circumstances which leave it doubtful whether it denotes one or two persons. 1. In Ac 18[17], when the Jews at Corinth rose against St. Paul and brought him to the tribunal of Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia, and the latter, refusing to be a judge in questions of their law, dismissed them from his bar, we learn that ‘they all,’ i.e. the bystanders or assembled crowd, ‘laid hold on Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment-seat,’ without interference on the part of Gallio, who, in his indifference to Jewish disputes, gave himself no concern. In the best critical texts the word ‘all’ (πάντες) stands without any defining noun, which has accordingly been supplied by the insertion, in some MSS, of an explanatory gloss, either οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, as though the assailants were the Jews, visiting the failure of their complaint on the head of their own leader, or oftener and more feasibly οἱ Ἕλληνες, the (predominantly) Greek onlookers. Sosthenes, described as ‘ruler of the synagogue’ (which see), was doubtless the chief representative and mouthpiece of the complainants. He was probably the successor in office of Crispus, who had become a convert to Christianity (Ac 18[8]). The theory of Chrysostom, which identifies him with Crispus, and ascribes his maltreatment to his being a Christian, is wholly arbitrary; and hardly less so are the conjectures that he had been a colleague in 'rule' with Crispus (see 'rulers' in the plural, Ac 13^{15}), or had presided over another synagogue.

---

* In the Scotch Liturgy ‘sore’ is changed into ‘grievously’ in the ‘Communion’—‘whereas you offend God so sore in refusing this holy banquet.’

† The Ἀλ- probably represents the last part of Νάχαλ.

2. In 1 Co 1^{1} Sosthenes stands alongside of St. Paul in the inscription of the Epistle. He is simply designated as 'the brother,' which would seem to imply that his person and Christian standing were well known to the readers of the letter. He has been often identified with the synagogal ruler of Ac 18, who is assumed to have become a convert in the interval; but such an assumption is arbitrary, when the name was, confessedly, a common one; and St. Paul's associate was now at Ephesus, not at Corinth. Many have assumed him to be the apostle's amanuensis in the Epistle, to which he appends an autograph salutation (16^{21}); but he must have been something more than a mere amanuensis to be thus honourably co-ordinated in the superscription. Later tradition represented him as having been one of the seventy disciples, and as having become subsequently bishop of Colophon.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

SOSTRATUS (A Σώστρατος, V Σόστρατος).—The governor of the citadel (ὁ τῆς ἀκροπόλεως ἔπαρχος) at Jerusalem, who in vain demanded, on behalf of Antiochus Epiphanes, the money which Menelaus had promised to pay on being raised to the high priesthood in place of Jason, 2 Mac $4^{27\,(28).\,29}$.

SOTAI (סוֹטַי and סֹטַי).—The eponym of a family of 'Solomon's servants,' who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{55} (B Σατεί, A and Luc. Σωταί)=Neh 7^{57} (BA Σουτεί, Luc. Σωταί).

SOUL is throughout a great part of the Bible simply the equivalent of 'life' embodied in living creatures. In the earlier usage of the OT it has no reference to the later philosophical meaning—the animating principle, still less to the idea of an 'immaterial nature' which will survive the body. 'A living soul' in Genesis and other records is simply an 'animated being,' and the word is applied equally to the lower animals and to man. When the life is emphasized as human, it signifies life in the individual. This meaning it takes especially when נֶפֶשׁ, ψυχή, is put in contrast with רוּחַ, πνεῦμα, 'spirit,' which then comes to signify the principle of life. In this way 'soul' acquires more precisely the idea of the individual life in man, the Self, the Ego, although it may denote other aspects of man than the intellectual, and, in fact, is sometimes equivalent to 'heart' as well as to 'mind' (see analysis below). In the NT the emphasis on the personality becomes most marked in such sayings of our Lord as Mt $16^{25.\,26}$, Mk 8^{35}.

The following is an analysis (abridged from Oxf. Heb. Lex.) of the usage of the Heb. terms for 'soul':—

1. נֶפֶשׁ nephesh, lit. 'that which breathes,' 'the breathing substance or being'=ψυχή, anima (opp. bāsār, 'flesh' [Dt 12^{23}, Is 10^{18}], or beṭen, 'body' [Ps 31^{10}]); its source of life is the nishmath ḥayyîm breathed into the nostrils of its bāsār by God (Gn 2^{7}), in virtue of which man (ib.) becomes a nephesh ḥayyah [this expression elsewhere always of animals, Gn $1^{20.\,24.\,30}$ $9^{12.\,15.\,16}$ (all P), Ezk 47^{9}; cf. nephesh haḥayyah in Gn 1^{21} 9^{10} (both P), Lv $11^{10.\,46}$ (H)]. The life of the nephesh resides in the blood (Gn $9^{4.\,5}$, Dt $12^{23.\,24}$, Lv $17^{10.\,11.\,12.\,14}$). Nephesh is used for life itself, 171 t., either (a) of animals Pr 12^{10}, or (b) of man Gn 44^{30}, Ex 21^{23}, Lv 24^{17} et al.: hence הִכָּה נֶפֶשׁ='smite mortally' Gn 37^{21}, Dt $19^{6.\,11}$, Jer $40^{14.\,15}$ †; לָקַח נ׳ 'take away life' 1 K 19^{4}, Jon 4^{3}, Ps 31^{14}, Pr 1^{9} †; הִצִּיל נֶפֶשׁ מִמָּוֶת 'deliver life from death' Jos 2^{13}, Ps 33^{19} 56^{14} †; מִלֵּט נ׳ 1 S 19^{11}, 2 S 19^{6} quater, 1 K 1^{12} bis, Jer 48^{6} $51^{6.\,45}$, Ezk 33^{5}, Am $2^{14.\,15}$, Ps 89^{49} 116^{4} †; פָּדָה נ׳ 'redeem life' 2 S 4^{9}, 1 K 1^{29}, Ps 34^{23} 49^{16} 55^{19} 71^{23} †; שָׁמַר נ׳ 'keep life' Ps 25^{20} 97^{10}, Job 2^{6}, Pr 13^{3} 16^{17} 19^{16} 22^{5} †. Nephesh, as the essential of man, stands for the man himself, and may thus paraphrase the personal pronouns, esp. in poetry and ornate discourse: e.g. נַפְשִׁי='me' (Gn 49^{6}, Nu 23^{10}, Jg 16^{30}, La 3^{24}), נַפְשְׁךָ='thee' (Is 43^{4} 51^{23}), etc.; or it may represent the reflexive 'self': e.g. 'myself' (Job 9^{21}), 'thyself' (Dt 4^{9}), 'himself' (1 S $18^{1.\,3}$ 20^{17}); or it stands for 'person,' 'individual' (cf. Eng. 'souls,' esp. in enumerations or collective expressions), Lv 24^{17}, Nu 31^{35}, Dt 10^{21} 24^{7}; and is used even of deceased persons, with (Nu 6^{6}, Lv 21^{11}), or (more usually) without (Nu 5^{2} 6^{11} $9^{6.\,7}$ $19^{11.\,13}$, Lv 19^{28} 21^{1} 22^{4}, Hag 2^{13}), מֵת. Nephesh is largely used for the seat of the appetites: e.g. נ׳ רְעֵבָה 'hungry soul' Ps 107^{9}, Pr 27^{7}; in Is 5^{14} it is said that 'Sheol enlarged her appetite' (הִרְחִיב נַפְשָׁהּ); similarly it is the seat of emotions and passions: e.g. אִוְּתָה נ׳ 'soul desires' (Dt 12^{20} 14^{26}, 1 S 2^{16}, 2 S 3^{21}, 1 K 11^{37}, Job 23^{13}, Pr 13^{4} 21^{10}, Mic 7^{1}); גָּעֲלָה נ׳ 'soul abhorreth' (Lv $26^{11.\,15.\,30.\,43}$, Jer 14^{19}); מָרֵי נ׳ 'bitter of soul' (Jg 18^{25}, 2 S 17^{8}, Job 3^{20}, Pr 31^{6}). When used with lēbhābh, 'heart' (in D), nephesh is assimilated in meaning to it, so as to include intellect and will as well as feeling (e.g. Dt 4^{29} 26^{16}, 1 K 8^{48}, 2 K 23^{25}). See HEART.

2. נְדִיבָה, tr. in AV of Job 30^{15} 'soul,' means 'nobility' (RVm), i.e. 'honour' (RV). 3. נְשָׁמָה, lit. 'breath,' is once in EV (Is 57^{16}) tr. 'soul.' It is used in the same absolute way in Jos 10^{40} and Ps 150^{6} (both כָּל־הַנְּשָׁמָה 'every breathing being').

The LXX and NT ψυχή follows very closely the above usages of nephesh (see Cremer or Grimm, s.v.).

The development of a double expression for man's inner life (ψυχή, πνεῦμα) gives throughout the whole Bible a usage which is often not much more than a vague parallelism, as, e.g., in Is 26^{9}, Lk $1^{46.\,47}$, Ph 1^{27} (RV). It undoubtedly, however, contains a hint everywhere of the antithesis between the life-principle and the individual life. Where the two are set side by side, as in He 4^{12}, the actual relation subsisting between the 'soul' and its life-principle ('spirit') is brought into view. While in the older language of the Gospels σῶμα and ψυχή appear as the two constituent parts of human nature (Mt 10^{28}), there is in the Pauline usage a threefoldness: τὸ πνεῦμα the Divine life-principle, ἡ ψυχή the individual life in which the πνεῦμα is manifested, τὸ σῶμα the material organism vivified by the ψυχή (1 Th 5^{23}).

Where the most distinct antithesis occurs is in the use of the adjective psychic or soulish (ψυχικός). In the only places in which ψυχικός occurs in OT Greek (2 Mac 4^{37} 14^{24}) it means 'hearty.' [In 4 Mac 1^{32} something more purely psychological is meant, but this is hardly biblical Greek]. In the NT another interest comes in. In the six instances where ψυχικός occurs (not wholly Pauline), an altogether new antithesis is introduced. What is natural or human in the ψυχή is contrasted with what is Divine and divinely given in the πνεῦμα θεοῦ. So that ψυχικός has acquired a meaning almost equivalent to 'carnal' or 'sensual,' by which latter word it is twice rendered in AV. But since the πνεῦμα and πνευματικός, with which it is contrasted, is the Divine spirit in regeneration, it seems fair to render ψυχικός 'natural' as AV does in four of these places, and RVm in the other two (see 1 Co 2^{14} $15^{44\,bis.\,46}$, Ja 3^{15}, Jude ^{19}). Thus Christianity has enriched this word ψυχικός, adding to its psychological sense an ethical or even a theological significance.

Additional NT instances of the use of ψυχή in composition are ἄψυχα 'soulless,' or 'lifeless,' 1 Co 14^{7}; σύμψυχοι 'of one accord,' Ph 2^{2}; ἰσόψυχον 'like-minded,' Ph 2^{20}; δίψυχος 'double-minded,' Ja 1^{8} 4^{8}. See also art. PSYCHOLOGY.

SPAIN (Σπανία).—The S.W. peninsula of Europe was known to the Greeks as Ἑσπερία or Ἰβηρία, the latter name being derived from the river Ἴβηρ (the modern Ebro). The Roman name was Hispania. The information of the Greeks about the country was somewhat vague. Gibraltar was one of the Pillars of Hercules, and Herodotus (iv. 8) speaks of Gades (Γάδειρα) as lying beyond these. Spain had been colonized in very early times by the Phœnicians. Strabo (I. iii. 2) refers to settlements beyond the Pillars of Hercules soon after the Trojan war. The country first comes into the clear light of history in connexion with its conquest by the Carthaginians, a Phœnician people, between B.C. 237 and 218. In the second Punic war (B.C. 218–205) the Romans conquered that portion of Spain which had been subdued by Carthage, and divided it into Hispania citerior and Hispania ulterior, the Ebro being the boundary between the two. The northern and western parts of the peninsula remained unsubdued, and the conquest of them proceeded only gradually. It was greatly advanced by the operations of Pompey and Cæsar, and was finally completed under Augustus, who divided the country into three provinces, Bœtica in the south, Tarraconensis in the north, and Lusitania (the modern Portugal) in the west. The first-named province was senatorial, and the other two were imperial.

The mineral wealth of Spain is greater and more varied than that of any other country in Europe. Copper, lead, and quicksilver are abundant, and silver and gold are also found. It was the mines of Spain which gave the country its chief value for its ancient colonists and conquerors.

The river Bœtis (Guadalquivir), and also the surrounding country, had the name Ταρτησσός, which was derived from that of the inhabitants (Turti) (Herod. iv. 152; Strabo, III. ii. 11 ff.). With this locality the תַּרְשִׁישׁ of the Hebrews is generally identified (but see TARSHISH).

The other Scripture references to Spain are few, and in all of them Σπανία, a form of the Roman name, takes the place of the older Greek ones. 1 Mac 8^{3} refers to the Roman conquest, and to the acquisition of the gold and silver mines. On his third Missionary Journey the Apostle Paul formed the purpose of extending his evangelistic labours into the lands west of Greece. In writing to the Corinthians from Macedonia he indicated his intention of preaching the gospel in 'the parts beyond' them (2 Co 10^{16}); and in writing a little later from Corinth to Rome he explained his purpose as specially including Italy and Spain (Ro $15^{24.\,28}$). Whether he ever carried out this intention as regards Spain is a matter of much dispute, and the question is important only from its connexion with that of the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles. St. Paul certainly did not visit Spain before his first Roman imprisonment. On the hypothesis of his liberation and second imprisonment he may have done so at a later time. The Pastoral Epistles themselves only refer to his journeyings in the eastern part of the Mediterranean; but if the fact of his liberation be admitted, credence may be given to the statement of Clement of Rome (1st Ep. i. 4), that the apostle, before his martyrdom, preached the gospel 'to the extremity of the west' (ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως). Clement's expression naturally suggests Spain, and the Muratorian Canon shows that the apostle's visit to Spain was an accepted tradition of the Church before the end of the 2nd cent. It says that Luke in the narrative of the Acts omits 'profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis' (see PAUL, vol. iii. p. 714^{a}). See, further, Lightfoot, Clement, l.c., and Biblical Essays, 423 ff., where the whole of the evidence is collected.

SPAN.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

SPARROW (צִפּוֹר ẓippôr).—There is only one passage where the context makes it reasonably certain that the house sparrow is intended by ẓippôr (Ps 84^{4} [LXX στρουθίον], where AV and RV both tr. 'sparrow).' The 'ẓippôr alone upon a housetop' (Ps 102^{7} [LXX νυκτικόραξ]) may also be this bird. It is true that this is one of the most gregarious of birds, and that it is usually seen in large flocks, flitting from branch to branch, and from the ground to the roofs of houses and stables. But it happens sometimes that a single bird perches alone on a branch or on the roof. The fact of its generally sociable habits would make this the more phenomenal and illustrative of the loneliness of the psalmist. The attempt to identify it with the blue thrush Petrocossyphus cyaneus, Boie, is strained. If it does not refer to a solitary house sparrow, it is probably intended to indicate any small solitary bird. In addition to the above two passages, RV tr. ẓippôr 'sparrow,' in Pr 26^{2} [LXX ὄρνεα], unhappily, for the sparrow never wanders. Elsewhere in the 40 or more passages where it occurs, both Eng. VSS render it by 'bird' or 'fowl.' In some of these passages it is doubtless generic for small birds, corresponding to the Arab. 'uṣfûr (Job 41^{5} [LXX ὄρνεον], Ps 11^{1} [LXX στρουθίον], etc.). It is also used for such birds as are caught by fowlers (Pr 6^{5} 7^{23}, Am 3^{5} [LXX in all three ὄρνεον]), which would exclude the house sparrow, as it is notoriously far too cunning to be so taken. The Arabs have a proverb, 'the dûri (house sparrow) cannot be taken with bird-lime,' applying it to persons who are too shrewd to be entrapped by guile. Ẓippôr is also used generically for birds, and even for birds of prey (Ezk 39^{17}, see FOWL). The meaning of the Heb. root to twitter or chirp, which caused its original application to the passerines, has been overlooked in this broader application. The considerable number of LXX renderings shows this. The NT στρουθίον (Mt 10^{29}, Lk $12^{6.\,7}$) refers to the sparrow Passer domesticus, L., or two closely allied species, P. Italica, Vieill., the Italian sparrow, and P. hispaniolensis, Temm., the Spanish sparrow. The latter is found in great abundance in the Jordan Valley, where it breeds in Zizyphus bushes. The house sparrow is so familiar that any allusion to its habits would be superfluous.

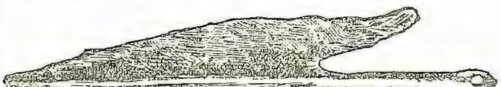
SPEAR.—The spear of antiquity was a near relation of the sword. The primitive knife might be fitted with a short handle and become a sword proper, or be mounted on a pole and become a spear; hence possibly the doubt whether the ῥομφαία (see SWORD) was a sword or a spear.



BRONZE SPEAR-HEAD FROM TELL EL-HESY (LACHISH).
(By kind permission of the PEF).

The spear-head was of flint or bronze (see the illustrations in Bliss, Mound of many Cities, pp. 36, 37) or of iron (1 S 17^{7}; Bliss, pp. 106, 107). Egyptian spears (perhaps only for hunting and fishing) have been found made of wood throughout.

Different kinds of spears were :—1. The javelin (כִּידוֹן kîdôn): RV of Jos $8^{18.\,26}$ (AV 'spear'); 1 S 17^{6} (AV 'target'); v.^{45} (AV 'shield'); Jer 6^{23} (EV 'spear'); 50^{42} (AV 'lance'); Job 39^{23} (AV 'shield'); $41^{29\,[21]}$ (RV 'the rushing of the javelin'; AV 'the shaking of a spear'). This weapon was for casting. In the Heb. Sirach (46^{2}) kîdôn preserves the reference to Jos 8^{18}, which is lost in the Gr. ῥομφαία (EV 'sword').

2. The lance (רֹמַח rōmaḥ, cf. Arab. rumḥ), perhaps a lighter weapon than the spear proper. In 1 K 18^{28} rōmaḥ is tr^{d} in AV 'lancets' ('lancers' in the earlier editions). See, further, Driver's note on Jl 3^{10}.

3. The spear (proper)—once a tr. of קַיִן ḳayin (2 S 21^{16}, where H. P. Smith accepts the emendation קוֹבַע ḳōbhaʿ 'helmet'); generally, however, the rendering of חֲנִית ḥănîth. This (heavy) spear was used probably in close array, when an army was drawn up shield touching shield, and with spears at the charge to repel a threatened attack. From this array champions advanced to issue their challenges (1 S 17$^{21.\,23}$), and back to it upon occasion they retreated. In Ps 35$^{2.\,3}$ the Psalmist seems to think of himself as such a champion defeated and retiring. The ḥănîth was used by Saul (1 S 22^{6}) as a 'sceptre' (שֵׁבֶט shēbheṭ, the shepherd's staff).* The cutting up of the spear (Ps 46^{9}) is a sign of the end of war. The two parts of the spear were the 'staff' or butt (עֵץ ʿēẓ 'wood,' 1 S 17^{7} Ḳĕrê; 2 S 21^{19}; or חֵץ ḥēẓ 'arrow' or 'shaft,' 1 S 17^{7} Kĕthîbh) and the 'head' (לֶהָבֶת lahebheth or לַהַב lahabh 'flame,' Job 39^{23}).

In NT 'spear' represents λόγχη (Jn 19^{34} [the only occurrence], Vulg. lancea). In Jn 19^{29} F. Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT, pp. 106–108) points out that ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες corresponds with the περιθεὶς καλάμῳ of Mt 27^{48}; accordingly, reviving an old conjecture, he suggests ὑσσῷ περιθέντες, 'putting [a sponge] upon a spear' (ὑσσός=pilum); certainly 'a sponge upon hyssop' is a difficult phrase to explain.

SPEARMEN.—1. Incorrectly for קָנֶה ḳāneh, 'reeds,' in the phrase חַיַּת קָנֶה ḥayyath ḳāneh, 'the company of spearmen,' Ps 68^{30} [67^{31}] AV (similarly Pr. Bk.); RV 'the wild beast of the reeds' [LXX τοῖς θηρίοις τοῦ καλάμου], i.e. probably the crocodile or the hippopotamus (cf. Job 40^{21}) as the symbol of Egypt. 2. For δεξιολάβους (Ac 23^{23} EV; Vulg. lancearii), Lachmann, following cod. A and the Peshiṭta (ܩ̈ܠܥܐ ܕܝܡܝܢܐ), reads here δεξιοβόλους, 'right-handed slingers.' E. Egli (ZWTh xxvii. pp. 20, 21) proposes to take the word in a passive sense (δεξιόλαβος, sic proparoxytone, 'rectâ captus'), 'left-handed slingers' (cf. Jg 20^{16}). See Blass, in loc.

SPECKLED BIRD.—Jer 12^{9} (only). If the MT of this passage (הַעַיִט צָבוּעַ נַחֲלָתִי לִי הַעַיִט סָבִיב עָלֶיהָ) is correct, the tr. can hardly be other than 'Is mine heritage unto me (i.e. to my sorrow, a dativus ethicus [Cheyne, ad loc.]) (as) a speckled bird of prey? Are (the) birds of prey against her round about?' (so, substantially, RV). The people of Israel is compared to a bird of prey, just as, on account of its hostility to Jehovah, it is compared in v.^{8} to a lion. But as a speckled (צָבוּעַ, cf. Jg 5^{30}) bird attracts the hostile attention of other birds (Tac. Ann. vi. 28; Suet. Cæsar, 81; Pliny, HN x. 19), Israel becomes a prey to the heathen (so Cheyne, Reuss, et al.). Cornill (in SBOT) alters the text slightly, changing לִי into כִּי (originally proposed by Graf) and pointing the ה of the second העיט as the art. instead of the interrogative particle. This does not seriously affect the tr., which would now be 'Is my heritage a speckled bird of prey, that the birds of prey are against her round about?' It need scarcely be said that the rendering 'mine heritage is unto me the ravenous hyæna' (see art. Hyæna) cannot be obtained from the present text. It is a fair question, however, whether the MT is correct. The LXX has, B σπήλαιον ὑαίνης ('hyæna's den,'? = מְעָרַת צָבֻעַ), A σπήλαιον λῃστῶν ('robber's den'). Siegfried-Stade suggest טְרֵפַת צָבֻעַ 'torn (prey) of the hyæna.'

SPELT.—See Rye.

SPICE, SPICES.—Three Heb. words are so translated in OT. 1. סַמִּים ṣammîm. This is a generic word (perh. loan-word from Arabic) for odoriferous substances. It is used alone in Ex 30^{34} (LXX ἡδύσματα), and with קְטֹרֶת ḳĕṭôreth= 'incense' in Ex 30^{7} (σύνθετος) 40^{27}, Lv 4^{7} 16^{12}, Nu 4^{16} etc. (σύνθεσις='composition'). In the first passage cited is a list of three of the substances included under this heading. Of these, two are known, galbanum, a gum resin, and onycha, the operculum of a Strombus: for the third see Stacte.

2. בָּשָׂם bāsām (Ca 5^{1} RVm 'balsam,' LXX ἀρώματα), בֹּשֶׂם bōsem, בֶּשֶׂם besem, pl. בְּשָׂמִים bĕsāmîm. A list of some of the aromatics included under this generic name is given in Ex 30^{23} (LXX ἡδύσματα): myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia, and with two of them, cinnamon and calamus, besem and bōsem are construed as adjectives, to denote sweetness. Such are spoken of as a sign of wealth (2 K 20^{13}, 2 Ch 32^{27}), and were given as tokens of royal favour (1 K 10^{2} etc.). They were objects of commerce (Ezk 27^{22}). Asa was laid in a bed of spices (2 Ch 16^{14} AV; RV 'sweet odours'). Some have supposed that the expression 'and they made a very great burning for him' indicates that Asa was cremated. As the previous part of the verse says, however, that they buried him in the sepulchre, and laid him in a bed of spices, the better explanation of the burning is that it was a bonfire in his honour. Such fires are favourite expressions of popular enthusiasm on feast days in Bible lands. Spices were stored in the temple (1 Ch 9^{29}), and used for the purifying of women (Est 2^{12}, Ca 4^{10} etc.). 'Mountains of spices' (Ca 8^{14}) may refer to the hillsides around Jerusalem, where were Solomon's Botanical Gardens, containing beds of spices (5^{13} 6^{2}). Besem and bōsem may have signified originally the same as their Arab. cognate bashâm=the Balsam of Mecca tree, Balsamodendron Opobalsamum, Kth., which is defined in the Arab. lexicons as 'a certain kind of odoriferous tree, of sweet taste, the leaves of which, pounded and mixed with henna, blacken the hair.' This confines it to a single tree or group of trees (see Balm). But the analysis of the use of bōsem and besem given above, with the fact that a special word ẓŏri is used for Mecca Balsam, makes it evident that these two words are not to be taken in any such restricted sense, but to be understood generally of aromatics, which would be a better translation than that of our Eng. VSS 'spices.'

3. נְכֹאת nĕkôʼth. This was a substance or substances carried by the Ishmaelite traders from Gilead to Egypt (Gn 37^{25}), and of which Jacob sent some as a present to Joseph (43^{11}). It is associated in both passages with balm and ladanum (see artt. on these words), and, in the latter, with honey, pistachio nuts, and almonds, which were products of Gilead proper. Some have supposed nĕkôʼth to be the same as the Arab. nakaʼath or nakaʻath. This is defined as a plant similar to the ṭurthûth. The latter is defined by Avicenna as—'Pieces of rotten wood, with an astringent taste . . . it is said that they are brought from the desert. Its medicinal properties are astringent' (ii. 183). The plant is defined in the dictionaries as 'a slender, oblong plant, inclining to redness, serving as a stomachic, included among medicines . . . a plant of the sands, similar to a fungus . . . having no leaves.' This corresponds, with considerable accuracy, to the characteristics of Cynomorium coccineum, L., a parasitic, leathery plant, of the order Balanophoraceæ, with a crimson, club-shaped spadix, 3–4 in. long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ in. to 1 in. thick, borne on a cylindrical stalk. It grows in sand on the coast, and in the salt marshes of the interior. We have been unable to find in the Arab. dictionaries sufficient authority for the tr. 'gum tragacanth' (RVm Gn 37^{25}) for naka'ath and naka'ath. Moreover, the tragacanth bears no resemblance to the above description of the turthîth. It has also a special name kethîrâ, which is defined as 'a liquid exuding from a tree in the mountains of Beirût and Lebanon.' This is undoubtedly the gum tragacanth, which exudes from a number of the mountain species of Astragalus in Syria and other parts of the Orient as A. gummifer, Lab., A. echinus, DC, etc. The genus Astragalus is represented by over 120 species in Palestine and Syria. We are inclined to reject the idea of any connexion between naka'ath, naka'ath, and nĕkô'th. If by the former two were meant the Cynomorium coccineum, it would not have been an article of commerce important in the Egyptian trade. Could it be proved, which we believe impossible, that they meant tragacanth, the same remark would apply. The quantity exuded from all the Astragali of Lebanon and Hermon would not load a dozen camels. We have no reason to believe that it was ever more abundant. We incline, on the authority of the LXX in both the above passages (θυμίαμα), to render the word nĕkô'th 'perfumes' or 'aromatics,' which better expresses the Gr. than 'spices,' and corresponds to the grouping of articles enumerated. See, further, Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and Literature there cited.

* Cf. Pausanias, ix. 40. 11, where it is said that Agamemnon's ancestral σκῆπτρον was also called δόρυ.

As to נְכֹת nĕkôth (2 K 20^{13}=Is 39^{2}), the meaning is uncertain, although the context demands something like 'treasure.' Possibly the word is of Assyr. origin (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.): read then נְכֹתָיו.

Spices (ἀρώματα) are mentioned in NT in connexion with the burial of our Lord ('Mk' 16^{1}, Lk 23^{56} 24^{1}, Jn 19^{40}). In Rev 18^{13} RV tr. ἄμωμον by 'spice,' m. 'Gr. amomum.'

G. E. POST.

SPIDER.—Two words are tr^{d} 'spider' in AV. 1. עַכָּבִישׁ 'akkābîsh (Arab. 'ankabût), ἀράχνη, aranea. In both the passages in which this word occurs (Job 8^{14}, Is 59$^{5.6}$) the allusion is to the gossamer web of the spider, as an emblem of frailty and speedy destruction, Bildad declaring that the hope of the wicked is as the spider's web (m. 'house'; cf. beit 'ankabût in Arab.), and Isaiah saying that the tenuous web cannot be wrought into a garment. The number of species of spiders in Palestine and Syria is very large.

2. שְׂמָמִית sĕmāmîth (Pr 30^{28}). This word, from an obsolete root שָׁמַם sāmam, 'to poison,' refers to some noxious, reputedly poisonous creature, which is probably some species of lizard (so RV; see, further, Toy, Proverbs, ad loc.). The LXX καλαβώτης signifies a newt, gecko, or spotted lizard. The latter may be the abu bureiṣ of the Arabs. Stellio in the Vulg. signifies the newt or gecko. Several species of lizards frequent houses, as the gecko, wall lizard, green lizard, etc. See CHAMELEON, GECKO, LIZARD. G. E. POST.

SPIKENARD (נֵרְדְּ nērd, νάρδος, nardus).—A fragrant, essential oil, from Nardostachys Jatamansi, DC, a plant of the order Valerianaceæ, growing in India. The shaggy stems, branching from their base, resemble the tail of an ermine. The perfume is procured from this part of the plant. It is called by the Arabs Sunbul Hindi, the Indian Spike. It is mentioned 3 times in the OT (Ca 1^{12} 4$^{13.}$ [pl. nĕrādîm]^{14}), and once in the NT (Mk 14^{3} ‖ Jn 12^{3}), where it is called νάρδος πιστική. The root meaning of pistic is fluid. AVm gives 'pure' or 'liquid nard,' and RVm 'genuine' or 'liquid nard,' or considers that pistic may be a 'local name.' As the perfume is an oil, the etymological signification is eminently appropriate, and should be retained. The Romans used it in this state for anointing the head. It was exceedingly valuable (Jn l.c.), that used to anoint Jesus' feet being worth about £12. Pliny gives 100 denarii as the value of a pound of it. That used for our Saviour must have been of a very superior grade. The tests of genuineness given by Pliny are lightness, red colour, sweet smell, taste which leaves a dry sensation but pleasant flavour in the mouth (HN xii. 26). G. E. POST.

SPINNING.—The notices of spinning in the Bible are very meagre, being found only in Ex 35$^{25.26}$ P (טָוָה 'spin,' and מַטְוֶה 'yarn') and Mt 6^{28}, Lk 12^{27} (νήθειν); but the art is implied in many other passages, such as where the curtains and hangings of the tabernacle are mentioned; and the various garments, the materials for which must have been spun. The description of the virtuous woman in Pr 31$^{10-31}$ includes it as one of her chief accomplishments (vv.$^{13.19}$); and the Heb. women were certainly skilled in working the spindle, as is evident from the articles which, acc. to P, they prepared for the tabernacle (Ex 35$^{25f.}$). They used a hand-spindle, such as was in use in Egypt, and such as the women of Syria and Palestine still employ. This consisted of a whorl or hemispherical disc of wood, amber, or other material, for steadying the motion of the pin which passed through the centre (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. i. 317, ed. 1878). The Egyp. spindle was over a foot long (ib. ii. 171, 172), and, though generally of wood, was also made of rushes and palm-leaves. The distaff was no doubt employed, but the word so tr^{d} in Pr 31^{19} means more properly the whorl, or the spindle itself. (See DISTAFF).

In Egypt men as well as women engaged in spinning, but among the Hebrews women only are mentioned in this connexion. The materials they used were wool and flax (Pr 31^{13}), goats' hair (Ex 35^{26}), and possibly cotton, which was known in Egypt (Wilkinson, ii. 159). Even silk may have been used (cf. Ezk 16$^{10.13}$ and Pr 31^{22}), as Kenrick (Phœn. p. 246) says that raw silk was brought to Berytus and Tyre by the Persian merchants, but it was too rare to have been much employed. Raw silk is spun quite extensively at present by the Syrian women, and they use the spindle to fill up leisure hours much as Western women do the knitting-needle. H. PORTER.

SPIRIT.—Besides its use for the Supreme Spirit,—the Spirit of God, the Spirit of the Lord, the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of truth, etc.,—this word is occasionally used for the extreme opposite, as πνεῦμα δαιμονίου ἀκαθάρτου (Lk 4^{33}). Then there is its secondary use for an influence, or power, as 'spirit of error' (1 Jn 4^{6}), 'spirit of the world' (Eph 2^{2}), 'of bondage' and 'of sonship' (Ro 8^{15}), etc., yet often with a reference to the spiritual personality controlling these influences. But the main use of it is psychological, where it is immensely indebted to the Bible and to Christianity. Indeed it may be said to be an expression created by Christianity.

Two Heb. terms are tr. in EV 'spirit.' 1. רוּחַ, lit. 'wind' (so often in OT); used of the breath of life (rûaḥ ḥayyîm) which animates God's creatures, Gn 6^{17} 7^{15} (both P; cf. nishmath ḥayyîm in 2^{7} [J]); the medium of consciousness, 1 S 30^{12}, Jg 15^{19}, Job 9^{18}; the seat of emotions, 1 K 21^{5}, Is 66^{2}, Pr 15^{13}, Ezk 3^{14}, Jos 2^{11} (courage; and so 5^{1}, Pr 18^{14}, Is 57^{15}); and of intelligence and will, Ezk 20^{32}, Pr 16^{32} 21^{2} 24^{12}, Dt 2^{30}, Job 20^{3}; of an inexplicable or uncontrollable impulse, Nu 5$^{14.30}$, Is 19^{14} 28^{6} 29^{10} 37^{7}, Hos 4^{12} 5^{4}. When used with reference to God, rûaḥ is used of the brooding (מְרַחֶפֶת) and creative activity of His spirit (Gn 1^{2}, Ps 104^{30}), which imparts itself to men with the result of capacitating them for the performance of extraordinary deeds, Jg 6^{34} (Gideon) 14$^{6.19}$ (Samson), and is specially noted as fitting the prophets for their work, Is 48^{16} 59^{21}, Hos 9^{7} (the prophet is 'the man of the spirit'), Ezk 37^{1} (and often). See, more fully, vol. ii. p. 402 ff.; and add Schultz, ii. 242 ff. (249 on distinction of רוח and נפש); Wendt, Notiones carnis et spiritus quomodo in VT adhibeantur; Briggs, 'The uses of רוח in OT' in JBL, 1901, p. 133 ff. (synopsis of passages arranged and translated).

2. נְשָׁמָה is twice in EV (Job 26^{4}, Pr 20^{27}) tr. 'spirit.' Its lit. meaning is 'breath.' See, also, under SOUL.

The LXX and NT πνεῦμα follows the usage of rûaḥ. In the two passages (Mt 14^{26}, Mk 6^{49}) where φάντασμα occurs, the AV tr. 'spirit' is replaced in RV by 'apparition.'

So far as it depends on physiological suggestion, in all the languages 'spirit' is the same,—the inhaling of the 'breath,' and so 'wind,' and more remotely 'life,' and so is closely allied to 'soul' (ψυχή), which depends upon a similar physiological derivation. In one respect the two words soul and spirit differ widely. πνεῦμα is far less than ψυχή connected with the life of man in the Greek classics. πνεῦμα is never used in classical psychology for one of the elements of man's inner life, whereas ψυχή is invariably so used. Indeed it is one of the chief distinctions of biblical from all other psychology to give πνεῦμα the supreme place as an element in the life of man. Only in the LXX and in the NT has πνεῦμα the sense of a spiritual being, or refers to man in his higher inward aspects. Thus it is a good example of the language-building and enriching power of the Bible religion. The suggestion depends mainly upon two biblical ideas, viz. the attribution of spirit in man to Divine gift or creation (Ec 12^{7}), and the parallel or analogy between 'spirit' in man, and the Divine Spirit (1 Co 2^{11}, Ro 8^{16}).

Sufficient attention has already been called to the frequent and intimate association of the two terms 'Soul' and 'Spirit' (see art. SOUL) occurring so often in the Bible as nearly parallel psychological expressions; yet each implying all through the characteristic distinction: 'soul,' the individual and personal life; 'spirit,' the principle of life.

There is another antithesis, more peculiarly Pauline, of the 'spirit' over against the 'flesh.' The more obvious antithesis of 'body' and 'spirit' (Ja 2^{26}) is upon purely natural ground. But the Pauline is a moral distinction, and belongs to specially Christian doctrine. It occurs chiefly in those passages where St. Paul is describing the conflict of the old nature, or the 'old man' as he calls it, with the new nature or the new man. Human nature, as it comes to any one through the σάρξ, manifests itself in the σάρξ, is determined by it, and called after it, comes to stand in contrast with 'spirit' (πνεῦμα), the Divine nature, or the divinely originated and sustained new nature. Thus σάρξ came at length, in distinct and presupposed antithesis to πνεῦμα, to signify the sinful condition of human nature, and in such a manner that this same σάρξ mediates or effectuates that sinful condition—the σάρξ ἁμαρτίας, 'the flesh determined by sin' (Ro 8^{3}). In this antithesis there is progress or intensification in the meaning of πνεῦμα as well as of σάρξ. The πνεῦμα in man, which is the element originally created by God, and which ought to rule or govern his whole nature, is used by St. Paul for the new nature divinely originated in the Christian, so that a direct antithesis is brought out between 'flesh' and 'spirit,' and everything πνευματικόν, spiritual, is a Divine product or creation, according to that new nature.

This use of πνευματικόν for everything determined or influenced by the Divine πνεῦμα extends beyond St. Paul's writings, and is quite general in the Epistles of the NT. There is the 'spiritual house' (οἶκος πνευματικός, 1 P 2^{5}) because 'built up of living stones'; 'spiritual sacrifices,' i.e. offerings fixed or determined by the Spirit (ib.); 'spiritual understanding' (Col 1^{9}); 'spiritual songs' (ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί, Col 3^{16}); 'spiritual food, drink, rock' (βρῶμα, πόμα, πέτρα, 1 Co $10^{3.\ 4}$). In two sets of passages St. Paul contrasts it with ψυχικόν (1 Co 2^{14} $15^{44.\ 46}$). There is one curious exception from this Pauline use of it for divine, viz. Eph 6^{12} τὰ πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας = 'wicked spirits,' or something equivalent.

There is another antithesis in which St. Paul places it as contrasted with νοῦς or σύνεσις, where the intention plainly is to contrast the action of the 'understanding' in man with that of spiritual or ecstatic impulse even in a Christian (1 Co $14^{14.\ 15}$). It is also once or twice opposed to γράμμα, where inwardness or reality is the thing to be brought out (Ro 2^{29} 7^{6}, 2 Co 3^{6}).

There are two things mainly noticeable and distinctive in this biblical use of 'spirit.' The first is the habit of biblical writers to explain the 'spirit' in the natural man as the product or creation directly of God, and as accounted for only by the direct contact of man with the Almighty in his origin. This is peculiarly prevalent in the OT (Gn 2^{7}, Is 42^{5}). Then there is the assertion of a parallelism and communication between the self-conscious, inner life of man—his spirit—with the Spirit of God (1 Co $2^{11.\ 12}$, Ro $8^{1\text{-}17}$, Philem ^{25}). There is a foundation laid in this way for the whole spiritual life of man, and especially for the renewed and redeemed life of which, according to Christianity, he is made a partaker.

SPITE.—Like DESPITE (which see), 'spite' means in AV 'injury' (rather out of contempt than malice). It occurs only Ps 10^{14} 'Thou beholdest mischief and spite' (כַּעַס, properly 'vexation'). Cf. Child's Ballads, v. 299—

> 'Day and night he'll work my spight,
> And hanged I shall be.'

The adv. 'spitefully' is used in the same sense; the phrase is 'entreat spitefully,' Mt 22^{6}, Lk 18^{32} (ὑβρίζω, RV 'entreat shamefully').

SPONGE (AV spunge, σπόγγος, spongia).—The medium by which vinegar or sour wine was carried to the mouth of Jesus on the cross (Mt 27^{48}, Mk 15^{36}, Jn 19^{29}). This well-known substance is a porous, fibrous framework, composed of a material called keratode, invested by a fleshy covering and lining of amœboid bodies. Sponges grow only in sea water, near the coast, and mostly in the warmer seas of the globe, although some kinds are found even in the polar regions. Sponge fishing is a considerable industry along the coasts of Syria, Asia Minor, and the Ægean Sea. The divers go out in row-boats or sail-boats, a short distance from the shore; they then strip, and holding in their hands, high above their heads, a heavy stone attached to a rope, fill their chests with air, and then plunge, stone downmost, and so rapidly reach the bottom. They often dive to a depth of 60 ft. or more. They then walk or creep quickly along the bottom, holding the stone to steady themselves, and tear the sponges off the stones to which they are attached, and put them into a netted bag hung around their neck. When they are exhausted they jerk the rope, and their companions quickly haul them to the surface. Few can stay under water more than 60 seconds, none as long as 100. Their occupation usually develops emphysema, and other diseases of the lungs, from which they are apt to die early.

STACHYS (Στάχυς).—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{9}, and described as 'my beloved.' The name is rare, but found among members of the Imperial household (CIL vi. 8607). He is commemorated Oct. 31, and later legends will be found in Acta Sanct., Oct., vol. xiii. p. 687.

A. C. HEADLAM.

STACTE (נָטָף nāṭāph).—The Heb. word occurs twice: Ex 30^{34} (cf. Sir 24^{15}), LXX στακτή, Vulg. stacte, RVm opobalsamum; Job 36^{27} (LXX σταγόνες, Vulg. stillæ, both of which signify 'drops,' and refer to water). The Heb. נָטָף nāṭaph (=Arab. naṭaf) signifies to drop or distil. As the exudation of all gums is in drops, the etymology does not help us. But it is evident from the context in Exodus that a fragrant gum is intended. Many identify the στακτή here mentioned with the gum from the libneh (=storax, see POPLAR). But στακτή means primarily myrrh. Myrrh, however, is mentioned by its proper name מֹר môr (v.^{23}), coupled with דְּרוֹר dĕrôr, which AV tr. 'pure,' and RV 'flowing.' The LXX tr. this expression by ἄνθος σμύρνης ἐκλεκτῆς; Vulg. primæ myrrhæ et electæ. Dioscorides describes two kinds of stacte, one of which is pure myrrh, and the other made from storax and fat. It is unlikely that any such inferior compound as the latter would be used in making the sacred incense. It is most likely then that nāṭāph, and its LXX and Vulg. equivalent stacte, refer to myrrh in drops or tears, which is the purest form.

STAGGER.—In Ro 4^{20} 'stagger' has the meaning of 'stumble,' and so literally 'waver' (as RV), 'He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief' (οὐ διεκρίθη). Tindale uses the stronger form of the same word, 'He stackered not'; Rhem. is the first to use 'stagger.' The word is of Icel. origin, strakra, freq. of staka, to push. Cf. Mt 21^{21} Rhem. 'Amen, I say to you, if you shal haue faith, and stagger not, not only that of the figtree shal you doe.'

STANDARD.—See BANNER and POLE.

STAR.—The Bible treats the stars as the noblest work of the Creator (Ps 8^{3} 19^{1}, Job 25^{5}, Wis 7^{29}), insisting on their brightness (Dn 12^{3}), their height above the earth (Is 14^{13}, Ob ^{4}, Job 22^{12}), and especially their number (Gn 15^{5} 22^{17} 26^{4}, Ex 32^{13}, Dt 1^{10} 10^{22} 28^{62}, Jer 33^{22}, Neh 9^{23}, He 11^{12} etc.). They are sometimes poetically represented as living beings ('sang together,' Job 38^{7}; 'fought against Sisera,' Jg 5^{20}), and the darkening of the stars is treated as a sign of coming distress (Jl 2^{10} 3^{15}, Am 8^{9}, Is 13^{10} 34^{4}, Ezk $32^{7.8}$, Mt 24^{29}, Mk 13^{25}, Lk 21^{25}, Rev pass.). But they were created by God (Gn 1^{14}, Am 5^{8}, Ps 74^{16} 136^{7}, Job 9^{7}, Sir 43^{9}) to give light (Gn 1^{16}, Jer 31^{35}); He gave them their paths according to fixed laws (Jer 33^{25}, Job 38^{33}), and they are subject to Him (Job 9^{7}, Is 45^{12}, Ps 147^{4}, Bar 3^{34}, Ep. Jer ^{59}), who calls them by their names (Is 40^{26}). It follows that star-worship is rigorously forbidden (Dt 4^{19} $17^{2.3}$); though introduced by Manasseh (2 K 21^{3}, cf. $23^{4.5.11}$; Am 5^{26} does not necessarily imply its existence at an earlier date, cf. Driver in Smith, DB, art. 'Amos'), and several times mentioned at a later date (Zeph 1^{5}, Jer 7^{18} 19^{13} 44^{17}, Wis 13^{2}), it is always spoken of with reprobation (cf. also 2 K 17^{16}, Jer 44^{25-27}). On the sources of this star-worship among the Jews see W. Lotz in Herzog, RE^{2} xiv. 694. For the stars known to the Israelites and for astrological views see ASTRONOMY AND ASTROLOGY; for the star of the Magi see MAGI.

STATER.—See MONEY, vol. iii. p. 428^{b}.

STEALING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, vol. i. p. 522^{b}, s. 'Theft,' and MAN-STEALING.

STEEL is a form of iron intermediate in composition between cast iron and wrought iron, and combining the most useful properties of both (see IRON). The word occurs thrice in AV for נְחוּשָׁה (2 S 22^{35}, Job 20^{24}, Ps 18^{34}), and once for נְחֹשֶׁת (Jer 15^{12}). In these cases the reference is not to steel but to brass (so RV) or bronze (see BRASS).

'Steel' appears in RV only in Nah 2^{3}, where it is the translation of פְּלָדֹת (AV 'torches'). The word פְּלָדָה occurs nowhere else, but its Arabic and Syriac cognates have the meaning of steel, or iron of fine quality. The 'fire' or 'flashing' of steel in this passage may be understood either of the appearance of the metal-plated chariots themselves or of the glitter of the 'scythes' attached to their wheels. Against this latter supposition is the fact that such scythes are never represented on Assyrian chariots, but appear to have been introduced for the first time by the Persians (see CHARIOT).

JAMES PATRICK.

STEPHANAS (Στεφανᾶς, Stephanas; the name occurs CIG ii. 3378).—A Christian of Corinth, 1 Co 1^{16} $16^{15.17}$. St. Paul mentions the household of Stephanas as one of the few exceptions to the practice which he had followed of not personally baptizing his converts. At the end of the Epistle the same household are spoken of as the first-fruits of Achaia. They are said to have given themselves to the ministry of the saints, and the Corinthians are exhorted to obey such persons and all who work and labour with them. From the next verse we gather that Stephanas himself was with St. Paul at Ephesus at the time when the Epistle was written. In Clement of Rome's Epistle, ch. xlii., we are told that the apostles, preaching from city to city and country to country, appointed their first-fruits, having tested them by the spirit, to be bishops and deacons of those that should believe (καθίστανον τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν . . . εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, Clem. Rom. i. 42). It would be beside our purpose to discuss the exact meaning of this passage, but it may reasonably be held that Stephanas, and perhaps some members of his household, had been appointed to a position in the nascent church at Corinth, which implied on the one side ministry (διακονία), on the other side some recognition of their authority. If this was not a local ministry, in the later sense of the term, there were here the germs out of which it grew.

A. C. HEADLAM.

STEPHEN (Στέφανος), Ac 6–8^{2}.—Some dissatisfaction having been expressed by the Grecian Jews or Hellenists in the infant Church at Jerusalem regarding the distribution of alms among their widows, seven brethren were chosen, and solemnly set apart by the apostles, to undertake the administration of the poor-table. Of the seven (see DEACON), Stephen is the first named (Ac 6^{5}), and the most distinguished, though in a sphere, strictly speaking, beyond his office, viz., as a preacher and a worker of miracles—characteristically apostolic functions. Nothing is known of his conversion to Christianity, though Epiphanius (Hær. xx. 4) records that he was one of the Seventy. It is not certain that he was a Hellenist, though his Greek name, the fact that a committee largely Hellenistic would probably be chosen to deal with the grievances of the party, and to some extent his opinions, make the supposition very probable. His character and abilities as given in Ac 6 are of the highest: 'a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit' (v.^{5}, cf. 7^{55}), 'full of grace (AV faith) and power' (v.^{8}), 'the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake' (v.^{10}); cf. also the qualifications necessary for the office (v.^{3}), and St. Paul's words, 'Stephen thy witness' (22^{20}). Stephen seems to have aroused the hostile notice of the Hellenistic synagogues (see below) by the wonders and signs which he wrought among the people (6^{8}), but probably also by the substance and manner of his preaching; in any case they challenged him to disputation. But his skill in maintaining his opinions was so irresistible, that his adversaries, discomfited in argument, raised the charge of blasphemy, procured witnesses to testify to it, and thus succeeded in having him arrested and brought before the Sanhedrin. Here he was formally accused of speaking blasphemous words against the Temple and the Law, having said, as the false witnesses maintained, that Jesus of Nazareth would destroy 'this place,' and change the customs delivered by Moses. Stephen was unperturbed by these accusations; his face appeared to those present 'as the face of an angel' (6^{9-15}). Being asked by the high priest to answer to the charges, Stephen made a long speech, traversing the greater part of the history of the chosen people, from the call of Abraham, through Joseph and Moses, to David, and the building of the Temple by Solomon. Towards the close he fearlessly turned to his judges, rebuked them as 'stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears,' and as those who, carrying on the unholy work of the persecutors of the prophets, had become the betrayers and murderers of Him whom the prophets had foretold (7^{1-53}). These words were the occasion of a furious outburst of wrath on the part of the assembly; and when Stephen, undismayed, looked upwards, and declared that he saw the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God, the exasperated hearers violently rushed upon him, dragged him forth by one of the gates of the city, and stoned him to death. The witnesses (who according to Dt 17^{7} had to take the lead in casting the stones) placed their garments in the keeping of a young man named Saul (cf. 22^{20})—the first historical mention of a great name. Among the last words of Stephen were, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit,' and 'Lord, lay not this sin to their charge,' which are very similar to two of our Lord's sayings on the cross, Lk $23^{46.34}$. In fact, the bearing of Stephen throughout—his courage, his calm, his patience, his gentleness—accords remarkably with the demeanour of his Master in like circumstances. The mutilated body was reverently interred by 'devout men' (7^{54}–8^{2}).

The vividness of the narrative hardly leaves room for the supposition that the stoning of Stephen was a legal execution, i.e. one carried out with the sanction of the Roman authorities, or, indeed, that it was other than a murder. But the Sanhedrin may have been able to represent the whole incident as a mere tumultuous outbreak, for which they could not officially be called to account.

A few other minor points require notice: (1) As to the number of synagogues implied in 6^{9}, whether five, or three, or two, or only one (each number has had its advocate among expositors), the Greek seems to support the view of Wendt, viz. that two synagogues are meant: (a) of the Libertines (Cyrenians and Alexandrians), and (b) of those from Asia and Cilicia. See LIBERTINES; Sanday, Expositor, viii. p. 327 (third series); also Winer-Moulton, Grammar, p. 160 note. (2) The date of the martyrdom of Stephen can be determined only approximately: Bengel gives A.D. 30, Ewald A.D. 38, and every intervening year has had its supporter. Acts seems to place the event shortly before St. Paul's conversion; certainly nearer to that event than to the terminus a quo, the Crucifixion (say 29–30). Recent chronologists have somewhat narrowed the termini of St. Paul's conversion: von Soden 31–35, Harnack 30, Ramsay 33; see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 424 (C) and Table. (3) Who are the persons covered by the term 'devout men,' ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς (8^{2})? Hardly proselytes (Renan, Apostles, viii.) of either class, as St. Luke regularly uses προσήλυτος and φοβούμενος (or σεβόμενος) τὸν θεόν for proselytes of the higher and the lower rank respectively, and elsewhere applies εὐλαβεῖς to Jews (Lk 2^{25}, Ac 2^{5} 22^{12} RV). It is also unlikely that they were Christians, else we should have expected the designation to be μαθηταί or ἀδελφοί. Most probably they were Jews who took a sympathetic interest in the fortunes of the Church, and who may have known and respected Stephen. Cf. Joseph of Arimathæa and Nicodemus (Jn $19^{38.39}$), and see Knowling in Expositor's Greek Testament, ii., ad loc. (4) Traditions about Stephen. According to an early tradition, the scene of the martyrdom was the open ground outside the Damascus Gate on the north; but about the 15th cent. this gave place to the popular belief that it was on the east, where, accordingly, St. Stephen's Gate is now located (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, small ed. p. 61). Another legend relates that, through the friendliness of Gamaliel, the body of Stephen was buried at Kafr Gamala, a day's journey from Jerusalem, all the apostles being present. This story probably originated after the so-called 'Invention and Translation of the Relics of St. Stephen,' the chief details of which are that in the year 415 Gamaliel appeared in vision to Lucian, parish priest of Kafr Gamala, and indicated the resting-place of the remains of Stephen, which were then disinterred, carried to Jerusalem, and buried in the church of Mount Zion; it was also said that the exhumation disclosed a tablet bearing the Aramaic name of Stephen, Kelîl (Syr. kelīla, 'crown'=στέφανος).

The Speech of Stephen.—The historical narrative given by Stephen shows a considerable number of divergences from the OT account; e.g. according to Ac 7^{2-4} Abraham receives his call before his migration to Haran, in Gn 12^{1} while in Haran; the giving of the Law is connected with angels in Ac 7^{53}, while Ex 19 has no mention of angels. 'Remphan' in 7^{43} shows that Stephen was quoting from the LXX; the Hebrew has 'Chiun' (Am 5^{26}); see CHIUN. A full list of these variations is given by Farrar, St. Paul, small ed. p. 92 note.

The authenticity of the speech has been much canvassed; e.g. Weizsäcker (and he is representative of many more) regards the speech as a 'doctrinal exposition,' i.e. a later composition; but see ACTS, vol. i. p. 33 f. There has been an almost equal diversity of opinion regarding the purpose of the address. Now, this very diversity seems a remarkably convincing proof of its substantial historicity; a mere fabricator would surely have taken care to leave his readers in little doubt as to his 'tendency.' Was the speech completed? Was it intended as an answer to the charges made by the false witnesses? Or was it meant as a vindication, in whole or in part, of the opinions by which Stephen had originally provoked opposition? As to the first of these questions, it may be said that the speech has all the appearance of being complete; the fact that Stephen did not proceed to recount the nation's story beyond the building of Solomon's temple is sufficiently explained if we remember that the legal and institutional status quo was traditionally held to have been but little altered subsequent to that event. As to the second, it is certainly difficult to maintain that the address is a counter-plea to the very definite charges of $6^{13.14}$. It remains, then, to seek an answer to the question whether the speech was, so to speak, a plea of veritas, i.e. a re-declaration of what Stephen had said against the Temple and the Law. If we answer affirmatively, the climax will be found in vv.$^{48-50}$, where it seems to be suggested that the building of the Temple was an act contrary to God's will, a continuation of the contumacy that had fashioned the golden calf, and taken up the tabernacle of Molech (vv.$^{41.43}$); while, if we answer negatively, the essential point will lie in vv.$^{51-53}$, where Stephen declares that (not he and his brethren, but) his hearers and judges were the real violators of God's commands. The former view is usually adopted by those who regard Stephen as the first to discern that the gospel could not be confined within the bonds of Judaism, as, in fact, the forerunner of St. Paul. But it should be observed that if Stephen had spoken (as the false witnesses said) against the Temple, and had affirmed that Jesus would change the customs of Moses, his adversaries would have been his own Christian brethren, whereas he was held in the highest repute by them. Further, such words as 'the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands' can hardly be taken as implying any disparagement of the Temple, since similar language was used by Solomon himself (1 K 8^{27}, 2 Ch 6^{18}). Finally, Stephen speaks of the Law in terms of the highest respect ($7^{38.\,53}$); and his references to the call of Abraham in Mesopotamia (v.^{2}), to the Divine favour vouchsafed to Joseph and Moses in Egypt, and to the subsequent revelation accorded to the latter in Midian (v.$^{29\text{ff.}}$), while they might be interpreted as signifying that the Divine purpose and blessing were not limited to the Holy Land, are rather to be understood in the light of the fact that Stephen represents Canaan as the destination of the Chosen People from the first; the patriarchs are buried there (v.^{16}) as in a country really their own; and the sojourn in Egypt (still more the deportation to Babylon) is plainly regarded as a misfortune. On the other hand, if Stephen was at one with his opponents (as with his brethren) in their high appreciation of the Holy Land, the Law, and the Temple, how could the charge of blasphemy arise? The witnesses might be false, but there must have been some colourable reason for an accusation so definite. But it seems a quite satisfactory answer to this to say that Stephen had attacked the traditional Law (as did Jesus Himself, Mt $15^{1\text{-}20}$= Mk $7^{1\text{-}23}$), which was freely held to have authority equal with the Mosaic, and that he may have urged, in the manner of Isaiah, that 'temple-treading' and external observances did not ensure acceptance with God. It is quite conceivable that such teaching would be misunderstood, and even misrepresented as blasphemy against 'the law and this holy place,' or even against God (6^{11}). On this view, then, the speech was not so much the advancing of a new theological position against an older; its purpose was rather ethical and personal. God had vouchsafed great privileges to the nation, —the land, an ordained leader (Moses), the Law, the Tabernacle, and the Temple,—but they had been rendered of none effect by the people's contumacy and disobedience. Doubtless, as Spitta makes out, there is an unmistakable intention to draw or suggest a parallel between Moses and Jesus, 'the prophet whom the Lord will raise up unto you . . . like unto me' (7^{37}), and the treatment accorded to each; but this is meant to give point to the general theme of the speech, viz. that the members of the council, and all in league with them, had proved themselves to be only too truly the children of ungrateful and unworthy forefathers. It is thus questionable how far we are entitled to speak of Stephen as the forerunner of St. Paul. Even if we accept Spitta's view that the erection of the Temple is represented by Stephen as an unauthorized and presumptuous act, this is something very different from St. Paul's conception of the national institutions as having had validity for their own time. Certainly Stephen never asserts the secondary and provisional character of the Law, nor does he suggest the call of the Gentiles—two of St. Paul's most characteristic tenets. In short, Stephen seems to regard Christianity (as did the apostles generally) as the continuation and development of the Divine purpose in the history of Israel; St. Paul sees in it the beginning of a new order of things—another dispensation.

STEWARD occurs six times in AV of OT. It is used in Gn 15^{2} of Eliezer, where for 'steward of my house' RV rightly substitutes 'he that shall be possessor of my house' (Heb. בֶּן־מֶשֶׁק בֵּיתִי. For the correct text and meaning of this verse see Kautzsch-Socin's Genesis, Comm. of Del. and Dillm. ad loc., and above all Ball's note in Haupt's OT). In Gn 43^{19} $44^{1.\,4}$ 'steward' is tr^{n} (both AV and RV) of אֲשֶׁר עַל בֵּיתוֹ 'he who was over his (Joseph's) house.' The same tr^{n} is given by RV in 43^{16}, where the Heb. is the same, but AV arbitrarily and inconsistently gives 'ruler.' See art. JOSEPH, vol. ii. p. 772^{a}. In 1 K 16^{9} for AV 'steward of his (Elah's) house' RV substitutes 'who was over the household' (הַבָּיִת). See art. KING, vol. ii. p. 843^{b}. The only remaining instance in AV is 1 Ch 28^{1}. The Heb. is שָׂרִים, which RV tr. 'rulers.' In Dn 1^{11}, where AV gives MELZAR as a prop. name, RV is perh. correct in translating 'the steward' (הַמֶּלְצַר with the article shows at least that we have here some title, although its meaning is not certain).

In NT 'steward' is tr^{n} of ἐπίτροπος in Mt 20^{8} (the steward of the lord of the vineyard), Lk 8^{3} (Herod's steward). This word occurs also in Gal 4^{2} (AV 'tutors,' RV 'guardians') and twice in Apocr., 2 Mac 11^{1} 13^{2} (AV 'protector,' RV 'guardian'). Elsewhere in NT it is the tr^{n} of οἰκονόμος, which is used both literally and metaphorically, Lk 12^{42} $16^{1.\,3.\,8}$ (the cogn. vb. οἰκονομέω occurs v.^{2}, cf. 2 Mac 3^{4}), 1 Co $4^{1.\,2}$, Tit 1^{7}, 1 P 4^{10}. In Gal 4^{2} οἰκονόμοι is coupled with ἐπίτροποι (see above), and is tr^{d} in AV 'governors,' RV 'stewards.' The former of these Gr. terms occurs also in Ro 16^{23}, where RV has 'treasurer' (cf. 1 Es 4^{49}), AV 'chamberlain.'

Stewardship (οἰκονομία) in lit. sense occurs in Lk $16^{2.\,3.\,4}$ (AV and RV), and in metaphorical sense is substituted by RV for AV 'dispensation' in 1 Co 9^{17}. So RVm gives 'stewardship' in Eph 3^{2}, Col 1^{25}, 1 Ti 1^{4} where 'dispensation' stands in the text. J. A. SELBIE.

STILL.—1. As adj.: the general meaning is silent, as Ps 46^{10} 'Be still' (הַרְפּוּ, RVm 'Let be,' LXX σχολάσατε); Ps 83^{1} 'Be not still, O God'; Is 42^{14} 'I have been still, and refrained myself; now will I cry'; Mk 4^{39} 'Peace, be still' (πεφίμωσο, lit. 'be muzzled'). Cf. Ac 18^{9} Wyc. 'Speke and be not stille' (μὴ σιωπήσῃς). Or it means a low sound, as 1 K 19^{12} 'A still small voice' (קוֹל דְּמָמָה דַקָּה, lit. as RVm 'a sound of gentle stillness,' LXX φωνὴ αὔρας λεπτῆς); Ps 23^{2} 'He leadeth me beside the still waters' (עַל־מֵי מְנֻחוֹת, RVm 'waters of rest,' LXX ἐπὶ ὕδατος ἀναπαύσεως: the idea is 'waters that refresh,' or 'waters that are resting-places' [Del., Cheyne], not 'softly flowing waters' as in Is 8^{6}).

From meaning 'silent' the word passes naturally to mean inactive, as Jg 18^{9} 'Are ye still? be not slothful to go'; 1 K 22^{3} 'Know ye not that Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria?'

2. As adv.: the idea of persistence is more prominent than in modern usage. Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 14, 'God uses still to goe a way by himselfe'; Adams, 2 Peter, p. 46, 'If the hand be still striking and stabbing, there is a bloody heart'; Shaks. Hamlet, II. ii. 42—

> 'Thou still hast been the author of good tidings.'

So 1 S 26^{25} 'Thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still prevail'; 2 S 16^{5} 'He came forth, and cursed still as he came'; Ps 84^{4} 'They will be still praising thee'; and Jer 23^{17} 'They say still unto them that despise me' (RV 'They say continually'). J. HASTINGS.

STOICS (Στωϊκοί).—When St. Paul at Athens encountered the Stoics (Ac 17^{18}), they regarded his teaching as an interesting novelty: and so in some respects it was. Jesus and the Resurrection were indeed 'strange gods,' but, for all that, there was more in common between St. Paul and his hearers than either party was perhaps aware of. To begin with, the Jews had a natural affinity with Stoicism. What nation indeed could stand more in need of the philosophy of endurance than that whose whole history was one long record of persecution? The 'courage never to submit or yield,' which animated Stoicism, was the moral also of the story of the 'seven brethren with their mother' (2 Mac 7). The Jews claimed kindred with the Spartans, who were the ideal of Stoicism, and admired the Romans, of whom Stoicism was the ideal (1 Mac 12). But, in the next place, Stoicism, as has been shown by Sir Alexander Grant, was not a genuine product of Hellenic thought, but an importation from the East. 'Its essence,' he says, 'consists in the introduction of the Semitic temperament and a Semitic spirit into Gr. philosophy' (Ethics of Arist. vi.). Not one of the famous Stoic teachers was a native of Greece proper. Zeno, the founder of the school, who flourished about B.C. 278, was a native of Citium in Cyprus, a Greek town in which there was a large infusion of Phœnician settlers (Diog. Laert. vii. § 1). Hence Zeno is sometimes called 'the Phœnician' (ib. ii. § 114), and his master Crates, the Cynic, used jocularly to address him as Φοινικίδιον. His successor, Cleanthes (about B.C. 263), was a native of Assos. The third head of the school, Chrysippus (B.C. 280–207; ib. vii. § 184), whose intellectual ability caused him to be regarded as its second founder, came from Cilicia, either from Soli or from St. Paul's native city, Tarsus. Tarsus, indeed, was a very stronghold of Stoicism. To it belonged Zeno, a disciple of Chrysippus, who seems himself at one time to have been head of the school (ib. vii. §§ 35, 41, 84). Though Strabo in his account of Tarsus (xiv. p. 674) says nothing of this person, he mentions among the Stoic teachers who had adorned that city, 'Antipater, Archedemus, and Nestor, and further, the two Athenodori.' Of these Antipater was a disciple of Diogenes of Babylon (Cic. de Off. iii. § 51), one of the three philosophers who were sent on the famous embassy to Rome in B.C. 155 (Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. VI. xiv. 9). He was himself the instructor of Panætius of Rhodes (Cic. de Div. i. § 6), who was the friend of the younger Africanus, and the teacher of Posidonius (of Apamea in Syria), who in his turn numbered Cicero among his hearers. Archedemus is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius (vii. §§ 40, 68, 84) in a way that would lead us to think that he followed Chrysippus. Of Nestor the Stoic nothing more is known. Of the two Athenodori, the earlier, known as Cordylion, died in the house of Cato Uticensis; the later, who was also known as 'the Kananite,' from a village (Kanna) in Cilicia, was the friend and adviser of Augustus. In his old age he was given power to restore civil order in his native city.

St. Paul then, coming from Tarsus, the home of so many of the Stoics, was not likely to have been a stranger to their way of thinking. In his speech on the Areopagus he seems to have addressed himself more directly to the Stoic part of his audience. He deftly quoted part of a line with which they were familiar, 'His offspring, too, are we,' probably thinking of the Hymn of Cleanthes, though the precise form in which he quotes it comes from the contemporary poet Aratus.* Another point in which the apostle's language is coloured by the presence of Stoic auditors, is in the appeal he makes to their sentiment of cosmopolitanism—'and he made of one every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth,' while the words which follow, 'having determined their appointed seasons, and the bounds of their habitation,' express a conception of fate and providence, which was common ground to the apostle and his hearers.

The constructive era of Greek thought had already passed away before the Stoics appeared upon the scene. Neither they nor the Epicureans extended the bounds of thought, but only emphasized certain aspects in the philosophy of their predecessors. Both schools were intensely practical, and endeavoured to make philosophy a 'life,' as Christianity afterwards announced itself to be. Both also were systems of materialism, and agreed in discarding the abstractions of earlier thought. The Stoics adopted the physical theory of Heraclitus, the Epicureans that of Democritus. With both, however, physics were a mere scaffolding for ethics; but the Stoics paid great attention to logic, while the Epicureans neglected this department of philosophy. What was special to the Stoics was the exalted tone of their morality, their grim earnestness, and their devout submission to the Divine will. Of the Stoic physics we seem to have a trace in the doctrine of the destruction of the world by fire (2 P $3^{5-7.\ 10-13}$). The idea of the soul going up to heaven at death is not alien to their philosophy. For death with them was the resolution of man's compound nature into its elements, and the soul, whose nature was fire (cf. Verg. Æn. vi. 730, 'igneus est ollis vigor et cælestis origo'), struggled upward to its native home in the empyrean. Without dogmatizing on disputed ground, it is at least interesting to compare Ec 12^7 'And the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit return unto God who gave it,' with what Velleius Paterculus (ii. 123), echoing the Stoic doctrine, says of the death of Augustus: 'in sua resolutus initia . . . animam cælestem cælo reddidit.'

The doctrine of the Logos may not have come exclusively from Greek sources; but at all events Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 9) admits that Zeno had anticipated the Christian teaching: 'Hunc sermonem divinum ne philosophi quidem ignoraverunt: siquidem Zenon rerum naturæ dispositorem atque opificem universitatis λόγον prædicat, quem et fatum et necessitatem rerum et deum et animum Jovis nuncupat.' The words δι' ὃν τὰ πάντα, applied to God in He 2^{10}, are suggestive of the Stoic explanation of the name of the Supreme Being: 'Δία μὲν γάρ φασι, δι' ὃν τὰ πάντα,' while the words in St. Paul's sermon, 'in him we live,' recall the explanation offered of the other form of the name: 'Ζῆνα δὲ καλοῦσι, παρ' ὅσον τοῦ ζῆν αἴτιός ἐστιν.'

The problem of fate and freewill, which was hardly raised by the Socratic philosophers, was much discussed by the Stoics. In this also they display an affinity with Semitic speculation. For this was the philosophical problem which divided the Jewish schools, as it has since divided the Christian Churches. The Pharisees leaned strongly to predestination, as we can see from the sentiments of Gamaliel (Ac 5^{39}) and from those of St. Paul himself. Josephus, himself a Pharisee, says that that sect was very like the sect of the Stoics among the Greeks (Vita, ch. ii.).

Another point of resemblance, which justifies this remark of Josephus, is the Stoic belief in a future life. It is true they did not regard the souls even of good men as being absolutely immortal. But they held that these were destined to last until the next re-absorption of all things into the Divine nature. God was defined by the Stoics as 'an individual made up of all being, incorruptible and ungenerated, the fashioner of the ordered frame of the universe, who at certain periods of time absorbs all being into himself, and again generates it from himself' (Diog. Laert. vii. § 137).

* It may be remarked that the language of He 4^{12} is strongly suggestive of the Hymn of Cleanthes (lines 9–13), which might be used as an argument, so far as it goes, in favour of the Pauline authorship of that Epistle.

Instead of drawing out further, as might be done, the parallelism between Stoicism and Christianity, we will here close with a caution. It does not follow that, because we find a Stoic notion in the Bible, it has got into it from the Stoics. It may originally have come to the Stoics from the Jews, or both may have borrowed from the same source.

LITERATURE.—The chief ancient authorities for a knowledge of the Stoics are Cicero's philosophical works, especially de Finibus, Book iii.; Diogenes Laertius, Book vii.; Stobæus, Ecl. Eth. pp. 166–184; Plutarch, de Repugnantiis Stoicis, and de Placitis Philosophorum; Sextus Empiricus, adversus Mathematicos. Among modern works may be mentioned Zeller, Stoics and Epicureans; Sir Alexander Grant, The Ethics of Aristotle, Essay vi.; Lightfoot, Philippians, Excursus on 'St. Paul and Seneca.'

STOMACH.—In modern Eng. 'stomach' is confined to its literal meaning of the receptacle for food in the body. In this sense it occurs in 1 Ti 5^{23} 'Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake' (διὰ τὸν στόμαχον). But in older Eng. the word was used figuratively, as we use 'heart' or 'spirit,' and expressed either courage or pride.

The transition from the literal to the fig. sense was the easier that 'stomach' was freely used for appetite. Thus Fuller, Holy State, 185, 'A rich man told a poore man that he walked to get a stomach for his meat: And I, said the poore man, walk to get meat for my stomach.' The sense of courage ('heart') is seen in Ridley, Works, 359, 'Blessed be God, which was and is the giver of that and all godly strength and stomach in the time of adversity'; and in Coverdale's tr. of Jos 2^{11} 'And sence we herde therof, oure hert hath failed us, nether is there a good stomacke more in eny man, by the reason of youre commynge.' Cov. even applies the word to Jehovah in Is 42^{13} 'The LORDE shal come forth as a gyaunte, and take a stomacke to him like a fresh man of warre.' The sense of pride is seen in Knox, Works, iii. 187, 'And ye haif a Quene, a woman of a stout stomak, more styffe in opinioun nor flexibill to the veritie'; Golding, Calvin's Job, 574, 'Therefore when wee come to heare a sermon, let us not carie such a loftie stomacke with us, as to checke agaynst God when we be reproved for our sinnes'; and Fuller, Holy Warre, 99, 'A man whose stomach was as high as his birth.' This is the meaning of the word in Ps 101^{7}, Pr. Bk. 'a proud look and high stomach,' where Earle quotes in illustration Katharine's character of Wolsey from Henry VIII. IV. ii. 33—

'He was a man
Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking
Himself with princes.'

The word occurs figuratively in the sense of courage in 2 Mac 7^{21} 'Stirring up her womanish thoughts with a manly stomach' (ἄρσενι θυμῷ, RV 'with manly passion'). J. HASTINGS.

STOMACHER is the EV tr. of פְּתִיגִיל, Is 3^{24} (only). The derivation of the Hebrew term is very uncertain. There is no probability in the supposition that it represents two words, פְּתִי 'width' and גִּיל 'mantle,' although the sense thus obtained would yield an effective contrast with the following מַחֲגֹרֶת שָׂק: 'instead of a flowing mantle, a girding of sackcloth' (Cheyne, PB, cf. Dillm.-Kittel, Jes. ad loc.). Others think that the antithesis suggests that פְּתִיגִיל is a kind of ornamental girdle (see art. DRESS, vol. i. p. 628^{a}). The LXX tr. by χιτὼν μεσοπόρφυρος, Aq. ζώνη ἀγαλλιάσεως, Symm. στηθοδεσμίς, Vulg. facia pectoralis.

The Eng. word 'stomacher' was applied to that part of a woman's dress which covered the breast and the pit of the stomach. It was usually much ornamented, and looked upon as an evidence of wealth. Coverdale translates Is 47^{2} (of the degraded daughter of Babylon), 'Thou shalt bringe forth the querne, and grynede meel, put downe thy stomacher, make bare thy knees, and shalt wade thorow the water ryvers.' STONE.—1. A fragment of rock of any size from a pebble up to the most massive block. In AV 'stone' usually stands for אֶבֶן or λίθος; but it also occurs as the tr. of סֶלַע (Ps 137^{9} 141^{6}, RV 'rock'), of צֹר (Ex 4^{25}, AV 'sharp stone,' RV 'flint,' Job 22^{24}), of חֶרֶשׂ (Job 41^{30}, RV 'potsherd'), of צְרוֹר (2 S 17^{13}, Am 9^{9}, AVm), of πέτρος (2 Mac 1^{16} 4^{41}, Jn 1^{42}), and of ψῆφος (Rev 2^{17}). 'Gravel stones' is for חָצָץ (La 3^{16}); 'corner stones' for זָוִיּוֹת (Ps 144^{12}); 'chief corner stone' for ἀκρογωνιαῖος (Eph 2^{20}, 1 P 2^{6}); 'a heap of stones' for מַרְגֵּמָה (Pr 26^{8} RV); and 'hewn stone' for גָּזִית (Ex 20^{25}, 1 K 5^{17} 6^{36} $7^{9.\,11.\,12}$, Is 9^{10}, La 3^{9}, Ezk 40^{42}, Am 5^{11}). Conversely אֶבֶן appears in EV as 'weight' (Lv 19^{36}, Dt $25^{13.\,15}$, 2 S 14^{26}, Pr 11^{1} 16^{11} $20^{10.\,23}$, Mic 6^{11}, Zec 5^{8}) and as 'plummet' (Is 34^{11} RV).

The stones referred to in Scripture may be classified according to their size and the uses to which they were put. Among the smaller stones mentioned are 'gravel stones' (La 3^{16}) and 'stones of the brook' (1 S 17^{40}, Job 22^{24}). The smoothness of the latter is noted in 1 S 17^{40}, and the effect of water in wearing them is alluded to in Job 14^{19}. Stones in the soil interfered with its fertility, and it was part of the husbandman's work to gather them out. On the other hand, to scatter stones over the fields was one way of devastating an enemy's country (2 K $3^{19.\,25}$). These are probably the opposite circumstances referred to in Ec 3^{5}. The 'stony ground' (τὰ πετρώδη, τὸ πετρῶδες) of Mt $13^{5.\,20}$ ‖ is not soil full of stones, but shallow soil with rock near the surface (RV 'rocky'). Stones were convenient missiles for the hand (Ex 21^{18}, 2 S $16^{6.\,13}$, Sir 22^{20} 27^{25}, 2 Mac 1^{16} 4^{41}, Mk 12^{4}), for the sling (Jg 20^{16}, 1 S $17^{40.\,49.\,50}$, 1 Ch 12^{2}, 2 Ch 26^{14}, Pr 26^{8}, Jth 6^{12}, Sir 47^{4}), or for larger military engines (2 Ch 26^{15}, 1 Mac 6^{51}). Josephus (BJ III. vii. 23, v. vi. 3) gives an account of these engines as used in the sieges of Jotapata and Jerusalem. Stone projectiles roughly spherical, and 13 or 14 in. in diameter, have been found at Baniâs (Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 524). A stonecast was a rough measure of distance (Lk 22^{41}). Stone-throwing might prove fatal (Nu $35^{17.\,23}$), and was a common method by which death-sentences were executed, and in which popular violence found vent. The verbs סָקַל, רָגַם, λιθάζω, καταλιθάζω, λιθοβολέω, are used to denote this practice. A heap of stones was sometimes raised over the bodies of those who were thus put to death (Jos $7^{25.\,26}$), or who were otherwise executed (Jos 8^{29}) or slain (2 S 18^{17}). This is perhaps the fate referred to in Is 14^{19}, La 3^{53}. Such heaps were also placed over ordinary tombs for protection or to mark the spot (see BURIAL, vol. i. p. 333^{a}). The density of stones (Pr 27^{3}) made them convenient for use as weights (see list of passages above) and plummets (Is 34^{11}), and also for attaching to anything to be sunk in water, like Jeremiah's book of prophecy (Jer 51^{63}), or the body of a criminal to be executed by drowning (Mt 18^{6} ‖). Sharp stones were used as knives (Ex 4^{25}, Mk 5^{5}). In the former case the reference is probably to artificially fashioned knives of flint such as have been recently found among the prehistoric remains of Egypt (see FLINT, vol. ii. p. 15; KNIFE, vol. iii. p. 8; and Petrie and Quibell, Naquada and Ballas, pp. 55–59). Vessels of stone are mentioned in Ex 7^{19}, Jn 2^{6}. In connexion with the former passage, see Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ii. 8; Petrie and Quibell, Naquada and Ballas, p. 10. Small stones or pebbles were originally used in voting, and the counters of metal, etc., afterwards employed were still called ψῆφοι (4 Mac 15^{26}, Ac 26^{10}).

Among larger stones, besides mill-stones (for which see MILL, vol. iii. p. 369), may be noticed those which covered wells (Gn 29$^{2.3.8.10}$) and deposits of treasure (Sir 29^{10}), and those which closed the mouths of caves (Jos 10$^{18.27}$), pits used as dens (Dn 6^{17}), and rock-hewn tombs (Mt 27^{60}). The entrances of tombs were closed sometimes by stone doors hung on stone pivots, and sometimes by circular slabs like millstones set on edge, which rolled in grooves athwart the openings, the grooves being sloped so as to make the stone easy to roll to the door and difficult to roll away again. The entrance to the Tombs of the Kings at Jerusalem has both kinds of stone doors (see Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 406–7, and SWP Special Papers, p. 280 ff.). Og's 'bedstead of iron' (Dt 3^{11}) was probably a sarcophagus of basalt, such as have been found in abundance E. of the Jordan (see Driver, Deut. in loc.).

Certain large stones served as landmarks, such as the great stone in Gibeon (2 S 20^{8}), the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben (Jos 15^{6} 18^{17}), the stone of Zoheleth (1 K 1^{9}), the stone Ezel (1 S 20^{19} MT). Other large stones had a more or less sacred character. Rude stone monuments of religious origin are still plentiful E. of the Jordan, though they are not found W. of it except in Galilee. They have been divided into four classes, menhirs or pillars, dolmens or stone tables, cairns or stone heaps, and cromlechs or stone circles. Examples of the first class are the 'pillar' which Jacob set up at Bethel and anointed (Gn 28^{18} 35^{14}), and that which he erected at Mizpah (Gn 31^{45}). In early Semitic religion these pillars were associated with the presence of a deity, and were smeared with blood or oil as an act of worship (see PILLAR, vol. iii. pp. 879–81). In some cases a rude stone pillar seems to have served simply as a memorial (Jos 24$^{26.27}$, 1 S 7^{12}) or as a monument to the dead (cf. 1 Mac 13^{27}, 2 K 23^{17} RV, Ezk 39^{15}). While at first the sacred stone representing the deity served also as an altar, the latter came to be distinct at a very early period. It might be a natural rock (Jg 6$^{20.21}$ 13^{19}, 1 S 6^{14} 14^{33}) or artificially built of stone. In the latter case the stones were unhewn (Ex 20^{25}, Dt 27$^{5.6}$, Jos 8^{31}). Elijah's altar on Carmel was, no doubt, of this kind (1 K 18$^{31\text{ff.}}$). Under the Maccabees the stones of the altar of burnt-offering in the temple were laid aside as defiled and a new altar was built (1 Mac 4$^{46.47}$). Ezekiel's ideal temple was to be provided with hewn stone tables for slaying the sacrifices (Ezk 40^{42}) (see ALTAR, vol. i. pp. 75, 76, and Robertson Smith, RS 184 ff., 214). The narrative in Gn 31 mentions a cairn (גַּל) as well as a pillar at Mizpah. The stones set up by Joshua at Gilgal (Jos 4) were an example of a circle with a memorial significance (Conder, Syrian Stone-lore, 220; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 56 ff., 379, 380). Inscriptions might be placed upon monumental stones (Dt 27$^{4.8}$), on altars (Jos 8^{32}), or on stone tablets such as those on which the Law was engraved. Stone, like wood, was among the commonest materials out of which idolatrous images were made (Jer 2^{27}, Hab 2^{19} etc.). Such images, as well as sacred pillars, were forbidden in Lv 26^{1}.

The most important use of stone was, of course, for building. For this purpose it was regarded as superior to brick (Is 9^{10}), which was substituted for it in Babylonia (Gn 11^{3}). The chief references to stone as a building material are in connexion with the temple. Stone was among the preparatory stores collected by David (1 Ch 22$^{14.15}$ 29^{2}). The foundation of the temple consisted of great costly hewn stones (1 K 5$^{17.18}$ 7^{10}), and the superstructure was also of stone, though covered with wood (1 K 6^{18} 7$^{9.11.12}$). The stones were brought to the site in a prepared state (1 K 6^{7}). Hewn stone is mentioned in connexion with the repairs executed by Joash (2 K 12^{12}) and Josiah (2 K 22^{6}, 2 Ch 34^{11}), and stone was among the materials of the second temple (Hag 2^{15}, Ezr 5^{8} 6^{4}, 1 Es 6$^{9.25}$). The size and splendour of the stones of Herod's temple are referred to in Mt 24$^{1.2}$ ‖. Contrasted with the process of building is that of demolishing (Mic 1^{6}, La 4^{1}). The stones in the ruins of Jerusalem were dear to the exiles (Ps 102^{14}). The opponents of Nehemiah laughed at the idea of rebuilding the city walls with stones from among the rubbish (Neh 4$^{2.3}$).

Some of the great stones in the foundation wall of the temple are visible in the Jews' Wailing Place. Other parts of the wall have been reached by recent excavation, notably at the S.E. corner. The lowest stone at this point is 14 ft. long and 3 ft. 8 in. high, 'squared and polished, with a finely dressed face.' If the present foundation, which rests on the solid rock, be really that of Solomon's temple, then this stone is the 'foundation' or 'chief corner stone' so often referred to in Scripture (Is 28^{16}, Ps 118^{22}, Mt 21^{42} ‖ Ac 4^{11}, 1 P 2^{6}). While the 'head of the corner' is a foundation stone, the 'head stone' (אֶבֶן רֹאשָׁה Zec 4^{7}) is the highest and the last to be placed. Large as the temple stones are, they are small compared with some found in the ruins of Baalbek. Three of these, forming one course, are the largest hewn stones in the world. They are all 13 ft. high and as many thick, and their respective lengths are 64, 63¼, and 63 ft. A still larger stone, 70 ft. long, 14 ft. thick, and 14 ft. high, lies in the adjacent quarry. For methods of transporting such stones, see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 302–10. The remains of quarries are visible in many places in Palestine, and their extent affords a measure of the antiquity of the building sites near them. The greatest quarries at Jerusalem are the caverns under Bezetha, from which a great part of the stone work of the city has been excavated. Traces of the process of working the quarry still remain. The blocks were separated from the rock by cuttings from 3 to 6 in. wide made all round them with some instrument like a pick. The margins of the stones were dressed with toothed chisels (Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 238). In the basaltic rocks of Bashan there are many circular holes 4 or 5 ft. deep, and as great in diameter, from which millstones have been quarried (Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 25).

A few references to stone are of a symbolic character. Jeremiah was directed to hide some great stones in the clay of a brick-kiln at the entrance to Pharaoh's house at Tahpanhes, to be a foundation for the throne of Nebuchadnezzar, which would be set up in that place (Jer 43$^{9.10}$). In Zec 3^{9} a stone with seven eyes (or facets) is set before Joshua the high priest, and an inscription is to be placed upon it. This stone has been variously understood as referring to the foundation stone of the temple, the 'head stone' of Zec 4^{7}, a jewel in the high priest's breastplate, or in Zerubbabel's crown, or the finished temple as a whole (see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, ii. 296). The white stone with a new name written on it (Rev 2^{17}) is likewise an obscure symbol. From the reference in the same verse to the 'hidden manna' the 'white stone' has been connected with the Roman tessera hospitalis—the token divided between two friends who had entered into hospitium, and handed down to their descendants, so as to secure perpetual mutual hospitality; or with the tessera frumentaria—the token in exchange for which a free grant of corn was given to the poorer citizens of Rome. Putting aside the reference to the manna, a possible explanation may be found in the tessera gladiatoria, an oblong token of ivory given to a gladiator when he had passed successfully through a certain number of contests. It had inscribed on it the name of the combatant and that of his trainer, the date of his first victory and the letters SP (spectatus). In Rev 18^{21} the destruction of 'Babylon' is symbolized by an angel casting a great stone into the sea.

The various properties of stone give rise to numerous comparisons. The Egyptians sank in the sea like a stone (Ex 15^{5}, Neh 9^{11}). Fear made the enemies of Israel still as a stone (Ex 15^{16}). Nabal became as a stone before his death (1 S 25^{37}). The heart of leviathan is firm as a stone (Job 41^{24}). The strength of stone is also alluded to in Job 6^{12}. Ice is compared to stone (Job 38^{30}). Other figurative usages are frequent. The deadness and sterility of stone gives point to the Baptist's saying in Mt 3^{9} ||; so with its dumbness (Hab 2^{11}, Lk 19^{40}), and inedibility (Mt 4^{3} 7^{9} ||). Its weight suggests what Jerusalem will be to the nations (Zec 12^{3}), and what wisdom is to the unlearned (Sir 6^{21}). Its hardness supplies a metaphor for hardness of heart (Ezk 11^{19} 36^{26}). As a contrast to this, Ezekiel's figure is combined with an allusion to the inscribed tables of the Law in 2 Co 3^{3}. The new name Πέτρος given to Simon (Jn 1^{42}) denoted the firmness of his character in the future. A slothful man is compared to a 'defiled stone' (Sir 22^{1}). God is called 'the stone of Israel' (Gn 49^{24}). The Messiah's kingdom is represented in Dn 2^{34} as a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which breaks in pieces the composite image symbolizing the kingdoms of this world. Christ uses a similar figure regarding Himself (Mt 21^{44} TR, Lk 20^{18}). Isaiah describes the Deliverer of Judah as a 'foundation' and a 'corner stone.' Christ applies Ps 118^{22} to Himself (Mt 21^{42} ||), and similar applications are found in Ac 4^{11}, 1 P 2^{4-7}. In the latter passage Christ is called a 'living stone,' and Christians are also called 'living stones.' The same ideas of Christ as the corner stone and Christians as forming a building along with Him, appear in Eph 2^{20-22}.

JAMES PATRICK.

STONES, PRECIOUS. — This subject is both obscure and complex, and one on which no help is to be gained by relying on modern traditional results. The only satisfactory way to treat it is as a series of quite independent stages of research:—i. The actual stones known to (a) the ancient Egyptians, (b) the early Greeks, (c) the Roman writers. ii. The equivalence of Hebrew and Greek names. iii. The substances designated by the Greek names. iv. The side-lights on the subject from (a) the Arabic or other versions, (b) the colour arrangement, (c) beliefs about stones, etc.

i. It is obviously useless to attempt to identify gems which were unknown before the Roman age with any of the earlier names, and hence the diamond and the sapphire are outside of the question. It is also quite useless to expect the same distinctions between stones that we now make by chemical and crystallographic classification. Different materials, if of the same appearance, were doubtless classed under the same name, such as beryl and green felspar, or carnelian and fleshy felspar. On the other hand, the same material, under different appearances, would have different names, such as the many different aspects of quartz, in rock-crystal, amethyst, chalcedony, carnelian, red jasper, green jasper, and yellow jasper.

The stones commonly known to the Egyptians for jewellery and engraving are as follows, those not known as engraved being in brackets. These are arranged according to the colours, which would be natural classification, and which shows what is liable to be confounded under a single name. The transparent stones are in italics, according to the varieties actually found. BLACK: [hæmatite], obsidian. BLUE: amethyst, lazuli. GREEN: serpentine, felspar, [beryl], jasper, turquoise. YELLOW: agate, jasper. BROWN: sard, [corundum]. RED: red sard, [garnet], felspar, carnelian, jasper. WHITE: quartz, milky quartz, chalcedony. Two stones that might reasonably be expected in early use, but have never yet been found in Egypt before Greek times, are the onyx or nicolo (known to the Romans as Ægyptilla), and the olivine = peridot (modern chrysolite), from the Red Sea. And the beryl is rare before Græco-Roman times.

The early Greeks, down to Theophrastus, appear to have had much the same series as the Egyptians; but in Roman times, with extended commerce, more of the stones became known which we now class as gems. With these, however, we are not here concerned in OT usage.

ii. The second consideration is the equivalence of the Hebrew and Greek names. For, as we have only a few vague indications of the meanings of the Hebrew names, or connexions of those with other languages, it is really the tradition of the times of the LXX that has to be almost entirely trusted. Of lists of stones there are five to be considered, — The list of the breastplate (Ex 28^{17-20}), that of the king of Tyre (Ezk 28^{13}), the translation of these two lists in the LXX, and the foundations in Rev 21^{19-20}. All these lists are certainly connected, as we shall see by the statement of them.

Several problems meet us here. The LXX must either have found the lists of Ex. and Ezek. alike, or else have altered one into conformity with the other. There is one sign of confusion in the LXX, where silver and gold are interpolated in the midst of the series (marked S and G here); whereas the Heb. in Ezek. has gold at the end (marked G here); so far the Hebrew is the more consistent. On the other hand, it is evident that the list in Ezek. has been written with the list in Ex. in view: the first two names being the same, the 2nd line being the 4th line in Ex., and the 3rd line being 5, 4, 3 of Ex. in inverted order, all show that Ezek. is apparently a corrupted copy of Ex., perhaps changed by the prophet quoting from memory.

But here another difficulty arises: the yāshĕpheh 12 in Ex. cannot but be intended by iaspis 6, while the yāshĕpheh is 6 in Ezekiel. Here LXX agrees with Ezek.; while, in ṣappîr 5 in Ex. and 7 in Ezek., the LXX agrees with Ex. in 5 sappheiros. In another point probably Ex. agrees with LXX; bāreḳeth, the 'flashing' or 'lightning' stone, is probably quartz crystal; and smaragdos, which it parallels in Ex., is also probably quartz, as we shall see further on. On the whole, it seems safest to take Ex. and LXX as equivalent lists; granting a transposition of 12 and 6, probably in the Hebrew.

---

* The Greek forms are kept here to avoid confusion with English names derived from them, which now denote different stones.

iii. Next we come to the third section—the meaning of the Greek names; and for this we must remember that the series should correspond to the stones actually in use in early times, and not to those which may have had those names in Græco-Roman writings. (1) Sardios = 'ōdem, is the 'blood'-coloured stone (Heb.); and as none of the early ones except red jasper can be so described, it seems that this must be intended.

(2) Topazion = piṭdah, is reputed to be the peridot, because of its being described as imported from the Red Sea, as of a greenish-yellow colour, and as the softest of precious stones. The difficulty in this is that no instance is known of peridot in Egyptian work; and this would lead us to look for some similar stone as the earlier representative of piṭdah. The transparent precious serpentine was in use in Egypt, and is of closely the same colour; in fact, of the same composition, but hydrated. This, then, has the best claim to be the original stone, for which the harder olivine, peridot, was later substituted. The Arabic has 'asfar, 'yellow,' which corresponds with peridot.

(3) Smaragdos = bāreḳeth. This is commonly supposed to be emerald; but, as there is beryl also in the list, it is unlikely that a slight variety of purer and less pure colour should give occasion to repeat the same stone. There are two indications that in smaragdos is included rock-crystal. Pliny mentions the shortsighted Nero using an eye-glass of smaragdus; the difficulty of getting emerald free from flaws and large enough for an eye-glass, the depth of colour (for this was not the lighter beryl), and the greater hardness of emerald, all make that stone very unlikely. The colourless rock-crystal is far more probably the material used. And in Rev 4^3 there is described—a rainbow like a smaragdus: now a colourless stone is the only one that can show a rainbow of prismatic colours; and the hexagonal prism of rock-crystal, if one face is not developed (as is often the case), gives a prism of 60°, suitable to show a spectrum. The confusion with emerald seems to have arisen from both stones crystallizing in hexagonal prisms; and, as the emerald varies through the aquamarine to a colourless state, there is no obvious separation between it and quartz crystal. The meaning of bāreḳeth, the 'flashing' or 'lightning' stone, agrees with the brilliancy of rock-crystal. The Arabic has samurod=smaragdus.

(4) Anthrax = nōphekh. The former name is generally agreed to be the carbuncle, which is the dark clear red garnet. Garnet was a favourite stone in Egypt for beads, but is not found engraved, at least not till late times.

(5) Sappheiros=ṣappîr. There can be no doubt of the equivalence of these names; yet they do not mean our sapphire or corundum, as that was quite unknown in early times, and probably too hard to be engraved. Pliny's description of it as opaque and speckled with gold, shows it to have been our lapis-lazuli, which was used and greatly valued in early times.

(6) As we cannot sever the iaspis from the yāshĕpheh, we must assume a corruption in either the Heb. or Greek. The Greek is more probably correct, as the iaspis was certainly opaque, and would well consort with the opaque lazuli. We must restore, then, (6) iaspis=yāshĕpheh. The earliest jaspers mentioned by Greek writers appear to have been green; and a dark green jasper was a favourite stone among early Greek engravers, and used also by Egyptians. This is probably, then, the iaspis.

(7) Ligurion = leshem. The ligurion is a corruption of lyncurion, described as brilliant yellow, and in Greek times apparently identified with the jacinth=zircon. As this is unknown in Egyptian work, probably yellow quartz or agate (R.) was intended by leshem.

(8) Achatēs = shĕbō. This is agreed to be connected with some varieties of modern agates. The black and white banded is said to be probably the variety earliest known as achatēs to the Greeks; but this is little, if at all, known in Egypt until Greek times. From the contrasts of colour in the series a red agate would be the more likely here; but a grey and white is the only closely-banded agate that occurs in Egyptian work. If possible we should expect the carnelian here, as it is a usual stone, and yet does not appear elsewhere in the list.

(9) Amethystos='ahlāmah. There is no question as to this being the modern amethyst, which was frequently used in Egypt at an early date, and well engraved.

(10) Chrysolithos=tarshîsh. This stone among later Greeks is probably the topaz; but, as that was quite unknown in earlier times, some other golden-coloured stone must be intended. As clear yellow quartz is already fixed to the ligurion, that is not in question; nor would a transparent yellow stone be so appropriately termed 'golden' as an opaque one. The bright yellow jasper was finely engraved by the Egyptians of the 18th dynasty and onward, and that may well be the 'golden stone' or chrysolithos.

(11) Beryllion=shōham.—It is generally agreed that this is the modern beryl, the opaque green variety of the emerald; and with this was doubtless confused the green felspar, which is only distinguished in appearance by its brighter cleavage and lustre. As the felspar was far more usual for jewellery than the beryl in early times, it is pretty certain that it was the shōham, afterwards confused with the beryl.

(12) As we have already noticed, the yāshĕpheh has probably changed places in the Hebrew with yahălōm, and therefore (12) onychion = yahălōm seems to be the probable equivalence. This is usually accepted as being the modern onyx; but such a stone in layers was apparently not known to early engravers, the first dated example being of the 26th dynasty. There is, however, no other stone which seems more probable for this name.

It may be as well now to state what stones that were used for early engraving stand outside of the identifications we have arrived at, and appear not to have been used in the breastplate. The following were all wrought in Egypt: obsidian, black jasper, hæmatite, fawn-coloured chert, milky quartz, chalcedony, and turquoise. Thus no striking or important stone is omitted from the list of Ex. except turquoise, which was mainly used before 4000 B.C., and in late times. But we have in several cases put down two stones to one name, where they were such as were likely to have been confounded in one class together.

iv. We now turn to the question of colour. The breastplate would apparently have stood thus—

3 White quartz	2 Yellow serpentine	1 Red jasper
6 Green jasper	5 Blue lazuli	4 Red garnet
9 Purple amethyst	8 Red carnelian	7 Yellow agate
12 White and black onyx	11 Green felspar	10 Yellow jasper

Here there is good contrast maintained except in the right column, where there are two reds together and two yellows; but none of these are in serious doubt, and if any change is suggested it would be by transposing two of these. The first entry seems well fixed in the lists; and the fourth cannot change with the seventh without bringing red garnet and carnelian together. If, however, the fourth and tenth interchanged, then the opaque yellow jasper would be next to the opaque lazuli and in line with opaque green jasper, which would be harmonious. Should this be accepted, then the red garnet, anthrax, would be tarshîsh (R.); and the yellow jasper, chrysolithos, would be nōphekh.

There now remains the question of the relation of the stones in Rev. to those in the OT. They have evidently some connexion; but sometimes in the object order, sometimes in the verbal order, the Heb. reckoning running contrary to Greek. Thus there is—

Ex. LXX	6 Iaspis	5 Sappheiros
Rev.	1 Iaspis	2 Sappheiros
Ex.	3 Smaragdos	2 Topazion	1 Sardion
Rev.	4 Smaragdos	5 Sardonyx	6 Sardion
Ex.	10 Chrysolithos	11 Beryllion	12 Onychion
Rev.	7 Chrysolithos	8 Beryllos	9 Topazion
Ex.	7 Ligurion	8 Achatēs	9 Amethystos
Rev.	10 Chrysoprasos	11 Hyakinthos	12 Amethystos

Here topazion and sardonyx appear to have changed places; as, if so, the topazion would agree in both, and the onychion compare with the sardonyx. The chrysoprasos may well be a later name of the ligurion. There is, in any case, a strong influence of the LXX lists on the Rev. list; but yet it seems much like the apparent relation by memory of the Ezek. list with the Ex. list in the Hebrew.

A few stones occur in Rev. that are not in LXX. (3) Chalkedōn was a green stone according to Pliny, from the copper mines near Chalcedon. As it was only found in very small pieces, the suggestion that it was dioptase (silicate of copper) seems not unlikely, as that is in small crystals. (5) Sardonyx is doubtless the red and white onyx. (7) Chrysolithos in the Roman age was the present topaz; while (9) topazion was the present chrysolite=peridot. (10) Chrysoprasos was probably the green chalcedony, or the plasma. (11) Hyakinthos was the present sapphire, according to the account of it by Solinus. Of these stones in Rev. there is far less doubt than of those in OT, as the writers on gems are nearly contemporary with Rev., and describe the gems in detail.

The shāmîr of Ezk 3^{9} 'harder than flint' is evidently connected with the Egyptian asmer and the Greek smiris, both of which mean corundum or emery. The hardness of that stone agreeing with the description in Ezek., leaves no doubt that it is the shāmîr.

Finally, we may here summarize the results—

Heb.	Greek (LXX).	Early.	Late.
Ōdem	Sardion	Red jasper	Sard

The lists of stones anciently used in pre-Greek times are from the writer's own observation. For the greater part of the information on Greek names and gems, King's Antique Gems has been the source here used. But for corroborations and modifications of the general views, the results of Prof. Ridgeway's private studies have been most generously communicated, especially in points marked (R.); and it must be remembered that the details of the reasons for some of the identifications cannot be fully stated or discussed in a brief outline like the present.

See, further, the separate artt. on the EV names of the precious stones mentioned in the Bible.

STONING.—See Crimes and Punishments, vol. i. p. 527^{a}.

STONY.—1. In the Preface to AV the word 'stony' is used with the meaning 'made of stone': 'Although they build, yet if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stony wall.'* Cf. Shaks. Jul. Cæsar, I. iii. 93, 'Nor stony tower, nor walls of beaten brass.' 2. In Mt $13^{5.20}$, Mk $4^{5.16}$ 'stony' means 'rocky' (τὰ πετρώδη, AV 'stony places,' RV 'rocky places'). This is the meaning also in Ps 141^{6} 'When their judges are overthrown in stony places' (בִּידֵי סֶלַע, RV 'by the sides of the rock'). Cf. Raleigh, Guiana, 69, 'The maine banks being for the most part stonie and high.' So 'stone' is used for 'rock' in Peres the Ploughmans Crede, 806—

> 'And sythen his blissed body was in a ston byried,
> And descended a-doune to the dark helle';

and by Coverdale in Is 51^{1} 'Take hede unto the stone, wherout ye are hewen, and to the grave wherout ye are digged.' 3. In Ezk 11^{19} 36^{26} and Sir 17^{16} 'stony' means 'hard as stone,' as in Shaks. Merch. of Venice, IV. i. 4—

> 'Thou art come to answer
> A stony adversary.'

STOOL.—1. A chair of honour for a guest, 2 K 4^{10} 'Let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool.' (So RV, though the Heb. is כִּסֵּא, which elsewhere means a royal throne or other seat of state: the LXX gives δίφρος, which is tr^{d} 'stool' in AV of 2 Mac 14^{21}, but in RV 'chair of state').

In older English 'stool' was used freely for any kind of seat, as in Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Prol. 287, 'Spones and stoles, and al swich housbondrye'; Mk 11^{15} Tind. 'the stoles of them that sold doves' (καθέδρας, AV 'seats'); 1 S 1^{9} Cov. 'Eli the prest sat upon a stole by the poste of the temple of the Lorde' (AV 'upon a seat'); Job 26^{9} Cov. 'He holdeth back his stole, that it cannot be seen' (פְּנֵי־כִסֵּה, AV and RV 'the face of his throne'); Jer 17^{25} Cov. 'Then shal there go thorow the gates of this cite, kinges and prynces, that shall syt upon the stole of David' (כִּסֵּא, AV and RV 'throne'); 29^{16} Cov.; 33^{17} Cov. 'David shal never want one, to syt upon the stole of the house of Israel' (עַל־כִּסֵּא, AV and RV 'upon the throne,' which is Coverdale's own tr. of the same Heb. in v.^{21}).

2. Mother's bearing stool (but see Holzinger in loc., and Expos. Times, xii. 165), Ex 1^{16} 'upon the stools,' RV 'upon the birthstool' (Heb. עַל־הָאָבְנָיִם, found only in dual, its only other occurrence being Jer 18^{3}, where it describes the potter's wheel, 'two discs revolving one above the other'; cf. vol. iii. p. 367^{a}).

STORAX.—See Myrrh, Poplar, Stacte.

STORK (חֲסִידָה ḥăsîdāh).—Although one of the commonest and the largest birds of Bible lands, the LXX translators do not seem to have known its name, as they render ḥăsîdāh in the six passages where it occurs by four different words (Lv 11^{19}, Ps 104^{17} ἐρωδιός, Dt 14^{18} πελεκάν, Jer 8^{7}, Job 39^{13} ἀσιδά [transliterated], Zec 5^{9} ἔποψ). There is, however, no doubt as to its identity. Two species are found in the Holy Land—the black stork, Ciconia nigra, L., and the white stork, C. alba, L. The former is a little smaller than the latter, and less common in the southern and western districts. It is more common towards the north-east. Its colour is black, and it is a shy bird, frequenting the desert, where it lives in flocks. The white stork is 44 in. long and has black wings, but the coverts and rest of its plumage are white. The beak, legs, and skin about the eyes are red; the iris is dark brown.

---

* In the text of Neh 4^{3} it is 'their stone wall,' the form 'their stony wall' being from Coverdale and the Geneva Bible.

Few as are the passages in which the stork is mentioned, we can gather from them some of its chief traits: (1) It was an unclean bird (Lv. and Dt. l.c.); this corresponds to its food, which consists of reptiles, amphibians, and garbage. (2) In the obscure passage (Job 39[13]) there may be a reference to the contrast between the supposed indifference of the ostrich to its young and the proverbial affection of the stork. This, however, is uncertain; see the Comm. ad loc. (3) The stork nests in fir trees (Ps 104[17]). Most storks in Palestine now nest in the tops of ruins. In many places in other countries they build on chimney tops. But there is abundant evidence that they even now sometimes nest in trees in the Holy Land, as well as in other countries. It has been well observed by Tristram that, in ancient times, when there were fewer ruins and more trees, storks must perforce have resorted to the trees and rocks. He says that the black storks still always prefer trees. (4) The migrations of the stork at definite times (Jer 8[7]) did not escape notice. At such times it flies high 'in the heaven.' There are abundant illustrations of the regularity with which these birds return to their old haunts year after year, and repair the very nests which they had before occupied both as offspring and parents. (5) Their power of wing and the sound as of wind made by their flight are alluded to (Zec 5[9]). The spread of their wings is nearly 7 feet.

STORY.—In older Eng. 'story' and 'history' (of which 'story' is an aphetic form) were used interchangeably. We accordingly find 'history' applied to romance, and 'story' to continued historical narrative. In Pref. to AV the translators even use the word 'story' of history in general, 'This will easily be granted by as many as know storie, or have any experience.' The word 'story' occurs in AV (outside the Apocr.) only in 2 Ch 13[22] 24[27], for which see art. COMMENTARY in vol. i. p. 459^{b}. In the Apocr. it is used as the tr. of ἱστορία in 2 Mac 2[24. 30. 32], of διήγησις in 2[32], and of σύνταξις in 15[38. 39], and in 1 Es 1[33] ἡ βίβλος τῶν ἱστορουμένων περὶ τῶν βασιλέων τῆς Ἰουδαίας is tr^{d} 'the book of the stories of the kings of Judah.' Cf. Rhemish NT, note on Jn 5[2] 'The force of divers waters in the world is justly attributed by our forefathers and good stories to the prayers and presence of Saincts, which profane incredulous men referre onely to nature.' Tindale says (Expos. 201) 'We believe not only with story faith, as men believe old chronicles.'

Storywriter, for 'historian' (i.e. chronicler), occurs in 1 Es 2[17] (ὁ γραμματεύς; RVm 'recorder'), and 2[25] (ὁ γράφων τὰ προσπίπτοντα); in the latter verse γραμματεύς is tr^{d} 'scribe.'

STOUT, STOUTNESS.—The modern meaning of the Eng. word 'stout,' viz. solid, substantial (and then corpulent), suggests a connexion with Lat. stolidus and the root sto, to stand; but the word is of Low Germ. origin (coming to us through the French), and in its earliest use signified 'brave,' 'bold,' 'impetuous.'

In AV the meaning is bold in Job 4[11], Dn 7[20], and presumptuous in Is 10[12], Mal 3[13]. Stouthearted occurs in Ps 76[5], Is 46[12] with the former meaning (Heb. אַבִּירֵי לֵב). The subst. stoutness is found in Is 9[9], also with the meaning of boldness, as in Golding, Calvin's Job, 570, 'For what is the cause that oftentymes wee dare not undertake a good quarell, but for that we have not the stoutnesse and skill too resist so stedfastly as were requisite?'

J. HASTINGS.

STRAIT.—The Eng. words 'strait' and 'strict' are doublets, the latter coming directly from Lat. strictus,* ptcp. of stringere, to draw tight; the former through the Old Fr. estreit or estrait (mod. étroit).† 'Strait' is an adj., an adv., a subst., and a verb.

As an adj. 'strait' means in AV either lit. narrow, confined, or fig. strict, rigorous.

1. Narrow, confined: e.g. 2 K 6[1] 'The place where we dwell with thee is too strait for us' (צַר מִמֶּנּוּ, LXX στενὸς ἀφ' ἡμῶν); Mt 7[13. 14] 'Enter ye in at the strait gate . . . because strait is the gate' (στενός).

2. Strict, rigorous.—The transition from the lit. to the fig. sense is seen in 2 Es 7[14. 18] bis, thus 7[18] 'The righteous shall suffer strait things, and hope for wide (ferent angusta sperantes spatiosa); for they that have done wickedly have suffered the strait things, and yet shall not see the wide.' Then the fig. sense appears in 7[21] 'God hath given strait commandment' (mandans mandavit; RV 'straitly commanded').

As an adv. 'strait' means closely, narrowly. It occurs in 1 Es 5[72] 'The heathen . . . holding them strait' (πολιορκοῦντες, RVm 'besieging them'); and 1 Mac 13[49].

As a subst.: e.g. La 1[3] 'All her persecutors overtook her between the straits' (בֵּין הַמְּצָרִים, RV 'within the straits').

As a verb 'strait' occurs only in Sus [22] 'I am straited on every side,' where mod. editions give 'straitened' (στενά μοι πάντοθεν).

The verb straiten is used both literally and figuratively.

1. Literally it means (1) to shorten or narrow, e.g. Job 37[10] 'The breadth of the waters is straitened' (בְּמוּצָק, lit. 'in narrowness,' i.e. 'in a narrow channel,' RVm 'congealed').

2. Figuratively, 'straiten' means narrow (opp. 'enlarge') or confine, and so hamper: Job 12[23] 'He enlargeth the nations and straiteneth them again' (Heb. as RV 'bringeth them in,' RVm 'leadeth them away'), 18[7], Pr 4[12] (both of the straitening of steps—'Widening of the steps is a usual Oriental figure for the bold and free movements of one in prosperity, as straitening of them is for the constrained and timid action of one in adversity'—Davidson on Job 18[7]).

The adv. straitly means either (1) closely, Jos 6[1] 'Jericho was straitly shut up' (סֹגֶרֶת וּמְסֻגֶּרֶת, RV 'shut the gates, and was shut in'); Wis 17[16] 'was straitly kept' (ἐφρουρεῖτο, RV 'was kept in ward'); Sir 26[10] 'keep her in straitly' (στερέωσον φυλακήν, RV 'keep strict watch'): or (2) strictly, as Ac 4[17] 'Let us straitly threaten them' (TR ἀπειλῇ ἀπειλησώμεθα; edd. omit ἀπειλῇ, whence RV 'let us threaten them').

Straitness.—Dt 28[53] 'In the siege and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee' (RV 'shall straiten thee'), so vv.[55. 57], Jer 19[9]. The word also occurs in Job 36[16] opposed to 'a broad place,' and 2 Mac 12[21] (στενότης). Cf. Is 58[3] Cov. 'Wherfore fast we (saye they) and thou seist it not? we put our lives to straitnesse, and thou regardest it not?'

J. HASTINGS.

STRANGE, STRANGER.—Both these words have shades of meaning in AV which are now almost obsolete, and they are also used to represent various Heb. terms, whose significations are materially distinct. On the other hand, the word 'strange' has a connotation in modern English which it never possesses in the OT, and very rarely in the NT. Hence in many passages considerable confusion, which might have been obviated by a change of rendering in the RV, is produced in the mind of the English reader.

---

* Chaucer uses the ptcp. in its lit. sense, 'drawn,' applying it to a sword: Nonne Preestes Tale, 537—

'Pirrus with his streite swerd
When he hadde hent king Priam by the berd,
And slayn him.'

† 'Straight' is a distinct word, from Anglo-Sax. streht, ptcp. of streccan, to stretch.

'Strange' (Old Fr. estrange, Lat. extraneus) and 'stranger' mean in a great many instances simply 'foreign'* [a word unknown to AV except in 1 Mac 15^{3}, 2 Mac 10^{24}; but introduced by RV in Zeph 1^{8}, Ac 26^{11} in place of AV 'strange'] and 'foreigner' (AV only Ex 12^{45} [wrongly for 'sojourner,' תּוֹשָׁב], Dt 15^{3}, Ob ^{11}, Eph 2^{19} [wrongly for 'sojourner,' πάροικος]; but introduced by RV in Lv 22^{25}, Dt 17^{15} 23^{20} 29^{22}, by Amer. RV in Ru 2^{10} and 2 S 15^{19} for AV 'stranger,' and by RV in Dt 14^{21} for AV 'alien'). It would conduce to clearness if, in the great majority of instances where (as in all the above OT passages except Ex 12^{45} as noted) derivatives of the root נכר are employed, the renderings 'foreign' and 'foreigner' were adopted. Thus we should have 'foreigner(s)' for בֶּן־(ה)נֵּכָר (lit. 'son of foreignness') or בְּנֵי (ה)נ' in Gn 17^{12} (defined by the ‖ 'not of thy seed') ^{27}, Ex 12^{43} [all P], Lv 22^{25} [H], 2 S 22$^{45.\,46}$=Ps 18$^{45.\,46}$, Ezk 44$^{7.\,9\,bis}$, Neh 9^{2}, Is 56$^{3.\,6}$ 60^{10} 61^{5} 62^{8}, Ps 144$^{7.\,11}$; and 'foreign (not 'strange') god(s)' (אֵל נֵכָר Dt 32^{12}, Mal 2^{11}, Ps 81^{10}; אֱלוֹהַּ נ' Dn 11^{39}; אֱלֹהֵי (ה)נ' Gn 35$^{2.\,4}$, Jos 24$^{20.\,23}$ [all E], Jg 10^{16}, 1 S 7^{3}, Jer 5^{19}, 2 Ch 33^{5}; אֱלֹהֵי נֵכַר־הָאָרֶץ Dt 31^{16}); 'foreign vanities,' i.e. idolatries (הַבְלֵי נ' Jer 8^{19}); 'foreign altars' (מִזְבְּחוֹת נ' 2 Ch 14^{2}); 'foreign soil' (אַדְמַת נ' Ps 137^{4}); 'everything foreign' (כָּל־נ' Neh 13^{30}).

The same rendering would reproduce נָכְרִי in Gn 31^{15} [but here, perhaps, in narrower sense of 'not of one's father's family'], Dt 14^{21} [‖ גֵּר] 15^{3} (cf. אִישׁ נ' 17^{15}) 23^{11} [opp. 'thy brother'] 29^{21} [+ 'who cometh from a far distant land'], Jg 17^{12} (defined by 'who is not of the children of Israel'), Ru 2^{10}, 2 S 15^{19} [‖ גֹּלֶה 'exile'], 1 K 8^{41} [+ 'who is not of thy people'] =2 Ch 6^{32}, v.^{43}=2 Ch 6^{33}, Is 2^{6}, La 5^{2}, Ob ^{11} [both ‖ זָרִים]. So we should have a 'foreign (not 'strange') people' (עַם נָכְרִי Ex 21^{8} [E]), 'foreign apparel' (מַלְבּוּשׁ נ' Zeph 1^{8}), 'foreign land' (אֶרֶץ נָכְרִיָּה Ex 2^{22} [J] 18^{3} [E]); note esp. נָשִׁים נָכְרִיּוֹת of 'strange (i.e. foreign [non-Isr.]) wives' (1 K 11$^{1.\,8}$, Ezr 10$^{2.\,10.\,11.\,14.\,17.\,18.\,44}$, Neh 13$^{21.\,27}$). A 'strange woman' (נָכְרִיָּה) is a techn. term in Proverbs for a harlot (perhaps because in Israel harlots were originally chiefly foreigners): Pr 2^{16} 7^{5} 5^{20} [all ‖ זָרָה (אִשָּׁה)] 6^{24} [‖ אֵשֶׁת רָע] 23^{27} [‖ זוֹנָה].

The word זָר, which is also frequently rendered 'stranger' in AV, can in some of its usages hardly be distinguished in sense from נָכְרִי (see art. FOREIGNER), but, if a distinctive Eng. term be desired, we would suggest 'alien' (used in AV in Ex 18^{3} [wrongly for 'sojourner,' gēr], Dt 14^{21}, Job 19^{15}, Ps 69$^{8\,(9)}$, La 5^{2} [all נָכְרִי], Is 61^{5} [בְּנֵי נֵכָר], He 11^{34} [ἀλλότριος], Eph 2^{12} [ἀπηλλωτριωμένοι ‖ ξένοι]; and introduced by RV in Pr 5^{10} [זָר], Ezk 44^{7} [בֶּן־נֵכָר], and by Amer. RV in Ps 144$^{7.\,11}$ [בְּנֵי נֵכָר]).

Zār may denote 'alien' or 'strange' in a narrower or a wider sense; (a) strange to a person: Job 19^{27} 'and mine eyes shall behold, and not another' (m. 'as a stranger'), a passage of doubtful meaning; Pr 14^{10} 'The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy'; 27^{2} 'Let another man praise thee . . . a stranger . . .'; cf. the 'alien woman' (אִשָּׁה זָרָה) of Pr 2^{16} 5$^{3.\,20}$ 7^{5} 22^{14} 23^{33} [several times ‖ נָכְרִיָּה, see above]. (b) Strange to a family, i.e. belonging to another household: Dt 25^{5}, 1 K 3^{18}, Job 19^{15}, Ps 109^{11}, Pr 5$^{10.\,17}$ 6^{1} 11^{15} 20^{15} 27^{13}; fig. of another household than God's, Hos 5^{7}; esp. of another family than the priests (Ex 29^{33} 30^{33}, Nu 3$^{10.\,38}$ 17^{5} [Eng. 16^{40}] 18^{7} [all P], Lv 22$^{10.\,12.\,13}$ [all H]), or of another tribe than Levi (Nu 1^{51} 18^{4} [both P]). (c) Strange to a land, i.e. foreign; so freq. plur. זָרִים 'foreigners,' 'aliens' (often with the implication of hostility): Hos 7^{9} 8^{7}, Is 1$^{7\,bis}$ 25$^{2.\,5}$ 29^{5} 61^{5}, Jer 5^{19} 30^{8} 51$^{2.\,51}$, La 5^{2}, Ezk 7^{21} 11^{9} 16^{32} 28$^{7.\,10}$ 30^{12} 31^{12}, Jl 4 (3) ^{17}, Ob ^{11}, Job 15^{19}, Ps 54$^{5\,(3)}$; note esp. the phrases a 'strange god' (אֵל זָר Ps 44$^{21\,(20)}$ 81$^{10\,(9)}$, Is 43^{12} [זָר alone, cf. זָרִים 'strange ones' in Dt 32^{16} and in Jer 2^{25} 3^{13}]), 'strange (i.e. foreign) waters' (2 K 19^{24}, Jer 18^{14}), 'strange slips' (זְמֹרַת זָר, lit. 'vine-slip of an alien,' Is 17^{10}); God's tôrah is counted as alien (כְּמוֹ־זָר נֶחְשָׁבוּ Hos 8^{12}); 'his work is alien' (Is 28^{21}, see below). (d) Strange to the Law: 'strange incense' (קְטֹרֶת זָרָה Ex 30^{9} [P]); 'strange fire' (אֵשׁ זָרָה Lv 10^{1}, Nu 3^{4} 26^{61} [all P]). See NADAB.

The LXX and NT equivalents of 'strange' and 'stranger' in the senses discussed above will be found under art. FOREIGNER.

The idea of foreign naturally leads to that of unfamiliar or unknown: Job 19^{15} 'I am become a foreigner (נָכְרִי) in their eyes'; Ps 69$^{8\,(9)}$ 'I am become estranged (מוּזָר) unto my brethren, and a foreigner (נָכְרִי) to my mother's children'; Ec 6^{2} 'a stranger (נָכְרִי) eateth it'; Is 28^{21} 'foreign (נָכְרִיָּה) is his task, alien (זָר) his act' [cf. the common expression 'this is foreign to one's nature'; or is the meaning here that he acts as if dealing with (foreign) enemies?]; Jer 2^{21} 'a foreign vine' (גֶּפֶן נָכְרִיָּה fig. of degenerate Israel); Pr 20^{16} 27^{13}, where זָר and נָכְרִי are both used of persons unknown to one.*

This last usage approaches, but does not reach, the modern sense of 'strange,' namely peculiar or wonderful, a sense which is pretty near to that represented by ξενίζοντά τινα ('certain strange things') of Ac 17^{20} (cf. ξενίζουσαι συμφοραί, 'strange sufferings' of 2 Mac 9^{6}), ξενίζονται ('they think it strange') of 1 P 4^{4}, and μὴ ξενίζεσθε ('think it not strange') of v.^{12}. Once only is this sense unmistakably conveyed by 'strange' in canonical Scripture, namely in Lk 5^{26} 'We have seen strange things to-day.' The Gr. is παράδοξος, which occurs in the same sense in the Apocrypha in Jth 13^{13}, Wis 5^{2} 19^{5} (cf. v.^{8} θαυμαστός), Sir 43^{25}, 2 Mac 9^{24} [EV in last 'contrary to expectation'].

It is most unfortunate and confusing that AV uses 'stranger' also to represent גֵּר or (thrice, Lv 25$^{6.\,45.\,47}$) the allied term תּוֹשָׁב, words which would be much more happily rendered 'sojourner.' 'Stranger' might suitably be retained as tr^{n} of both נָכְרִי and זָר in the few instances where their specific renderings 'foreign(er)' and 'alien' hardly suit the idiom or the context. The standing and privileges of the gēr (the familiar 'stranger within thy gates') are described fully in art. GER.

STRAW (תֶּבֶן teben, in Is 25^{10} מַתְבֵּן mathbēn; ἄχυρον, palea).—The Hebrew teben is the same as the Arabic tibn, which is the straw of wheat and barley cut by the threshing machine into pieces from ½ to 2 in. long, and more or less split and torn, and mixed with chaff. It is the universal accompaniment to the provender of the domestic herbivorous animals. It is usually mixed with barley, and takes the place of hay. It was mixed with clay in the manufacture of unbaked bricks (see Dillm.-Ryssel on Ex 5^{7}). In one passage (Jer 23^{28}) AV tr. it 'chaff,' RV 'straw' (see CHAFF). In one (Job 21^{18}) AV and RV tr. it 'stubble.' In all the rest (Gn 24$^{25.\,32}$, Ex 5$^{7.\,10.\,11.\,12.\,13.\,16.\,18}$, Jg 19^{19}, 1 K 4^{28}, Job 41^{27}, Is 11^{7} 65^{25}) both VSS tr. it 'straw.' As 'straw' in Western languages refers to whole stalks of the cereals, it might be better to adopt the Arab. tibn, a word now well understood, and which is better than 'cut straw,' as it includes the chaff. There is no reason for the rendering 'stubble' or 'chaff.' Whole straw is seldom used for any purpose in the East.

* The denom. verb נכר occurs in Hithp. in sense of 'make oneself strange,' 'act as a stranger' in Gn 42^{7} (of Joseph's attitude to his brothers) and 1 K 14$^{5.\,6}$ (of Jeroboam's wife feigning herself to be a stranger). In Dt 32^{27} the words פֶּן־יְנַכְּרוּ צָרֵימוֹ (AV 'lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely') appear to mean 'lest . . . should misdeem' (RV), i.e. fail to recognize the truth [lit. 'treat as foreign,' cf. Jer 19^{4}].

STREAM.—See BROOK and RIVER.

STREET.—In Oriental towns the streets seem to owe their form and direction more to accident than design. The houses are built with a view to seclusion and comfort within, and with little care as to what is without. Space is precious, so the streets are narrow; and as no order is enforced in building, they twist and turn among the houses with bewildering effect. They are usually unpaved, and go swiftly to mud in rainy weather. Often, in spite of the industry of innumerable dogs, the refuse cast out is at once offensive and dangerous to health. The upper storeys frequently project over the street, leaving only a narrow opening overhead. This utilizes space, and forms a shelter from heat. In unwalled towns and villages, in obedience to the instinct of defence, the houses are crushed closely together: the openings between them are rather alleys than streets. Schick gives the average width of the streets in Jerusalem as 2·75 m. (ZDPV, 1884, iv. 217); the στενωποί of Josephus (BJ V. viii. 1) would still accurately describe most of them. Where a town is built on a steep slope, as, e.g., in Safed, the roofs of the lower houses sometimes form the street in front of the higher.

Tobit (13^{17}) sees the streets of the future Jerusalem 'paved with beryl, and carbuncle, and stones of Ophir' (cf. Rev 21^{21}). Herod the Great laid a main street in Antioch with 'polished stone' (Jos. Ant. XVI. v. 3). This is the first mention of actual pavement. Agrippa II. consented to the paving of Jerusalem with white stone (ib. XX. ix. 7). The two spacious thoroughfares characteristic of Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman cities, which cut through the city at right angles, were commonly paved with stone. Their remains can be traced in Bozrah, Damascus, etc.; but by far the finest example is found at Shuhba, on the north-western shoulder of Jebel Haurân. In some cases the central roadway was separated from the passage for foot passengers on either side by a stately colonnade. The imposing effect of this arrangement may still be seen among the ruins of Jerash.

Men of the same trade are usually found in one street. In Jer 37^{21} we read of the 'bakers' street.' Josephus (BJ V. viii. 1) says Titus entered through the second wall 'at the place where are the merchants of wool, the braziers and the market for cloth.' So in Cairo and Damascus, for instance, we have the bazaars of the braziers, the silversmiths, the saddlers, etc. The goods are exposed for sale in little shops whose fronts are entirely open. The bazaars are frequently roofed with glass. As strictly business streets, they are shut at sunset, and closely guarded.

חוּץ, 'what is without,' is the Heb. word which properly corresponds to street: רְחוֹב is unhappily often so rendered, esp. in AV (less often in RV), but it really means broad or open place (cf. Driver on Am 5^{16} or Dn 9^{25}). For חוּץ LXX gives ὁδός (Is 5^{25} etc.), ἔξοδος (2 S 1^{20} etc.), δίοδος (Is 7^{34}), πλατεῖα (Ps 18^{42} etc.); for עַל־פְּנֵי־חוּץ (Job 18^{17}), ἐπὶ πρόσωπον ἐξωτέρω, where the sense is obviously 'on the face of the earth' (Davidson, Job, ad loc.). In each case AV and RV render 'street.' This is right when the reference is to the outside of the house. The context determines the meaning. In Ps 144^{13} RV gives correctly 'in our fields.' רְחוֹב is represented in LXX by ὁδός (Is 59^{14}), δίοδος (Dt 13^{16}), ἔπαυλις (Ps 144^{14}); but the usual equivalent is πλατεῖα, in which the root idea is the same. It applies to the open space at the gate (see OPEN PLACE) where assemblies met, cases were tried, and business done; also to any square or open space in the city, as, e.g., before the house of God (Ezk 10^{19}). שׁוּק occurs in Pr 7^{8}, Ec $12^{4.5}$, Ca 3^{2}. In the first LXX renders δίοδος, 'thoroughfare'; in the others ἀγορά. This corresponds with Arab. sûḳ='market,' or 'place of concourse': zuḳaḳ is used for the common passages between the houses.

In NT πλατεῖα and ῥύμη are practically synonymous. Although in Lk 14^{21} we read πλατείας καὶ ῥύμας, possibly here implying distinction in breadth, and rendered 'streets and lanes,' yet the street called Straight in Damascus is called ῥύμη (Ac 9^{11}), and it was one of the finest streets in Syria. For ἀγορά (Mk 6^{56}) RV gives correctly 'market place.'

W. EWING.

STRENGTH OF ISRAEL.—The EV tr. of the Divine title נֵצַח יִשְׂרָאֵל in 1 S 15^{29}. The word נֵצַח occurs parallel with הוֹד, תִּפְאֶרֶת, גְּבוּרָה, גְּדֻלָּה, in a list of Divine attributes in 1 Ch 29^{11}, where it is tr. in EV 'victory' (so LXX νίκη). Driver (Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 98) points out that the proper meaning of the root נצח is splenduit, and argues that the sense of victory is a special and derived one. He adopts for נצח ישראל the tr. 'the Glory of Israel' (similarly, Löhr). H. P. Smith (following the Vulg. triumphator) renders 'the Victor'; Wellh. 'the Faithful one.' The LXX in 1 S 15^{29} has καὶ διαιρεθήσεται Ἰσραὴλ εἰς δύο, which implies that the Gr. translator read or misread יחצה for נצח.

STRIKE, STROKE.—The verb 'to strike' is of Anglo-Sax. origin, coming from strīcan 'to advance swiftly and smoothly' (Middle Eng. striken),* though it is allied to Lat. stringere 'to touch swiftly and lightly, graze.' It is thus properly an intrans. verb, its trans. form being 'stroke' (from Anglo-Sax. stracian, causal of strīcan). But 'strike' early adopted a transitive sense, and the two verbs were not kept distinct.

1. In AV 'strike' occurs transitively in the phrase 'strike through.'

For example: Jg 5^{26} 'When she had pierced and stricken through his temples' (וְחָלְפָה רַקָּתוֹ, RV 'she struck through his temples'; Moore 'she . . . demolishes his temple, lit. makes it vanish,' with a long note justifying the tr.; the Oxf. Heb. Lex. gives 'pierce'; the Heb. vb. is usually intrans. 'pass on or away,' but here and in Job 20^{24} it is trans. 'pass through'); Job 20^{24} 'The bow of steel shall strike him through,' Ps 110^{5}, Pr 7^{23}, La 4^{9}, Hab 3^{14} (RV 'pierce'). It is a strong phrase meaning to crush, and the verb 'strike' has its original meaning of swift motion. Cf. Milton, Reform. in Eng. i. 'The bright and blissful Reformation (by Divine Power) strook through the black and settled Night of Ignorance and Anti-Christian Tyranny.'

2. Through the confusion between 'strike' and 'stroke,' the former came to mean rub smoothly. There are some examples in AV.

Ex 12^{7} 'They shall take of the blood and strike it on the two side-posts' (וְנָתְנוּ, LXX θήσουσιν, RV 'put it'); so 12^{22}; also 2 K 5^{11} 'He will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper' (הֵנִיף יָדוֹ אֶל־הַמָּקוֹם, LXX ἐπιθήσει τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὸν τόπον, RV 'wave his hand over the place'—because it is the same Heb. verb that is used for 'waving' the 'wave-offering' [Ex $29^{24.26}$ etc.], for waving the hand as a signal [Is 13^{2}], and the like—see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. נוף); To 11^{11} 'He strake of the gall on his father's eyes' (προσέπασε τὴν χολὴν ἐπὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς). Cf. Holland, Pliny, ii. 313, 'If the side-posts or doore-cheeks of any house be striked with the said bloud, wheresoever magicians are busie with their feats and juggling casts, they shall take no effect.'

---

* This early meaning is most nearly seen in the phrase stricken in age or in years: Gn 18^{11} 'Now Abraham and Sarah were old and well stricken in age' [בָּאִים בַּיָּמִים, which is always the Heb. whether the Eng. be 'age' (Gn 18^{11} 24^{1}, Jos $23^{1.2}$) or 'years' (Jos 13^{1} bis)]; Lk 1^{7} 'They both were now well stricken in years' (προβεβηκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῶν), 1^{18}. Cf. Robinson's More's Utopia, 29, 'I chaunced to espye this foresayde Peter talkynge with a certayne Straunger, a man well stricken in age.'

3. To 'strike sail' is simply to haul it down in order to ease the ship: Ac 27^{17} 'strake sail,' Gr. χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος, RV 'they lowered the gear'—see Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, p. 105 ff.; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 329 f.; and the notes by Page and by Knowling.

4. To 'strike hands' is to become security, as Pr 17^{18} 'A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend,' so 6^{1} 11$^{15m.}$ 22^{26}, Job 17^{3}, Ad. Est 14^{8}. The expression is Heb. and arises from the action.

5. In the Pref. to AV occurs the rare but intelligible phrase 'strike the stroke'; 'The vintage of Abiezer, that strake the stroke; yet the gleaning of grapes of Ephraim was not to be despised.'

6. The verb 'to strike' is used for the action of God's hand in disease or death, and the result is a 'stroke.'

Strike: 2 S 12^{15} 'The Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick'; 2 Ch 13^{20} 'The Lord struck him, and he died'; Is 1^{5} 'Why should ye be stricken any more?'; 16^{7} 'Surely they are stricken' (אַךְ־נְכָאִים, RV 'utterly stricken'); 53^{4} 'We did esteem him stricken'; 53^{8} 'For the transgressions of my people was he stricken' (נֶגַע לָמוֹ, RVm 'to whom the stroke was due'—see Cheyne's and Skinner's notes). Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 231, 'I can not but feir lyke plagues to stryke the realme of England'; Bunyan, Holy War, 27, 'My brave Lord Innocent fell down dead (with grief, some say; with being poisoned with the striking breath of one Ill-Pause, as say others).'

Stroke: Job 23^{2} 'My stroke is heavier than my groaning' (so RV; Heb. lit. as AVm 'my hand': but it is scarcely possible, says Davidson, that 'my hand' should mean 'the hand of God upon me,' i.e. 'my stroke'; see his note); 36^{18} 'Beware lest he take thee away with his stroke' (פֶּן־יְסִיתְךָ בְשָׂפֶק, RV 'lest thou be led away by thy sufficiency,' RVm 'lest wrath lead thee away into mockery'); Ps 39^{10} 'Remove thy stroke away from me'; Is 14^{6} 'He who smote the people in wrath with a continual stroke'; Ezk 24^{16} 'I take from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke.' The 'stroke'* of OT, as of Is 53$^{4.\ 8}$, was probably leprosy; in modern language a 'stroke' is paralysis. See art. PLAGUE in vol. iii. p. 887^{b}. Cf. Shaks. Rich. II. III. i. 31—

> 'More welcome is the stroke of death to me
> Than Bolingbroke to England.'

Timon of Athens, IV. i. 23—

> 'Plagues, incident to men,
> Your potent and infectious fevers heap
> On Athens, ripe for stroke.'

STUBBLE.—In one place (Job 21^{18}) this is the unfortunate tr^{n} (AV and RV) of teben (see STRAW). In all other places it is the equivalent, in both Eng. VSS, of קַשׁ ḳash. The LXX tr. this word in two places (Job 13^{25} 41^{28}) χόρτος; in eight καλάμη (='stubble' or 'straw'), and in four φρύγανα ('dry sticks' and 'stems,' including stubble, such as are gathered for fuel). This is the current (not classical) meaning of the Arab. cognate ḳash. Once (Is 33^{11}) the expression 'ye shall bring forth stubble' is tr. by LXX αἰσθηθήσεσθε (B), 'ye shall perceive,' or αἰσχυνθήσεσθε (א$^{c.\ a}$), 'ye shall be ashamed,' evidently a different reading. Grain in Bible lands is not cut by the sickle, but pulled up by the roots, or the straw broken off short near them. Consequently there is little stubble in the harvest field, in our sense of the term. When teben was withheld from them, the Israelites had to utilize ḳash for the manufacture of their bricks. Ḳash refers to such remnants of grain stalks, with sticks and stumps of small plants, as are expressed by φρύγανα. Such furnish the pasturage of countless herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. They are liable to catch fire and burn. Most of the allusions to stubble are with reference to such conflagrations (Ex 15^{7}, Is 5^{24}, Jl 2^{5} etc.). It is finally rooted up and carried away by the wind (Job 13^{25}, Is 40^{24}, Jer 13^{24} etc.). One of the most characteristic spectacles witnessed in passing over the breezy plains of Syria, after the harvest is over, is that of the uprooted plants of the large Umbelliferæ, Compositæ, and others, often with a spherical contour, dried to excessive lightness by the hot winds and whirled across the fields, leaping madly over stones and inequalities in the surface, and sometimes taking long flights in the air, then pausing a moment, only to bound off again, until they are caught in some thorn bush, or lost to view beyond the distant horizon. G. E. POST.

STUFF (Lat. stupa, stuppa, the coarse part of flax, tow, Old Fr. estoffe) is used in AV in the sense of goods, esp. household furniture. The Heb. is כְּלִי kĕlî, except in Ex 36^{7} (מְלָאכָה, lit. 'work,' of the furniture of the tabernacle). The Gr. is τὰ σκευάσματα, Jth 15^{11}; or τὰ σκεύη, Jth 16^{19}, Lk 17^{31}. Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Par. i. 7, 'All that ever they had about them of stuffe or furniture, shewed and testifyed povertie and simplicitie'; North, Plutarch, 871, 'This man after he had spent the most part of his father's goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driven to sell his household stuffe, by billes set up on every post.'

In 2 Ch 2$^{\text{heading}}$ 'stuff' means 'materials' for building. Cf. Erasmus, Crede, 39, 'Certayne men . . . have taught that he doth create which doth brynge forthe and make somewhat of nothynge, which belongeth onely to God, and that he doth make which frameth or shapeth ony thing of some matere or stuffe'; Ex 39^{5} Tind. 'And the brodrynge of the girdel that was upon it was of the same stuffe and after the same worke of gold.'

STUMBLING BLOCK.—The word 'block' was formerly used of a lump of wood, stone, or the like, in one's way, and was then applied fig. to any obstruction. Thus Payne, Royal Exch. 38, 'At which common block many weakelings do stumble.' The expression exists now only in the compound 'stumbling-block,' and only the compound is found in AV.

The words so tr^{d} are in Heb.: (1) mikshôl (Lv 19^{14}, Is 57^{14}, Jer 6^{21}, Ezk 3^{20} 7^{19} 14$^{3.\ 4}$ *); and (2) makshêlah (Zeph 1^{3}). The Gr. words are: (1) πρόσκομμα (Sir 39^{24}, Ro 14^{13}, 1 Co 8^{9}); (2) ξύλον προσκόμματος (Sir 31^{7}); and (3) σκάνδαλον (Wis 14^{11}, Sir 7^{6}, Ro 11^{9}, 1 Co 1^{23}, Rev 2^{14}). See OFFENCE, vol. iii. p. 586^{a}.

In the same way stumblingstone is used in Ro 9$^{32.\ 33}$ (λίθος προσκόμματος), for which RV gives 'stone of stumbling,' the AV expression for the same Gr. in 1 P 2^{8}. 'Stone of stumbling' occurs also in Is 8^{14} for 'eben negeph, the latter word meaning lit. 'plague,' 'stroke' (see STRIKE, STROKE).

cêder) is simply to follow; and success (Lat. successus, Old Fr. succes) is that which follows. Thus, Shaks. II Henry VI. II. iv. 2—

> 'After summer evermore succeeds
> Barren winter';

Tymme, Calvin's Genesis, 785, 'This verily was rare honour, to be tolde of the event, and successe to come of fourteene yeares'—in reference to the interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams. In modern Eng. when the reference is to the result of an enterprise, 'succeed' and 'success' denote prosperity, but in older Eng. the nature of the result was not contained in the words themselves, but had to be indicated by an adv. or adjective.

Succeed: In Sir 48^{8} the verb occurs in its simple sense, and the prep. is expressed, 'Who anointedst kings to take revenge, and prophets to succeed after him' (διαδόχους μετ' αὐτόν). We still say 'follow after,' but not 'succeed after.' The nature of the result is expressed by an adv. in To 4^{6} 'If thou deal truly, thy doings shall prosperously succeed to thee' (εὐοδίαι ἔσονται ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις σου). Cf. Shaks. Lear, I. ii. 157, 'The effects he writes of succeed unhappily.'

Success: It was possible in 1611 to use 'success' in a good sense;* it occurs so once in AV, 2 Mac 10^{28} 'For a pledge of their success and victory' (ἔγγυον εὐημερίας καὶ νίκης). So Fuller, Holy State, 258, 'God causeth sometimes the sunne of successe to shine as well on bad as good projects.' But elsewhere in AV an adj. is used, either 'good' (Jos 1^{8}, 1 S 18^{heading}, To 7^{12}, Wis 13^{19}, Sir 20^{9} 38^{13}, 1 Mac 4^{55} 8^{23}, 2 Mac 10^{23} 13^{16}) or 'prosperous' (Sir 43^{26}). Cf. Fuller, Holy State, 109, 'God mouldeth some for a scholemaster's life, undertaking it with desire and delight and discharging it with dexterity and happy successe.' On the other hand, Holy State, 79, 'Sorrow-struck with some sad signe of ill-successe'; and Milton, PR iv. 1—

> 'Perplexed and troubled at his bad success,
> The tempter stood.'

SUCCOTH.—1. (סֻכּוֹת) A place so called according to Gn 33^{17} because of the booths (Heb. ṣukkôth) which Jacob made there for his cattle. In the Heb. text of this verse ṣukkôth occurs three times and is rendered 'Succoth'—'booths'—'Succoth' in AV and RV. The LXX by using σκηναί three times makes clear the identity of Succoth with booths, which has to be explained in the margin of AV and RV, but conveys the impression that the name of Succoth was then Σκηναί. Josephus (Ant. I. xxi. 1) states that the place was so called in his time; but this name would not have been given before the period of Greek supremacy. The Targ. and Syr. preserve the proper name Succoth, but in place of the second ṣukkôth (tr. 'booths' in EV) use מטלן, מטללא, words which in a modified form are employed as equivalents for 'tabernacles' and 'booths' in Lv $23^{34.\,42}$ and other places where reference is made to the Feast of Tabernacles. The Vulgate explains 'Socoth, id est tabernacula,' though 'tentoriis' corresponds to 'booths' in the earlier part of the verse.

The passages where the name occurs are: Gn 33^{17} Σκηναί; Jos 13^{27} B Σοκχωθά, A Σιωχώ, Luc. Σιχώθ; Jg 8^{5-16} B Σοκχώθ, in v.^{16} τῆς πόλεως, A Σοκχώθ; 1 K 7^{46} (v.^{33} in LXX) Σοκχώθ; 2 Ch 4^{17} B Σεχχώθ (?), A Σοκχώθ; Ps 60^{8} B τῶν σκηνῶν, Aq. συσκιασμῶν; Ps 108^{8} ℵ τῶν σκηνωμάτων, ART σκηνῶν.

The passages in Joshua, Judges, Kings, and Chron. refer to a place E. of Jordan. Jos 13^{27} mentions Succoth as in the territory of Sihon, king of Heshbon. In Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites as related in Jg 8, he comes to Succoth after crossing the Jordan. From the references in Ps 60^{6} [$^{\text{Heb. 8}}$] 108^{7} [$^{\text{Heb. 8}}$] to the 'valley of Succoth' nothing definite as to geographical position can be inferred, but a locality east of the Jordan is suitable (note that the LXX in these two passages does not treat Succoth as a proper name). Jerome on Gn 33^{17} (Quæst. Heb. in lib. Gen.) observes with reference to Succoth: 'Est autem usque hodie civitas trans Jordanem hoc vocabulo inter partes Scythopoleos.' Jerome testifies to the survival of the Heb. name, while Josephus (as already remarked) testifies to the existence of its Gr. equivalent. The Talm. Jerus. (Shebiith, ix. 2) gives דרעלה (in some edd. תרעלה) as yet another name for Succoth, and Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 386), followed by Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 183) and G. A. Smith (HGHL, 585), proposes Tell Deir 'Alla, a mound about 1 mile N. of the Jabbok, as the site of the ancient Succoth, and the present equivalent of דרעלה. A place Sâkût, about 10 miles south of Beisan, on the west of the Jordan, has also been proposed as the site; but, though this may meet the requirements of the narrative in Gn 33, a place E. of the Jordan seems necessary for some of the other places where the name is mentioned. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 345) failed to find any trace of the name Succoth east of Jordan.

2. (Σοκχώθ, Ex 12^{37} 13^{20}, Nu $33^{5.\,6}$) The first encampment of the children of Israel on leaving Egypt. The word is a pure Heb. one, signifying 'booths' or 'tents' (see above), but Egyptologists regard it as the equivalent of an Egyptian word Thuku or Thuket, the name of a region of which the capital was Pithom. Brugsch and Naville are agreed on this point, but not as to the situation of Pithom. Ebers proposes a different Egyptian word as the equivalent of Succoth, but agrees with Naville as to the position of the region so designated. Referring to art. EXODUS, vol. i. p. 802, it will be seen that the neighbourhood of the station Ramses, on the railway from Zagazig to Ismailia, corresponds to the ancient Succoth. The children of Israel must have remained here a short time to arrange themselves in order for their future march; and whether the name was used by them in imitation of a similarly sounding Egyptian word, or because they then began to dwell in booths, may be left an open question.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (סֻכּוֹת־בְּנוֹת; B Ῥοχχωθβαινειθεί, A Σοκχωθβενιθεί; Sochoth-benoth).—In 2 K 17^{30} it is said that the colonists from Babylon at Samaria 'made Succoth-benoth,' just as the colonists from Cuth 'made Nergal.' The parallelism between Nergal and Succoth-benoth shows that the latter must be the name of a deity. As Nergal was the patron-god of Cuth, it is reasonable to infer that in Succoth-benoth we have a corrupted form either of Bel-Merodach, the patron-god of Babylon, or of his wife Ẓarpanit. There is consequently a good deal of probability in the conjecture of Rawlinson (Herodotus^{3}, i. p. 654) that we have in it a corruption of the Babylonian Ẓarpanit, 'the silvery one,' which, in accordance with a popular etymology, is generally written Zer-banit, 'the seed-createss,' in the cuneiform texts. The spelling of the name in the LXX lends support to this view; and it is just possible that Rawlinson may be right in suggesting that the biblical Succoth is due to a confusion between zerit, which seems to be a derivative form from zeru (see Haupt, Nimrod-Epos, 8, 35), and zarât, 'tents' or 'booths.' In Am 5^{26} the name of the Babylonian god Sakkut has been transformed into סִכּוּת, if we accept Schrader's explanation of the passage (SK, 1874, pp. 324–332). Perhaps the fact that the images of the Babylonian divinities were carried in procession in 'ships' or arks, assisted in the change of the name. It is even possible that by Succoth the Hebrew writer intended to denote these processional shrines, Benoth (from Benith) being corrupted from Belith or Belit, the classical Beltis, a common title and synonym of Zer-banit.

* On the other hand, it is found in the Rhemish NT in a bad sense: 'As God hath shewed by the successe of all Heretical Colloquies, Synodes, and Assemblies in Germanie, France, Poole, and other places in our daies' (note on Ac 15^{28}).

SUD (Σούδ, Sodi).—The 'river' of Babylon, on which dwelt 'Jechonias, the son of Joakim, king of Judah,' and his fellow-exiles (Bar 1^4). The canal on which Babylon was situated before its destruction by Sennacherib was called the Arakhtu; but the whole of Babylonia was intersected by small canals, each of which had a name, and it is therefore quite possible that in the time of Nebuchadrezzar one of those in the neighbourhood of the capital bore a name which resembled Sud. As, however, the Greek sibilant can represent more than one Semitic letter, it is useless to speculate about the Babylonian form of the name until we know how it was written in Hebrew or Aramaic.

A. H. SAYCE.

SUDDENLY.—The adj. 'sudden' and the adv. 'suddenly' were often used formerly without the element of surprise which belongs to their root (Lat. subitaneus, from subire, 'to come stealthily'), and is always associated with their use in mod. English. Thus Shaks. uses 'sudden' in the sense of soon (Meas. for Meas. II. ii. 83, 'To-morrow! O, that's sudden'); and of hasty (As You Like It, V. ii. 8, 'My sudden wooing, nor her sudden consenting'); and of impetuous (Rich. II. II. i. 35, 'Small showers last long, but sudden storms are short'). So also he uses 'suddenly' in the sense of quickly (Tam. Shrew, ii. 327, 'Was ever match clapped up so suddenly?') or presently (I Henry IV. I. iii. 294, 'When time is ripe, which will be suddenly'). In AV 'suddenly' means speedily in Ps 6^{10} 'Let them return and be ashamed suddenly' (רֶגַע, LXX διὰ τάχους); and in Jer 49^{19} 50^{44}. In 1 Ti 5^{22} 'Lay hands suddenly on no man,' the meaning is hastily (Gr. ταχέως).

SUKKIIM (סֻכִּיִּים; B Τρωγοδύται, A Τρωγλοδύται, Luc. Σουχιείμ).—The name of a tribe mentioned together with Libyans and Cushites as led by Shishak against Judæa (2 Ch 12^3). The passage is not found in the corresponding text of Kings. The LXX rendering 'Troglodytes' was probably suggested by the fact of a place called Suche (Pliny, HN vi. 172) being mentioned among Troglodyte possessions; the same is called by Strabo (iii. 8) 'the fortress of Suchus,' and Suchus, he tells us, is a name for a sacred crocodile (ib. xvii. 1). Several geographers identify this place with the modern Suakin, which, however, may well be an Arabic word (sawākin). The identification of the Sukkiim with the inhabitants of Suakin, though accepted by Forbiger and Dillmann (in Schenkel, i. 288), is therefore very uncertain; nor is the view of Gesenius, that the word should be treated as a Hebrew adjective, 'dwellers in tents,' much more probable.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

SULPHUR.—See BRIMSTONE.

SUN.—The usual word in the OT for the first of the great lights of heaven is שֶׁמֶשׁ, Phœn. שמש, Aram. שִׁמְשָׁא (Dn 6^{14}) and shemsha, Arab. shamsun, Assyr. šamšu (samsu in the name Samsu-iluna, c. 2200 B.C., evidently a West Semitic form). There is considerable uncertainty as to the etymology (for conjectures see Levy, Wörterb. über die Targg. ii. 578 f.). Other words for sun are חַמָּה, lit. 'heat,' or, adj. [?], 'hot' (Job 30^{28}, Ca 6^{10}, Is 24^{23} 30^{26}), and חֶרֶס (Jg 8^{13} 14^{18}, Job 9^7), of doubtful derivation. Both these terms are used poetically, and the latter occurs in the place-name Ir-ha-Heres, 'city of the sun' (Heliopolis), RV 'city of destruction' (see IR-HA-HERES). In Job 31^{26} the word used is אוֹר, marg. 'light.'

The earliest mention of the sun in the Bible is in Gn 1^{14-16} [P], in which, however, none of the above words are used, the luminary being referred to as the greater of the two 'great lights' (mĕ'ôrôth), created to rule the day, the lesser light being to rule the night, and to divide the light from the darkness (v.^{18}). Both of them were placed in the firmament for signs and for seasons, and for days and years (v.^{14}). As the lesser light, the moon was the measurer of time, by her constant and clearly-marked phases; the sun was, by the constancy and regularity of his apparent motion, the real indicator. With those of the lesser light, his eclipses were regarded as signs foretelling events. He indicated the beginning and the end of each day; seasons, both religious and agricultural; regulated the festivals; and determined the commencement and termination of every year, his movements forming, at the same time, the basis of all chronological data.

Naturally, the ideas of the ancient Hebrews concerning the movements of the sun, when tested by modern science, were erroneous. As we, in the language of everyday life, speak of the sun as 'rising' and 'setting,' so they spoke of him as 'going forth' (yāẓā', Gn 19^{23} etc.; zāraḥ, Jg 9^{33}, 2 S 23^4 etc.) and 'entering' (bô', Gn $15^{12.17}$ etc.). From zāraḥ and bô' came the expressions, mizraḥ (shemesh), 'the rising (of the sun),' also 'east'; and mĕbô' (shemesh), 'the setting (of the sun),' also 'west.' The equivalent Assyrian expressions are similar, being ẓît (for âẓît, from âẓû= yāẓā') šamši and êrib šamši, the 'coming forth' and the 'entering of the sun' (cf. for the latter, the Heb. עָרַב 'to become evening'). Poetically, this idea of going forth and entering was extended, and the sun, as well as the moon, was regarded as possessing a habitation (Hab 3^{11}) and a tent or tabernacle (Ps $19^{4.5}$), set for him by God, from which he came forth as a bridegroom from his chamber, rejoicing as a strong man to run his course. This idea seems to be illustrated by the designs on certain of the cylinder-seals of Babylonia, on which a deity, evidently the sun-god, is represented coming forth through the open doors, which the attendants hold back for him, at the same time turning their faces away, in order not to be blinded by his brightness. In connexion with this, it is also worthy of note that the Babylonians speak of the bolts of the high heavens greeting the sun at his setting, and his beloved wife going to meet him. There is hardly any doubt that these poetical similes are based upon the unfailing regularity of the sun's daily course, which, in more southern latitudes, varies less than with us, marking the two cardinal points, and also the division of day and night, with less variation. Such expressions as 'the time when the sun is hot' (1 S 11^9, Neh 7^3) were therefore more precise than they would be in our latitudes. Having risen, and run his fixed path in his might (Jg 5^{31}) until the time of his greatest heat, the sun went down at the hour which, like a living thing, he was supposed to know (Ps 104^{19}).

Like all God's creatures, the sun was altogether dependent on His will, and at His command would cease to shine (Job 9^7); and, this being the case, the sun could also undergo a change of his course. Of this there are two examples: Joshua's order to the sun to stand still (Jos 10^{12-14}, Sir 46^5), and the going back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz (2 K 20^{8-11}, Is 38^7). The former has given rise to a considerable amount of discussion, the improbability of such a change as the stoppage of the earth's rotation implied thereby being generally recognized, notwithstanding that God's power to do so without harm to the world and its inhabitants cannot admit of doubt. The probability, however, is that this passage, being a poetical extract from another work, 'the Book of Jashar,' is not to be understood literally, the statement being made by poetic licence for some such expression as 'the sun did not set until the enemies of Israel were completely defeated,' i.e. the operations were carried out so rapidly, that as much was done as if the day had been twice as long (cf. v.[14]). On the other hand, the explanation that the lengthening of the day, and the continued appearance of the sun above the horizon, may have been due to a considerable increase of the refractive properties of the atmosphere, is also possible. The return of the shadow on the dial has also been referred to various causes, and may, according to some, have been due to an eclipse (see Bosanquet in G. Smith's Assurbanipal, p. 346, and TSBA iii. 31 ff., v. 261). In 2 K 20[8-11] it is the shadow only that is spoken of; but the parallel passage in Is 38[7] mentions also the sun, and on account of this it has been contended that the movement recorded must have been purely optical. The phenomenon referred to in Mk 15[33], Lk 23[44.45], where it is stated that the sun was darkened, cannot refer to an eclipse, as it was the time of the full moon. The sun is in these passages, to all appearance, represented as hiding himself in order to cast a veil of darkness over the death of the Son of God. Whatever be the explanation of these three apparent departures from the sun's daily routine, there is no doubt that they are intended to emphasize the power of God, and His active interest in the affairs of man. The same ideas were, to all appearance, generally current with regard to eclipses in general, these being looked upon in like manner as extraordinary manifestations of the power of God over nature, or as foreshadowing the terrible tokens of the day of judgment (Is 13[10], Jl 2[10] 3[15]=Ac 2[20], Mt 24[29], Mk 13[24], Lk 21[25], Rev 6[12] 8[12]).* The setting of the sun at bright noonday is figurative of loss of happiness, prosperity, or success (Is 60[20], Jer 15[9], Am 8[9], Mic 3[6]), whilst the reverse of this is indicated by the rising of the 'sun of Righteousness' of Mal 4[2] (see also vol. i. p. 193[b]).

Like the moon, the sun was also regarded as an emblem of constancy, on account of the unerring daily repetition of his course (Ps 72[5.17] 89[36]). The man who loves God (Jg 5[31]) and the just ruler (2 S 23[4]) are both compared with him as the thing of all God's creation shining with the greatest brilliance, whilst, for the same reason, he became the image of God Himself (Ps 84[11]). His pure, unfailing light became also an emblem of beauty (Ca 6[10]), and his force increasing daily, or at certain seasons, typified the progress of a good man towards perfection (Pr 4[18]). The great luminary (Sir 17[31]) and adornment of the heavens (Sir 26[16]), his light shone on all things; and is surpassed in brilliance only by the heavenly world to come, of which God Himself is to be the light and the glory (Is 60[19], Ac 26[13]).

It is to the penetrating heat of the sun that the poetical expression חַמָּה, ḥammāh, is applied (cf. Ps 19[6]); and by means of this, as well as by his light, he exercises his beneficent power, bringing forth the fruits of the earth (Dt 33[14]), grass with the help of the rain (2 S 23[4]), and giving man the desire of life (Ec 11[7]). But the sun has also the power of injuring, smiting, and scorching men and the fruits of the earth by his heat (Ps 121[6], Is 49[10], Jon 4[8], Rev 7[16] 16[8] etc.).

Observation of the movements of the sun, and his influence upon the earth and upon all nature, caused all the ancient world, with but few exceptions, to regard him as a living thing; and from this view, dwelling, as they did, in the midst of heathendom, the ancient Hebrews were not wholly free, especially during the time of the kings. Except, however, where a direct reference to idolatry is made, the sun is spoken of as a personal living being only in the domain of poetry, though, as will be seen further on, the writers of the Hebrew poetical books had been apparently influenced by the heathen teaching concerning the luminary of day. He ruled over the day, not as a god but as the source of light, heat, and the divisions of time, and came forth from his chamber to run his fixed course as one of the great creations of God, not as being himself a deity whom men should worship.

Nevertheless, the Hebrews were attracted by the worship of the sun, under the influence of the heathen nations by whom they were surrounded. A common act of worship is that mentioned in Job 31[26.27], in which the hand was kissed, and which is described as an iniquity to be punished by the judges. The law against idolatrous worship of the sun and heavenly bodies is given in Dt 4[19], and from 17[2-5] we learn that the penalty was death by stoning at the gate of the city. The open idolatry which took place in the time of the kings, however, shows clearly that the laws recorded in the passages quoted were not generally observed.

On the entrance of the Israelites into the Holy Land, they found there the worship of the sun under the name of Baal-hammon, the last component part of this appellation being the singular of the word ḥammānîm, meaning 'sun-images,' and connected with the word ḥammāh, 'heat or hot,' one of the words used in the OT for the sun (Job 30[28] etc.). As pointed out in the article BAAL, however, it is not certain that Baal was regarded as the sun, but the sun was a baal, or 'lord,' just as the Babylonian sun-god, Šamaš, bore the title of bêlu, 'lord,' in common with the other deities of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. In all probability, therefore, the worship of the sun, properly so called, came from Babylonia, in which country there were at least two shrines to this god—one at Sippar (Abu-habbah), and the other at Larsa, which is identified with the Ellasar of Gn 14[1]. He was also worshipped, however, at many other places in Babylonia and Assyria.

Noteworthy in connexion with the worship of the sun by the Jews, and its origin, is the reference to the chariots of the sun in 2 K 23[11]. To all appearance the chariot, as well as the horses, had been dedicated by various idolatrous kings of Judah, and they were stationed at the western entrance to the temple, 'by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the precincts.' At the temple of the sun at Sippar in Babylonia there was also a chariot, and presumably horses, dedicated to that deity; and it is worthy of note that, as one of the sacred objects belonging to the temple of the god, it was the custom to make sacrifices to it.* In the 19th year of Nabopolassar this was transferred from the keeping of the men who had care of the horses (? of the sun at Sippara) to a man named Bêl-âḫê-iddina, and a list of the furniture (ûdê) of the chariot was drawn up, enumerating about 140 objects belonging to it, many of them of silver, though some were of gold and of bronze. It is doubtful whether the Babylonians ever thought of the sun-god coursing through the heavens in a chariot drawn by swift steeds of fiery breed typifying his brilliant daily journey through the heavens, as the inscriptions, so far as they are known, do not refer to this, and the representation of the sun-god on the stone found by Mr. Rassam at Abu-habbah shows the deity seated in his shrine, with the representation of his disc before him, and two small figures coming out of the top of the shrine, seemingly guiding the disc by means of the cords attached to it, which they hold in their hands. The sacrificial instruments which formed part of the furniture of the chariot suggest that it was used in connexion with the worship of the sun; and as, in its equipment, swords or daggers of gold (3 in number) and of some other material (2 in number) are referred to, the suggestion that it may have accompanied the army on certain occasions would not be without probability. The ceremonies in connexion with the chariot of the sun at Sippar, in all probability, had their reflexion at Jerusalem. It is hardly likely, however, that the chariot of the sun at Jerusalem, which Josiah burned with fire, was so splendid as that at Sippar in Babylonia.*

* Mahler, in JRAS, 1901, p. 42, explains the plague of darkness referred to in Ex 10[21ff.] as an eclipse of the sun, which took place in B.C. 1335 (Sitzungsber. der k. Akad. der Wiss., Vienna, 1885).

* One of the tablets referring to this states that on the 13th of Iyyar, in the 14th year of Nabopolassar, a full-grown white sheep was offered before it.

The worship of the sun at Jerusalem is described by Ezekiel, who speaks of the five and twenty men (? priests) with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east, worshipping the sun (Ezk 8^{16}). During this ceremony it is said (v.^{17}) that 'they put the branch to their nose,' a doubtful phrase which has been the subject of much discussion. The general opinion, however, is, that this is a reflexion of a Persian custom in which, when repeating the liturgy, the priests held from time to time in the left hand a bunch of twigs called bareçman, and wore, at the offering of the daily sacrifice, a kind of veil. It may be noted in connexion with this, that, in the list of things belonging to the chariot of the sun at Sippar, 2 nurmû are mentioned. Now the word nurmû, as is suggested by Frd. Delitzsch (Assyr. HWB), possibly means 'fig,' 'fig-tree,' and two models of a tree of this kind, or of branches, probably belonged to the chariot as ornaments, and may have been carried 'before the face' when worshipping the sun, as his emblems. Whether this practice originated in Persia or in Babylonia is doubtful.

These idolatrous Jews of old are represented as worshipping the sun towards the east, i.e. at his rising. This was a custom with the Persians, and also, in all probability, with all the nations which adored that luminary. At the temple of Borsippa, which is generally regarded as the Tower of Babel, the worship of the sun was possibly an institution of long standing, and at the beginning of a new day, that is, at sunset, the following hymn was sung:—

> 'Sun-god in the midst of heaven, at thy setting,
> May the bolt of heaven lofty speak thee peace—
> May the door of heaven bless thee.
> Mišaru, the messenger, thy beloved, let him direct thee.
> At Ê-babarra, the seat of thy dominion, thy supremacy shines forth.
> May Aa, thy beloved wife, gladly come to meet thee;
> May thy heart take rest;
> May thy divine refreshment be prepared for thee.
> Warrior, hero, sun-god, may they glorify thee.
> Lord of Ê-babarra, may the course of thy road prosper.
> Sun-god, direct thy path, make firm the road, go to thine abode.
> Sun-god, thou art judge of the land, (and) director of its decisions.'

In this hymn the sun is not only represented in a manner similar to that of the psalmist, as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber (Ps 19^5), but his bride is conceived as going to meet him, and he takes rest and refreshment after his wearying course. The last line of the inscription shows him also in the character which he commonly had with the Babylonians, namely, that of judge, which he apparently possessed as witness of everything that passes on the earth ('under the sun,' as so often occurs in Ecclesiastes, e.g. $1^{3.9}$ etc.). The tablet which followed the above was a hymn to the rising sun, beginning (the Akkadian version only is preserved), Utu ana-azaga-ta êa, 'Sun-god in the glorious heaven rising,' and may have resembled that with which the heathen Jews greeted the luminary, when performing the ceremony referred to by Ezekiel.*

The judgment pronounced against the sun and moon (Is 24^{23}), in which the former was to be ashamed, is regarded by some as resting upon the fact that the idolatrous worship which was paid to it was accounted as a sin, the consequences of which rested upon the object causing it, and would be visited upon it by God at the last day. This is probable; but the end of the verse ought to be taken into account, for when the Lord reigns in Zion gloriously the sun may well be put to shame on account of his inferior lustre.

SUPH.—One of the expressions used in Dt 1^1 to define the locality of Moses' address to Israel [? ; on the difficulty of this interpretation see Driver] is 'in the Arabah, over against Suph' (מוֹל סוּף [i.e. by dissimil., for מוּל], AV 'over against the Red Sea'). If the MT be correct, Ṣuph is a place-name, possibly identical with SUPHAH of Nu 21^{14}, but, upon the whole, it appears more probable that מול סוף is a textual error for מִיַּם־סוּף (cf. LXX πλησίον τῆς ἐρυθρᾶς [θαλάσσης], Vulg. contra mare rubrum). Yam ṣûph † means probably 'sea of reeds,' and appears to have been originally a title given to the upper end of the Gulf of Suez, which would be shallow and marshy, and abounding in reeds (W. M. Müller, As. u. Europ. 42 f.). In the OT this designation is usually confined to the W. (Suez) arm of the Red Sea: Ex 10^{19} (J) 13^{18} $15^{4.22}$ 23^{31} (all four E), Nu $33^{10.11}$ (P), Dt 11^4, Jos 2^{10} (J) 4^{23} (D), Neh 9^9, Ps $106^{7.9.22}$ $136^{13.15}$. It stands, however, for the Gulf of 'Aḳabah not only in Dt 1^1 (if the above suggestion is correct), but in Nu 21^4 (E) and 1 K 9^{26}; prob. also in Nu 14^{25} (E), Dt 1^{40} 2^1; and perhaps Jg 11^{16}, Jer 49^{21}.

SUPHAH (סוּפָה).—The name of an unknown locality E. of Jordan, found only in an obscure fragment of ancient poetry preserved in Nu 21^{14} ('Vaheb in Suphah'). The suggestion of Tristram (Land of Moab, 50 f.), that it may be the modern Ṣafieh, is exposed to the objection of which he himself is aware, that the initial ס of the Heb. word could hardly represent an Arabic ص. The same difficulty attaches to Knobel's identification with Naḳb eṣ-Ṣafā, some 25 miles W.S.W. of the Dead Sea. See, further, the Comm. ad loc.

SUPPER.—See FOOD, vol. ii. p. 41^b; and for the 'Last Supper' see LORD'S SUPPER.

SUR (B Ἀσσούρ, A Σούρ).—One of the towns on the seacoast of Palestine upon whose people the fear and dread of Holofernes fell when they heard that he had reached Damascus (Jth 2^{28}). The towns are mentioned in order from north to south; and Sur comes between Tyre and Ocina—the next place to the south being Jemnaan (Jamnia). The site, if a different place from Tyre (Heb. Ẓōr, Arab. Ṣûr), is unknown. C. W. WILSON.

* Among the Babylonians, the important thing in connexion with the ceremonies seems to have been the chariot, and this was probably the case at Jerusalem. With the Persians, on the other hand, the horses seem to have been at least as important, and sometimes the one, sometimes the other, followed in the processions. The colour of these sacred horses was white, and they were on certain occasions sacrificed to the sun (Herod. i. 188, vii. 40, 55; Xen. Cyr. viii. 3).

* For other forms of the sun-god and sun-worship see the articles BAAL, CHEMOSH, MOLECH, and TAMMUZ.

† Ṣûph is attributed also to the Nile in Ex $2^{3.5}$ (cf. Is 19^6).

SURE, SURELY, SURETY.—The adjectives 'secure,' 'sicker' (or 'siker'), and 'sure' all come from the Lat. securus; the first being taken directly, the second through the influence of the Teut. siker, sicher; the last through the Old. Fr. seür (mod. sûr). 'Secure' retained the meaning of the Lat. (se 'without,' cura 'care'; see SECURE); between 'sicker' and 'sure' the difference was mainly one of dialect, till 'sicker' dropped out of literary English. Thus Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus, 2642, 'Whan thow trowest to be most seur or siker of hir [fortune's] help, she wol faille thee and deceyve thee.' Both had a wider use than 'sure' has now.

'Sure' was often used where we should now use 'secure.' Thus Udall, Erasmus' Par. i. 13, 'Solitarines doeth quicken and make lustye the mind of a Christian souldier, and some time it is more sure for a man to count himself to the wild beastes, than to men. Baptisme taketh away al sinnes of the former life, but for al that, no man is sure from the assaultes of Satan which liveth sluggishly.' So Pr. Bk. Pref. (1552), 'There never was any thing by the wit of man so well devised, or so sure established, which (in continuance of time) hath not been corrupted.' And in AV 1 S 2^{35} 'I will build him a sure house'; Is 22^{23} 'I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place'; 32^{18} 'My people shall dwell . . . in sure dwellings.'

The adverb surely, in like manner, means sometimes securely: Pr 10^{9} 'He that walketh uprightly walketh surely.' Cf. Robinson, More's Utopia, 141, 'They fence and fortifie their campe sewerlye with a deape and a brode trenche.' Jer 35^{14} Cov. 'The wordes which Ionadab the sonne off Rechab commaunded his sonnes, that they shulde drynke no wyne, are fast and surely kepte'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 237, 'David . . . came to the pavilion of king Saul, where he found hym suerly slepynge, havinge by him his speare and a cuppe with water.'

But it is of more importance to observe that in its ordinary meaning 'surely' has now lost so much of its force that its use in AV sometimes suggests to the reader the opposite of that which is intended. Thus in Gn 2^{17}, the first instance of its use, 'In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,' the assertion is the strongest possible. The Hebrew is the idiomatic phrase, 'dying thou shalt die.' But the English suggests a slight doubt. So in Gn 3^{4} 'And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die,' i.e. Ye shall certainly not die.

This Heb. idiom, an account of which will be found in Davidson's Hebrew Syntax, § 86, or in Gesenius-Kautzsch, § 113, is variously rendered in AV. Sometimes the idiom is preserved, as Gn 22^{17} 'in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed.' More frequently an adverb or adverbial phrase is inserted, such as 'exceedingly' Gn 16^{10}, 'certainly' Gn 18^{10} 43^{7}, 'doubtless' 2 S 5^{19}, 'utterly' Dt 12^{2}, Jg 1^{28} 15^{2}, Zec 11^{17}; 'clean' Zec 11^{17}; 'solemnly' Gn 43^{3}; 'earnestly' 1 S 20^{6}; 'altogether' Nu 16^{13}, Jer 30^{11}; 'needs' Gn 24^{5}; 'indeed' Gn 37^{8}; 'ever' Jg 11^{25}; 'plainly' 1 S 2^{27} 10^{16}; 'at all' 2 K 18^{33}, Jer 26^{19}; 'straitly' Gn 43^{7}, 1 S 14^{28}; 'freely' Gn 2^{16}. But by far the most frequently used adverb is 'surely'; and in every instance it has the force of 'assuredly' or 'certainly.' Thus Gn 28^{22} 'I will surely give the tenth unto thee'; Jg 13^{22} 'We shall surely die, because we have seen God'; Hab 2^{3} 'It will surely come, it will not tarry.' Cf. Sir 48^{11} 'We shall surely live' (ζωῇ ζησόμεθα).

'Surely' is also the translation of certain Hebrew and Greek adverbs and other expressions, some of which are very forcible. Thus (1) 'ākēn,* Gn 28^{16} 'surely the Lord is in this place'; Ex 2^{14} 'surely this thing is known'; 1 S 15^{32} 'surely the bitterness of death is past'; Is 40^{7} 'surely the people is grass'; Jer 4^{10} 'Ah, Lord God! surely thou hast greatly deceived this people.' The same word is tr. 'verily' in Is 45^{15}, 'truly' in Jer $3^{23\ \textit{bis}}$, 'certainly' in Jer 8^{8}. (2) 'Im (an emphatic negative), as Nu 14^{23} 'surely they shall not see the land which I sware unto their fathers'; or 'im-lo' (an emphatic affirmative), as Ezk 36^{5} 'Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the heathen.' (3) 'Omnām (a strong asseverative from 'āman, 'to confirm'), as Job 34^{12} 'Yea, surely God will not do wickedly' (RV 'of a surety'). (4) 2 S 12^{5} 'The man that hath done this thing shall surely die' (Heb. 'is a son of death'; cf. 1 S 20^{31} 26^{16}). (5) ἀληθῶς, as Mt 26^{73} 'surely thou also art one of them?' (RV 'of a truth'); Jn 17^{8} 'They have known surely that I came out from thee' (RV 'of a truth'). (6) πάντως, Lk 4^{23} 'Ye will surely say unto me this proverb' (RV 'doubtless ye will say'). (7) ἦ [εἰ] μήν, He 6^{14} 'Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee' (ἦ [edd. εἰ] μὴν εὐλογῶν εὐλογήσω σε, καὶ πληθύνων πληθυνῶ σε). (8) ναί, Rev 22^{20} 'Surely I come quickly' (RV 'yea').

Examples of 'surely' are Knox, Hist. 315, 'I thinke and am surely perswaded.' Rhemish NT, Preface, 'Vulpilas surely gave the Scriptures to the Gothes in their own tonge, and that before he was an Arrian.' Generydes (E.E.T.S.), 1317—

> 'They were fully accordid all in one
> That Auferius suerly shuld be ther kyng.'

Surety occurs in the phrase 'of a surety,' Gn 15^{13} 18^{13} 26^{9}, Ac 12^{11} (ἀληθῶς, RV 'of a truth'). Cf. 1 S 26^{4} Cov. 'David . . . sent out spyes, and knewe of a suertie, that he was come in deede.' Elsewhere the word means 'security' in the legal sense; cf. Paraph. in Verse, 58^{2}—

> 'He who for men their surety stood.'

Suretiship occurs only in Pr 11^{15} 'He that hateth suretiship is sure' (Heb. as AVm and RVm 'those that strike hands'; see STRIKE). See DEBT, PLEDGE. J. HASTINGS.

SUSANNA (Σουσαννά).—i. TEXT AND VERSIONS.—The history of Susanna forms a part of the Bk. of Daniel in the Greek Bible and in those versions which are taken from the Greek. In Gr. MSS, and also in the Old Latin and Arabic, it stands before Dn 1; but in the Latin Vulgate it stands as Dn 13. Swete prints it as a separate work after Daniel. The LXX is the oldest extant text, but there may have been a Semitic original. If so, it is antecedently probable that it would be in Aramaic, not Hebrew. Hebrew was the language of legal discussions, hymns, and prayers. Aramaic was the language of such anecdotes and histories as circulated freely among the people. The LXX of the History of Susanna, as indeed of the whole of the Gr. Daniel, was lost for many centuries, because of the preference of the Church for the text of Theodotion. The LXX of Susanna is, even now, extant only in Cod. Chisianus, otherwise known as 87, a cursive of the 9th cent. Theod. for the most part transcribed the LXX literally, but in several instances he made additions and alterations meant to relieve improbabilities, or to supply details which seemed to make the narrative more smooth and intelligible. The Latin Vulg. is an accurate rendering of Theodotion. In Syriac Versions, our 'History' is exceptionally rich. We have (1) the Syro-Hexaplar, which is a close translation of the LXX; (2) the Peshiṭta, which is given in Walton's Polyglott, Ceriani's Codex Ambrosianus, and in Lagarde's Libri VT Apocr. Syriace, and designated W_1; (3) and (4) from v.^{42} onwards Lagarde gives two other Syriac recensions, both differing in many respects from each other and from W_1, and known as L_1 and L_2; (5) there is a remarkable VS given by Walton, the so-called Harklensian VS, known as W_2.

* A rather less emphatic particle is 'ak, the force of which is well seen in Ps $39^{5.\ 6.\ 11}$, esp. in RV. In Ps 62 this word is tr. five times 'only' (both AV and RV), once 'surely'; cf. Ps 73^{1}.

ii. THE STORY.—We intend first to give the story in those features which are common to all our sources, and then to specify the important additions or alterations made in each. In the early days of the captivity in Babylon, there was a woman named Susanna, very beautiful, very pious, the daughter of a priest. Her husband Joakim was very wealthy and honourable. He had a park adjoining his mansion, and his fellow-exiles were always welcome to both (vv.$^{1-4}$). There were two elders in Babylon, who were also judges, and were held in high repute; but both so far forgot God and the judgments He has pronounced against adultery (v.^{9}) as to foster impure desires towards Susanna. Neither dared divulge his secret to the other; but one day they met in the park unexpectedly and agreed to coerce her; but she strenuously refused to listen to them, saying that she would rather die than sin against God (vv.$^{10-24}$). Shortly afterwards, the elders summoned Susanna before the assembly of the Jews, and laid against her the false charge that they both saw her lying with a young man in the park, who, however, fled when they came near. Susanna protested her innocence, but the people felt obliged to believe two such honourable witnesses, and condemned her to death (vv.$^{28-44}$). As they were leaving the judgment-hall, Daniel, then a very young man, met them, and undertook to prove Susanna's innocence. He insisted on cross-questioning the witnesses apart, and put the same question to each: Under what kind of tree did the adultery occur? Each gave the name of a different tree (vv.$^{45-59}$). The people being thus convinced of the falsity of the charge, praised God, applauded Daniel, and put to death the false accusers (v.$^{60ff.}$).

This is, in the main, the story as it appears in the LXX. Theod. adds many details. It is probable that vv.$^{1-4}$ originated in Theod. and were transferred from him verbatim to our solitary codex of the LXX; because LXX in v.^{7} introduces Susanna, as though she had not been mentioned before. LXX simply states that the elders saw her walking in the park one evening, and they both came thither early next morning; but Theod. adds that the house of Joakim was used every morning as a court of justice, and, after the people had been dismissed, Susanna walked daily in the park, and both the elders became enamoured of her. One day they both lingered when the court closed; and after they had separated, saying it was dinner hour, they both came back, and confessed their lust. Theod. and the VSS taken from it then insert a part altogether lacking in LXX, how the elders watched her go into the park and concealed themselves among the trees, surmising that she was going to bathe. When Susanna sent her maids for oil and cosmetics (W_2 'soap') the elders rushed on her, tempted her to adultery, and threatened to testify that she had sent her maids away, so as to have intercourse with a young man. When the maids came back and heard this accusation from the elders, they were utterly ashamed. Further, while LXX states that the trial was held in the synagogue, Theod. says it was held in the house and presence of Joakim. He omits from LXX that 500 of Susanna's relatives and friends came to the trial: and he puts Susanna's protestations before the charge; LXX after. Theod. says the young man escaped because he was stronger than the elders. In LXX the elders did not recognize him because he was masked. LXX introduces an angel as inspiring Daniel with wisdom at the moment when Susanna was being led to death. This Theod. omits; but he adds to the LXX that Daniel said aloud, 'Turn back to the tribunal'; and that Daniel was invited to an elder's chair. Theod. omits most of v.^{51} in LXX where Daniel says, 'Do not suppose elders cannot lie.' LXX puts two questions to the wicked elders: 'Under what tree?' and 'In what part of the garden?' The punishment in LXX is: 'they threw them down the precipice'; in Theod. 'they slew them.' LXX only says: 'And the angel of the Lord cast fire through the midst of them,' and it alone adds a eulogy on young men meant to secure for them larger influence in public affairs.

The Vulgate translates Theod. very accurately; the chief deviation being the addition of one verse at the end: 'And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus the Persian took the kingdom.' This contradicts Dn 1, where Daniel is 'a young man' in 597, whereas Cyrus began to reign in 538.

The Peshiṭta is given, as we have said, by Ceriani, Lagarde, and W_1. Pesh. agrees in the main with Theodotion. The chief exceptions are that in v.$^{22f.}$ Pesh. lengthens Susanna's soliloquy and consequent repudiation of their overtures; and between vv.^{26} and ^{27} Pesh. inserts a verse which may well have dropped out from Theod., giving the testimony of the elders to the household which gathered when Susanna cried aloud. It is almost verbatim with $^{37-39}$. After v.^{41}, W_1 presents a recension of Pesh., different from L_1. L_1 inserts, after the sentence on Susanna, these words: 'That all women may fear and not do again according to this shame.' This W_1 omits. L_1 adds after v.^{43} 'concerning this which I have not done I am willing that they should ask me anything.' L_1 calls the first tree 'a pistic tree'; W_1 'a terebinth.' The second tree, in L_1, L_2 is 'a pomegranate'; in W_1 'a chestnut.' At the end of v.^{64} L_1, L_2, and W_2^a give a eulogy on Daniel, which W_1 omits.

Lagarde gives, as we have said, a second Syriac recension, from v.^{42} and onwards (L_2), which has several interesting readings. Two are unique. After v.^{43} Susanna's prayer continues: 'Appear for me and send a Redeemer from before thee, that thy truth may be believed by those that fear thee.' In v.^{53} Daniel says to the first elder: 'These things thou hast done and thou saidst: God is righteous, and the righteous He will not destroy; and thou hast not obeyed what thou hast taught to others.'

Much more important are the variations in Walton's second Syriac Version (W_2). It almost amounts to a distinct tradition. W_2 states that Daniel was 12 years old at the time: that the synagogue was held in the house of Joakim: that Susan was a widow, having lost her husband after a married life of a few days, and devoted herself to the Lord: that the names of the elders were Amid and Abid, and they were chiefs of the synagogue: that before the trial Susan was in chains in prison three days: that the two elders were not witnesses, but judges of Susan: that it was decided that at the 9th hour Susan should be cast down a precipice: that a throne was brought from the treasury for Daniel to sit upon, but that he refused to sit upon it.

iii. ITS ORIGIN.—There are several indications that the story before us cannot be regarded as historical. (1) The discrepancies in the several accounts, e.g. those just given from W_2. (2) The improbability that in the first days of the Captivity, when Daniel was 'a young youth' (v.^{45}), any Jew in Babylon could be so affluent as Joakim, or that so soon after the deportation of Jehoiachin the Jews should, in exile, possess the jus necis. (3) The reasons for Susanna's condemnation are very flimsy, and the behaviour of the very youthful Daniel is, at least, arbitrary. He loudly condemns both culprits before he adduces any proof of their guilt.

Assuming that we have here an ethical mythus, can we find its origin and motif? Ball (Speaker's Apocr. ii. 325 f.) has a probable theory, borrowed in the main from Rabbi Brüll (Das apokr. Susanna-Buch). He adduces evidence from several sources of a tradition of two elders, who, in the Captivity, led astray silly women, by the persuasion, that, through them, they would become the mother of a great prophet, or of the Messiah. These stories are an amplification or embellishment of Jer 29$^{21-23}$, where we read of two prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah, whom 'Nebuchadnezzar roasted in the fire because they committed folly in Israel, and committed adultery with their neighbours' wives.' Origen and Jerome both knew of the elaborated form of this incident, and it occurs with sundry variations in Midrash Tanhuma on Leviticus; Bab. Talm. Sanhedrin 93 a; Boraitha of R. Eliezer, c. 33, and in Pesikta, No. 25. Here we have materials for the former half of the story: but not for the trial. The reasons for the rehabilitation of the tradition, with the trial attached, are ingeniously supposed to have arisen about B.C. 100, when Simon ben Shetach was president of the Sanhedrin. Simon was extremely anxious to introduce reforms into criminal procedure. It is said that his son was falsely accused of a capital offence. On the way to his execution the false witnesses confessed the crime, but the son said to his father, 'If the salvation of Israel can be wrought through you, consider me the threshold over which you may pass.' Simon, the Judæan Brutus, let the law take its course, that by the death of one he might save the innocent lives of many. He advocated a more careful examination of the witnesses—his favourite dictum being: 'Examine the witnesses abundantly' (Pirke Aboth i. 9). He sought also to suppress perjury by insisting that he who swore falsely should, if detected, be punished with the same penalty as he sought to inflict on another. (N.B.—The elders were put to death for seeking to cause Susanna's death). The Sadducees, against Simon, interpreted the law, 'an eye for an eye,' etc., to mean that the false witness should be punished, if his crime were detected after the penalty had been inflicted on the innocent one. We must confess that the appearance of our 'History' at such a juncture would be most opportune for Simon. There is, it seems to us, a further coincidence. The moral of the narrative is, in LXX, summed up thus: 'Because of this, young men are beloved in Jacob, by-virtue-of (ἐν) their ingenuousness (ἁπλότητι): and as for us, let us take heed that our youths be powerful; for young men will be pious, and there will be in them a spirit of knowledge and understanding for ever and ever.' Clearly, this is a eulogy on youth; and may well have been meant as a compliment to Alexander Jannæus, whose adviser Simon was, and who ascended the throne at the age of twenty-three.

This assumes that the 'History' is of Palestinian origin: and there is nothing against this. If it cannot be proved to have been originally written in Aramaic, it cannot be proved that it was not.

An argument, as old as the time of Origen, which has been adduced in favour of a Greek original, seems to the present writer untenable. In vv.$^{54f.}$ and $^{58f.}$ there occur two paranomasiæ. Daniel asks the first elder: 'Under what tree didst thou see them?' and the reply is: 'Under a mastic tree' (Gr. σχῖνος); and Daniel says: 'The angel of God shall cleave (σχίσει) thy soul to-day.' The second elder replies: 'Under a holm-tree' (πρῖνος); and Daniel says: 'The angel of God has a sword to cut thee in two' (πρίσαι σε). These verbal plays are so ingenious that they have been held by many to prove, beyond all controversy, a Greek original. There is no more cogency in this, it seems to us, than if, supposing all early VSS to be lost, we should read in English: 'Under a clove tree' . . . 'the Lord shall cleave thee,' 'Under a yew tree' . . . 'the Lord shall hew thee,' and should therefrom infer English authorship. Origen says that he asked many Jews to furnish him with Heb. words that would produce a similar assonance: but always in vain (Migne, xi. 61–65). If Heb. fails, Aramaic is equal to the demand. The 'mastick' is in Syriac VSS פסתקא (using Heb. letters); and the verb 'to cut in two' is פסק: the word which occurs in Pal Syr of Mk 6^{16} 'I beheaded John.' In the second case L_2 and W_2 have רומנא 'a pomegranate'; opposite which, we surmise that there originally stood the words: 'The angel of God shall precipitate thee' (רמא). This is the punishment stated in LXX to have been inflicted: 'They muzzled them and threw them down into the ravine.' The verb רמא is used in this same sense in the Aram. of Dn 3^{20} 6^{16}, and in the Targ. of Jon 1^{16}, Ezk 16^5.

iv. CANONICITY.—The History of Susanna was included in the Canon by the Greek, Syrian, and Latin Churches. The first to dispute its claim was Julius Africanus. In his Letter to Origen he powerfully questions its historicity (Bissell, 446), and calls it a σύγγραμμα νεωτερικὸν καὶ πεπλασμένον. Origen makes a rejoinder to each of his objections, but the replies are far from satisfactory. Irenæus cites vv.$^{52.\ 53}$ and ^{56} as 'voices from Daniel the prophet' (adv. Hær. iv. 26. 3), and Tertullian refers to our history (de Corona, iv.). Hippolytus treats it exegetically at the commencement of his Comm. on Daniel; and fragments are extant of a Comm. by Origen in Book x. of his Stromata, from which Jerome makes extracts in his Comm. on Daniel, c. xiii. Schürer (HJP II. iii. 186) collects Origen's citations from Susanna.

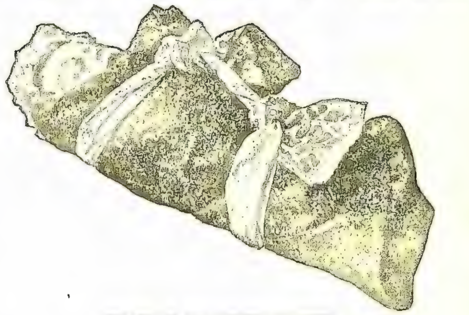
SUSI (סוּסִי; B Σουσεί, AF Σουσί).—A Manassite, Nu $13^{12\ (11)}$. The text, however, is doubtful (see Nestle, Eigennamen, 209; Gray, HPN 92; Dillm. Nu. ad loc.).

SWADDLE, SWADDLING-BANDS (חֲתֻלָּה ḥăthullah; 'to swaddle' [חָתַל] ḥāthal, σπαργανόω).—The wrapping in swaddling-clothes is at the present day, as it was in ancient times, one of the first services rendered to the newborn infant in the East. The child is laid across the diagonal of a square of cloth of which the corners are folded over the body and feet and under the head. The bandages, which are of plain cotton among the poor and of silk and embroidered work in the case of the rich, are then wrapped round the cloth which encases the child. The custom seems to point back to the early nomadic life, as the bandaging not only affords protection against cold and support to the spine, but also by the confinement of the limbs enables the mother more easily to carry the child on the day's journey. During the first week salt water (Ezk 16^4) is applied daily to the lips and flexures of the body wherever the tender skin might become inflamed. This hardening process as a protection against chafing is further assisted by dusting the joints with a powder of pounded myrtle leaves, and any tender or irritated parts of the skin are rubbed with olive oil. The absence of these attentions at the birth of Israel (Ezk 16^4) indicated the outcast insignificance of the nation at the beginning. Amid the privations of the manger at Bethlehem this maternal duty was carefully attended to (Lk $2^{7.\ 12}$). The swaddling-bands are daily unfastened in attending to the child, but the practice is kept up for about a year until the child is strong enough to use his limbs. The Oriental cradle has not the high sides of the Western cradle or infant's crib, and the infant is firmly tied down by long straps resembling the swaddling-bands round the body. This idea of restraint appears in the majestic figure of the clouds as the swaddling-bands of the sea (Job 38^9). In La 2^{22} the AV 'swaddled' (טִפַּחְתִּי ṭippaḥti) is in RV tr. 'dandled.' The word is a denominative from טֶפַח 'span' or 'palm of the hand.'



INFANT IN SWADDLING-CLOTHES.

The English words 'swaddle' and 'swathe' are merely different spellings of Anglo-Sax. swethel or swethil, a strip of cloth for wrapping a child, or for bandaging in any way. Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 446, 'Their feet to this end so straitly swadled in their infancie that they grow but little.'

G. M. MACKIE.

SWALLOW.—Two words are tr^d 'swallow' in AV, and a third in RV. 1. דְּרוֹר dĕrôr (Ps 84^3 LXX τρυγών; Pr 26^2 LXX στρουθός = 'sparrow' or other small bird). The allusion to the nesting of this bird in the sanctuary and its swift (unalighting) flight fit the swallow. 2. עָגוּר 'āgûr (Is 38^{14} LXX περιστερά=‘pigeon’; Jer 8^7 LXX στρουθίον=‘sparrow’ or other small bird). 'Agûr (see CRANE) seems to be an adjective, and perhaps signifies ‘twitterer’ instead of ‘crane’ (RV), and is explanatory of ṣûṣ or ṣîṣ; see, further, Dillm.-Kittel on Is 38^{14}. 3. סוּס ṣûṣ, סִיס ṣîṣ, should be tr^d as in RV (Is 38^{14}, Jer 8^7), ‘swallow’ instead of ‘crane’ (AV; see CRANE). If ṣûṣ or ṣîṣ be the swallow, or better, the swift or martin, the twittering could only refer to its note in its nest. The allusion to the migratory habits of the bird would suit the swallow. The following swallows and swifts or martins are common in the Holy Land:—Hirundo Savygnii, Steph., the Oriental swallow; H. rustica, L., the common swallow (Arab. sûnûnû, or ṣûṣ or ṣîṣ); H. rufula, Temm., the red-rumped swallow; Chelidon urbica, L., the martin; Cotyle riparia, L., the sand martin; C. rupestris, Scop., the crag martin; C. obsoleta, Cab., the pale crag martin; Cypselus apus, L., the black martin or swift; C. melba, L., and C. Galileensis, would be included under the popular conception of the swallow or swift. Any or all of them would sometimes be called ṣûṣ or ṣîṣ.

SWAN.—The AV tr^n (twice) of תִּנְשֶׁמֶת tinshemeth, a word which occurs thrice in the list of unclean creatures, once at the end of a list of lizards (see MOLE, 1 (b)), and twice among the birds (Lv 11^{18} LXX πορφυρίων=‘water-hen,’ Vulg. porphyrio, RV ‘horned owl,’ m. ‘swan’; Dt 14^{16} LXX ἶβις, Vulg. ibis, RV ‘horned owl’). The arguments against the swan are—(1) There is no reason why the swan should have been held unclean. (2) The swan is very rare in the Holy Land and Egypt, and therefore would have been little recognized. (3) The ancient VSS are against it. The gallinule or water-hen (Porphyrio) and the ibis are, however, birds which would have been held unclean, which are quite common, and each of which has the support of one passage in the VSS. Porphyrio cœruleus, Vandelli, the Purple Gallinule, and Ibis religiosa, L., or I. falcinella, L., the Glossy Ibis, would suit the requirements of the passages.

SWEARING.—See OATH.

SWEAT.—See MEDICINE, vol. iii. p. 330^a.

SWEET CANE.—See REED.

SWINE (חֲזִיר ḥăzîr).—This word is cognate to the Arab. khinzîr. The LXX tr. ḥăzîr in Ps 80^{13} σύς (AV and RV ‘boar’), Lv 11^7, Dt 14^8, Pr 11^{22} ὗς (AV and RV ‘swine’) There is no question as to the identity of the animal intended. The NT word for it is χοῖρος. The eating of swine's flesh is forbidden in Israel (Lv 11^7, Dt 14^8), hence the infringement of this rule was one of the practices to which the Hellenizing party sought to compel the faithful (2 Mac 6^{18}). The flesh (Is 65^4 66^{17}) and blood (66^3) of swine are described as characteristically heathen and repulsive offerings (cf. 1 Mac 1^{47}). A jewel of gold in a swine's snout is used as a simile of a fair woman of doubtful character (Pr 11^{22}). A wild boar appears as fig. of the foes of Israel (Ps 80^{13}). The ancient Egyptians and Phœnicians, as well as the Jews, regarded swine as unclean. Mohammedans are, if possible, more intense than the Jews in their disgust for them. To call a man a hog is worse than to call him a dog. This feeling is shared by most of the Christians in Palestine. But a considerable number of them breed swine and eat their flesh. Swine's flesh is sold in a number of shops in Beirut. The writer has seen native Christians in Amanus hunting wild swine, which are very abundant in that range, as also in the Jordan Valley, and in the higher regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon. It would appear that, in the time of Christ, Jews had come to raising swine in large herds (Mt 8^{30} etc., Lk 15^{15}).

SWORD in OT is the rendering of several Hebrew words:—1. מְכֵרָה mĕkhērāh, Gn 49^5 RV ‘weapons of violence are their swords’ (better RVm ‘compacts’). The word is of very doubtful meaning, the VSS being at fault; cf. Dillmann, Genesis, ad loc. 2. שֶׁלַח shelaḥ, Jl 2^8 AV (better RV ‘weapons’). 3. כִּידוֹן kîdôn, Sir 46^2, through the ῥομφαία of LXX (better ‘spear’ as Jos $8^{18.\,26}$ or ‘javelin’). 4. חֶרֶב ḥerebh (the usual word, occurring with great frequency in OT), which can nearly always be tr^d ‘sword’ or ‘dagger’ (Jg 3^{16}), but once had a more general meaning; cf. the Arab. ḥarb ‘war.’ Thus ḥerebh is ‘tool’ Ex 20^{25}, ‘axes’ Ezk 26^9, and ‘mattocks’ 2 Ch 34^6 AV (RVm ‘axes’; RV, following a different reading, ‘in their ruins’; the text is quite dubious), and in Jos 5^2 חַרְבוֹת צֻרִים ḥarbhôth ẓûrîm is ‘knives of flint.’ Probably therefore ḥerebh denoted originally the primitive flint implement, which, according to its varying shape and size, might serve the purpose of spear-head, arrow-head, axe, hammer, or knife. Such implements have been found during the excavation of Tell el-Hesy (Lachish). The ‘blade’ of a sword and the ‘head’ of a spear are alike called לַהַב lahabh.

STONE KNIFE FROM TELL EL-HESY (LACHISH).
(By kind permission of the PEF).

In size the ḥerebh was probably quite short. Ehud's ‘sword’ (Jg 3^{16} RV) was a cubit (about 17 inches) long, and Goliath's (1 S 21^9) was a possible weapon for David. The material of all weapons of offence was sometimes iron and sometimes bronze (cf. Gn 4^{22}, Jos 8^{31}, 1 S 17^7, Jg 1^{19}, Is 10^{34}); at the excavations at Tell el-Hesy (Lachish) spear-heads and a battle-axe of bronze were found as well as arrow-heads and a curved dagger (khanjar) of iron (F. J. Bliss, PEFSt, 1892, pp. 101–113, with illustrations; for mines in Palestine cf. Driver on Dt 8^9). Roughly speaking, the difference of metal marks a difference of time, bronze weapons being earlier than those of iron or steel. In shape the ḥerebh was sometimes curved with a sharp inner edge like the Egyptian sword, sometimes straight like the weapon worn by the Assyrians; for illustrations see R. F. Burton, Book of the Sword, pp. 156, 205. The ‘double-edged’ ḥerebh (Jg 3^{16}, Ps 149^6, Pr 5^4, Sir 21^3) might be either curved or straight; cf. Burton, as above.

The use of the sword was twofold: in war to despatch the flying or fallen enemy after the bow and the spear had done their work, in peace to execute malefactors; cf. 1 K $2^{8.\,46}$. The sword was carried in a sheath (תַּעַר ta'ar, Jer 47^6, or נָדָן nādān, 1 Ch 21^{27}) ‘probably of leather’ (Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. 363), but ancient sheaths were made also of metal (Burton, p. 222, with note 11), of wood (Schliemann, Mycenæ, p. 281; cf. p. 303), of ivory (Odyssey, viii. 404), and perhaps even of linen (Schliemann, p. 283). When not worn a sword might be wrapped in a cloth (1 S 21^9), just as blades are bandaged with greased rags by the natives of India (Burton, p. 232). The sheathed sword was worn hanging from a girdle (חֲגוֹר ḥăgôr, 2 S 20^8; cf. Ps $45^{3\,[4]}$).

Among the many interesting sword-passages of the OT are:—Gn 3^{24} RV (the two guardians are the cherubim and the darting flame, i.e. probably the lightning; cf. Burton, p. 183, who suggests the disc-like sword of Merodach); Gn 4^{23} (the Song of the Discovery of the Sword, according to some); Dt 33^{29} (the LORD Israel's sword, so EV rightly); Jg $7^{(18).\,20}$ (the war-cry 'a sword for the LORD and for Gideon'); Is 27^{1} (the LORD'S sword of chastisement); Is 2^{4}=Mic 4^{3} ('swords into plowshares' a symbol of peace); Jl 3^{10} [4^{10}] ('plowshares into swords' a symbol of war); 2 Mac 15^{15} (the prophet Jeremiah delivers a golden sword to Judas Maccabæus in a vision).

In LXX and NT 'sword' is represented by three words:—1. ξίφος, a long straight sword, only in LXX. 2. μάχαιρα, a word used to describe a mere knife (Gn 22^{10}, Jg 19^{29} LXX (A) for מַאֲכֶלֶת ma'ăkheleth; cf. Lk 22^{38} in F. Field, Notes on the Translation of NT, pp. 76, 77), as well as the legionary's sword (Eph 6^{17}), and the executioner's weapon (Ac 12^{2}). Μάχαιρα is used in Mt 26^{52}, a verse sometimes supposed to refer to war, but really referring to ordinary violence; in Eph 6^{17} of the 'sword of the Spirit, the word of God (ῥῆμα θεοῦ)' received (not 'taken') by the Christian warrior; and in He 4^{12} of the two-edged sword with which 'the word (ὁ λόγος) of God' is compared.* 3. ῥομφαία, a word of somewhat doubtful meaning, but used in several interesting passages. It is found in Latin in the forms romfea (Sir 46^{2}) and rumpia (Livy, xxxi. 39). It is certain that it was a Thracian weapon of large size (Livy, loc. cit.), but whether it was a sword or a spear is not quite certain. In Plutarch (Æmil. 18) the Thracians are spoken of as ὀρθὰς ῥομφαίας βαρυσιδήρους ἀπὸ τῶν δεξιῶν ὤμων ἐπισείοντες ('having straight rumpiæ of heavy iron swaying from their right shoulders'). Suidas (ed. Bernhardy, 1853) gives τὸ μακρὸν ἀκόντιον ἢ μάχαιρα, and Hesychius (Leyden, 1766) μάχαιρα, ξίφος, ἢ ἀκόντιον μακρόν. In the 'Vulgate' Psalter (taken from the LXX) ῥομφαῖαι is rendered frameæ (i.e. large spears such as were used by the Germans) in Ps 9^{7}, where Jerome's 'Hebrew' Psalter gives solitudines (=חרבות). The usual Syr. rendering is 'sword,' but in Lk 2^{35} both Pesh. and Syr$^{\text{sin}}$ give rumḥa 'lance,' and in Rev 1^{16} the Philoxenian (ed. Gwynn, 1897) gives ruḥa (apparently a mistake for rumḥa). General Pitt-Rivers, quoted by Burton (p. 183), speaks of a 'leaf-shaped sword-blade attached to the end of the spear like the Thracian romphea,' but Burton himself (p. 237) says that in modern Romaic it denotes the flamberge, the wavy blade carried by angels in art (ib. pp. 136, 138). That ῥομφαία may possibly mean 'spear' is disputed by W. Wayte (Smith's Dict. Antiq.^{3} 1890), but acknowledged by Plummer on Lk 2^{35}.

Instances of the use of ῥομφαία are—Gn 3^{24} (τὴν φλογίνην ῥ., see above); 1 Ch $21^{12.\,27}$ (the sword of pestilence); Sir 46^{2} (Heb. כִּידוֹן kîdôn 'javelin'); 2 Mac 15^{15} ('the sword seen in vision); Lk 2^{35} (the sword of anguish), Rev 1^{16} 19^{15} (the sword of judgment proceeding out of the mouth of the glorified Christ; cf. Is 11^{4} 49^{2}). This last image is not so strange as appears at first sight, for the short Roman sword was tongue-like in shape, as the annexed illustration (taken from Lindenschmit, Tracht u. Bewaffnung. Tab. xi. fig. 11) shows.

LITERATURE.—Sir Richard Burton's Book of the Sword (London, 1884) is a work of great but unequal merit, with many helpful illustrations; pp. 183–186 are on The Jewish Sword. Schliemann's Mycenæ (London, 1878) contains a good deal of information about ancient Greek swords. For other works see ARMS.

SYCAMINE (συκάμινος, Lk 17^{6}).—As St. Luke alludes by name to the sycomore (συκομορέα), it is prob. [but see Plummer, ad loc.] that he discriminates between it and the sycamine. By consent of scholars, συκάμινος is the Black Mulberry, Morus nigra, L., the strict signification of the word. Yet συκάμινος undoubtedly signifies also the sycomore. In all the passages in the OT where שִׁקְמִים and שִׁקְמוֹת occur (1 K 10^{27}, 1 Ch 27^{28}, 2 Ch 1^{15} 9^{27}, Ps 78^{47}, Is 9^{10}, Am 7^{14}), the LXX tr. it by συκάμινος (or -ον). As it is undoubted that shiḳmîm and shiḳmôth refer to the sycomore, we conclude that the LXX so understood συκάμινος. The true sycamine is therefore mentioned but once in the canonical books of the Bible and once in Apocr. (1 Mac 6^{34} μόρος, AV and RV 'mulberry'). It is a fine tree of the order Urticaceæ, with a hemispherical comus, 20–30 ft. high. Its leaves are cordate-ovate, undivided or more or less lobed and toothed. They are too tough to be suitable food for the silkworm, like those of the White Mulberry, Morus alba, L. The fruit resembles in size and shape the larger varieties of blackberries. It really consists of an aggregation of flowers, in an oblong spike, the succulent part of the fruit being the fleshy sepals. It has a pleasant acid taste, and is sold in all Oriental fruit markets. It is so abundant in Damascus as to be known as tût-shâmî=Damascus Mulberry. Neither it nor the white mulberry is to be confounded with the 'mulberry trees' of 2 S $5^{23.\,24}$, 1 Ch $14^{14.\,15}$; see MULBERRY.

SYCAMORE, SYCOMORE.—As pointed out under SYCAMINE, the Heb. שִׁקְמִים and שִׁקְמוֹת refer to the sycomore, which must not be confused with the tree known by that name in England and America—Acer pseudo-platanus, L., the false plane tree. The reference is to a tree of the same order, Urticaceæ, as the sycamine. It is of the same genus as the fig, and known in botany as Ficus Sycomorus, L., Arab. jummeiz. It has a flattened spherical comus, from 15–50 ft. high, often one-sided, as in the illustration, and sometimes shading an area 60–80 ft. in diameter. As it is very frequently planted by roadsides, its long, nearly horizontal branches project over the road. It was therefore eminently a suitable tree for Zaccheus to climb (Lk 19^{4}) in order to see Jesus passing. Seated on its lowest branch, he would be within easy speaking distance of the Saviour. The foliage also is not usually dense, esp. in the old trees by waysides. The trunks often attain a very large size, sometimes 30-40 ft. in circumference. The leaves are ovate-subcordate. The fruit is a small, not very palatable fig, about 1 in. long, growing thick together on curious little leafless twigs on the trunk or large branches. Whatever may have been the custom in ancient times in regard to puncturing the figs of the sycomore to cause them to ripen, or to improve their flavour, this is no longer done in Palestine. The fruit is either shaken down or plucked as it ripens, and eaten without any preparation. It ripens in successive instalments almost throughout the year. The wood of the sycomore, although light and porous, is durable. It was used in Egypt for mummy cases. It is not now so common in the Holy Land as to furnish much available timber, but it was formerly very plentiful, esp. in the low lands (1 K 10^{27}, 1 Ch 27^{28}). It occurred, however, in the hill-country also. Amos, a Judæan shepherd, collected (?)* its fruit (7^{14}). The destroying of sycomore trees by frost (Ps 78^{47}) was phenomenal, as frost is exceedingly rare in Egypt. At the same time it was a great disaster, as the sycomore was much cultivated there for the industrial uses of its wood. Sycaminopolis (Haifa) derived its name from this tree. G. E. POST.

SYCHAR (ABℵ Συχάρ; Vulg. Sichar).—Jesus passing through Samaria, on His way from Judæa to Galilee, came 'to a city of Samaria called Sychar,' which was 'near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph' (Jn 4^{5}); and Jacob's well was there (v.^{6}). The identification of Sychar has been the subject of much discussion. All commentators now agree that 'Sychar' is the correct reading, and not a copyist's error for 'Shechem' as Jerome and Epiphanius held. But the question remains whether Sychar was Shechem or another place in the vicinity of Shechem.

It has been urged that, in consequence of the hatred which existed between the Jews and the Samaritans, the Jewish common people ironically called Shechem Shikkor, 'drunken,' or Sheḳer, 'falsehood.' But there is no evidence either in Josephus, the Targum, or the Talmud of their ever having done so; and the only support of the theory seems to be that Isaiah (28$^{1.3}$), referring, apparently, to the city of Samaria, denounces the 'drunkards' (shikkōrim) of Ephraim; and that the expression in Hab 2^{18}, a 'teacher of lies' (mōreh sheḳer), which refers to idolatry, contains an allusion to Moreh and Shechem. These interpretations are too forced, and the suggestion of Trench (Studies in the Gospels, p. 86), that St. John 'was himself the author of the nickname,' is too far-fetched. Another view is that m and r are often confounded in pronunciation (Olshausen and Lücke, Com. z. Ev. Joh. i. 512), and that Sycha*r* comes from Syche*m* as pronounced by the Greek residents (cf. Belia*r* for Belia*l*, 2 Co 6^{15}, Eph 2^{2}). The change from e to a is not, however, explained. Jerome (Ep. Paul. and Quæst. Gen.) says that Sychar and Sychem are the same place, but he gives no evidence, and attributes the altered form to a copyist's error. This view has been adopted by Epiphanius and the pilgrims Arculf (A.D. 670), Theoderich (A.D. 1172), Maundeville (A.D. 1312), etc.; and in modern times by Robinson, Stanley, Guérin, and Riehm (HWB).

It is more logical to take Sychar to be another place in the vicinity of Shechem. The writer of the Fourth Gospel was well acquainted with the OT, which sufficiently indicates the position of Shechem; and it is inconceivable that he should have described a well-known town with such a history and with so many sacred associations as 'a city of Samaria near the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.' It is also highly improbable that St. John, in this particular narrative, would have referred to Shechem by a nickname. St. Stephen (Ac 7^{16}) uses the LXX form, Sychem (Συχέμ), and this would probably have been employed by the evangelist if he had not intended to indicate another place. Sychar and Sychem are, in fact, distinguished in ancient documents. Eusebius (Onom.) says that Sychar was 'before,' that is 'east' of Neapolis (Nâblus), which he distinguishes from Sychem—a place in its suburbs, near Joseph's tomb. Jerome (Onom.) translates this description without remark. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) makes a distinction between Neapolis, Sichem, and Sichar, and places the last one Roman mile from Sichem. Sychar is also mentioned as a distinct place from Neapolis and Shechem by Abbot Daniel (A.D. 1106), Fetellus (A.D. 1130), and John of Würzburg (A.D. 1160). All these pilgrims apparently refer to el-'Askar,—a village on the lower slopes of Mt. Ebal, which has a fine spring,—'Ain el-'Askar, and gives its name, Sahel 'Askar, to the northern portion of the plain of el-Mukhna. This village answers much better than such a well-known place as Shechem to the casual notice of St. John. Robinson (Later Researches, p. 133) held that 'the fact that 'Askar begins with the letter 'Ain excludes all idea of affinity with the name Sychar.' But there are cases, such as Ascalon ('Askulân), in which the Aleph of the Hebrew has changed to an 'Ain. In the Samaritan Chronicle, which cannot be later than the 14th cent. A.D., mention is made of a town, apparently near Shechem, that is called Ischar,—merely a vulgar pronunciation of Sychar,—and the Samaritans, in translating their Chronicle into Arabic, call this place 'Askar. Thus the transition is traceable from the Hebrew form, through the Samaritan Ischar, to the Arabic 'Askar (Conder, Tent-Work, i. 75). The Mishna mentions a place called 'the plain of En-Sokher,' which is perhaps Sychar (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 169). Schwarz (HL p. 127) correctly identifies En-Sokher with 'Ain el-'Askar, and the plain with the Sahel 'Askar. There is thus a strong case for the identification of Sychar with el-'Askar. This view is supported by Thomson (L. and B. ch. 31), Williams (Smith's D. of G. ii. 412*b*), Raumer (Pal. p. 163), Ewald (Gesch. iv. 284, v. 348, 3rd ed.), Derenbourg (Géog. du Talmud, p. 169), Caspari, Neubauer, Conder, Smith (HGHL p. 367 ff.—a good summary of the question), Tristram, and others. SYCHEM (Συχέμ; Sichem).—The Greek (LXX Gn 12^{6} etc.) form of Shechem. It occurs only in the speech of St. Stephen (Ac 7^{16}), according to which the twelve sons of Jacob were buried in Sychem, in the tomb that Abraham bought of Hamor (Emmor) in Sychem. See SHECHEM.

Although in the above-named passage in Acts the strictly accurate reproduction of the original demands Sychem (so AV), RV, consistently with its practice of following the Hebrew in the case of OT names, gives Shechem. C. W. WILSON.

i. THE NAME.—Synagogue is the name applied to the place of assembly used by Jewish communities primarily for the purpose of public worship. The Gr. συναγωγή stands for the assembly itself, and represents in the LXX in most instances the Heb. עֵדָה. So also in the Heb. Sirach (e.g. 4^{7} 41^{18}) עֵדָה answers to the συναγωγή of the Gr. text. The Aramaic versions of the Bible reproduce עֵדָה by כְּנִישְׁתָּא (Syr. כנושתא). The verb כנש, from which this Aram. substantive is derived, has its representative in Hebrew in the rare verb כנס, which is used in Est 4^{16} of the assembling of the Jews of Susa for a religious fast. The common Heb. verb אסף is translated in Aramaic by כנש, in Greek by συνάγω (cf. e.g. Jl 2^{16}). From כנס (of which the verbal noun is כְּנִיסָה in the special sense of assembling for worship, Megilla, i. 1, Gen. rab. ch. 49, on Gn 18^{42}) was formed, as the equivalent of the Aram. כנישתא, the subst. כְּנֶסֶת, which may indeed stand for any gathering, but which appears at a very early date to have acquired the special sense of an assemblage for worship. It was perhaps originally this special sense that was attached to the word when the gathering of which we read in Neh 9^{1}–10^{40} was called כנסת הגדולה 'the great assembly' [נאספו of Neh 9^{1} is translated in Pesh. by אתכנשו, in LXX by συνήχθησαν]; for this epoch-making assembly had the marks of a worshipping body (fasting, reading of the Torah, confession of sin, prayer). See art. SYNAGOGUE (THE GREAT). The house, in which the meeting for worship was held, was called בֵּית הַכְּנֶסֶת (Aram. בֵּי כְּנִישְׁתָּא), but the words כְּנֶסֶת and כְּנִישְׁתָּא standing alone may also be used for the place of meeting. It is noteworthy that in the Pal. Talmud the use of כנישתא predominates, in the Bab. Talmud בי כנישתא. The plural of כְּנֶסֶת is כְּנֵסִיּוֹת (from a supposed *כְּנֵסִית; cf. משניות, plur. of משנה), hence בָּתֵּי כְנֵסִיּוֹת='synagogues.' To this plural goes back the sing. form כְּנֵסִיָּה, of which there is only an isolated occurrence (Aboth, iv. 11; the reading כְּנֵסָה, cited by Taylor, is not sufficiently authenticated), which is not the equivalent in meaning of כְּנֶסֶת, but stands for an association or society in general. In this more general sense of כְּנֵסִיָּה we should also understand the plural found in Aboth, iii. 10, and Echa rabbathi, Prooem., No. 10.—The shorter expression כְּנֶסֶת or כְּנִישְׁתָּא (without בֵּית or בֵּי) finds its representative in the Gr. συναγωγή, which in the NT and Josephus stands for the place of worship, the synagogue. Cf. Philo, Quod omnis probus liber, § 12 (of the Essenes): εἰς ἱεροὺς ἀφικνούμενοι τόπους οἳ καλοῦνται συναγωγαί.

Another Gr. name for the synagogue is προσευχή, which occurs especially in Philo (in Flaccum, § 6, 7, 14, Leg. ad Gaium, § 20, 23, 43, 46), but is found also elsewhere (3 Mac 7^{20}, Ac 16^{13}; Jos. Vita, 54; inscriptions ap. Schürer, GJV^{3} ii. 443). It appears in Latin (proseucha) in Juv. Sat. iii. 296. As συναγωγή is shortened from οἶκος συναγωγῆς, so is προσευχή from οἶκος προσευχῆς. The corresponding Heb. expression is found in Deutero-Isaiah, not only in 56^{7} (בית תפלתי, בית תפלה), but also in 60^{7}, where בית תפארתי is rendered in the LXX by ὁ οἶκος τῆς προσευχῆς μου, so that the original reading must have been ב' תפלתי. The Jewish tradition-literature offers only once, in an anecdote of the Bab. Talmud (Giṭṭin, 39*b*), the half-Aramaic half-Heb. בי תפלה. Once (Midrash Tehillim on Ps 4) the synagogue is called מקום תפלתו, 'his (God's) place of prayer.' Philo has also προσευκτήριον, 'place of prayer' (Vita Mosis, iii. 27).

In an edict of the emperor Augustus the synagogue is called σαββατεῖον, 'house of Sabbath-keeping' (Jos. Ant. XVI. vi. 2), to which corresponds in later times the Syr. בית שבתא דיהודיי, plur. בית שבי (see Payne-Smith, col. 497).

One other term may be mentioned, כְּנֶסֶת יִשְׂרָאֵל used by the Agada as a personification of the whole body of Israel, the Jewish people. In the Tannaite literature the expression is still rare (see Bacher, Die älteste Terminologie der jüdischen Schriftauslegung, p. 85), but it is very frequent in the post-Tannaite Agada (from the 3rd cent. onwards; see the passages cited under 'Gemeinde Israels' in the Index to Bacher's Agada der pal. Amoräer, vols. i. ii. iii.). It is the same kind of personification as took place when the analogous term ἐκκλησία was adopted as a designation for the whole body of adherents of the Christian faith. For the use of the term by the Church Fathers see Schürer^{3}, ii. 432.

ii. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE SYNAGOGUE.—1. The first beginnings of the synagogue as an institution of Judaism are involved in complete obscurity. The later Tradition represents it, like other more recent institutions, as in existence from the earliest times. According to the Pal. Targ. on Ex 18^{20}, this verse already contains an allusion to the prayers to be repeated in the synagogues; the Targ. on 1 Ch 16^{39} states that the great place of offering at Gibeon was a synagogue. An anonymous Midrash (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 129*b*) makes three contemporary prophets proclaim the word of God in three different places: Jeremiah in the public squares, Zephaniah in the synagogues, Huldah among the women. The 'house of the people' (Jer 39^{8}) was, according to a Midrash cited by D. Kimchi, the synagogue (see also Rashi's Com. ad loc.; L. Löw, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 8, wrongly cites here the Targum). Although a tradition of the 2nd cent. tells us that uneducated people were accustomed to call the synagogue בֵּית עַמָּא (Simon b. Eleazar, Shabbath, 32*a*), this explanation of the expression בית העם in Jeremiah cannot be taken seriously. Philo and Josephus (see Schürer^{3}, ii. 429) both believed that the institution of the synagogue goes back to Moses, and the same notion perhaps finds expression in the words of the Apostle James in Ac 15^{21} 'For Moses from generations of old (ἐκ γενεῶν ἀρχαίων) hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath.'

In all probability, the germs of the future institution of the synagogue should be sought during the Babylonian exile. Thus the historical reality is not so very far removed from the view which the Targ. on Ezk 11^{16} attaches to the words וָאֱהִי לָהֶם לְמִקְדָּשׁ מְעַט, namely, that when Israel was scattered among the nations God gave them the synagogue as a compensation for the loss of the sanctuary. Amongst the exiles torn from their homes, but brought nearer to God and His teaching, the need must have made itself felt of a medium for cultivating, in common, religious emotions and for receiving religious instruction. The absence of the sacrificial cultus during the Exile, the higher significance to which Sabbath observance attained, the regular fast-days (cf. Zec 7^{5}, Is 58) augmented this sense of need, which would find satisfaction in gatherings at fixed places and times. All these considerations, which were at work in Babylon, made their influence felt also in Palestine, when Israel after the Return struck new roots in the old home, and the religious life, in spite of the fact that the newly-built temple at Jerusalem was its central point, gained a basis independent of the sacrificial cultus. In particular, the activity of Ezra and his successors the scribes guided the development of the religious life in a direction which was bound to lead to the rise of synagogues all over the country. Hence we may confidently place the origin of the synagogue in Palestine at the period of the Persian domination. There is indeed no express and unmistakable mention of the synagogue either in the Persian or in the first two centuries of the Greek era. Even the narratives about the religious persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes are silent as to synagogues. At most, the 74th Psalm, if it really belongs to the Maccabæan age, may be cited as the earliest source where the synagogue is named; for מועדי אל (v.^{8}) may very well be interpreted, with Aquila and the Midrash on Psalms, as a name for the places of assembly throughout the land consecrated to God, מוֹעֵד being thus a poetical equivalent of בית הכנסת (Löw cites, in illustration of the expression, בֵּית מוֹעֵד of Job 30^{22}; cf., also, בית ועד, Aboth, i. 4).—Express notices of the synagogue, so far as these are found in the literature, belong for the most part to the last century of the Second Temple. But in all cases where it is mentioned the synagogue appears as an institution that has long existed, and as the central point of the organized social life of the Jews.

2. In Jerusalem itself, immediately before the destruction of the city by Titus, there were 394 (Bab. Kethub. 105*a*), or, according to another version (Jerus. Megilla, 73*d* and oft.), 480 synagogues. Even if these figures are exaggerated, the number of synagogues in Jerusalem must be thought of as very large. Apart from the synagogues belonging to the inhabitants proper of the capital, there were others for the various communities of foreign Jews settled in Jerusalem. A Tannaite tradition mentions the synagogue of the Alexandrians at Jerusalem (Tos. Megilla, ii. 224^{26}, Jerus. Megilla, 73*d*^{40}; otherwise Bab. Megilla, 26*a*). The Acts of the Apostles (6^9) also names the synagogue of the Alexandrians, along with the synagogues of the Cyrenians, Cilicians, and Asians; the Hellenistic members of these synagogues dispute with Stephen (ib. cf. 9^{29}). In the temple itself there was a synagogue, which Joshua b. Chananja mentions from recollections of his own (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^{18}), and of whose functionaries we hear also from other quarters (Yoma, vii. 1; Sota, vii. 7, 8). On the synagogues of Jerusalem cf. also Jerus. Sukka, 54*a*^{45}.

Of the synagogues of Palestine the Gospels name Nazareth (Mt 13^{54}, Mk 6^2, Lk 4^{16}) and Capernaum (Mk 1^{21}, Lk 7^5, Jn 6^{59}) as those in which Jesus taught. The synagogue of Dora was built by Agrippa I. (Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3); the synagogue of Cæsarea became a moving cause of the rising against Rome (BJ II. xiv. 4–5), and in memory of this continued to be called in the 4th cent. 'the revolution synagogue' (בנישתא דמרדתא, Jerus. Bikkurim, 65*d*^{17} et al.; see Graetz, Gesch. d. Juden^{2}, iv. 313). The great synagogue of Tiberias is mentioned by Josephus (Vita, 54). During the three centuries that followed the destruction of Jerusalem, the Talmudical literature names various Pal. synagogues: for instance, those that were the centres of scribal activity: Sepphoris (the 'great synagogue,' Pesikta, 136*b*; the 'synagogue of the Babylonians,' Jerus. Berakhoth, 9*a*^{32}, Shabb. 8*a*^{42}; the 'synagogue of the vine' [ב' דגופנא], Jerus. Berakhoth, 6*a*, et al.); Tiberias (Erubin, x. 10; 'the 13 synagogues of Tiberias,' Berakhoth, 8*a*, 30*b*; the 'synagogue of the senate-house' [βουλή, ב' דבולי], Jerus. Taan. 64*a*^{51}, see Die Agada der pal. Amor. iii. 100); Cæsarea (see above); Lydda (Jerus. Shekalim, v., end). There is mention, further, of the synagogues of Beth-shean [Scythopolis] (Jerus. Meg. 74*a*^{67}); Kiphra or Kuphra (Jerus. Taan. 68*b*^{34}, Meg. 70*a*^{49}; in Pesikta rabb., ed. Friedmann, p. 196^b כפר של טבריא 'village of Tiberias'); Maon (Shabb. 139*a*, Zebach. 118*b*); Sichnin (Jerus. Meg. 75*b*^{41}); Tibein (Tos. Meg. 223^{13}).

In Babylonia the oldest synagogues were counted to be that of Shaph-Jethîb at Nahardea (Megilla, 29*b*, Rosh hash. 24*b*, Aboda zara, 43*b*, Nidda, 13*a*), and that of Huẓal (Megilla, 29*b*). The founding of the former was ascribed to king Jehoiachin. From the 3rd cent. there is witness for a 'synagogue of Daniel' (Erubin, 21*a*). In Machuza there was in the 4th cent. a 'synagogue of the Romans' (ב' דרומאי, Meg. 26*b*).

In Syria specially famous was the great synagogue of Antioch, to which the successors of Antiochus Epiphanes presented the brazen vessels which had been carried off from the temple at Jerusalem (Jos. BJ VII. iii. 3). On this synagogue, on whose site arose in the 4th cent. the Christian basilica dedicated to the Maccabæan martyrs, see Cardinal Rampolla in Revue de l'Art Chrétien, 1899, p. 390.—The Apostle Paul preached in various synagogues at Damascus (Ac 9^{20}, cf. v.^{2}). The narrative of the journeys of the same apostle makes mention of synagogues in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece: for instance, those of Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13^{14}), Iconium (14^1), Ephesus (18^{19}), Philippi (16^{13}), Thessalonica (17^1), Berœa (17^{10}), Athens (17^{17}), Corinth ($18^{4.7}$). There were several synagogues at Salamis in Cyprus (13^1).

The numerous Jewish population of Alexandria had, according to the testimony of Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, § 20), many synagogues in the different quarters of the city. The largest of these was the famous basilica, of which the Tannaite tradition of the 2nd cent. gives a hyperbolical but yet very graphic description (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^{20}; Jerus. Sukka, 55*a*, bottom; Bab. Sukka, 51*a*). The founding of the synagogue of Ptolemais is related in 3 Mac 7^{20}.

We learn from Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, § 23) that as early as the time of Augustus there were a number of synagogues in Rome. The names of several of these have been preserved in the inscriptions (see Schürer^3, iii. 44 ff.). An ancient literary tradition names the 'synagogue of Severus' at Rome (see Epstein in Monatsschrift für Gesch. u. Wiss. des Judenthums, 1885, p. 338).

The memory of many synagogues of the Diaspora is preserved in early Greek inscriptions. Specially noteworthy are the ruins of ancient synagogues at several spots in northern Galilee, 'of which the oldest date from the second or even the first cent. A.D.' (Schürer^2, ii. 445).

3. At the time of the rise of Christianity every Jewish community, whether in Palestine or in the Diaspora, certainly had its synagogue. The words of St. James quoted above are in harmony with the testimony of Philo, who speaks of the places of prayer that existed in every city as so many places of instruction in virtue and piety (Vita Mos. iii. 27: τὰ κατὰ πόλεις προσευκτήρια τί ἕτερόν ἐστιν ἢ διδασκαλεῖα κ.τ.λ.). Hence there is a reflexion of the real condition of things when in a Tannaite saying of the 1st or 2nd cent. (R. 'Aḳiba already glosses it) the synagogue is named as one of the qualifications of a city in which a scribe may settle down (Sanhedrin, 17*b*, bottom). When in the Tannaite hălāchā the synagogue is looked upon as the property of the city (Nedarim, v. 5), the places in view are such as are inhabited wholly or for the most part by Jews, for in these the political and the religious body are one and the same. Where there is no synagogue, the citizens (בני העיר 'sons of the city') have the right to demand that one be built and 'to compel one another to do this' (Tos. Baba meẓia, xi. 396^{29}). The same rule applies to the procuring of the necessary copy of the Pentateuch and the Prophets for the synagogue (ib.).—The members of the community belonging to the same synagogue are called בני הכנסת ('sons of the synagogue'), a designation which has a special significance when there are a number of synagogues in the same place. See the use of the expression in Tos. Megilla, ii. 223^{20}; Bar. Moed ḳaṭon, 22*b*, bottom; Bekhoroth, v. 5; Zabim, iii. 2. In Tos. Megilla, iii. ad init. (224^{10}) the members of the synagogal community are opposed to the rulers of the city (פרנסי העיר).—With reference to the right to alienate a synagogue to another use, the casuistry of the Pal. Amoras draws a distinction between private synagogues (בית הכנסת של יחיד) and public synagogues (ב׳ ה׳ של רבים); see Jerus. Megilla, 73*d*^{38} and 74*a*^{57}. The corresponding passage of the Bab. Talmud (Meg. 26*a*) distinguishes village from city synagogues (ב׳ ה׳ של כפרים, כרכים).—The possibility of a private house being converted into a synagogue is considered in the Tannaite hălāchā (Nedarim, ix. 2, cf. Jerus. Meg. 73*d*^{49}). As a rule, the synagogues were buildings specially erected for the purpose. In spite of the public character of the synagogal buildings they were subjected to certain ceremonial regulations applicable to dwelling-houses (Tos. Negaim, vi. 625^{17}, Bar. Yoma, 11*b*). A varying tradition (Yoma, ib.) distinguishes between synagogues which contain a dwelling for the synagogue attendant (דירה לחזן הכנסת) and those that do not.—The Tannaite hălāchā deals with the contingency of a non-Jew supplying the building material for a synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 224^{20}). This recalls the case of the Roman centurion at Capernaum, who had built a synagogue for the Jews (Lk 7^5).—The consecration attaching to the synagogal building in virtue of its sacred destination does not cease entirely even when the building is no longer used for its original purpose. A synagogue may be sold only on condition that it is not used for dishonourable purposes (Meg. ii. 2). It is even considered a profanation of its sacred character to enter a synagogue for shelter from the burning sun or from frost or rain (Tos. Meg. iii. 224^{27}; Bab. Meg. 28*a b*). Citing the circumstance that even the ruined holy places are called sanctuaries (Lv 26^{31}), Jehuda b. Ilai (2nd cent.) teaches that even the ruins of synagogues are not to be used for profane purposes (Meg. iii. 3). The Bab. Amora Chisda (3rd cent.) prohibits the pulling down of a synagogue until another has been built (Meg. 26*b*, Baba bathra, 3*b*).—In Babylonia there appear to have been two kinds of synagogue—winter and summer synagogues (Baba bathra, 3*b*; see Löw, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 97).

iii. SITUATION OF THE BUILDING, STYLE OF ARCHITECTURE, ETC.—1. A Tannaite tradition, appealing to Pr 1^{21}, lays down the rule that the synagogue should be built 'on the height of the city,' i.e. upon a commanding point (Tos. Meg. iii. 227^{16}). With reference to this, a later Midrash (Tanchuma, בחקותי 4, ed. Buber, iii. 10) declares: 'In early times the synagogue was built on the height of the city.' So also Rab in Babylon (3rd cent.) taught: 'A city whose roofs overtop the synagogue is given over to destruction' (Shabb. 11*a*). Of course these words can apply only to synagogues built within the city, and there can be no doubt that this was the case with the synagogues in Palestine. On the other hand, there is evidence that in Babylonia the synagogues were frequently outside the city. The Bab. Talmud speaks of synagogues which are 'in the neighbourhood of the city,' and presupposes others which are at a greater distance from it (Kiddush. 73*b*, cf. Shabb. 24*b*, and also the Comm. of Rashi, s. סכנה).

Allusion is made to such extra-mural synagogues in a Midrash on Ec 12^5, where the old man, to whom the walk to the synagogue is a hard task, is addressed in the words בוא ונצא אל בית הכנסת ('come let us go to the synagogue,' Tanchuma, ed. Buber, חיי שרה, 7). On the other hand, we are not to follow L. Löw (Gesam. Schriften, iv. 15) in seeing in the interpretation of the 'well in the field' (Gn 29^2) as an allegory of the synagogue (Gen. rabba, ch. 70) an allusion to the situation of synagogues outside the city; for the expression 'in the field' is as indifferent for the purpose of the allegory as it is in the immediately preceding interpretation of the well as an allegory of the Sanhedrin. Nor does the passage Pesikta, 158*a* (ed. Buber), refer to synagogues in the country (Löw, ib. note 2), but the contrast there is between prayer in the open country and prayer in the synagogue inside the city (cf. Midrash Tehillim on Ps 3, ed. Buber, p. 46).

The fact that the synagogues in Babylonia were—partly at least—outside the cities was perhaps connected with the circumstance that at the beginning of the Sassanide rule the synagogues were destroyed by the Persians (Yoma, 10*a*), and the rebuilding of them within the cities was not allowed.

To another category belong the statements from which it has been inferred that it was customary to build the synagogues by a running stream or by the sea. None of these statements, moreover, refer to either Palestine or Babylonia. During St. Paul's stay at Philippi it is said (Ac 16^{13}): 'And on the sabbath day we went forth without the gate, by a river side, where we supposed there was a place of prayer.' The synagogue of Philippi was thus situated by a river outside the city. The assumption that it would be found there shows that this must have been the case elsewhere also. The municipality of Halicarnassus expressly granted permission to the Jews to perform their devotions, according to their ancestral habit, by the seashore (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 23). But here there is no mention of a synagogue, but simply of prayer in the open air. We may recall in this connexion the religious fasts that were held in Palestine in the open market-place of the town (Taanith, ii. 1). It is the same allusion to the fasts of the Jews that underlies the similar statements of Tertullian (de Jejunio, 16; ad Nationes, i. 13; see Schürer^3, ii. 447). In like manner the Jews of Alexandria betook themselves, in their time of straits, to the seashore, to pray there 'in the purest place' (ἐν καθαρωτάτῳ; Philo, in Flaccum, § 14). This remark of Philo throws light upon the custom of the Jews living among the heathen of praying by the seashore, and perhaps also upon the building of the synagogue by a river, which is witnessed for Philippi. The motive would be to avoid the interior of the city polluted by idolatry, and to seek the 'purest' places for prayer, namely, the banks of rivers and the seashore. The same notion finds expression also in the ancient Midrash on Ex 12^1 (Mechilta, ad init.): Moses prays outside the city (Ex 9^{33}), because it was full of abominations and idolatry (see Kohler, Monatsschrift, xxxvii. 442; Blau, Magyar-Zsidó Szemle, x. 494). Once more, it may be noted that at Corinth the synagogue was inside the city; for the house of Titius Justus, where St. Paul lived, 'joined hard to the synagogue' (Ac 18^7).

2. The style of building adopted in the ancient synagogues of Palestine is illustrated by the above-mentioned ruins in N. Galilee. 'Almost all these synagogues lie north and south, so that the entrance is at the south. As a rule they appear to have had three doors in front—one principal entrance and two smaller side doors. In some instances it can still be seen that the building was divided by two rows of pillars into three aisles. Some had a portico in front. In general the style was influenced by the Græco-Roman, although it shows very characteristic differences from it. In particular it was marked by a wealth of overladen ornamentation' (Schürer^3, ii. 446). This orientation of the synagogue from north to south contradicts a prescription of the Tannaite hălāchā (Tos. Megilla, iv. 227^{15}), according to which the synagogue entrance, like that of the sanctuary (Nu 3^{38}), is to be at the east. One is tempted to assume that this rule, found only in the Tosephta, has in view Babylonia and other lands to the east of Palestine; for in these the orientation from east to west corresponds with the direction prescribed to the congregation at prayer in the synagogue. In the Tosephta there are other traces of Babylonian redaction. As far as the synagogues of Galilee are concerned, their orientation, as the ruins show, was the opposite of the direction prescribed for prayer. In an early halachic tradition (Siphrê on Deut. § 29, 70*b*; Bab. Berakh. 30*a*) it is said, upon the ground of 1 K 8^{48}, that during prayer the worshipper must face towards Jerusalem and the sanctuary: those dwelling in the north stand with their face to the south, those in the south face the north, those in the west the east, those in the east the west. From this it follows that the worshippers in the synagogues of N. Galilee would turn in prayer towards the entrance. The direction towards the sanctuary, i.e. towards that part of the synagogue which is turned towards the sanctuary, is dealt with in the following rules, which are likewise found only in the Tosephta (Megilla, iv. 227^{11}):—

> 'The elders (וקנים) take their places facing the people, and with their back to the sanctuary (כלפי קודש). The book-press in the synagogue is so placed that its front is towards the people, its back to the sanctuary. When the priests lift up their hands to bless, they stand with their face to the people, their back to the sanctuary. The synagogue attendant (ḥazzan) stands with his face turned towards the sanctuary, which is also the direction in which all the people face.'

In the above quotation קודש may be a designation of the particular side of the synagogue itself. In any case, we may assume that this part of the building was not always opposite the entrance.

In the case of two considerable synagogues, we know that they had the form of a basilica with a double row of pillars. The expression διπλῆ στοά is used of both of them. One is the famous great synagogue of Alexandria mentioned above; the other is that of Tiberias, to which an author of the 4th cent. (see Agada der pal. Amor. iii. 672, from Midr. Tehillim on Ps 93, end) applies that designation.

According to Philo (in Flaccum, § 7) there were exhibited in the περίβολοι of the synagogue of Alexandria dedicated gifts and inscriptions set up in honour of the emperors (Schürer^3, ii. 446, iii. 52).

3. Of the furnishings of the synagogue the most important was the press (תֵּיבָה) in which the sacred writings were kept. The complete expression is תיבה של ספרים (Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683^8); rarely do we find the Aram. term ארונא (=Heb. אָרוֹן), Jerus. Meg. $73d^{61, 65}$. The same 2nd cent. tradition which censures the use of בית עמא by uneducated persons as a term for the synagogue (see p. 636^b), condemns in the same way the employing of the term ארונא for the book-press (Shabbath, 32*a*). It appears that in popular speech ארון or ארונא meant either a coffin or a press for keeping victuals (see Kelim, xii. 3), and hence the word תיבה established itself for the press of the synagogue which served a sacred purpose. It appears in Aram. as תיבותא (Jerus. Berakh. $9c^{38, 43}$; Bab. Meg. 26*b*), and is reproduced by the Gr. κιβωτός (Chrys. Orat. adv. Jud. vi. 4).

The press was furnished with a species of canopy called כילה (Jerus. Meg. $73d^{61}$; see Levy, ii. 318*b*), which was spread over it before the commencement of the Sabbath (Jerus. Shabb. $17c^{42}$). In Babylonia its name was פירסא (Meg. 26*b*). As long as the congregation remained in the synagogue the press was not to be denuded of this adornment (Bab. Sota, 39*b*, להפשיט התיבה).

The press appears to have been placed in a shut-off part of the synagogue, with a curtain in front of it which, like the curtain in the sanctuary, bore the name פרוכת (Aram. פרוכתא). Behind this curtain took place the rolling up of the Torah after the reading of the Scripture lesson (Jerus. Sota, $22a^{22}$; Jerus. Meg. $75b^{60}$; Soph. xi. 3).

The cloths in which the copies of the sacred writings kept in the press were wrapped were called מִטְפָּחוֹת, or, in full, מ׳ של ספר or מ׳ של ספרים, also מ׳ ספרים (see Kelim, ix. 3, xxiv. 14; Negaim, xi. 6; Tos. Kilayim, v. 80^{18}; Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683^8). Such cloths were used elsewhere also to wrap up the books of Scripture: thus in Sanhed. 100*a* we read of the cloths in which, in the house of the Bab. Amora Jehuda (3rd cent.), the books were wrapped (מ׳ ספרי דבי רב יהודה). By מ׳ תיבה (Tos. Kilayim, v. 80^{18}) appear to be meant the cloths used to wrap up the books that lay in the synagogue press. From a controversy between the schools of Hillel and Shammai (Kelim, xxviii. 4) we learn that these cloths used to be adorned with embroideries (מצוירות). Little bells were also attached to them (זגים למ׳ ספרים, Tos. Kelim, i. 1, 579^{21}; Bab. Shabb. 58*b*).

In the graduated scale of consecration attaching to the synagogue and its furnishings, the press is holier than the building, the cloths for the Scriptures are holier than the press (Meg. iii. 1). In the hălāchā in question there is no mention of the chest (θήκη); hence it is probable that the תיק הספר of Shabb. xvi. 1 and the תיק הספרים of Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683^8, do not refer to the chest in which the synagogue Scriptures were kept.

Amongst the fittings of the synagogue was the tribune (בימה, i.e. βῆμα). There was a tribune of wood (בימה של עץ, cf. מגדל עץ of Neh 8^3; see art. PULPIT) also in the temple at Jerusalem, upon which king Agrippa I. stood—instead of sitting—and read the Torah at the Feast of Booths (Sota, vii. 7; Tos. Sota, vii. 307^{20}). There was a similar structure in the centre of the great synagogue of Alexandria, from which the signal to utter the Amen was given to the congregation (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^{23}). In small synagogues the tribune appears to have been in close proximity to the press; hence the pronouncement of the Bab. Amora Samuel (3rd cent.), preserved in the Pal. Talmud (Meg. $73d^{62}$), that the tribune and the tablets (בימה ולווחין) possess the degree of sacredness of the building but not of the press. The Bab. Talmud (Meg. 32*a*) speaks in like manner of the tablets and the tribunes (הלוחות והבימות). In the Midrash (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 84*a*) there is a story of how some one had טבלאות בימאות וספסלין made of a cedar tree (where טבלאות is the same as לוחות). But there is nowhere sufficient evidence what is to be understood by these 'tablets' which belonged to the furnishings of a synagogue. They may have been tablets inscribed with Bible texts (cf. Is 30^8), such as were used in connexion with elementary Scripture lessons (see Jelamdenu, cited in Friedmann's introduction to his edition of the Mechilta, p. xxxiv).

The above-mentioned ספסלין (i.e. subsellia), seats for the congregation, are named in Jerus. Meg. $73d^{61}$ as among the furnishings of a synagogue; they have the same degree of sacredness as the building. Along with the seats are named also קלטירה; but this word should be emended to קטידרה, which stands for the usual קתידרא (or קתידרה), i.e. cathedra (cf. Jerus. Shabb. $6a^2$ הספסל והקתידרא). Chairs were, no doubt, provided for the elders and scribes, who sat in a prominent place (see above, ii. § 5, and cf. the πρωτοκαθεδρία of Mt 23^6, Mk 12^{39}, Lk 11^{43}). So also in the great synagogue of Alex andria there were 71 chairs of gold (שבעים ואחת קתדראות של זהב) for the members of the great council there (Tos. Sukka, l.c.). On the 'chair of Moses,' which the Chinese Jews had in their synagogue instead of the bîmā (Almemor), see REJ xxxv. 110, and on the Μωσέως καθέδρα spoken of by Jesus in Mt 23^{2} see ib. xxxiv. 300.

At the reading of the Scriptures a reading desk (אנלגין של ספר, or, shortly, אנלגין [ἀναλογεῖον]) was used (Kelim, xvi. 17), which, as a piece of the synagogue furniture, had the same degree of sacredness as the building itself (Jerus. Meg. 73*d*^{64}).

We hear also of candelabra and lamps (מנורה, נר) being provided for the synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 224^{15}). The Pal. Talmud tells of a candelabrum which Antonine, to the great joy of the patriarch Jehuda, presented to a synagogue (Meg. 74*a*^{29}); the Bab. Talmud (Arakhin, 16*b*) relates how an Arab, named עורק, presented a lamp to the synagogue of Jehuda, the head of the school of Pumbeditha (3rd cent.). The Mishna (Terumoth, xi. 10) speaks of the oil which was burned in the synagogue, and also of the custom of keeping lamps burning in the synagogues on the Day of Atonement (Pesachim, iv. 4).

iv. SYNAGOGUE WORSHIP, OFFICIALS, ETC.—For the holding of public worship in the synagogue the presence of at least ten adult male persons is required. These constitute the minimum of a congregation (כְּנֶסֶת=עֵדָה). (See Sanhed. ii. 3, Meg. iv. 3). It once happened that Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (1st cent.), accompanied by his slave, came into the synagogue, and, finding that the requisite ten were not present, he gave the slave his freedom in order to make up the proper number (Pesach. 47*b*; Giṭṭin, 38*b*). With this story may be compared the testimony of the inscription of Pantikapæum, according to which a manumitted slave was bound to attend the synagogue regularly (Schürer^{3}, iii. 53). That was considered a great city in which there were at least ten synagogue members unencumbered by business (בטלנים), and who thus made it possible to hold a daily service (Meg. i. 3; Baba kamma, 82*a*; Sanhed. 17*b*; Jerus. Meg. 70*b*^{63}), whereas the great mass of the congregation could attend only on the Sabbath and on the festival days. At a later period the 'ten men of leisure' became a kind of institution in the congregation.

Women were not counted as members of the synagogue congregation. Yet even a woman could take part in the reading of the Sabbath lesson as one of the seven persons required on such an occasion; but it was considered objectionable, on grounds of decency (מפני כבוד הצבור), for a woman to read in public from the Torah (Tos. Meg. iv. 226^{4}; Bab. Meg. 23*a*). Women were zealous attenders of the synagogue. A Tannaite hălāchā (Aboda zara, 38*a b*) names as the two places for which a woman is wont to leave her house, the baths and the synagogue (cf. also Yoma, 15*b*).

Characteristic is the anecdote of the woman who had become very old and longed to leave this world. When she went to Jose b. Chalaphta (2nd cent.) with her complaint, he asked her: 'What duty art thou accustomed daily to perform?' She replied: 'It is my custom to neglect even what is dearest to me, in order that I may visit the synagogue daily.' Then he advised her to leave off for three successive days attending the synagogue. She followed his counsel and died on the third day (Jalkut Shimeoni, i. 871, from Jelamdenu).

In the Diaspora, women played an important rôle in synagogue life. St. Paul found in the synagogue of Philippi (see above) a gathering of women (Ac 16^{13}). On the inscriptions of S. Italy mater synagogæ appears side by side with pater synagogæ as a title of honour (Schürer^{3}, iii. 50). From Babylonia we have the information (Kiddushin, 81*a*) that two school heads of the 4th cent., Abaji and Raba, arranged that men and women should sit apart from each other in the synagogue. The members of the synagogue congregation were called בני הכנסת (see above); at their head was the ראש הכ' ('head of the synagogue,' Gr. ἀρχισυνάγωγος or [Lk 8^{41}] ἄρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς). The synagogue of the Jerus. temple had in like manner its head. The 'ruler of the synagogue' had the responsibility of maintaining order in the synagogue (see Lk 13^{14}); it was his part to decide who was to conduct the public worship (Ac 13^{15}). If he himself wished to take part in the reading of the Scriptures, he had to be invited by others to do so, because he could not of himself assume an honourable function (Tos. Meg. iv. 227^{10}). The 'ruler' was not a scribe, but he stood in rank immediately after the scribes (Pesachim, 49*b*, top; Giṭṭin, 60*a*, top). At mourning feasts it was customary, following a rule dating from the 2nd cent. (Jerus. Berakh. 6*a*^{33}; Semachoth, ch. 14, end), to drink a cup, with a blessing, to the health of the ruler of the synagogue. A more extended sense was assumed by the title 'ruler of the synagogue' in the Diaspora, as is evident from the Gr. and Lat. inscriptions, in which it frequently implies no function, but is simply an honorary title, bestowed even upon women and children (Schürer^{3}, ii. 438 f., iii. 49 f.).

The service of attendant in the synagogue as well as charge of the building and its furnishings was assigned to the synagogue official called חַזַּן הַכְּנֶסֶת (shortly חַזָּן).

The word חַזָּן was derived not only by Nathan b. Yechiel (Aruch, s.v.) but, before him, by Dûnash b. Labrât (10th cent.) from the verb חזה (Kritik gegen Saadja, ed. Schröter, No. 170). But this derivation is unsatisfactory from the point of view both of grammar and sense. It is better to assume that the root חזן has the same meaning as the identically sounding Arab. root خزن (see Perles, Monatsschrift, 1870, p. 521). This root is indeed unexampled elsewhere in Hebrew, but it is readily conceivable that alongside of חסן there existed also a root חזן with the same meaning (cf. עלז side by side by עלס). From the verb חזן='keep charge' was formed the subst. חַזָּן which was used to designate the man who had charge of the synagogue and its furnishings, and who had also to give attendance at the conducting of public worship.

Even the synagogue of the temple at Jerusalem had its ḥazzān (see Yoma, vii. 1; Sota, vii. 7, 8). The temple, however, had other attendants also called ḥazzānîm; see Sukka, iv. 4, where the subject is the keeping of the palm branches at the Feast of Booths, and Tamid, v. 3, where the keeping of the priests' garments is spoken of. The synagogue attendant is called in Greek ὑπηρέτης (Lk 4^{20}); Epiphanius (c. Hær. xxx. 11) knows also a Græcising of the Heb. word: Ἀζανιτῶν τῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς διακόνων ἑρμηνευομένων ἢ ὑπηρετῶν.—From the period while the temple at Jerusalem yet stood it is related that, along with the pilgrims who brought the firstlings to the sanctuary, the synagogue attendants (חוני בית הכנסת, var. lec. חזנין וכל בית הכ') also went up (Tos. Bikkurim, ii. 101^{29}).—The advent of the Sabbath and of festival days was announced by the ḥazzān from the roof of the synagogue, with a thrice-repeated trumpet blast which was the signal for the suspension of work (Tos. Sukka, iv. 199^{8}; cf. Chullin, i. 7; Jerus. Shabb. 16*a*^{53}; Bab. Shabb. 35). In the legend of the schoolmaster Naḳḳai (a contemporary of the Hadrianic persecutions) the latter is called both שמשא (attendant) and ספרא. Every Friday he arranges the lamps of the synagogue at Migdal-Zabba'aya (Jerus. Maaser sheni, 56*a*^{11}, Echa rabbathi on Ec 3^{7}).

During public worship it is the ḥazzān that calls to the performance of any function (Jerus. Berakh. 9*c*^{61}). He hands the copy of the Scriptures to the reader, and receives it back from the hands of the man who has read the final lesson (Soph. xiv. 3). Cf. Lk 4^{20}, where Jesus, having read the passage from the Prophets, returns the book to the attendant. The ḥazzān rolls up the Torah roll after the reading (Jerus. Meg. $75b^{59}$), and, after holding it up to view (Jerus. Sota, 21*d*, top), deposits it in the press. He calls upon the priests at the proper moment to pronounce the benediction (Siphrê on Nu 6^{23}, § 34, end; cf. Jerus. Giṭṭin, $47b^{61}$, Bab. Sota, 38*a*). On the occasion of religious fasts he indicates when the priests have to blow the trumpets (Bab. Taanith, 16*b*). In the great synagogue of Alexandria he waved a handkerchief as a signal to the congregation for the Amen (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^{23}). When the ḥazzān himself read the Scripture lesson, another had to wait upon him (ואחר מְחַזֵּן לו [this denom. verb does not occur elsewhere], Tos. Meg. iv. 227^{10}). The ḥazzān belonged to the scribal body, of which he constituted, as it were, the lowest grade. In an Aram. saying of Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (1st cent.) the scale is stated thus: חכימיא (scribes), ספריא (schoolmasters), חַזָּנַיָּא. At mourning feasts a cup was drunk in his honour (Jerus. Berakh. $6a^{33}$), as in the case of the ruler of the synagogue (see above). Even in early times it must have been customary, especially in smaller congregations, for the ḥazzān to read the Scripture lesson. An instance of this from the beginning of the 2nd cent. occurs in Bab. Meg. 25*b*. He acted also as leader in prayer. For an example from 3rd cent. see Jerus. Berakh. $12d^{46}$.—The patriarch Jehuda I. was requested by the inhabitants of an inconsiderable place to recommend to them one of his pupils to discharge the duties of preacher, judge, ḥazzān, and schoolmaster. His recommendation fell upon the afterwards so well-known Levi b. Sisi (Jerus. Yebam. $13a^{17}$; Gen. rabba, ch. 81, ad init.). In the 3rd cent. the Jewish inhabitants of Bostra (בוצרא) beg of Simeon b. Lakish to recommend to them some one capable of exercising all the functions necessary, as preacher, judge, schoolmaster, and ḥazzān (Jerus. Shebiith, $36d^{6}$). In the Midrash Ḳoheleth rabba (on Ec 7^{5} and 9^{15}) the ḥazzān already appears as leader of the prayer, in virtue of his office; i.e. the word ḥazzān has the character which it gained in the period of the Gaons, and which it has retained down to the present day (see also Soph. x. end, xi. ad init.; Pirke R. Eliezer, xiii. end).

Seeing that, as a rule, the instruction of children was also carried on in the synagogue, the ḥazzān acted, further, as assistant to the schoolmaster, or was himself schoolmaster, in addition to his other duties (Shabb. i. 3: החזן רואה היכן התינוקות קוראים). He discharged the functions also of an officer of the law court, carrying out, for instance, a sentence of scourging (see Makkoth, iii. 12; Tos. Makkoth, v. $444^{29, 31}$; cf. also Tos. Sanhed. ix. 428^{25} [=Jerus. Sanhed. $23a^{2}$: חזני כנסיות]). It appears, however, that officers of the law court bore the title ḥazzān, even when they were not at the same time synagogue attendants (see Jerus. Kiddushin, $65c^{18}$, Sanhed. $19c^{44}$ and $23d^{16}$; Bab. Shabb. 56*a*, 139*a*, Makkoth, 23*a*).—It is only in the Bab. Talmud (Kethuboth, 8*b*) that we meet with the title חזני העיר [the parallel passage of the Jerus. Talmud (Pesach. 6*a*) has חזן הכנסת], Aram. חזני מתא (Baba mezia, 93*b*). Cf. Arakhin, 6*b*: חזני רפומבריתא.

The leader in prayer who as the representative of the congregation recited aloud the prayers in the synagogue, was called שְׁלִיחַ צִבּוּר, ‘delegate of the whole’ (צִבּוּר is the name of the collective body assembled in the synagogue, in opposition to the individual, יָחִיד). This leading in prayer was a voluntary function discharged by members of the congregation who were qualified for it and invited to undertake it. According to a Tannaite tradition, the formula addressed to the person selected was not ‘Come and pray,’ but ‘Come and offer’ (בוא וקרב, Jerus. Berakh. $8b^{24}$). The uttering of prayer was considered the equivalent of the offering of sacrifice; hence the leader was called קְרוֹבָא (see Jerus. Berakh. 3*c*, bottom; Leviticus rabba, chs. 19. 20).—The leader in prayer stepped in front of the synagogue press; hence the function was known also as עבר לפני התיבה (see Berakh. v. 3, 4; Meg. iv. 3), Aram. עבר קומי תיבותא (Jerus. Berakh. $9c^{43}$). The prayer is preceded by the reciting of the Shema‘ and the Blessings connected with it; this function was called פרס על שמע [פרס means properly to break off a piece of bread and ask a blessing over it; in the expression before us it is used in the sense of to pronounce the Blessings attached to the Shema‘].

A principal part of the public worship of the synagogue is the reading from the Pentateuch and the Prophets. This office is discharged by members of the congregation, among a fixed number of whom the particular passage of the Pentateuch is portioned out. On the Sabbath the number of readers is seven, on festival days five, on the Day of Atonement six, at the New Moon and on the half-festival days of Passover and Feast of Booths four, on week days and on the afternoon of the Sabbath three (Meg. iv. 1, 2). After the reading of the Pentateuch lesson, a passage is read from the Prophets by one who may at the same time act as leader in prayer (ib. 5). When there is only one of the members of the synagogue who can read from the Scriptures, he reads the whole section (Tos. Meg. iv. 226^{5}).

The reading of the Scriptures was coupled with the translating of the Heb. text (in Palestine and Babylonia into Aramaic). The man who publicly gave the translation (Targum) in the synagogue was called תַּרְגְּמָן, also תּוּרְגְּמָן or מְתוּרְגְּמָן (see, on the correct pronunciation, Bacher, Die älteste Terminologie der jüd. Schriftauslegung, p. 206). The larger synagogues would have a Targumist or Mĕthôrgĕmān of their own. There was one of this class at Jamnia in the time of Gamaliel I. (1st cent.), namely Rabbi Chuẓpith, who was surnamed התורגמן (Berakh. 27*b*). In the 3rd cent. there was a Rabbi Hoshaya in Palestine with the (Aram.) surname תּוּרְגְּמָנָא (Gen. rabba, ch. 51, ad fin.). But as a rule it was the schoolmasters, those who from their calling were familiar with the Bible and had a traditional acquaintance with the Targum, that gave the translation. From the beginning of the 4th cent. comes a story of how Samuel b. Jiẓḥaḳ once came into a synagogue and saw that the schoolmaster read the translation from a written Targum (Jerus. Meg. $74d^{15}$ עאל לכנישתא חמא חד ספר מושט תרגומא מן גו סיפרא). But any one who was capable, even a minor, was entitled to give the Targum in the synagogue (Meg. iv. 6; Tos. Meg. iv. 227^{21}).

The reading of the Scriptures was followed, when a competent person was present, by an exposition of the lesson, or, in other words, by a sermon. It was customary to invite any stranger scribe who happened to be there, to deliver this address.

It is told of a Palestinian Amora of the 4th cent. how he once came to a strange place and followed up the lesson by a sermon (Lev. rabba, 3). Naḥum b. Simai, a Pal. teacher of the 3rd cent. preached in Tarsus (Pesikta rabbathi, ch. 15, 78*b*). In Midrash Tanchuma (Teruma, 1, ed. Buber, ii. p. 89) an anecdote is told of a scribe who, travelling by sea in company with some merchants, was derided by them when he boasted of the wares which he had by him, and which they sought in vain. When they landed, the merchants had their goods taken from them by the custom-house officials, while the scribe went into the synagogue, preached there, and was loaded with honours and gifts. In like manner Jesus travelled about in Galilee, teaching in the synagogues (διδάσκων ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς); see Mt 4^{23}, Lk 4^{15}; and cf. Mk 1^{21} 6^{2}, Lk 6^{6} 13^{10}, Jn 6^{59} 18^{20}.

The synagogue, as has been already said, was called also σαββατεῖον, because its principal purpose was to serve as the meeting-place of the congregation for public worship on Sabbaths (and festival days). From the period when the temple and its sacrificial cultus still existed at Jerusalem, the tradition is preserved that the body of men (מַעֲמָד) belonging to the division of priests in charge of the temple service for the week, assembled daily in the synagogue of their dwelling-place and read the Creation story of Gn 1 (Taanith, iv. 2; Tos. Taanith, iv. 219^{18}; Bab. Taanith, 27*b*). The second and fifth days of the week also saw from early times the congregation assembled in the synagogue, because on these days there was reading from the Torah (Tos. Taanith, ii. 217^{11}). But the practice of daily service could prevail only in larger towns where there were at least ten members unencumbered by business and thus able to give daily attendance at the synagogue (see p. 640^{a}). Nevertheless, it was enjoined by the scribes that every one should, as far as was in his power, discharge his duty of prayer by taking part in the common prayer of the synagogue.

An early Tannaite, Eliezer b. Jakob (1st cent.), introduces his pronouncement on prayer with the exhortation to pray in the synagogue (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 158*a*). A Tannaite of unknown date, Abba Benjamin, derives from 1 K 8^{28} the thesis that it is only prayer offered in the synagogue that is heard (Berakhoth, 5*b*). Joshua b. Levi (3rd cent.) gives this instruction to his sons: 'Going into the synagogue morning and evening prolongs life' (Berakhoth, 8*a*). Jiẓhak, a great Agadist of the 3rd cent., says in a paraphrase to Is $50^{10.\,11}$: 'If there is a man who is wont to go into the synagogue and on some particular day comes not, God inquires after him, saying, Where is the God-fearing one who is wont to be among you? He ought to have trusted in the name of the Eternal and left himself in the hands of his God, and not have absented himself from the house of God for the sake of gain or any worldly end' (Berakh. 6*b*). Another great Agadist of the 3rd cent., Levi, applying Jer 12^{14}, says: 'The man in whose place of abode there is a synagogue and who does not frequent it is called an "evil neighbour" of God' (Berakh. 8*a*). Another Pal. teacher of the 3rd cent., adopting an artificial explanation of Job 36^{5}, says: 'God does not leave unheard the prayer that is offered in company with the assembled congregation' (Berakh. 8*a*). A Pal. Agadist of the 4th cent., Jehuda b. Simon, makes Israel sing (Midrash, Tehillim on Ps 5): 'Behold, O God, to how much persecution and oppression I am subjected by Edom (i.e. Rome), to keep me from owning thee as my God and king. But we go daily into our synagogues and own thee in our confession of faith (the Shema') as God and king.' The same Agadist applies to Pr 8^{35} the oft-recurring idea that God's glory is present with the congregation assembled in the synagogue: 'Who ever came into the synagogue without finding my glory there' (Deut. rabba, 7)?

The above and similar sayings (cf. e.g. also Derech Ereẓ zûta, 9, ad init.) show not only the importance attached to the prayer of the congregation in the synagogue, but also the constant need there was of warning the members against negligence in their attendance. In the 3rd cent. it was told in Palestine to the credit of the Babylonian Jews that they visited the synagogue every morning and evening (Berakh. 8*a*).

v. THE SYNAGOGUE AS AN ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.—The synagogue was not only the place of public worship; it embraced also the school in which the first instruction in the Holy Scriptures as the principal or the sole subject of education was given. As the bêth hammidrāsh served for the studies of more advanced youths and adults, the synagogue was the place in which—perhaps in a special room—the children were taught.

In a homiletical exposition of La 1^{9} Abba b. Kahana (3rd cent.) adds to the words of Jer 9^{21} [Heb.^{20}] 'to cut off the children from the street, the youths from the squares' the gloss 'but not from the synagogues and the schools' (Echa rabbathi, ad loc.). Joshua b. Levi himself conducted his grandson to the synagogue, i.e. to school (Kiddush. 30*a*). Chija b. Abba (3rd cent.), as he passed a synagogue of Sepphoris, heard children being taught to repeat Gn 20^{1}, and made this the subject of a remark (Gen. rabba, 52). In an anecdote of the 4th cent. we are told how a teacher in the synagogue punished a child excessively and was cursed for this by a woman who happened to be passing by (Jerus. Moed katon, $81d^{44}$). Rab, the Bab. Amora, said that women gain special merit by conducting their children to the synagogue, i.e. to school (Berakh. 17*a*). See also the saying of the Pal. Amora Simon (end of the 4th cent.) reported in Jerus. Challa, $57b^{18}$. That in Babylonia the synagogue was the place of elementary education is evident from Meg. 28*b*; Yebamoth, 21*b*, top; Baba bathra. 21*a*.—According to the above-mentioned tradition (ii. § 2, ad init.) regarding the synagogues of Jerusalem, each of these was provided with a school for children and one for more advanced students. In a hyperbolical statement about Bethar, the capital of Judæa in the time of Bar Cochba, it is said (Giṭṭin, 58*a*): 'There were 400 synagogues in Bethar, and in each of these there were 400 teachers (מלמדי תינוקות), each with 400 children under his instruction.'

vi. OTHER USES OF THE SYNAGOGUE.—The synagogue was also the scene of legal decisions. Of Abahu, the head of the school of Cæsarea (beginning of 4th cent.), it is expressly recorded that he lectured (Jerus. Berakh. 6*a*, bottom) in the ancient synagogue there (see above, ii. § 2), and also decided questions of law in it (Jerus. Sanhed. 18*a*, bottom). In the same synagogue Jochanan, the famous teacher of Abahu, also acted at one time as judge (Bab. Yebamoth, 65*a*). From the NT we learn that the punishment of scourging was inflicted in the synagogues (Mt 10^{17} 23^{34}, Mk 13^{9}, Ac 26^{11}; cf. Lk 12^{11} 21^{12}, Ac 22^{19}, 2 Co 11^{24}). It has already been mentioned (above, § iv.) that the ḥazzān carried out this sentence and acted in other ways as an officer of the law court. There is mention in Lev. rabba, 6, ad init., of an oath in a civil process being taken in the synagogue.

The mourning for a man who was lamented by the whole community was held in the synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 225^{2}; Bab. Meg. 28*b*; cf. the story of the funeral of Jehuda I. in Ḳoh. rabba on Ec 9^{10}). A Bab. Amora of the 5th cent. held the mourning for his daughter-in-law in the synagogue (Meg. 28*b*).

At the time of the war against Rome, gatherings of a political character were held in the great synagogue of Tiberias on the Sabbath and the following day (Jos. Vita, 54). R. Jochanan (3rd cent.) gave express permission to deliberate about public affairs in the synagogues and schools on the Sabbath (Kethuboth, 5*a*). After the destruction of Jerusalem it was customary—so a Tannaite tradition tells us—to give out in the synagogues and schools a list of articles lost (Baba meẓia, 28*b*). Thefts were also intimated in the synagogue with a view to the detection of the perpetrator (Lev. rabba, 6, ad init.). For other announcements made in the synagogue, see Yebamoth, 63*b*. An Agadist of the 4th cent. once followed up an address in the synagogue by calling upon the congregation to contribute alms for a stranger (Lev. rab. 32, ad fin.).

In a Tannaite rule, amongst the prescriptions concerning what is due to the dignity of the synagogue, there is one forbidding eating and drinking in it (Meg. 28*a*, bottom). Nevertheless, common meals were held even in the synagogue (see on this point K. Kohler, Monatsschrift, xxxvii. p. 494, who suggests a connexion between this custom and the meals of the Essenes). An anecdote from the 3rd cent. mentions a meal as held on the Sabbath evening in the synagogue of the Pal. Kephar-Chiṭṭaja (Gen. rab. 65); while a testimony from the 4th cent. refers to a great meal in the school (Jerus. Berakh. 11*c*, bottom).—Joshua b. Levi (3rd cent.) laid down the principle that the synagogues and schools belong to the scribes and their pupils (Jerus. Meg. $74a^{64}$, cf. Bab. Meg. 28*b*). His younger contemporary, Ammi, ordained that the schoolmasters (who at the same time filled the post of synagogue keeper) should provide quarters in the synagogue building for travellers who had the slightest acquaintance with the Torah (Jerus. Meg. $74a^{65}$). Chija and Assi, the colleagues of Ammi, used to insist on quartering themselves in the synagogue (ib.). Measha and Samuel b. Jiẓḥaḳ, Pal. Amoras of the beginning of the 4th cent., speak of eating in the synagogue (Jerus. Berakh. ch. ii. end [$5d^{14}$], Shabboth, $3a^{55}$). In Babylonia also travellers were accommodated in the synagogue and there took their Sabbath meal; upon which is founded the rule that the blessing over the wine, which elsewhere is the introduction to the meal, is to be spoken also in the synagogue (Pesachim, 101*a*).

In a great many passages of the Jewish tradition-literature (Talmud and Midrash) the synagogues are named along with the schools. They appear as the two institutions which are specially characteristic of Israel, and whose extreme importance for Judaism finds expression in manifold ways. In order to see what the synagogue was in the life and thought of Israel during the first centuries of the Christian era, one must make acquaintance also with those sayings of the Tannaites and Amoras, in which synagogue and school are glorified as inseparable institutions. In these it must be observed that the synagogue means not only the place of public worship, but that of instruction for the young. As a rule, in these sayings the synagogue precedes the school (בתי כנסיות ובתי מדרשות), a circumstance which indicates the higher repute in which the synagogue stood. But the opposite view had also its representatives: from the 3rd cent. there has come down the saying of a Pal. scribe (Meg. 27*a*), and from the 4th cent. that of a Bab. scribe (ib. 26*b*), according to which the school has a higher rank than the synagogue. The following are some of these sayings about synagogue and school:—

An Agadist of the 4th cent. attributes to the philosopher Œnomaus of Gadara, known through his intercourse with the famous R. Meir, the saying that, so long as the 'voice of Jacob' (Gn 27^{22}) sounds in synagogue and school, the 'hands of Esau' (i.e. Rome) are powerless against Israel (Gen. rab. 65; Pesikta, 121*a*).—Abahu said: 'Seek the Eternal where he is to be found (Is 55^{6}). Where is he to be found? In the synagogue and the school' (Jerus. Berakh. 8*d*, bottom).—Levi said: 'While the descendants of Abraham sit in the synagogue and the school, God's glory stands over them' [in allusion to Ps 82^{1}] (Gen. rab. 48; Pesikta, 48*b*).—By 'your sanctuaries' (Lv 26^{31}) are to be understood synagogue and school (Siphrâ, ad loc. 112*a*).—Jiẓḥaḳ declared that by 'our dwellings' (Jer 9^{19}) are meant synagogue and school (Echa rabba, Prooem., No. 8).—Samuel b. Jiẓḥaḳ interpreted the 'sanctuary מְעַט' (Ezk 11^{16}) of the synagogues and schools of Babylonia (Meg. 29*a*).—The 'holy place' (Ec 8^{10}) means synagogue and school (Koh. rab. ad loc.; Tanchuma, ed. Buber, Jithro, ad init.).—'My heart is awake' (Ca 5^{2}) in the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. ad loc.).—In the allegorical interpretation of the Song of Songs many other passages are also applied to the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. passim; Bab. Erub. 21*b*; Pesach. 87*a*).—Jose b. Chanina (3rd cent.) discovers in the 'gardens' of Ca 6^{2} the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. ad loc.).—Attending synagogue and school is contrasted with attending theatre and circus (Jerus. Berakh. 7*d*^{37} [prayer of Nechunja b. Hakkana in 1st cent.]; Gen. rab. 67 [Levi]; Koh. rab. on Ec 1^{7}).—When David prays (Ps 61^{4}), 'May I dwell for ever in thy tent,' he means, 'May it be vouchsafed to me that my words may be repeated under my name in the school and the synagogue' (Jerus. Berakh. 4*b*).—The 'refuge from generation to generation' of Ps 90^{1} is interpreted by Raba (4th cent.) of synagogues and schools. As a matter of fact, even in later centuries, these were the refuge of Israel scattered through all lands.

vii. LATEST HISTORY OF THE SYNAGOGUE.—In the present article regard has been had only to the synagogue of antiquity, i.e. of the last years of the Second Temple and the first five centuries of the Christian era. But the synagogue survived also in the following periods, through the Middle Ages down to the present day, as the most notable institution of Judaism, the focus of the religious life of the Jewish community. A history of the synagogue in the Middle Ages and in modern times would be an integral part of the history of Judaism, from the point of view alike of its outward fortunes and its inner development. The manifold character which Jewish history displays in virtue of its having the whole of the inhabited globe for its stage of action and in virtue of the influences exercised upon it by different forms of civilization, is exhibited also in the character of this Jewish institution, which is ancient indeed, but is ever renewing its youth. It may suffice to point out that in the most recent times, during something like the last 80 years, the synagogue was the central point and also the principal object of Jewish attempts at reform, and that the importance of the institution has been marked even externally by the synagogue buildings which have been everywhere reared, on both sides of the Atlantic—a testimony to the spontaneous effort of the builders and sometimes their almost excessive love of splendour.

LITERATURE.—As far as concerns articles on the Synagogue in the various Encyclopædias, or the treatment of the subject in the works on the History of the Jews, on Biblical Archæology, and the History of NT Times, a general reference may suffice. Schürer devotes a long section (GJV^{3} ii. 427–464) to the Synagogue. Of the literature cited by him the following deserve special notice: Vitringa, De synagoga vetere, libri tres (1696); Leopold Löw, 'Der synagogale Ritus' (Monatsschrift, 1884, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 1–71. In the 5th vol. of the Gesam. Schriften, pp. 21–33, are 'Plan und Collectaneen' to a detailed account of 'synagogalen Alterthümer,' supplemented by the editor, Immanuel Löw). We may mention also: K. Kohler, 'Über die Ursprünge und Grundformen der synagogalen Liturgie' (Monatsschrift, xxxvii. [1893] 441–451, 489–497); S. H. Goldfahn, 'Die Synagogen der Talmudzeiṭ' (Jüd. Litteraturblatt von Rahmer, xiii.); J. Reifmann, 'Über Synagogen und Lehrhäuser zur talmudischer Zeit' (in N. Keller's Heb. periodical Bikkurim, II. Theil, 1866).—On the place of the synagogue in the Middle Ages, see I. Abrahams, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 1896, pp. 1–34.

W. BACHER.

SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.—An alleged college or senate, whose founder and first president is said to have been Ezra, and which, according to tradition, exercised control over the Jewish community, especially in religious matters, from about 450–200 B.C. Its membership is generally given as 120 (e.g. Jerus. Berakhoth ii. 4), but sometimes as 85 (e.g. Jerus. Meg. i. 7). The important part attributed by some to this institution in connexion with the forming of the CANON OF THE OT (see below) demands that we should examine, as briefly as possible, the evidence for its existence and activity.

There is no mention of the Great Syn. in Philo, Josephus, or the Apocrypha, not to speak of the OT itself. Nothing can be built on 1 Mac 14^{28}, where μεγάλη συναγωγή is not a technical term, but means simply 'a great gathering.' Only once in the Mishna (Pirḳe Aboth, i. 1) are the Men of the Great Synagogue (אַנְשֵׁי כְּנֶסֶת הַגְּדוֹלָה) mentioned: 'Moses delivered the Torah to Joshua, Joshua to the Elders, the Elders to the Prophets, and the Prophets to the Men of the Great Synagogue. These spake three words: Be cautious in pronouncing judgment, Make many disciples, Build up a hedge around the Torah.' Simon the Just is said (ib. 2) to have been 'of the remnants of the Great Synagogue (משירי כ׳ הג׳).' This last statement does not imply that the Great Syn. had existed for centuries, for, although the Simon who was surnamed 'the Just' was probably high priest c. 200 B.C., the author of the above notice is more likely to have identified him with Simon I. (c. 300). Now we know that the utmost confusion prevailed amongst the Jews as to the chronology of the period between the Return from Exile and the conquests of Alexander the Great. Hence it would be nothing extraordinary to find Simon, a contemporary of Alexander, represented as a member of the same body as Ezra; and, in the other direction, to find Joshua, Zerubbabel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and even Daniel, introduced as members. As far, then, as the testimony of Pirḳe Aboth goes, it would seem to favour the conclusion that the Great Syn., whatever it was, continued only for a single generation, instead of having a succession for centuries. It is noteworthy that the Talm. treatise Peah (ii. 6) omits the Great Syn. as a connecting link, and the succession passes direct from the Prophets to the Zugôth or 'Pairs.'

In Baba bathra (14*b*) we read that the Men of the Great Syn. wrote Ezekiel, the Minor Prophets, Daniel, and Esther; and in the Aboth of R. Nathan (a post-Talm. treatise) they are said to have secured the acceptance of Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes, which had been formerly disputed. In Pesachim (50*b*) it is said that they fostered the work of copying the Torah and tephillîm and mĕzuzôth (see Dt $6^{8f.}$). In an important passage of Midrash Tanchuma (26*a*) certain corrections in the text of the OT, introduced in order to prevent misunderstanding, are also traced to the Men of the Great Syn., who are reported elsewhere (Jerus. Berakh. ii. 4) to have drawn up certain prayers, in particular the Shemoneh 'Esreh, or 18 Blessings (bĕrākhôth). To them are attributed also the directions for the reading of the Book of Esther, and the keeping of Purim not on the 14th and 15th, but on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of the month Adar (Makkoth 23; Jerus. Meg. i.). It is not, however, till the 16th cent. that we meet with the notion that the Men of the Great Synagogue collected the sacred books, and fixed the Canon of the OT. This notion makes its first appearance in the pages of the Massoreth Hammassoreth (1538) of Elias Levita, a Jewish contemporary of Luther.

The whole question of the Great Syn. was thoroughly investigated by Kuenen (see Literature at end), whose conclusions are accepted by the great majority of modern scholars. The institution, as it appears especially in mediæval Judaism, is held by Kuenen to be simply a characteristic transformation of the great assembly described in Neh 8–10. Just as the Talmud represents the SANHEDRIN as an assembly of scribes, because such were the schools at Jamnia and Tiberias, so the Great Synagogue, instead of being a popular assembly once called together for a definite purpose, is converted into a permanent institution discharging functions similar to those of the scribes at a later period.

That a dim reminiscence of the original identity of the Great Syn. and the convocation of Neh 8–10 still lingered on even in Rabbinical circles, may be gathered from some of the references. For instance, in Midrash Ruth we read, 'What did the Men of the Great Syn. do? They wrote a book and spread it out in the court of the temple. And at dawn of day they rose and found it sealed. This is what is written in Neh 9^{38}.' Again, there occurs in Dt 10^{17} this collocation, 'God the great, the strong, the terrible (הָאֵל הַגָּדוֹל הַגִּבּוֹר וְהַנּוֹרָא).' It is repeatedly stated in the Talmud (e.g. Jerus. Berakh. ii. 4) that this formula, which had fallen into disuse, was again brought into currency by the Men of the Great Synagogue. It seems impossible to doubt that Kuenen is right in finding an allusion here to Neh 9^{32}, where all these epithets are found. Similar Talm. statements appear to allude to Neh $9^{5.6.7.18}$. Once more, the variety of statement as to the number of members that constituted the Great Syn. (sometimes 120, sometimes 85) may be explained from Neh 8–10. There were 84 that sealed the covenant, according to Neh $10^{1\cdot 28}$, and the number 85 may be obtained either by adding the name of Ezra (who is not mentioned), or by supposing that a name has dropped out of the list (either in v.^{10} or in v.^{4}, where the Pesh. actually supplies an extra name, Shephatiah). If, on the other hand, we wish to obtain the number 120, this may be done, at least approximately, by combining the above list with the lists in Neh $8^{4.7}$ and $9^{5.6}$, or in Ezr 2 and 8 (for other arguments of a similar kind, see Kuenen's Essay).

The very name 'Synagogue' seems inexplicable except upon Kuenen's view. It calls up neither a college of scribes nor a legislative body, but an assembly for religious service. The word כְּנֶסֶת (see SYNAGOGUE) denoted either a congregation met for worship on the Sabbath day, or, by metonymy, the building where it met. The name might be fittingly enough applied to the convocation of Nehemiah, which, as Kuenen remarks, was not a law-imposing, but a law-receiving assembly; and in the account of whose proceedings we find all the exercises characteristic of Synagogue worship, such as prayer, the reading of the Law, etc. To this memorable convocation the epithet 'Great' would, for a variety of reasons, be eminently suitable.

W. R. Smith agrees with Kuenen that what came afterwards to be spoken of as the Great Synagogue was originally a meeting, and not a permanent institution. 'It met once for all, and everything that is told about it, except what we read in Nehemiah, is pure fable of the later Jews' (OTJC^{2} 169). Historical criticism thus leaves no place for the Great Synagogue of tradition.

LITERATURE.—Buxtorf's Tiberias sive Comm. Massor. (1620) strenuously upholds the traditional view, and is still of value for its copious citation of testimony, which, however, is used in a very uncritical fashion. On the other side is Rau's Diatribe de Syn. magna (1726), which, although marked by an excess of anti-Jewish prejudice, shows true critical instinct, and anticipates some of the weightiest of Kuenen's arguments. The question may be considered to have been finally settled, in the sense advocated above, by Kuenen in his famous monograph, Over de mannen der groote synagoge, Amsterdam, 1876 [tr. by Budde in Gesam. Abhandlungen, pp. 125–160], whose conclusions are accepted by Ryle, Canon of OT, 250 ff. [valuable as containing the Jewish testimonies relied on by Buxtorf]; Wildeboer, Entsteh. des AT Kanons, 120 ff.; Buhl, Canon and Text of OT, 33 ff.; W. R. SYNTYCHE (Συντύχη).—A member of the Philippian Church whom St. Paul exhorts to become reconciled to EUODIA, another member of the same Church. They appear to have held a position of importance in the Church as ladies of some wealth and position, or possibly as deaconesses, like Phœbe in the Roman Church (Ro 16^1). Their disagreement was therefore not only unseemly, it was a calamity for the entire Church. Both the names, Euodia and Syntyche, occur in the inscriptions (Lightfoot, Ep. to the Philippians^{4}, p. 158). There is no need, therefore, to introduce the far-fetched interpretation of the Tübingen school, that they are allegorical personages representing the Jewish and Gentile sections of the Church.

SYNZYGUS (TR Σύζυγος, but modern edd. Σύνζυγος).—If Synzygus is a proper name, he was a person to whom St. Paul addressed an entreaty to bring about a reconciliation between Euodia and Syntyche, two members of the Philippian Church who were at variance (Ph 4^3). He was at the time in Philippi, and may have been the chief presbyter or bishop of the Church. The sole objection to this interpretation—the only natural one—is that Synzygus is nowhere used in Greek literature as a proper name, nor is it found in the inscriptions (but see Vincent, ad loc.). It was suggested by Weizsäcker that it may have been adopted by the bearer after his conversion to Christianity. The other interpretation is that σύνζυγος here, as in classical Greek, signifies 'yoke-fellow,' and that the exhortation was addressed to a companion of the apostle who was with him when he wrote, who was possibly his amanuensis (see vol. iii. p. 841^b). Barnabas, Silas, Epaphroditus, and Timothy have been suggested. Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. 358) thinks that Luke was either 'the true yoke-fellow' or the actual bearer of the Epistle to Philippi. The suggestion of Renan (Saint Paul, p. 148), that the 'true yoke-fellow' is Lydia, who had become the wife of the apostle, is hardly to be taken seriously.

SYRACUSE (Συράκουσαι, but Vulg. wrongly sing. Syracusa), situated on the west coast of Sicily, was the principal city of the island, and under the Romans was the capital of the eastern half. After the western half of Sicily was taken from Carthage by the Romans (B.C. 241) at the close of the first Punic War, the eastern half continued to belong to the kingdom of Syracuse in alliance with Rome. In the second Punic War, Syracuse took the side of the Carthaginians, but was captured by Marcellus in 212, and the whole island thenceforward continued to be a Roman Province, though in two distinct divisions, in each of which a quæstor was stationed, under the authority of the single governing prætor, who presided over the whole island.

Syracuse was one of the most famous and magnificent colonies of Greece. Its defeat of the great Athenian expedition in B.C. 415 was one of the most critical events in Greek history; and its kings were among the leading powers in the Greek world. Whether it preserved its old prosperity in the first century after Christ is uncertain, as Sicily suffered severely in the Civil Wars, especially from the exactions of Sextus Pompey and in the contest between him and Augustus. Strabo, 272 f., describes the whole island as in a state of decay in his time, some of the cities having disappeared, while others were declining: the interior was to a large extent given up to grazing and horse-breeding, peopled by herdsmen, and devoid of educative influences. Its ancient importance as an arable and corn-growing country had disappeared; and the reason for this lay partly in the economic conditions of the empire, and partly in the dreadful circumstances of the Servile Wars, B.C. 135–132 and 103–100. The land belonged for the most part to absentee landlords.

Syracuse was one of the 26 censoriæ civitates of Sicily, which had been conquered in war, and whose territory had been appropriated by the Roman State as ager publicus. Julius Cæsar, as was natural to his statesmanlike mind, had been revolving schemes for the restoration of prosperity to Sicily, but his plans were interrupted by his assassination. Antony produced a plan which he declared to have been found among Cæsar's papers, and proposed a law to extend the Roman franchise to Sicily. This was not carried out completely; and Augustus was content with a much more gradual process of elevating Sicily to the full Roman rights. He founded seven Roman colonies of military origin, one of which was Syracuse.[*] Pliny mentions also that there were in Sicily two Roman towns (oppida civium Romanorum) and three cities with Latin rights; but his enumeration is very imperfect, and it is certain that Roman and Latin rights were much more widely spread in Sicily before the middle of the first century after Christ than he allows. It was during this process of transition from the position of a conquered province to that of a constituent part of the Roman State that St. Paul approached the Sicilian coast.

Syracuse is mentioned in the NT only as having been a harbour where St. Paul lay at anchor for three days on his voyage from Malta to Rome. The shipwrecked crew and passengers, after spending three months in Malta, set sail on the Dioscuri, evidently one of the Alexandrian fleet of imperial transports carrying grain from Egypt to maintain the food supply in Rome.[†] They started, evidently, very early in the year, probably in February, before the settled weather and the customary season for navigation (mare clausum 11 Nov. to 5 March) had begun. That implies that a suitable and seemingly steady wind was blowing, which tempted them to embark, and carried them straight to Syracuse, a distance of about 100 miles. On the voyage from Malta to Rome as a whole, see Rhegium.

Nothing is said with regard to any preaching by St. Paul in Syracuse, nor could any be expected to occur. The ship was certainly waiting for a suitable wind to carry it north to the straits of Messina; and under such circumstances no prisoner was likely to be allowed leave of absence, as the ship must be ready to take instant advantage of the wind. A survey of the progress of early Christianity would show that it rarely spread through the activity of coasting travellers, even on shores where their voyages were very tedious and subject to frequent and long interruptions (as, for example, the coasts of Lycia and Pamphylia). It is more probable that the new religion spread from Italy to Sicily in the course of direct communication between the two countries. Many Christian memorials of a fairly but not very early date have been found at Syracuse: see the papers by Orsi in Notizie degli Scavi, 1893 and 1894, and esp. in Römische Quartalschrift f. christl. Alt. 1896, pp. 1–59. W. M. Ramsay.

SYRIAC VERSIONS.—No branch of the Early Church has done more for the translation of the Bible into their vernacular than the Syriac-speaking. In our European libraries we have Syriac Bible MSS from the Lebanon, Egypt, Sinai, Mesopotamia, Armenia, India (Malabar), even from China. And many of the Bible versions in other Oriental languages are dependent on, or at least influenced by, the Syriac, as the Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopic. Some of the Syriac MSS appear to be the oldest Bible MSS, in any language, which have an exact date: a Syriac Pentateuch in the British Museum (Add. 14425) is dated from the year 464, written by a deacon John at Amid.[*] A Syriac-Chinese stone inscription, erected at Singan-fu in the year 781, discovered by Jesuit missionaries in 1625, speaks of the 27 books of the NT. It would be a pleasant task to follow up the history of the Syriac Bible versions through all times, regions, and departments of culture: want of space, however, obliges us to confine ourselves to the importance of the Syr. VSS for the modern student of the Bible. We begin with the NT.

I. New Testament.—Older scholars spoke of that Syr. VS of the NT which alone was known to them as 'the Queen' of all Bible versions. But now we have more than one, at least for the Gospels.

1. Tradition.—When, in the 16th cent., the Syr. VS of the NT became known in Europe, the belief prevailed that it was due to the evangelist Mark, who was said to have written his Gospel first in Latin and then to have translated it, with the other books of the NT, into Syriac.[†] Jacob of Edessa († 701) and others were of the opinion that Addai the apostle (Thaddæus) and king Abgar sent interpreters to Palestine (see Moses bar Cepha [† 913] and Barhebræus, Scholia in Ps 10). What Theodore of Mopsuestia says of the Syr. translation of the OT holds equally good of the NT: ἡρμήνευται δὲ ταῦτα εἰς μὲν τὴν τῶν Σύρων παρ' ὅτου δή ποτε· οὐδὲ γὰρ ἔγνωσται μέχρι τῆς τήμερον ὅστις ποτὲ οὗτός ἐστιν (Comm. in Soph. [1, 6]; Mai, Nova Patr. Bibl. vii. 1854).

2. Place.—We do not know where the translation was made. On the ground of some lin-

[*] Pliny (Nat. Hist. iii. 88–90) wrongly mentions only five (one being Syracuse).

[†] By a strange mistake, in contradiction of Ac 28^{11}, the Dioscuri is described in Smith's DB iii. 1403 as a ship in the African corn trade, which had sailed from the province Africa intending to round Pachynum to Syracuse, and was carried out of its course to Malta. On the name of the ship, and the grammatical construction of the clause describing it, see Rhegium.

[*] W. Wright, A Short History of Syriac Literature (London, 1894, p. 5 = Enc. Brit.^{9} xxii. 824).

[†] 'Syri constanter asserunt S. Marcum . . . latine primum scripsisse Evangelium suum. Deinde eundem ipsum Marcum lingua patria, hoc est, Galilæa Syra, non modo Evangelium suum transtulisse, sed etiam cæteros omnes NT libros. Id mihi litteris significavit Guilielmus Postellus affirmavitque se ita a Syris ipsis accepisse' (Bodérianus [Guido Fevre de la Boderic] in the Preface of the Syr. NT 1571). Widmanstadt, the first editor of the NT in Syriac (1555), agrees that Mark wrote in Latin, but contents himself with affirming that the books of the NT (except Matthew and Hebrews) were translated into Syriac 'ab initio rerum Christianarum.'

guistic peculiarities, Syrian grammarians, as Elias I. and Barhebræus, reached the same conclusion as Jacob of Edessa, that the translation originated in Palestine; European scholars thought first of Antioch, because the translation became known to them through the Patriarch of Antioch: in recent times Edessa has found most favour; but nothing can be said with certainty.

3. History.—(a) The first mention of a Syriac NT seems to be the statement of Eusebius (HE iv. 26) on Hegesippus (about 160–180): ἔκ τε τοῦ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγελίου καὶ τοῦ Συριακοῦ καὶ ἰδίως ἐκ τῆς Ἑβραΐδος διαλέκτου τινὰ τίθησιν, ἐμφαίνων ἐξ Ἑβραίων ἑαυτὸν πεπιστευκέναι (Rufinus: 'de Evangelio secundum Hebræos et Syros'; Syr. VS of Eusebius: 'from the Gospels of the Hebrews and Syrians'; see on the passage Th. Zahn, Forschungen, vi. 246).

(b) About the same time or a little earlier we hear that Tatian, who was born, according to his own statement, ἐν τῇ τῶν Ἀσσυρίων γῇ, and had been in Rome the hearer of Justin Martyr, returned home—as it seems, in the year 172—and composed (probably there; not at Rome, about 153–170 [so Harnack formerly, TU i. 213]) his famous Diatessaron, i.e. a harmony of the four Gospels (συνάφειάν τινα καὶ συναγωγὴν οὐκ οἶδ' ὅπως τῶν εὐαγγελίων συνθεὶς τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων τοῦτο προσωνόμασεν, ὃ καὶ παρά τισιν εἰσέτι νῦν φέρεται, Eus. HE iv. 36; in the Syr. Eusebius: 'he gathered and mixed and composed a Gospel and called it Diatessaron, i.e. of the Mixed (דִּמְחַלְּטֵא), which is still with many'). It appears to be simply to a misunderstanding that we owe the remark of Epiphanius (Hær. 46. 1, ed. Dindorf, ii. 412): λέγεται δὲ τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων εὐαγγέλιον ὑπ' αὐτοῦ γεγενῆσθαι, ὅπερ κατὰ Ἑβραίους τινὲς καλοῦσι. Of this work Theodoret (till 457 bishop of Kyrrhos) tells us that it was in his times used not only by the followers of Tatian, but also in orthodox congregations; that he himself found more than 200 copies in use in the churches of his diocese; that he collected and removed all (πάσας συναγαγὼν ἀπεθέμην),* substituting for them the Gospels of the Four (τὰ τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελιστῶν ἀντεισήγαγον εὐαγγέλια). A little earlier, bishop Rabbula of Edessa (412–435) ordered that presbyters and deacons should take care that in all churches the 'Gospels of the Separate' (אונגליון דִּמְפָרְשֵׁא; S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulæ . . . opera selecta, ed. Overbeck, Oxf. 1865, p. 220) be kept and read. Of the same Rabbula his biographer tells that he occupied himself with 'translating the NT out of the Greek into Syriac, because of its variations, exactly as it was' (ib. 172).

This Harmony of Tatian was apparently in Syriac, not in Greek [the latter is (or was) the view of Harnack].

See, on all questions connected with Tatian, Arthur Hjelt, Die altsyrische Evangelienübersetzung und Tatians Diatessaron, besonders in ihrem gegenseitigen Verhältnis untersucht, Leipzig, 1901, pp. 16–75: the Literature is quoted in part in vol. ii. 697 f., iii. 536, 538. Add: E. Lippelt, Quæ fuerint Justin. Martyris ἀπομνημονεύματα quaque ratione cum forma evangeliorum syro-latina cohæserint (Diss.), i., Halle, 1901.

The great question is now whether this Diatessaron of Tatian was the first form in which the Gospel came to the Syrians, or whether there was already, before Tatian, a Syr. VS of the Gospels, which he may have used. The question is difficult, because Tatian's work has not survived in its original form, but only in a late Arabic recension, due to Abulfaraj Abdullah ibn aṭ Ṭajjib (†1043); further, it seems to have been the basis of the Latin Harmony of Victor of Capua; it was commented on by Ephraem Syrus; but this commentary is again preserved only in translation (in Armenian); it was used by Aphraates, and few direct quotations have been preserved by Syriac lexicographers and commentators: these have been collected by Hall, Harris, Goussen. Some help towards answering the question was given when, in addition to the Syriac NT, known since older times, there came in 1858 the version of the Gospels discovered by Cureton, and in 1892 that found on Mt. Sinai by Mrs. A. S. Lewis, and edited in 1894 by Bensly, Burkitt, and Harris. But, on the other hand, the question became the more complicated.

(c) The history of these discoveries cannot be told here; suffice it to say, that of the fragments published by Cureton (Remains of a very antient recension of the Four Gospels in Syriac, hitherto unknown in Europe, London, 1858),* the Gospel of Matthew has the very title used above by Rabbula, 'Gospel of the Separate,' and that in the Sinai Gospels the same expression is used in the subscription.

[In what follows we designate Tatian by $\mathfrak{T}$, Cureton's Gospels by $\mathfrak{S}^c$, the Sinai Gospels by $\mathfrak{S}^s$, the common Syr. VS called Pĕshiṭṭå (פְּשִׁיטְתָּא) by $\mathfrak{S}^p$].

(1) פְּשִׁיטְתָּא, to which supply מַפַּקְתָּא, means 'the simple,' i.e. the simple version. It is first used, so far as known at present, in Massoretic MSS of the 9th and 10th cents. in contradistinction to the Harclensis; and in Moses bar Cephas (†913) in opposition to the Syro-Hexaplaris. The latter says: 'One must know that there are in Syriac two translations of the OT: the one, this פשיטתא in which we read, was made from Hebrew into Syriac; the other, that of the Seventy-two, from Greek' (see Urt. p. 229 f.). On the pronunciation, spelling, and meaning of the name (Pĕshīṭṭå, simplified to Peshito), see the Lit. quoted l.c. p. 230.

(2) Its origin and the spread of its use are quite obscure. Till 1842 the Peshito was the only known older Syr. VS of the Bible; it is still held by G. H. Gwilliam to be the oldest (see Studia Biblica, i. 151 ff. ['A Syriac biblical MS'], iii. 47 ff. ['The materials for the criticism of the Peshito NT']; Expos. Times, Jan. 1895, 157 ff. ('The new Syriac Gospels'); Crit. Rev Jan. 1896, 14–22 ('Communication on the Lewis Palimpsest, the Curetonian Fragments, and the Peshitta'); The Oxford debate on the textual criticism of the NT held at New College on May 6, 1897, Lond. 1897). His view is shared by A. Bonus, who thinks $\mathfrak{S}^p$ 'scarcely later than the latter half of the second century.' With this contrast the statement of Burkitt (JThSt, i. 571): 'I confess that I am unconvinced that what we call the NT Peshitta was in existence in S. Ephraem's day, and I believe that we owe both its production and its victorious reception to the organizing energy of the great Rabbula, bishop of Edessa from 411–435 A.D.).' †

The following answers to the above question have been given:—

(1) Abbé P. Martin: $\mathfrak{S}^c$ 'is a revision of the Peshito made with the help of a MS closely resembling Codex Bezæ. The Curetonian recension dates from the end of the 7th or the beginning of the 8th cent., probably from this last period. It never had much vogue. Its author was probably Jacob of Edessa [† 703]' (Introduction à la critique textuelle du NT, Paris, 1883). The latter hypothesis may be dismissed at once.

(2) Gwilliam (Bonus): $\mathfrak{S}^c$ and $\mathfrak{S}^s$ were not the origin of $\mathfrak{S}^p$; $\mathfrak{S}^c$ is more modern than $\mathfrak{S}^p$ (Crit. Rev. 1896, p. 19); Rabbula intended that copies of $\mathfrak{S}^p$ should be substituted for $\mathfrak{T}$ (p. 21); but it might be, probably was, difficult to procure copies of the Peshitta, in obedience to Rabbula's order. The term Mepharreshê used by Rabbula would easily become a title for copies subsequently made. 'Are $\mathfrak{S}^s$ and $\mathfrak{S}^c$ relics of copies made by order of Rabbula?'

The position of $\mathfrak{S}^p$ is of great importance, because it is, as Sanday styled it, 'the sheet-anchor' of the theory of Burgon-Miller on the textual criticism of the NT. See, further, p. 740^{b}.

---

* There is no ground for the statement which is sometimes made (for instance by Jülicher, Einleitung, § 37) that he 'burned' the copies.

* The edition is out of print; a new edition by F. C. Burkitt, 'The Curetonian Syriac Gospels, re-edited together with the readings of the Sinaitic Codex, and a translation into English,' advertised by the Camb. Univ. Press (Academy, Sept. 29, 1894, p. 233^b; JThSt, i. 569), is approaching completion.

† Comp. with this the statement of the present writer (*PRE*³ xv. [1885] 195), on the work of Rabbula, that one might be inclined to see its result in $\mathfrak{S}^c$ resp. $\mathfrak{S}$ [$=\mathfrak{S}^p$].

(3) $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ are three recensions of one and the same version, and this is their historical order (adopted by many, for instance Allen at the Oxford Debate). $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ is impossible, equally impossible is the genealogy $\mathfrak{S}^{p}<^{\mathfrak{S}^{c}}_{\mathfrak{S}^{s}}$.

(4) $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$—$\mathfrak{T}$. Conybeare: 'I believe scholars are beginning to recognize that Tatian . . . used the Curetonian version of the Gospels, which in turn rested on the new Syriac' [Academy, Jan. 12, 1895]. $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ also older than $\mathfrak{T}$ (Burkitt, Holzhey, Bewer).

(5) $\mathfrak{S}^{c}$ older than $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ (Resch, Duval; see Hjelt, p. 95).

(a) $\mathfrak{T}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$ (Baethgen, Zahn), before the discovery of $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$.

(b) $\mathfrak{T}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{s}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$ or

(c) $\mathfrak{T}<^{\mathfrak{S}^{s}}_{\mathfrak{S}^{c}}$. $\mathfrak{T}$ older than $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ (Zahn, Nestle, Hilgenfeld, Bardenhewer, Gwilliam, Cundberg).

(6) $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$—$\mathfrak{T}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{c}$—$\mathfrak{S}^{p}$. So in the main Hjelt; $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ on the whole a faithful witness of the Old Syr. VS of the 2nd cent., $\mathfrak{S}^{c}$ a later recension of it probably from the first half of the 2nd cent., formed under the influence of $\mathfrak{T}$; $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ a revision of the old version, which eliminated the influences of $\mathfrak{T}$ and became the Vulgate; at last $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ in its turn influenced $\mathfrak{T}$, which remained in use with the Nestorians longer than with the Jacobites.

The priority of $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ would be certain, if the thesis of Hjelt were proved that $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ is not a unity, but that the various Gospels were due to different hands and that nevertheless all were used by $\mathfrak{T}$. The first part of his thesis Hjelt seems to have proved. There is a decided difference in the vocabulary of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (see p. 96 ff.); he may be even right in his supposition, that the translation of Matthew was the oldest, due to a Jewish Christian (cf. Mt 9^{18} head of the synagogue, 23^{5} tephillin and purple תכלתא).* But the second part, that $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ was used by $\mathfrak{T}$, does not seem to be proved. But in any case $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$ and $\mathfrak{T}$ belong to the most important witnesses for the text of the Gospels.

Acts and Epistles.—Amidst the absorbing interest caused by the discovery of $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$, little attention has been paid of late to the rest of the Syriac NT, Acts and Epistles. They are known as yet only as parts of $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$, but there are indications that for the Acts and the Pauline Epistles also an older version was in existence. And it is of great interest that these two parts, together with the Gospels, made up the whole of the NT of the Syriac Church; all the Catholic Epistles, and not only the minor ones, being unknown. This is proved not only by the Doctrine of Addai (ed. Phillips, Lond. 1876, p. 44), where Addai orders: 'But the Law and the Prophets, which you read every day before the people, and the Epistles of Paul, which Simon Peter sent us from the city of Rome, and the Acts of the Twelve Apostles, which John the son of Zebedee sent us from Ephesus; these books read ye in the Churches of Christ, and with these read not any other, as there is not any other, in which the truth that ye hold is written, except these books which retain you in the faith to which ye have been called.' This is corroborated by the quotations of Aphraates, which are restricted to Acts and Paul, to the exclusion of the Catholic Epistles.

The passages cited by Wright as references to 1 P 4^{18} and 1 Jn 3^{24} 4^{15} have been shown by Zahn not to refer to these passages (but the former to Pr 11^{31}; the latter to the Gospel of John).

At last there was published in the Studia Sinaitica, No. 1 (p. 11 ff.) from extracts made by J. R. Harris from cod. Syr. 10 on Mt. Sinai, a list of the canonical books of the Syriac Bible, giving for each book and group of books the number of ῥήματα (stichi).* After the four Gospels (Mat. 2522, Mark 1675, Luke 3083, John 1737 [write 1937], total 9218) follows Acts (2720), then 'Paul the Apostle' with a total 5076 for 'the apostle,' immediately followed by the total for 'the holy books, which the holy Church receives.'

There are some errors and confusions in this list; but as to the primary importance of it there can be no doubt.

This exclusion of all the Catholic Epistles from the old Syriac Canon is further in full agreement with the statement of Leontius on Theodore of Mopsuestia: αὐτήν τε . . . τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰακώβου τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καὶ τὰς ἑξῆς τῶν ἄλλων ἀποκηρύττει καθολικάς. He followed in this the older tradition of the Syriac Church. Neither do the Apostolic Constitutions recognize the Catholic Epistles.

See Th. Zahn, Das NT Theodors von Mopsuestia und der syrische Kanon; Grundriss der Geschichte des neutest. Kanons (Leipzig, 1901, § 6); Jülicher, Einleitung in das NT$^{3.4}$ (1901, § 41); J. A. Bewer, The History of the NT Canon in the Syrian Church (Chicago, 1900).

About the middle of the 4th cent., therefore, the Church of Edessa had no Catholic Epistles in its Canon.

But it was not only the contents but the text of its Bible that differed at that time from $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$.

See in Bewer, p. 51, 'A comparison of the Acts and Epistles in Aphraates with those of the Peshitta.' A most significant example is not quoted by Bewer. Matthias in Ac $1^{23.26}$ is called by Aphraates Tulmai; this is now corroborated by the Syriac version of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius (see TU vii. 2, p. v; the same version called Agabus of Ac 11 Addai). In 1 Co 15^{51} Aphraates testifies for the reading of ℵ, $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ for that of B.

The quotations from Ephraem have been investigated by F. H. Woods (Studia Biblica, iii. 132 ff.): the result is the same; the influence of another version than $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ cannot be denied; but that influence is not half so strong as in Aphraates. But the Roman edition of Ephraem's work is excessively uncritical, and we can 'never trust a biblical quotation where it agrees with the Peshitta' (see Burkitt, JThSt, i. 570, and now Texts and Studies, vii. 2). But not only so, we cannot even trust the references to $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ in the critical apparatus of Tischendorf's ed. oct.; they are neither complete nor correct; cf. 1 Co 15^{37}, where $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ adds 'or of barley' between σίτου and ἤ τινος τῶν λοιπῶν; on 2 Co 1^{12} see Nestle, Introduction, 309. All references to $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ in Tischendorf's apparatus ought to be verified in the way in which Gwynn did this work for the four minor Cath. Epp. (Hermathena, 1890).

But not only in details of text did the older Syriac NT differ from $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$ as now current; it differed also as to the arrangement. In the list of the canonical books mentioned above, Galatians stands at the head of the letters of Paul, before Cor. and Rom., which are followed by Hebrews. The same order, Gal., Cor., Rom., seems to have been that of Ephraem (see J. R. Harris, Four Lectures on the Western Text, p. 21), and it is expressly testified to in Marcion. From this, Zahn is inclined to conclude that Tatian may have brought with him to the East at the same time the Western Text of the Gospels and the Marcionitic order of the letters of Paul; the more so as Eusebius says of Tatian that he altered the text of the Epistles of Paul (see Nestle, Introduction, p. 220).

---

* A great aid in these studies would be a Concordance to the Syriac Bible, which was desired by Lagarde as early as 1857. A prospectus of a Concordance of the Peshiṭṭa was sent out by Benj. Labaree and Wm. A. Shedd from Urumia in Oct. 1897, with some 'Specimen pages'; but the arrangement was not such as to satisfy the wants of the student. A Syriac Concordance in the manner of Hatch-Redpath is one of our needs.

* See on these ῥήματα the latest communication, that of F. C. Burkitt (JThSt, ii. 429–432).

Further, the Church of Edessa had in the time of Ephraem in its Canon the Apocryphal Correspondence of St. Paul and the Corinthians, of which we now know for certain that it once belonged to the Acta Pauli (see vol. i. p. 498). On the other hand, the short letter to Philemon seems to have been wanting in the Bible of Ephraem (see Zahn, Gesch. Kan. ii. 664, 1003, Grundriss, p. 52; Jülicher, Einleitung, doubts this).

It is totally unknown when the three greater Catholic Epistles were received. There has not been as yet even an examination of the question whether the translation of all the letters of Paul is due to the same hand, and that of the three Catholic Epistles to another. What is certain is that the four Antilegomena of the Catholic Epistles and the Bk. of Revelation never formed part of $\mathfrak{S}^{p}$, and were wanting therefore even in the first printed editions of the Syriac NT till 1630. It is the more surprising that the Nestorian Stone-inscription at Singan-fu speaks of 27 books left by Christ to further the soul in what is good (see J. E. Heller, Das Nestorianische Denkmal in Singan-fu, Budapest, 1897, 4to, reprint from 'Wissenschaftliche Ergebnisse der Reise des Grafen B. Széchenyi in Ostasien' (1877–1880), pp. 31, 45).

For a recent discussion on it see Journ. Amer. Orient. Society, xviii. (1897) 176–182 and 361 f., between Charles C. Torrey and R. Gottheil. That it forms the opposition to 'Gospel of the Mixed,' i.e. Tatian's Diatessaron, and means 'Gospel(s) of the Separate,' cannot be doubted any longer.

Of Dissertations on the text of the NT besides those connected with the discovery of $\mathfrak{S}^{s}$, there are none to be mentioned of recent times.

THE LATER VERSIONS OF THE NT.—1. The Philoxeniana.—Syriac scholars did not rest satisfied with the Pesh. NT. In the year 508 Aksĕnāyā or Philoxenus, bishop of Mabbogh (485–519), with the help of his chorepiscopus, Polycarp, undertook a literal translation of the whole Bible. Besides the NT, the Psalms in this version are mentioned by Moses of Aggēl (between 550 and 570), and portions of Isaiah survived in the Add. MSS 17106 of the British Museum, and have been edited by

[†] The first to call attention to the importance of this Commentary of Ephraem was not Ezra Abbott (The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, Boston, 1880), but P. de Lagarde in his edition of the Apostolic Constitutions (Pref. p. vii), 1862. Already in his earlier paper, de Novo Testamento ad versionum orientalium fidem edendo (Berolini, 1857), he made use of Ephraem's Armenian Commentaries.

Ceriani (Monumenta sacra et profana, v. i. 1–40, 1873). The text of the Gospels exists, according to Bernstein (Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1853, pp. 3, 29), in the codex A2 of the Bibliotheca Angelica at Rome. In 1884 Isaac H. Hall published Syriac Manuscript Gospels of a pre-Harklensian version, Acts and Epistles of the Peshito version, written (probably) between 700 and 900 (Philadelphia).

The minor epistles of the Philoxeniana were first published by Ed. Pococke (Leiden, 1630), and still earlier (1612) at Mayence a Latin translation of them (by Nicolaus Servasius, Comment. in Epist. Canonicas) from a MS brought to Rome. Pococke's text was taken over into the Peshito editions of the NT and emended by Lee (1823); still more in the New York impression, 1888. Gwynn collated fifteen MSS and gave a survey of the chief points, pending the publication of the emended text with a complete Apparatus Criticus (Hermathena, No. 16, vol. vii. pp. 281–314 ff.: 'The older Syriac Version of the Four Minor Catholic Epistles'). Cf., further, Ad. Merx, 'Die in der Peschito fehlenden Briefe des Neuen Testaments in arabischer der Philoxeniana entstammender Uebersetzung. Nach der Abschrift eines Manuscripts des Sinaiklosters von Frau A. Persis Burkitt veröffentlicht und mit Anmerkungen versehen' (ZA xii. 240–252, 348–381, xiii. 1–28). Merx frequently disagrees with Gwynn as to the value of the variants.

2. The Harklensis.—A hundred years later the work of retranslation and revision was taken up at Alexandria for the OT by Paul of Tella (see p. 445^{a}), for the NT by Thomas of Ḥarkel (Heraklea in Mesopotamia). This version comprises (as printed at present), like the Philoxeniana, all the books of the NT except Revelation, and was published under the (inappropriate) title of Versio Philoxeniana by Jos. White at Oxford, between 1778 and 1803. A lacuna in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11^{27}–13^{25}) has been supplied by Bensly (Cambridge, 1889). Its importance rests on the fact that one of the Greek MSS of Acts used by Thomas bore the closest relation to codex D, and that for the Epistles of Paul his text goes back to the library of Pamphilus (codex H). On Acts see Aug. Pott, Der Abendländische Text der Apostelgeschichte und die Wir-Quelle, Leipzig, 1900; R. Corssen, 'Die Recension der Philoxeniana durch Thomas von Mabug' (ZNTW, 1901, 1–12);[*] A. Hilgenfeld, 'Thomas von Heraclea und die Apostelgeschichte' (ZWTh, 43, 1900, 3). W. Deane had prepared a new edition; it is an urgent want for the textual criticism, especially of Acts.

3. Revelation.—A Syriac text of the last book of the NT was first published by L. de Dieu (Leiden, 1627) from a MS of Scaliger, now at Leiden, written by a certain Caspar from the land of the Hindus ('Hanravitarum,' as de Dieu read). The text of the Paris (and London) Polyglot seems to be taken from an independent MS. It does not belong to the original work of Polycarp, but to that of Thomas—a fact verified at last by the documentary evidence of the Florence MS rediscovered by Gwynn (Hermathena, 1898: 'On the recovery of a missing Syriac Manuscript of the Apocalypse,' pp. 227–245).

The same scholar discovered, in 1892, in a codex belonging to Lord Crawford, another and older translation of Revelation, and published it as the first Syriac book issued from the Dublin University Press, in 1897 (The Apocalypse of St. John in a Syriac Version hitherto unknown; edited . . . with Critical Notes on the Syriac Text and an annotated Reconstruction of the underlying Greek Text. To which is added an Introductory Dissertation on the Syriac Versions of the Apocalypse, Dublin, 4to).

4. The pericope de adultera and other passages. (a) The passage Jn 8^{2-11} missing in the common Syriac Bible became known to the learned at an early date. Mara, bishop of Amid (about 519), wrote a Greek prologue to a copy of the Tetraevangelium, in which this pericope had a place in canon 89, i.e. at Jn 8^{20}, where also the pseudo-Athanasian Synopsis mentions it. With the Prologue this pericope has been translated into Syriac in the so-called Church history of Zacharias Rhetor (Land, Anecdota Syriaca, iii. 252, 255).

From a MS of Ussher (now in the Trinity Library of Dublin) the same passage had been printed by de Dieu, 1631 (Animadversiones in quattuor Evangelia). A third translation was due to the abbot Mar Paul, apparently Paul of Tella; a fourth has been printed by J. White (ex codice Barsalibæi at the end of the Gospels in his edition of the Philoxeniana, i. [1778] p. 559). See on these and other points J. Gwynn (Transactions, Dublin, 1881).

(b) While scarcely one Syriac MS is known in Europe containing all 27 books of the present NT (see on this Gwynn, Transactions, 1886 and 1893; and compare what Rahmani states about the Mosul πανδέκτης, from which he published the Testamentum Domini nostri Jesu Christi [Præfatio, pp. ix, x]), there are some MSS that contain books which are no longer included in the NT, e.g. cod. 1700 in the University Library at Cambridge, from which The Epistles of St. Clement to the Corinthians in Syriac were edited by the late R. L. Bensly (Cambridge, 1899). In the MS the Clementine Epp. stand between the Catholic and Pauline Epistles, and are divided like these into lectures for Church use. There are, again, the MSS from which that other pair of letters ascribed to Clement, de Virginibus or de Virginitate, were published by Wetstein (NT Gr. t. i. 1751, Prol. pp. 1–26) and J. Th. Beelen (Lovanii, 1856; see on them J. P. N. Land, 'Syrische Bijdragen tot de Patristik,' in Godgeleerde Bijdragen van 1856–7).

(c) On the Clementine Octateuch added as number 77–83 to the 76 books of the OT and NT in the Mosul Pandektes just mentioned, see Rahmani, l.c. p. x.

These and other instances show that the history of the NT Canon was in the Syriac Church different from its history in most other branches.

5. The Palestinian Syriac.—One other version remains to be noticed, namely, that used by the Malkite (Greek) Church in Palestine and Egypt, written in a dialect more akin to the language of the Jewish Targums; long known exclusively from a lectionary in the Vatican Library, called the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum; described by Assemani and Adler (1789); published in 1861–64 in two vols. by Count Fr. Miniscalchi Erizzo, and again—as his last work—by P. de Lagarde in his Bibliotheca Syriaca (Göttingen, 1892); republished by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson on the strength of two other MSS found on Mt. Sinai (The Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the Gospels, London, 1899, 4to). Quite recently new texts have been added from Acts and the Epistles of Paul, including Hebrews and James (Studia Sinaitica, No. vi.), and the date and birthplace of this whole branch of literature have been elucidated by F. C. Burkitt (JThSt, ii. 174–185). In spite of its secondary character, it is not devoid of interest for textual criticism. In the Apparatus its symbol has been hitherto syr^{h} or ^{hr} or ^{hier}.[*]

---

[*] To be used with caution. The intention of Thomas was certainly not 'to restore with the help of his Greek MSS the original text of Philoxenus,' and 'the old Syrian' mentioned by him in Mt 27^{35} 28^{5} Mk 8^{17} is not Philoxenus, but the Peshito. Cf. also A Hilgenfeld, ZWTh, 44 (1901), 318–320.

[*] One of the urgent needs of textual criticism is fitting symbols for the Syriac versions of the NT. Tischendorf used

II. OLD TESTAMENT.—1. Tradition.—The Syrians themselves believed that a part of the OT was translated already in the time of Solomon at the request of king Hiram. Jesudad, bishop of Hadeth, c. 852 A.D., mentions the books then translated. Another tradition is that the version was due to the priest sent by the king of Assyria to Samaria; whose name is variously given as Asa, Asya, Ezra, Uria, אסא, אסיא 2 K 17^{24}, 1 Ch 15^{18}, ed. Lee and Ceriani; see the Literature quoted in Urt. p. 231, and add there Schatzhöhle, ed. Bezold, 192. 3 אורי, codd. PL תאוריה, in Arabic باوريه. The rest of the books are said to have been added in the days of Addai and Abgar (see p. 645^{a}).

2. Origin.—Whether part of the version is of pre-Christian, or at least of Jewish origin (thus Rich. Simon, Hug, Geiger, Perles, Lagarde), is not certain, but it is possible.* There were many Jews in Mesopotamia, especially in Edessa, in early times. It may suffice to recall queen Helena and Izates, and the Abgar legend. In the latter a daily reading of 'the OT and NT' (p. 34) or 'the Law and the Prophets' (p. 44) is presupposed besides that of the Gospel, Acts, and Epistles (see p. 647^{a}).

3. Extent.—The Syriac OT was, on the whole, the same as the Hebrew Bible. Jesudad, for instance, knows that it counts 22 books; but at a very early date the influence of the Greek Bible is felt. There are some notable peculiarities. Chronicles seems to have been wanting in the canon of the Nestorians, nor is it represented in the Massoretic labours of the Jacobites; but it is found already in MSS of the 6th cent. (cod. Ambrosianus, Brit. Mus., Wright 25), with a division at 2 Ch 6^1 (in most MSS, not in Ambros. and Florent.). Neither is Ezra-Nehemiah found in the Massoretic MSS, nor Esther in those of the Nestorians. In the Bibles of the Jacobites Esther forms, together with Judith, Ruth, and Susanna, the 'book of the women,' with 4463 stichi.

The arrangement of the books varies according to the MSS. The list on next col. gives them according to the order in the canonical list mentioned above, p. 647^{b}; the figures for cols. 2-5 are taken from Abbé Martin's Introduction à la critique textuelle du NT, Partie théorique, Paris, 1883, p. 667; cf., further, Gregory-Tischendorf, 3. 112, 1303; J. R. Harris, On the Origin of the Ferrar Group, Lond. 1893, 10, 26.

Note.—The Nomocanon of Barhebræus, ch. 7, § 3 (p. 103, ed. Bedjan) on the number of the holy books and those besides (ἔξω), quotes canon 81 of the Apostles, that all clergy and laymen ought to have the Holy Scriptures of the OT, i.e. 5 books of Moses, Josh., Judges, Ruth, Judith; 4 books of Kings; 2 of Chron.; 2 of Ezra; Esth., Job; 3 of Mac.; Job, David; 5 of Solomon; 16 Prophets. Of 'books without,' there is to be Bar Asira for the teaching of the young. The NT is to include 4 Gospels, 14 letters of Paul, 2 of Peter, 3 of John; James, Jude; 2 of Clement, 8 books of the mysteries of the same Clement, and the Praxeis of the Apostles.

The elucidation says that the 4 of Kings are Samuel and Kings, and of Solomon we know only 4 (Prov., Eccl., Cant., Wisd.); and it is possible that the 5th is that which is inscribed 'the deep Proverbs of Solomon'; and the Book of Susanna is reckoned with Daniel.

Then he quotes the great Athanasius on the great Wisdom, Bar Asira, Esther, Judith, Tobia, what is called διατάξεις ἀποστόλων, and the Shepherd; Dionysius of Alexandria on Revelation as being by Cerinthus or another John; Origen on Hebrews, Apocalypsis Pauli, and other Revelations, The Doctrine of the Apostles, Epistle of Barnabas, Tobia, the Shepherd, Bar Asira; the Patriarch Cyriacus on the Book of Hierotheos as being not by him, but probably by the heretic Stephen bar Ṣudaile.

A singular division found in some MSS is that the Law (אוריתא) is directly followed by כתבא רבית מותבֵא=liber sessionum, βίβλος καθισμάτων, i.e. Job, Josh., Judges, Sam., Kings, Prov., Sir., Eccl., Ruth, Canticles.

The Psalter also is divided into καθίσματα (20). This is the favourite book of the Syriac Church, which must be known by heart if one wishes to become a deacon, and was recited daily by certain monks. In accurate MSS there are Massoretical notes; cf. the edition of Bedjan (Liber Psalmorum, horarum diurnarum, ordinis officii divini et homiliarum rogationum ad usum scholarum, Parisiis, 1886, p. 117).

The number of Psalms is 150, of Hallelujahs 20, Sections (צתָּא) 29, Embolisms (מַרְמְיָתָא) 57, Stichi (פתגמא) 4833, and Books 5. The number of Words is 19,934, and the number of Letters 90,852. 'Lord' occurs 732 times, 'God' 400, 'because' (מטל) 285, 'Moses' 6, 'Aaron' 6, 'Jacob' 24, 'Samuel' 1, 'Benjamin' 2, 'Israel' 44, 'namely' (ניר) 5, 'but' (דין) 5. And 'know that there is not found in David the form תח׳ת for the preposition "under," as there is not found תחות in the Apostle'; תחות occurs 13 times; and 'from now and to eternity' 4 times.

There is a strange statement at the head of many Psalter MSS (already in the cod. Ambr.) that the Psalms were translated from the Palestinian language into Hebrew, from Hebrew into Greek, from Greek into Syriac. In the cod. Hunt 109 (Oxford, Bodleian) this statement is transferred to the whole Syriac OT, and in cod. Rich 7154 ¶ בר אסירא.

(Brit. Mus.) it is stated that the (Syriac) Psalter was translated from the Palestinian into Hebrew, according to the translation of Symmachus the Samaritan. Other Psalters have the heading דמפרשׁא, which is intelligible of the Gospels of the Separate (see pp. 646, 648), but scarcely of the Psalms. (Does it mean a Church-Psalter, detached from the Bible?*) Many liturgical additions are found in the Church-Psalters (see, e.g., the edition of Bedjan, which contains, of 'Canticles' at the end of the Psalter, Ex 15, Is 42, Dt 32).

Besides the books of the Greek and Hebrew Bibles, complete MSS called καθολικοί or πανδέκτης (קאתוליקיא או פנדקטא), like the cod. Ambrosianus, have preserved the Apocalypse of Baruch,† 4 Ezra, 4 and 5 Maccabees,‡ i.e. the history of Samuna, and Josephus BJ v. Apart from Bible MSS, many other pieces of apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature have been preserved to us in Syriac.§ On the Syriac text of Sirach see above, p. 546; of Tobit only the version of Paul of Tella is preserved, and this only down to 7^{11}; the rest is still later. Of the first Book of Maccabees the cod. Ambrosianus preserved a second recension.

4. Character of the Version.—The value of the Version varies greatly, as it is not the work of a single hand. The Pentateuch keeps close to the Heb. text and Jewish exegesis, but has interesting details; it knows, for instance, or thinks it knows, that the rare word כברה denotes the 'parasang.' Genesis, Isaiah (30^{20} $46^{5.6}$), the Twelve, the Psalter, show marks of having been influenced by the Septuagint;‖ Ruth is paraphrastic, Job literal, Chronicles like a Targum; the version of Proverbs has been used by the Targumists. Many of the books of the OT have been made the subject of special studies, whose results we now possess, mostly in the shape of Inaugural Dissertations; but new investigations are necessary.

5. Editions.—The printed text of the Syriac OT is in a most deplorable state, all editions going back to the Paris Polyglot of Michel le Jay (Paris, 1645). This was reproduced without any noteworthy improvements in Walton's London Polyglot (1657); Lee reproduced the same text with a few emendations and several misprints for the British Bible Society (1821). The Urmia edition of the American Missionaries (1852) is a reproduction of Lee in Nestorian characters with Nestorian vowels and with improved spellings. At last the Dominicans at Mosul published an edition of the Syriac Bible (3 vols. 1887–92), which the present writer has not seen, but which, he is afraid, will not satisfy our wants. Ceriani's photolithographic reproduction of the cod. Ambrosianus (1876–81, Milano, 200 frs.) is not within the reach of the general student; and as the editions of Urmia and the Bible Society are scarce or out of print, there is a crying need for a new edition of one of the most important versions of the OT. Only for the Libri Apocryphi or (as he wished afterwards to entitle the book) Libri Deuterocanonici we have the edition of P. de Lagarde (Lips. 1861). The country of Ussher, who intended himself to bring out such an edition, the country of Walton and of Buchanan, has here a task to discharge that will amply reward itself.*

(2) On the revision which Jacob of Edessa undertook in the years 704 and 705, see Urt. 236; Wright, p. 17. Kayser, 1881, p. 52 f.).

(3) The statement that Mar Abba († 552) 'translated and explained' (פשק and תרגם) the OT and NT from the Greek is made by Barhebræus, Ebedjesu, and seems to hint at more than a commentary.

From the Syriac MSS lying in the libraries of Europe the history of the transmission of the Bible might be very well illustrated; and much useful material might be gathered from the Commentaries of the Syrian divines, even from so late a scholar as Gregory Barhebræus (see J. Goettsberger, 'Barhebräus und seine Scholien zur heiligen Schrift,' in Biblische Studien, v. 4, 5, 1900).

SYROPHŒNICIAN (Συροφοίνισσα, Συροφοινίκισσα WH, Σύρα Φοινίκισσα WHmg) occurs only in Mk 7[26] as the national name of a woman who is called in Mt 15[22] 'a Canaanitish (Χαναναία) woman,' i.e. not a Jewess, but a descendant of the early inhabitants of the Phœnician coast-lands (see CANAAN). On ethnic and other grounds it is unlikely that the prefix Συρο- was meant to distinguish the district from the Carthaginian seaboard, called by Strabo (xvii. 19) ἡ τῶν Λιβυφοινίκων γῆ, the latter being a mongrel race (Livy, xxi. 22), and the alleged contrast being of no moment in the narrative. The term probably denotes a Syrian resident in Phœnicia proper, and may have been in current use before Hadrian adopted it as the official title of one of the three provinces into which he divided Syria. In Ac 21[2. 3] the two parts of the term are already used interchangeably. Tradition (Clementine Homilies, ii. 19, iii. 73) gives the name of Justa to the woman concerned in the incident, and that of Bernice to her daughter. Swete, following but correcting Euthymius Zigabenus, argues from the context, with some force, that the woman, though of Phœnician extraction, was Greek in speech as well as in religion.

TAANACH (תַּעְנָךְ; once, Jos 12[21] תַּעֲנָךְ; twice, 1 K 4[12], 1 Ch 7[29] תַּעֲנָךְ, which is the form adopted uniformly by Baer).—An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, whose king was amongst those whom Joshua smote (Jos 12[21]). It lay within the territory allotted to Issachar, but belonged to Manasseh, and was given to the Kohathite Levites. The Canaanites were not driven out, but they were put to tribute, or obliged to do personal service, as the Israelites increased in strength (Jos 17[11] 21[25], Jg 1[27], 1 Ch 7[29]). Near Taanach, perhaps on lands belonging to the city, was fought the decisive battle between Barak and the kings of Canaan, which is celebrated in the triumphant song of Deborah (Jg 5[19]). The city was in the rich district from which Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, drew supplies for the royal household (1 K 4[12]); and is mentioned in close connexion with Megiddo—'Taanach by (or 'upon') the waters of Megiddo' (Jg 5[19]). It was apparently one of the line of fortresses (Dor, Megiddo, Taanach, and Bethshean) which stretched across the country from west to east, and guarded the main avenues of approach to the great plain of Esdraelon from the south. As such it is mentioned with Megiddo in the list of Thothmes III. at Karnak, and again in the list of Sheshonk (Shishak) (Max Müller, Asien u. Europ. 158, 170). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Θααvάχ, Θανάκ, Thaanach) describe it as 'a very large village,' 4 or 3 Roman miles from Legio, and it is now Ta'annuk, about 4½ miles from Lejjûn. In the 13th cent. the manor of Thanis (Taanach) is noted as forming part of the possessions of the Abbey of St. Mary in the valley of Jehoshaphat at Jerusalem. Ta'annuk is a small village on the S.E. slope of a large isolated mound, Tell Ta'annuk at the S. edge of the plain of Esdraelon. The mound is covered with fragments of pottery and shapeless ruins, and there are ancient cisterns, wells, and rock-hewn tombs. Below the village is a small mosque, which was perhaps a church.

TAANATH-SHILOH (תַּאֲנַת שִׁלֹה; B Θηνασὰ καὶ Σελλησά, A Τηναθσηλώ; Luc. Θηναθασηλώ).—A town on the N.E boundary of Ephraim, mentioned between Michmethath and Janoah (Jos 16^{6}). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Θηνάθ) state that Taanath-shiloh was 10 Roman miles E. of Neapolis on the road to the Jordan, and called in their day Thena. This is probably the Thena (Θῆνα) mentioned by Ptolemy (v. xvi. 5) as one of the towns of Samaria. It was identified by Van de Velde with Tâna about 7 miles from Nâblus (Neapolis), and 2 miles N. of Yânûn (Janoah), The ruins, foundations, caves, cisterns, and rock-hewn tombs are on one of the Roman roads leading from Neapolis to the Jordan Valley (PEF Mem. ii. 232, 245).

The Talmuds explain the word Taanath by 'threshold,' and hold Taanath-shiloh to have been a long, narrow strip of land belonging to Joseph which ran southwards into the territory of Benjamin, and included the site of Shiloh.

TABAOTH, 1 Es $5^{29\,(30)}$ (B Ταβαώθ, A Ταβώθ), and TABBAOTH (טַבָּעוֹת), Ezr 2^{43} (B Ταβώθ, A Ταββαώθ, Luc. Ταβαώθ)=Neh 7^{46} (B Γαβώθ, A and Luc. as before).—The eponym of a family of Nethinim who are said to have returned with Zerubbabel.

TABBATH (טַבָּת; B Ταβάθ, A Γαβάθ; Tebbath).—The Midianites, after Gideon's night attack, fled to Beth-shittah, towards Zererah, as far as the border of Abel-meholah by Tabbath (Jg 7^{22}). No trace of the site of Tabbath has yet been found, but it must have been in the Jordan Valley, and probably not far from the spot, to the south of Bethshean, where the hills of Samaria approach the river. C. W. WILSON.

TABEEL (טָבְאֵל 'God is good' or [Winckl.] 'God is wise'; the pointing טָבְאַל in Is 7^{6} may be simply due to pause [Ols., König], or, more probably, may be designed to suggest the sense 'good for nothing' [אַל neg.; so Del., Dillm., Nöld., Duhm, Stade, Marti, and Oxf. Heb. Lex.]; LXX Ταβεήλ).—1. See REZIN, p. 267^{a}. 2. A Persian official in Samaria who was one of the parties to the letter to Artaxerxes, which was designed to hinder the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, Ezr 4^{7}.

J. A. SELBIE.

TABELLIUS (Ταβέλλιος), 1 Es 2^{16} (LXX ^{15})= Tabeel, Ezr 4^{7}.

TABER.—Only in Nah 2^{7}, in the description of the destruction of Nineveh, when HUZZAB 'is carried away, and her handmaids mourn as with the voice of doves, tabering (Amer. RV 'beating') upon their breasts' [lit. 'hearts'; מְתֹפְפוֹת עַל־לִבְבֵהֶן]. Beating the breast was a familiar Oriental custom in mourning (see the illustration in Ball's Light from the East, p. 119, and cf. Is 32^{12} [RV, but the text is doubtful]). The word here used means lit. 'drumming' (cf. Ps 68^{26}, its only other occurrence, and see illustration in vol. iii. p. 462^{b}). The LXX φθεγγόμεναι implies a reading מְצַפְצְפוֹת, which is used in Is 29^{4} of the voice of a wailing woman. Stade is inclined to prefer this to the MT.

The English word 'taber' means a small drum, usually accompanying a pipe, both instruments being played by the same performer. Other forms are 'tabor,' 'tabour,' and 'tambour'; and dim. forms are 'tabret' and 'tambourine.' The words are originally Arabic, and entered the English language through Old French, a step between French and Arabic being the Spanish. For the subst. cf. Shaks. Winter's Tale, IV. iv. 183—'If you did but hear the pedlar at the door, you would never dance again after a tabor and pipe.' The verb is rarer, cf. Chaucer, Good Women, 354—

'In your court is many a losengeour, . . .
That tabouren in your eres many a soun,
Right after hir imaginacioun.'

J. A. SELBIE.

TABERAH (תַּבְעֵרָה; LXX Ἐμπυρισμός).—A station in Israel's journeyings in the wilderness of Paran (Nu 11^{3}, Dt 9^{22}). Its name Tab'ērah (='burning or place of burning') is said to have been given to it 'because the fire of the LORD burnt among them' (Nu 11^{3} [prob. E]). The place, which is not named in the itinerary of Nu 33, has not been identified.

Literature.

The term tabernaculum, whence 'tabernacle' of the Eng. VSS since Wyclif, denoted a tent with or without a wooden framework, and, like the σκηνή of the Gr. translators, was used in the Latin VSS to render indiscriminately the אֹהֶל or goats'-hair 'tent' and the סֻכָּה or 'booth' (which see) of the Hebrews. Its special application by the Romans to the tent or templum minus of the augurs made it also a not altogether inappropriate rendering of the מִשְׁכָּן or 'dwelling' of the priestly writers (see § iii.), by which, however, the etymological signification of the latter was disregarded, and the confusion further increased. The same confusion reigns in our AV. The Revisers, as they inform us in their preface, have aimed at greater uniformity by rendering mishkān by 'tabernacle' and 'ōhel by 'tent' (as AV had already done in certain cases, see § iii.). It is to be regretted, however, that they did not render the Heb. sukkāh with equal uniformity by 'booth' (e.g. in Mt 17^{4} and parallels), and particularly in the case of the Feast of Booths (EV Tabernacles).

i. THE TENT OR TABERNACLE OF THE OLDEST SOURCES.—Within the limits of this art. it is manifestly impossible to enter in detail into the problems of history and religion to which the study of 'the tabernacle' and its appointments, as these are presented by the priestly authors of our Pentateuch, introduces the student of the OT. The idea of the tabernacle, with its Aaronic priesthood and ministering Levites, lies at the very foundation of the religious institutions of Israel as these are conceived and formulated in the priestly sources. To criticise this conception here—a conception which has dominated Jewish and Christian thought from the days of Ezra to our own—would lead us at once into the heart of the critical controversy which has raged for two centuries round the literature and religion of the OT. Such a task is as impossible to compass here as it is unnecessary. The almost universal acceptance by OT scholars of the post-exilic date of the books of the Pentateuch in their present form is evident on every page of this Dictionary. On this foundation, therefore, we are free to build in this article without the necessity of setting forth at every stage the processes by which the critical results are obtained.

Now, when the middle books of the Pentateuch are examined in the same spirit and by the same methods as prevail in the critical study of other ancient literatures, a remarkable divergence of testimony emerges with regard to the tent which, from the earliest times, was employed to shelter the sacred ark. In the article ARK (vol. i. p. 149^{b}) attention was called to the sudden introduction of the 'tent' in the present text of Ex 33^{7} as of something with which the readers of this document—the Pentateuch source E, according to the unanimous verdict of modern scholars—are already familiar. This source, as it left its author's pen, must have contained some account of the construction of the ark, probably from the offerings of the people (33^{6}) as in the parallel narrative of P ($25^{2ff.}$), and of the tent required for its proper protection. Regarding this tent we are supplied with some interesting information, which may be thus summarized:—(a) Its name was in Heb. 'ōhel mô'ēd (33^{7}, AV 'the tabernacle of the congregation,' RV 'the tent of meeting'). The true significance of this term will be fully discussed in a subsequent section (§ iii.) (b) Its situation was 'without the camp, afar off from the camp,' recalling the situation of the local sanctuaries of a later period, outside the villages of Canaan (see HIGH PLACE, SANCTUARY). In this position it was pitched, not temporarily or on special occasions only, but, as the tenses of the original demand, throughout the whole period of the desert wanderings (cf. RV v.^{7} 'Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it,' etc., with AV). Above all, (c) its purpose is clearly stated. It was the spot where J″, descending in the pillar of cloud which stood at the door of the tent (v.$^{9f.}$, cf. Nu 12^{5}, Dt 31^{15}), 'met his servant Moses and spake unto him face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend' (v.^{11}). On these occasions Moses received those special revelations of the Divine will which were afterwards communicated to the people. To the tent of meeting, also, every one repaired who had occasion to seek J″ (v.^{7}), either for an oracle or for purposes of worship. Finally, (d) its æditaus was the young Ephraimite Joshua, the son of Nun, who 'departed not out of the tent' (v.^{11}, cf. Nu 11^{28}), but slept there as the guardian of the ark, as the boy Samuel slept in the sanctuary at Shiloh (1 S $3^{3ff.}$).

The same representation of the tent as pitched without the camp, and as associated with Moses and Joshua in particular, reappears in the narrative of the seventy elders (Nu $11^{16f. 24-30}$), and in the incident of Miriam's leprosy ($12^{1ff.}$, note esp. v.$^{4f.}$), both derived from E; also in the reference, based upon, if not originally part of, the same source, in Dt $31^{14f.}$.

The interpretation now given of this important section of the Elohistic source is that of almost all recent scholars, including so strenuous an opponent of the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis as August Dillmann (see his Com. in loc.). Little, therefore, need be said by way of refutation of the views of those who have endeavoured to harmonize this earlier representation with that which dominates the Priestly Code. The only one of these views that can be said to deserve serious consideration is that which sees in the tent of Ex $33^{7ff.}$ a provisional tent of meeting pending the construction of the tabernacle proper. This interpretation is generally combined with the theory that the tent in question was originally Moses' private tent—an opinion which dates from the time of the Gr. translators (λαβὼν Μωυσῆς τὴν σκηνὴν αὐτοῦ, κτλ., so also Pesh.), and has found favour with commentators, from Rashi downwards, including most English expositors. This view is a priori plausible enough, but it falls to pieces before the fact disclosed above, that the same representation of the tent of meeting situated without the camp, with Joshua as its solitary guardian, is found in the Pentateuch, even after the erection of the more splendid tabernacle of the priestly writers. Moreover, there is no hint in the text of Ex 33^{7-11} of the temporary nature of the tent; on the contrary, as we have seen, the tenses employed are intended to describe the habitual custom of the Hebrews and their leader during the whole period of the wanderings. The closing verse of the section, finally, proves conclusively that Moses had his abode elsewhere, and only visited the tent when he wished to meet with J″. At the same time, the preservation of this section of E by the final editor of the Pentateuch, when the preceding account of the construction of the ark (cf. Dt 10^{1-5} with Driver's note) was excised, can hardly be explained otherwise than by the supposition that he regarded the tent of meeting here described as having some such provisional character as this theory presupposes.

During the conquest and settlement, the tent of meeting presumably continued to shelter the ark (which see) until superseded by the more substantial 'temple' of J″ at SHILOH. The picture of this temple (הֵיכָל) with its door and doorposts (1 S 1^{9} 3^{15}) disposes of the late gloss (2^{22b}), based on a similar gloss, Ex 38^{8}, which assumes the continued existence of the tent of meeting (see the Comm. in loc.). So, too, Ps 78^{60}, which speaks of the sanctuary at Shiloh as a tent and a tabernacle (mishkān), is of too uncertain a date to be placed against the testimony of the earlier historian. In the narrative of the older sources of the Book of Samuel (1 S 4 ff.) there is no mention of any special protection for the ark until we read of the tent pitched for it by David in his new capital on Mt. Zion (2 S 6^{17}, cf. 1 Ch 16^{1}, and the phrase 'within curtains,' 2 S 7^{2}, 1 Ch 17^{1}). The later author of 2 S 7^{6}, however, evidently thought of the ark as housed continuously from the beginning in a tent. 'I have not dwelt in an house,' J″ is represented as saying, 'since the day that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent ('ōhel) and in a tabernacle (mishkān),' or, as the text should more probably run, 'from tent to tent, and from tabernacle to tabernacle' (so Klost., Budde, basing on 1 Ch 17^{5}). David's tent was known as 'the tent of J″' (1 K $2^{28ff.}$). Before it stood the essential accompaniment of every sanctuary, an altar, to which the right of asylum belonged (ib. 1^{50}). What the tent may have contained in addition to the sacred ark is unknown, with the exception, incidentally mentioned, of 'the horn of oil,' with the contents of which Zadok the priest anointed the youthful Solomon (ib. 1^{39}). A solitary reference to 'the tent of meeting' in a pre-exilic document yet remains, viz. the late gloss 1 K 8^{4}, the unhistorical character of which is now admitted (see Kittel, Benzinger, etc., in loc., and cf. Wellh. Proleg. [Eng. tr.] 43 f.).

To sum up our investigation, it may be affirmed that the author of 2 S 7 not only accurately represents the facts of history when he describes the ark as having been moved 'from tent to tent and from tabernacle to tabernacle,' but reflects with equal accuracy the opinion of early times that a simple tent or tabernacle was the appropriate housing for the ancient palladium of the Hebrew tribes. This is confirmed both by the analogy of the practice of other branches of the Semitic race, and by incidental references from the period of religious decadence in Israel, which imply that tent-shrines were familiar objects in connexion with the worship at the high places (2 K 23^{7} RVm, Ezk 16^{16}; cf. the names Oholibah and Oholibamah, and art. OHOLAH).

ii. THE TABERNACLE OF THE PRIESTLY WRITERS. —The literary sources.—These are almost exclusively from the hand of the authors of the great priestly document of the Pentateuch. This document, as has long been recognized, is not the product of a single pen, or even of a single period.

The results which recent criticism has achieved in disentangling and exhibiting the various strata of the composite literary work denoted by the convenient symbol P, and the grounds on which these results are based, must be sought elsewhere, as, e.g.,—to name only a few accessible in English,—Kuenen, Hexateuch, 72 ff., Driver, LOT^{6} 40 ff., the more elaborate tables of the Oxford Hexateuch, i. 255, 261, ii. 138, and the art. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 808 ff., with the table, p. 810^{b}. Reference may also be made here to the present writer's forthcoming commentary on Exodus in the Internat. Critical Series.

The sections of the Pentateuch dealing with the subject of this art. are the following:—

(1) Ex 25–29, a fairly homogeneous section (but cf. Oxf. Hex. ii. 120) of the main or ground-stock of P (hence the symbol P^g), containing minute directions for the construction of the furniture and fabric of the sanctuary (25–27), followed by instructions relative to the priestly garments (28) and the consecration of Aaron and his sons (29).

(2) Ex 30. 31, a set of instructions supplementary to the foregoing. For their secondary character (hence the symbol P^s) see the authorities cited above and § viii. (c) below.

(3) Ex 35–40, also a fairly homogeneous block of narrative, reproduced in the main verbatim from 25–31 'with the simple substitution of past tenses for future,' but in a systematic order which embodies the contents of 30. 31 in their proper places in the older narrative 25 ff. (see authorities as above). It is therefore younger than either of these sections, hence also P^s. The critical problem is here complicated by the striking divergence of the LXX in form and matter from the MT, to some points of which attention will be called in the sequel.

(4) Nu $3^{25ff.}$ $4^{4ff.}$ $7^{1ff.}$ contain various references to the tabernacle and its furniture, which also belong to the secondary strata of P (see NUMBERS, vol. iii. p. 568). To these sources have to be added the description of the temple of Solomon in 1 K 6 ff. and the sketch of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 40 ff.), which disclose some remarkable analogies to the tabernacle. The references to the latter in the Bks. of Chronicles are of value, as showing how completely the later Heb. literature is dominated by the conceptions of the Priestly Code. Outside the Canon of the OT, the most important sources are the sections of Josephus' Antiquities which deal with the tabernacle (III. vi.), Philo's De Vita Moysis (ed. Mangey, vol. ii. p. 145 ff., Bohn's tr. iii. 88 ff.), and the 3rd cent. treatise, containing a systematic presentation of the views of the Jewish authorities, ברייתא דמלכת המשכן (ed. Flesch, Die Baraijtha von der Herstellung der Stiftshütte; Eng. tr. by Barclay, The Talmud, 334 ff.). The Epistle to the Hebrews, finally, supplies us with the first Christian interpretation of the tabernacle (§ xiii.).

iii. THE NOMENCLATURE OF THE TABERNACLE.*—(a) In our oldest sources the sacred tent receives, as we have seen, the special designation (1) אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד 'ōhel mô'ēd (Ex 33^7, Nu 11^{16} 12^4, Dt 31^{14}, all most probably from E). This designation is also found about 130 times in the priestly sections of the Hexateuch.

The verb יעד (ועד) from which מוֹעֵד is derived signifies 'to appoint a time or place of meeting,' in the Niphal 'to meet by appointment' (often in P). Hence אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד—as the name is understood by P, at least—signifies 'the tent of meeting' (so RV) or 'tent of tryst' (OTJC^{2} 246), the spot which J" has appointed to meet or hold tryst with Moses and with Israel. As this meeting is mainly for the purpose of speaking with them (Ex 29^{42} 33^{11}, Nu 7^{89} etc.), of declaring His will to them, the expression 'tent of meeting' is practically equivalent to 'tent of revelation' (Driver, Deut. 339, following Ewald's 'Offenbarungszelt'). It has lately been suggested that behind this lies a more primitive meaning. From the fact that one of the functions of the Babylonian priesthood was to determine the proper time (âdânu, from the same root as mô'ēd) for an undertaking, Zimmern has suggested that the expression אהל מוֹעֵד may originally have denoted 'the tent where the proper time for an undertaking was determined,' in other words, 'tent of the oracle' (Orakelzelt). See Zimmern, Beiträge zur Kenntnis d. bab. Religion, p. 88 n. 2 (cf. Haupt, JBL, 1900, p. 52). Still another view of P's use of the term מוֹעֵד has recently been suggested (Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves, 1900, p. 3 f.). P, according to Meinhold, intends to give to the older term (אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד) of E the same significance as his own אֹהֶל הָעֵדוּת 'tent of the testimony' (see No. 10 below), by giving to the Niphal of יָעַד ('make known,' 'reveal one's self,' as above) the sense of עוּד 'to testify of one's self.' The LXX, therefore, according to this scholar, was perfectly justified in rendering both the above designations by σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου (see below). The rendering of AV 'tabernacle of the congregation' is based on a mistaken interpretation of the word mô'ēd, as if synonymous with the cognate עֵדָה.

(2) The simple expression 'the tent' (הָאֹהֶל) is found in P 19 times (Ex $26^{9.11}$ etc.). We have already (§ i.) met with the title (3) 'the tent of J"' (1 K $2^{28ff.}$). To these may be added (4) 'the house of the tent' (1 Ch 9^{23}), and (5) 'the house of J"' (Ex 23^{19}).

(b) In addition to the older 'tent of meeting' a new and characteristic designation is used extensively in P, viz. (6) מִשְׁכָּן mishkān (about 100 times in the Hex.), 'the place where J" dwells' (שָׁכַן), 'dwelling,' 'habitation' (so Tindale); by AV rendered equally with אֹהֶל 'tabernacle' (but 1 Ch 6^{32} 'dwelling-place'). A marked ambiguity, however, attaches to P's use of this term. On its first occurrence (Ex 25^9) it manifestly denotes the whole fabric of the tabernacle, and so frequently. It is thus equivalent to the fuller (7) 'dwelling (EV 'tabernacle') of J"' found in Lv 17^4 (here ‖ (1), Nu 16^9 etc., 1 Ch 16^{39} 21^{29}), and to 'the dwelling of the testimony' (No. 11 below). In other passages it denotes the tapestry curtains with their supporting frames which constitute 'the dwelling' par excellence ($26^{1.6f.}$ etc.), and so expressly in the designation (8) 'dwelling (EV 'tabernacle') of the tent of meeting' (Ex 39^{32} 40^2 etc., 1 Ch 6^{32}). In the passages just cited and in some others where the 'ōhel and the mishkān are clearly distinguished (e.g. Ex 35^{11} 39^{40} $40^{27ff.}$, Nu 3^{25} 9^{15}), the AV has rendered the former by 'tent' and the latter by 'tabernacle,' a distinction now consistently carried through by RV.* In 1 Ch 6^{48} [MT 33] we have (9) 'the dwelling of the house of God.'

(c) Also peculiar to P and the later writers influenced by him is the designation (10) אֹהֶל הָעֵדוּת (Nu 9^{15} etc., 2 Ch 24^6, RV throughout 'tent of the testimony'; so AV in Nu 9^{15}, but elsewhere 'the tabernacle of witness'). The tabernacle was so called as containing 'the ark of the testimony' (see § ix.). Hence too the parallel designation (11) מִשְׁכַּן הָעֵדוּת (Ex 38^{21}, Nu 1^{50} etc., EV 'tabernacle of [the] testimony').

(d) In addition to these we find the more general term (12) מִקְדָּשׁ 'holy place or sanctuary,' applied to the tabernacle (Ex 25^8 and often; in the Law of Holiness (Lv 17 ff.) almost exclusively.

Passing to the versions that have influenced our own, we find as regards the LXX a uniformity greater even than in our AV. Owing to the confusion of מִשְׁכָּן and אֹהֶל (both = σκηνή) on the one hand, and of מוֹעֵד and עֵדֻת on the other (but cf. Meinhold, op. cit. 3 f.), we have the all but universal rendering ἡ σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου, 'the tent of the testimony,' to represent (1), (8), (10), and (11) above. This, along with the simple σκηνή, is the NT designation (Ac 7^{44} AV 'tabernacle of witness,' Rev 15^5 AV 'tabernacle of the testimony'). In Wis 9^8, Sir 24^{10} we have a new title (13) 'the sacred tent' (σκηνὴ ἁγία, with which cf. the ἱερὰ σκηνή of the Carthaginian camp, Diod. Sic. xx. 65). The Old Lat. and Vulg. follow the LXX with the rendering tabernaculum and tab. testimonii, though frequently also ('habitually in Numbers,' Westcott, Ep. to the Hebrews, 234 f.) tab. fœderis, the latter based on the designation of the ark as the 'ark of the covenant' (see § ix.). As to the older Eng. VSS, finally, those of Hereford and Purvey follow the Vulg. closely with 'tab. of witness, witnessynge, testimonye,' and 'tab. of the boond of pees (t. fœderis).' Tindale on the other hand follows LXX with the rendering 'tab. of witnesse' for (1) and (10), but then again he restores the distinction between 'ōhel and mishkān by rendering the latter 'habitacion,' except in the case of (7), 'the dwellinge-place of the Lorde.' Coverdale in the main follows Tindale. It is to be regretted that this distinction was obliterated in the later versions.

iv. THE UNDERLYING CONCEPTION OF THE TABERNACLE-SANCTUARY.—Nature and gradation of the materials employed in its construction.—In Ezekiel's great picture of the ideal Israel of the Restoration (Ezk 40 ff.) 'the ruling conception is that of J" dwelling in visible glory in his sanctuary in the midst of his people.' The prophet's one aim is to help forward the realization of the earlier promise of J": 'My dwelling (mishkān) shall be with them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people' (37^{27}). The same grand conception, the same high ideal, took possession of the priestly writers on whom Ezekiel's mantle fell. The foundation on which rests the whole theocratic structure of the Priestly Code is the provision of a sanctuary, which in its fabric, in its personnel, and in all its appointments, shall be for future ages the ideal of a fit dwelling for J″, the holy covenant God of the community of Israel, once again restored to His favour. That this is the point of view from which to approach our study of the tabernacle of the priestly writers is placed beyond question, not only by the characteristic designation of the tabernacle proper as the miskhān or dwelling (see above, § iii.), but by the express statement at the opening of the legislative section: 'Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them' (Ex 25^{8}, cf. 29^{45}).

* Cf. the suggestive note on the various designations of the tabernacle with the inferences therefrom in Oxf. Hex. ii. 120; also Klostermann in the Neue kirchliche Zeitsch. 1897, 238 ff.; Westcott, Hebrews, 234 ff.

* The authors of the Oxford Hexateuch call attention to 'the curious fact that in Ex 25–27^{19} the sanctuary is always called the "dwelling" [mishkān], while in 28. 29 this name is replaced by the older term "tent of meeting." . . . The title "dwelling" is, of course, freely used in the great repetition, Ex 35–40, but the main portions of the Priestly Law in Leviticus ignore it' (ii. 120, where see for suggested explanation).

Such a dwelling could only be one reared in accordance with the revealed will of J″ Himself. Moses, accordingly—according to the representation of P—is summoned to meet J″ in the cloud that rested on the top of Mt. Sinai, soon after the arrival there of the children of Israel (Ex $24^{16ff.}$). The command is given to summon the Israelites to make voluntary offerings of the materials necessary for the construction of the sanctuary. A pattern or model of this dwelling and of all its furniture is shown to Moses, who is at the same time instructed in every detail by J″ Himself (Ex 25^{1-9} [P^{g}] = 35^{4-29} [P^{s}], cf. 38^{21-31}). In the later strata of P we find the call of Bezalel (so RV), the son of Uri, and his endowment by J″ as constructor-in-chief, assisted by Oholiab (AV Aholiab), the son of Ahisamach (31^{1-11}=35^{30}–36^{1} $38^{22f.}$).

A list of the materials employed is succinctly given at the head of each section ($25^{3ff.}$=$35^{4ff.}$). Of these the three great metals of antiquity, bronze (see Brass), silver, and gold, are used in a significant gradation as we proceed from the outer court to the innermost sanctuary. Of the last-named, two varieties are employed—the ordinary gold of commerce, and a superior quality in which the pure metal was more completely separated from its native alloys, hence known as refined or 'pure' gold (זָהָב טָהוֹר). As to the technical treatment of the metals, we find various methods employed. They might be used in plain blocks or slabs, as for the bases of pillars and for the mercy-seat; or they might be beaten into plates (Nu 17^{3} [Heb. 16^{38}]) and sheets (Ex 39^{3}) for the sheathing of large surfaces, like the great altar, the frames (but see § vii. (b)), and most of the furniture. The most artistic work is the hammered or repoussé work in gold, of which the cherubim and the candlestick are examples.*

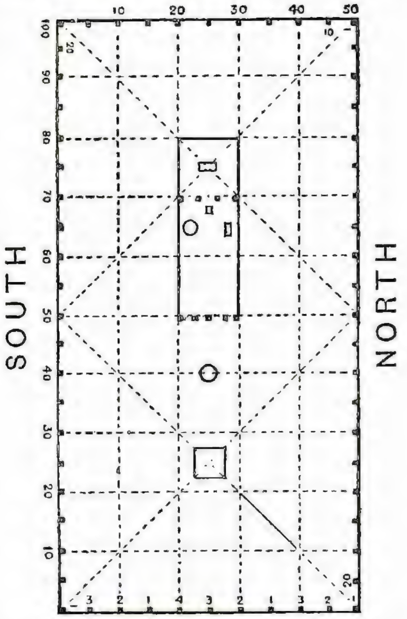
The wood used throughout was that of the tree named שִׁטָּה shiṭṭah (AV 'shittim wood,' RV 'acacia wood'), now usually identified with the Acacia seyal or A. nilotica (see, further, Shittah). Its wood is noted for its durability (cf. LXX rendering ξύλα ἄσηπτα). We come next to a graduated series of products of the loom. At the bottom of the scale we have the simple shēsh (שֵׁשׁ). This material has been variously identified with linen, cotton, and a mixture of both. The history of the textile fabrics of antiquity favours linen (see Linen, and Dillmann's elaborate note, *Exod.-Levit.*³ 305 ff.). A superior quality of it was termed 'fine twined linen' (שֵׁשׁ מָשְׁזָר), spun from yarn of which each thread was composed of many delicate strands. When dyed with the costly Phœnician dyes, both yarn and cloth received the names of the dyes, 'blue, purple, and scarlet' (25^{4} etc.). The first two represent different shades of purple (see Colours), and may be conveniently rendered by 'violet' and 'purple' respectively. The spinning of the yarn was the work of the women, the weaving of it the work of the men ($35^{25, 35}$, cf. 39^{3}). Among the latter a clear distinction is drawn between the ordinary weaver and the more artistic rôḳēm and ḥôshēb, who represent respectively the two forms of textile artistry practised from time immemorial in the East—embroidery and tapestry. The rôḳēm or embroiderer (so RV) received the web, complete in warp and weft, from the loom, and worked his figures in colours upon it with the needle. The ḥôshēb (lit. 'inventor,' 'artist,' as 31^{4}; EV 'cunning workman'), on the other hand, worked at the loom, weaving with 'violet, purple, and scarlet' yarn (cf. LXX 28^{6} ἔργον ὑφαντὸν ποικιλτοῦ) his figures into the warp, and producing the tapestry for which the East has always been famed. A gradation from without inwards, similar to that in the application of the metals, will meet us in the employment of these varied products of the loom.

v. The general Arrangement and Symmetry of the Sanctuary.—The Court of the Dwelling (Ex 27^{9-19} [P^{g}]=38^{9-20} [P^{s}]; cf. Josephus, Ant. III. vi. 2).—Once again we must start from Ezekiel. For the realization of his great ideal, Ezekiel places his new temple in the centre of a square tract of country, 25,000 cubits in the side, 'a holy portion of the land' (Ezk $45^{1ff.}$ $48^{8ff.}$). Within this area is a still more sacred precinct, the property of the priests alone, who thus surround the temple on every side to guard it from possible profanation. The same idea of the unapproachable sanctity of the wilderness 'dwelling' is emphasized by P through his well-known symmetrical arrangement of the camp of the Israelites. Around four sides of a huge square the tents are pitched, three tribes on each side (Nu $2^{1ff.}$ $10^{13ff.}$). Within this square is another, the sides of which are occupied by the priests and the three divisions of the Levites, the sons of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Nu $3^{23ff.}$). In the centre of this second square, finally, we find the sacred enclosure (τέμενος) which constitutes the wilderness sanctuary. This enclosure is the 'court of the dwelling' (חֲצַר הַמִּשְׁכָּן 27^{9}, αὐλὴ τῆς σκηνῆς, atrium tabernaculi), a rectangular space, lying east and west, 100 cubits* in length by 50 in breadth (proportion 2 : 1)—in other words, a space made up of two squares, each 50 cubits in the side. At this point it will help us to overcome subsequent difficulties if we look more closely at the proportions of the sanctuary as a whole, as revealed by the accompanying diagram. Beginning with the eastern square we note as its most prominent feature the altar of burnt-offering, lying 'four square' (5 cubits by 5) presumably at the intersection of the diagonals. In the western square stands 'the dwelling,' occupying three of the small plotted squares, of 10 cubits each way, its length being to its breadth in the proportion of 3 : 1. Like the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel, it consists of two parts, the outer and inner sanctuary, in the proportion of 2 : 1. The latter is the true sanctuary, the special abode of J″, a perfect cube, as we shall afterwards see, each dimension one-half of the inner shrine of the Solomonic temple. It stands exactly in the centre of its square, while its own centre in turn is occupied by the most sacred of all the objects in the sanctuary, the ark, the throne of J″, the dimensions of which, we shall find, are 5 × 3 × 3 half-cubits. These data are meanwhile sufficient to prove P's love for 'order, measure, number, and system,' which has long been recognized as one of his most prominent characteristics. From the first section of Genesis (1^1–2^3) onwards, with its arrangement by 10 and 7 and 3 (see art. NUMBER, vol. iii. p. 565^a), his genealogies, his chronology, his theory of the religious development of Israel, are all constructed on a definite system.[*] Nowhere is this fondness for symmetry and proportion so evident as in the measurements of the tabernacle. Three, four, seven, ten, their parts and multiples, dominate the whole (see further, § xiii.). The desire to preserve the proportion and ratio of certain parts and measurements has led to awkwardness and even inconsistency in other parts—a fact which lies at the root of not a few of the difficulties that beset the path of those that attempt to construct the tabernacle from the data of the priestly writers.

---

* No account is taken here of the quantities of these metals provided for the tabernacle, for the passage Ex 38^{24-31} was long ago recognized (Popper, Der bibl. Bericht über die Stiftshütte, 1862) as a late insertion in a late context. This is evident from the one fact alone that the silver, which provided, inter alia, for the sockets or bases at a talent each, is thought to be the produce of the poll-tax of half a shekel, which was not instituted till some time after the tabernacle had been set up (cf. Nu 1^{1} with Ex 40^{1}).

* The length of P's cubit is uncertain. For convenience of reckoning it may be taken as 18 inches.



PLAN OF THE COURT OF THE TABERNACLE.
Scale $\frac{1}{32}$ inch = 1 cubit.

The court of the tabernacle is screened off from the rest of the encampment by five white curtains (קְלָעִים kĕlāʿîm) of 'fine twined linen' of the uniform height of 5 cubits, but of varying length. Those on the N. and S. long sides measure each 100 cubits, that on the W. 50, while the two remaining curtains of 15 cubits each screen off the E. side, one on either hand of the entrance to the court. The latter is a space of 20 cubits, which is closed by a hanging or portière (מָסָךְ) of the second grade of workmanship explained above, i.e. embroidered in colours on a white ground. All six hangings are suspended from pillars of the same height, standing on bases (אֶדֶן, EV 'sockets') of bronze. The shape and size of these bases can only be conjectured. Elsewhere in OT (Ca 5^{15}, Job 38^6, and corrected text of Ezk 41^{22}) אֶדֶן is the base in the shape of a square plinth on which a pillar or an altar stands. So most probably in the case before us, the wooden pillar being sunk well into the plinth (so the Baraitha), which would thus be reckoned to the height of the pillar. The pillars were then kept in position by means of the usual 'cords'[†] or stays (מֵיתָרִים) fastened to pegs or 'pins' (יְתֵדוֹת) of bronze stuck in the ground. This seems preferable to the view first suggested by Josephus that the bases ended in spikes (σαυρωτῆρες) like that by which the butt-end of a spear was stuck in the ground—a method scarcely in place in the sand of the desert. According to P^s (38^{17}), the pillars had capitals (EV 'chapiters') overlaid with silver. Further, 'the hooks or pegs (וָוִים) of the pillars and their fillets (חֲשׁוּקִים) shall be of silver' ($27^{10f.}$, but 38^{19} makes the latter only overlaid with silver). The word rendered 'fillet' probably signifies a band or necking of silver (Ew., Dill. et al.) at the base of the capital, rather than, as is more generally supposed, silver rods connecting the pillars. And this for three reasons: (1) only on this view is the phrase 'filleted with silver' (27^{17}) intelligible; (2) no mention is made of any such connecting-rods in the minute directions for the transport of the tabernacle furniture (Nu 4); and (3) the screen and veil of the tabernacle proper (§ vii. (c)) were evidently attached to their pillars by hooks.

At this point we encounter our first difficulty. How are the pillars placed, on what principle are they reckoned ($27^{10ff.}$)? Ezekiel begins the description of his outer court with the wall 'round about' (40^5). P does likewise, only his curtain-wall is like a mathematical line, having length without breadth. It is as though the writer were working from a ground-plan like our diagram. The periphery of the court measures 300 cubits. This and no more is the length of his six curtains. Not even in the case of the entrance portière is allowance made for folds[*]—the first hint that we are dealing with an ideal, not an actual, construction. The pillars must be thought of as standing inside the curtains, otherwise they would not belong to the sanctuary at all. The principle on which they are reckoned is clear. It is that one pillar, and one only, is assigned to every five cubits of curtain. Now, a curtain of 20 cubits' length, like the entrance screen, requires not four, which is the number assigned to it, but five pillars; and on the same principle each of the two smaller curtains on either side of it requires four pillars, not three, and so with the rest. But to have counted twenty-one pillars for the sides, eleven for the end curtain, and 5+4+4 for the front, would have spoiled the symmetry, and so the artificial method of the text is adopted. Counting four for the entrance, as on the diagram, and three for the curtain to the left (vv.$^{16.\,14}$), we proceed round the court, reckoning always from the first corner pillar met with and counting no pillar twice. It is thus absurd to charge P with miscalculation, as his latest commentator still does (Baentsch, in loc.). But the charge is the price paid for the determination to reckon the pillars on the E. side as only ten in all, arranged symmetrically as 3+4+3 (when there are really eleven), and those of the N. and S. sides as multiples of ten.

vi. THE FURNITURE OF THE COURT.—(a) The altar of burnt-offering, Ex 27^{1-8}=38^{1-7} [LXX 38^{22-24}].—In the centre of the court, as the symmetry requires, stands 'the altar' (27^1 RV; for the significance of the article see § viii. (c)) of the sanctuary, also termed more precisely 'the altar of burnt-offering' (30^{28} 31^9 and oft.), and, from its appearance, 'the altar of bronze,' AV 'brazen altar' (38^{30} 39^{39}), both sets of passages probably belonging to P^s. 'Foursquare' it stands, 5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 cubits in height, a hollow chest[†] of acacia wood sheathed with bronze. From the four corners rise the indispensable horns, 'of one piece with it' (RV), the form and significance of which have been much debated. From the representations of similar 'horns' on Assyrian altars (see Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldea and Assyria, i. 255 f.), they would appear to have been merely the prolongation upwards of the sides of the altar to a point, for a few inches at each corner. The horns of Ezekiel's altar, e.g., form $\frac{1}{12}$th of the total height (see 43^{13-17} with Toy's diagram in SBOT). The horns play an important part in the ritual of the priests' consecration (Ex 29^{12}), the sin-offering (Lv 4^{18}), the Day of Atonement (16^{18}), and elsewhere.* According to a later tradition, the 'beaten plates' of bronze for the 'covering of the altar' were made from the bronze censers of the rebellious company of Korah (Nu $16^{36ff.}$). Round the altar, half-way between top and bottom, ran a projecting 'ledge' (so RV for the obscure כַּרְכֹּב, only 27^5 38^4; AV 'the compass,' etc.), attached to which and reaching to the ground was a grating (RV; AV 'grate,' which see) of bronze. The purpose of these two appendages can only be conjectured (see the Comm. and works cited in the Literature for the numerous conjectures that have been put forward). Considering the height of the altar, at least 4½ feet, one naturally supposes that the ledge was for the priests to stand upon during their ministrations at the altar, and in Lv 9^{22} we actually read of Aaron 'stepping down' from the altar. Together with the grating, it may also have been a device to prevent the ashes, etc., from falling upon and defiling the sacrificial blood, J″'s peculiar portion, which could still be dashed against the base of the altar through the wide meshes of the network. Four bronze rings were attached to the corners of the grating, presumably where it met the ledge, to receive the poles for carrying the altar. The necessary utensils were also of bronze; they comprised shovels or rakes (יָעִים) for collecting the ashes, pots (AV pans) for carrying them away, the large basins for catching the blood of the animals sacrificed, the flesh hooks or forks, and the fire-pans. The fire is to 'be kept burning upon the altar continually, it shall not go out' (Lv 6^{13}), which hardly accords with the prescriptions of Lv 1^7 and Nu $4^{13f.}$.

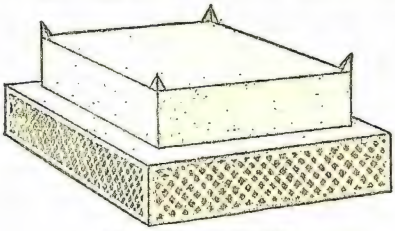
[*] Cf. Dillmann, Num.-Josua, 649 f., who also considers P to have distinguished four periods of the world's history characterized by the decreasing length of human life in the proportion 8:4:2:1.

[†] These are first mentioned in P^s (35^{18} 'the pins of the courts and their cords,' 39^{40} etc.).

[*] Josephus is quite wrong, therefore, in speaking of the curtains hanging in a 'loose and flowing manner' (l.c.).

[†] Nothing in the text suggests a mere four-sided frame to be filled with earth, as is usually supposed.



ALTAR OF BURNT-OFFERING.

The idea underlying this unique structure — a hollow wooden chest with a thin sheathing of bronze, little adapted, one would think, for the purpose it is to serve—is now generally recognized as having originated in the desire to construct a portable altar on the lines of the massive brazen altar of Solomon, which was itself a departure from the true Heb. tradition (Ex $20^{24ff.}$). The account of the making of this altar, which was one-fourth larger in cubic content than the whole tabernacle of P (2 Ch 4^1), has now disappeared from the MT of 1 K 7, but was still read there by the Chronicler (l.c.), and references to it still survive (1 K $8^{22.64}$ 9^{25}, 2 K $16^{14f.}$). Its disappearance is easily accounted for by the fact that its construction appeared to a later age as quite unnecessary, since the 'tent of meeting' and all its vessels, including the bronze altar of this section, were considered to have been transferred by Solomon, along with the ark, to his new temple (1 K 8^4; see Wellh. Proleg. [Eng. tr.] 44; Stade, ZATW iii. 157 = Akad. Reden, 164; and the Comm.).

(b) The Laver (Ex 30^{17-21}, cf. 38^8 [LXX 38^{26}]).—Between the altar above described and the tabernacle stood the laver of bronze (כִּיּוֹר, λουτήρ), to the description of which only a few words are devoted, and these few are found not in the main body of P, but in a section (30. 31) bearing internal evidence of a later origin (see § ii., and more fully § viii. (c)). Beyond the fact that it was a large basin of bronze, and stood upon a base of the same material, we know nothing of its workmanship or ornamentation. It served to hold the water required for the ablutions of the priests in the course of their ministrations, and is frequently mentioned in the secondary strata of the priestly legislation (30^{28} 31^9 etc.; it is omitted, however, from the directions for the march in Nu 4). A curious tradition grew up at some still later period, to the effect that the laver was made of the bronze 'mirrors of the serving-women which served at the door of the tent of meeting' (38^8, cf. 1 S 2^{22}). The latter, needless to say, was not yet in existence. The temple of Solomon had ten lavers of elaborate construction (see LAVER), the second temple apparently had only one (Sir 50^3).

vii. THE TABERNACLE PROPER—(a) The Curtains of the Dwelling and the Tent, the outer coverings (Ex 26^{1-14} = 36^{8-19} [LXX 37^1]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 4 [ed. Niese, § 130 ff.]).—Probably no section of the OT of equal length is responsible for so large a number of divergent interpretations as the chapters now before us. It is clearly impossible within the limits of this article to refer to more than a very few of these interpretations, even of those associated with scholars of repute. What follows is the result of an independent study of the original in the light of the recognized principles underlying the scheme of the wilderness sanctuary as conceived by the priestly writers (see § iv.). Fuller justification of the writer's position with regard to the many matters of controversy that emerge will be found in his commentary on Exodus (Internat. Crit. series).

Now, on the very threshold of our study of Ex 26, we meet with a clear statement, the far-reaching significance of which has been overlooked by most of those who have written on this subject. It is contained in these few words: 'Thou shalt make the dwelling (מִשְׁכָּן, EV 'tabernacle') of ten curtains' (26^1). To this fact we must hold fast through all our discussion as to the measurements and arrangements of the tabernacle. It is the curtains, not the so-called 'boards,' that constitute the dwelling of J″. The full bearing of this fact will appear as we proceed. The walls of the true dwelling, then, are to consist, on three sides at least, of ten curtains of beautiful Oriental tapestry, full of figures of the mystic cherubim, woven in colours of the richest dyes, violet, purple, and scarlet (see § iv.). The curtains form, as it were, the throne-room of J″. It is therefore appropriate that the mysterious beings that minister around His heavenly throne should be represented in J″'s presence-chamber upon earth (see, further, § ix. for cherubim upon the mercy-seat). The curtains measure each 28 × 4 cubits (7 : 1), and are sewed together in two sets of five. Along one long side of either set are sewed fifty loops (לֻלָאֹת) made of violet thread. By means of an equal number of gold clasps (קְרָסִים, RV; AV 'taches') the two hangings are coupled together to form one large covering, 40 (4 × 10) cubits in length by 28 c. in breadth, for 'the dwelling shall be one' (26^{6}).

* For the special sanctity attaching to the horns see ALTAR (vol. i. p. 77). It is open to grave doubt whether this widespread custom of providing altars with these projections has anything to do with the ox or calf symbolism (see CALF [GOLDEN], vol. i. p. 342), as Stade and others suppose. 'Horn' is rather a popular metaphor for the more correct מִקְצוֹעַ of Ezekiel (41^{22}; cf. Josephus' phrase γωνίαι κερατοειδεῖς), and their ultimate raison d'être is probably to be sought in the same primitive circle of thought as ascribed a special sanctity to the four corners of a robe (see FRINGES, vol. ii. p. 69^a). Another view is suggested by *RS*² 436, Baentsch (Com. in loc.).

For a tent (אֹהֶל) over the dwelling (v.^{7}), eleven curtains are to be woven of material usually employed for the Eastern tent (see CURTAINS), viz. goats' hair, and, to ensure that the dwelling shall be completely covered by them, they are each to be 30 cubits in length by 4 in breadth. These are to be sewed together to form two sets of five and six curtains respectively, coupled together as before by loops and clasps; the latter, in this case, of bronze, and forming one large surface (44 × 30 cubits), that the tent also 'may be one' (v.^{11}). Thus far there is no difficulty such as emerges in the verses (v.$^{12\text{f.}}$) that follow, and will be considered later (§ vii. (c)).

As the dwelling is to be covered by the tent, so the tent in its turn is to receive two protecting coverings, the dimensions of which are not given. Immediately above it is to be a covering of 'rams' skins dyed red' (מְאָדָּמִים, ἠρυθροδανωμένα). The dye employed is not the costly Phœnician scarlet or crimson dye previously met with (obtained from the coccus ilicis, see COLOURS, vol. i. p. 457 f.), but, as the Gr. rendering suggests, madder (ἐρυθρόδανον, rubia tinctoria), a vegetable dye.[*] The outermost covering is formed of the skins of an obscure animal (תַּחַשׁ, AV 'badger,' RV 'seal,' RVm 'porpoise'), now most frequently identified with the dugong, a seal-like mammal found in the Red Sea (see note with illustration in Toy's 'Ezekiel' [SBOT], p. 124).

At this point in P's statement, one naturally expects him to proceed to give directions for the pitching of this fourfold tent and for the preparation of the necessary poles, ropes, and pegs. There is thus every a priori probability in favour of the theory of the tabernacle associated in this country with the name of Mr. Fergusson, that the four sets of coverings now described were in reality intended by the author to be suspended by means of a ridge-pole or otherwise over the wooden framework about to be described. But it is inconceivable that so radical a part of the construction as the provision of a ridge-pole and its accompaniments should have been passed over in silence in the text of P. (For this theory see Fergusson's art. 'Temple' in Smith's DB; the Speaker's Commentary, i. 374 ff.; more recently, and in greatest detail, by Schick, Die Stiftshütte, der Tempel, etc.). On the contrary, P's wilderness sanctuary is to combine with certain features of a nomad's tent others suggestive or reminiscent of the temples of a sessile population. In short, as Josephus puts it, the finished structure is to 'differ in no respect from a movable and ambulatory temple' (Ant. III. vi. 1 [Niese, § 103]).

(b) The wooden framework of the Dwelling (Ex $26^{15\text{-}30} = 36^{20\text{-}34}$ [LXX $38^{18\text{-}21}$]; Jos. Ant. l.c. 116 ff.).—The right understanding of this important part of the dwelling, by which it is to be transformed into a portable temple, depends on our interpretation of the opening verses of the section (vv.$^{15\text{-}17}$). Literally rendered they run thus: 'And thou shalt make the ḳĕrāshîm[†] for the dwelling of acacia wood, standing up—10 cubits the length of the single[*] ḳeresh, and a cubit and a half the breadth of the single ḳeresh—2 yādôth[†] for the single ḳeresh, mĕshullābôth[‡] to each other.' Here everything depends on the three more or less obscure technical terms of the Heb. arts and crafts given in transliteration. The true exegetical tradition, we are convinced, had been lost, as was the case with the still more complicated description of Solomon's brazen lavers (1 K $7^{27\text{ff.}}$), until the key was discovered by Stade and published in his classical essay (ZATW iii. (1883) 129 ff. = Akad. Reden, 145 ff., corrected in details ZATW xxi. (1901) 145 ff.). The Jewish tradition, as we find it first in Josephus (l.c.) and in the Baraitha, has held the field to the present day. According to these authorities the ḳĕrāshîm were great columns or beams of wood 15 ft. high, 2 ft. 3 in. wide, and—by a calculation to be tested in due time—1 ft. 6 in. thick, i.e. 10 × 1½ × 1 cubits. The yādôth were pins or tenons (Jos. στρόφιγγες, 'pivots') by which the beams were inserted into mortices in the silver sockets or bases. Forty-eight of these beams were placed side by side to form the three walls (S.W. and N.) of the tabernacle, the eastern end or entrance being formed by a screen (for details and reff. see below). This interpretation, with numerous modifications in detail, particularly as regards the thickness of the so-called 'boards,'[§] has been adopted by every previous writer without exception.

We now proceed to test the value of this tradition. The avowed intention of P, it is admitted on all hands, is to construct 'a movable and ambulatory temple' for the desert marches. Could anything be more absurd than to begin by constructing enormous logs of wood, each with a cubic content—on the most usual computation of 1 cubit of thickness—of about 50 cubic feet, each weighing, according to a recent calculation (Brown, The Tabernacle^{6}, 1899, 275), close upon 1 ton, and out of all proportion to the weight they would have to bear? And this quite apart from the open question of the possibility of obtaining beams of such dimensions from the acacia tree of Arabia.[‖] Further, how is the fact that the tapestry curtains with their cherubim figures are always called 'the dwelling' to be reconciled with the traditional theory that they were completely hidden from view, except on the roof, by the intervention of the wooden walls? This difficulty has been felt by several writers, who have sought to avoid it by hanging these curtains inside the boards as a lining, thereby doing violence to the clear intention of the text (see below). These considerations by no means exhaust the difficulties presented by the current conception of the tabernacle, as may be seen on any page of the commentaries and special monographs cited in the Literature at the end of this article.

The way is now clear for a fresh examination of the technical terms of vv.$^{15\text{-}17}$. The first of the three (קֶרֶשׁ) is practically confined to P's account of the tabernacle, for its only other occurrence (Ezk 27^{6}) requires light from our passages rather than throws light upon them. The Gr. translators had no clear idea of what the word meant, and were content to render throughout by στύλοι, 'pillars,' a rendering suggested to them by the last word of v.^{15}, which they apparently read עַמֻּדִים, the ordinary word for ‘pillars’ (cf. Dillm. in loc.). Passing, therefore, to the second technical term yādôth (v.^{17}), we find the current text of the LXX responsible for a grave misinterpretation of this verse, by prefixing ‘and thou shalt make’ to the original text (but AF omit καὶ ποιήσεις). In reality we have here the continuation of v.^{15}, from which it is separated merely by a parenthesis, as translated above. The yādôth are thus seen not to be something additional to the ḳeresh, but to constitute its main component parts (as indeed may underlie the Gr. rendering μέρη in vv.$^{19.21}$ and elsewhere). What then is the signification of יָד as a technical term in the constructive arts? In 1 K 10^{19} =2 Ch 9^{18} yādôth denotes the ‘arms’ of Solomon's throne, of which ἀγκῶνες is the technically correct equivalent (2 Chron. l.c., see illustration of chair with arms bent at right angles in Rich, Dict. of Antiq. s. ‘Ancon’). In 1 K 7$^{32.33}$—as Stade (ll.cc.) has conclusively proved from extant ancient models—yādôth is the technical name for the stays or supports (EV ‘axletrees’) underneath the body or framework of the laver (illustrs. ZATW, 1901, 152, 167), as also for the similar stays projecting from the top of the frame and supporting the stand of the basin (cf. LAVER, vol. iii. p. 64^{a}). Technically, therefore, like our own ‘arm,’ and the classical ἀγκών and ancon, יָד may denote any arm-like structural element, whether straight or bent, especially if occurring in pairs. This result is strengthened by the phrase that follows, מְשֻׁלָּבֹת אִשָּׁה אֶל־אֲחֹתָהּ (v.^{17}, cf. 36^{22} and the various renderings in AV and RV). Here again the description of the lavers comes to our aid (1 K 7$^{28\text{ff.}}$), for the cognate term there employed (שְׁלַבִּים, with which cf. שְׁלִיבָה, שְׁלַבִּין, the rounds or rungs of a ladder in later Heb.) is now universally understood to mean the cross-rails joining the uprights of the frame of the laver. It seems evident, therefore, that the ḳeresh of P must be a frame of wood, such as builders in all countries have employed in the construction of light walls (see Blümner, Technologie, etc. iii. 151, for the paries craticius with its arrectarii and transversarii; cf. our own brick-nogged partitions with their timber ‘quarters’). This sense suits Ezk 27^{6} admirably: ‘thy panels are of ivory inlaid in boxwood’ (see illustr. in Toy, SBOT 150). We may now tr. v.$^{15\text{ff.}}$ thus, taking the parenthesis last: ‘And thou shalt make the frames for the dwelling of acacia wood, standing up, two uprights for each frame, joined to each other by cross-rails —10 cubits the height and a cubit and a half the breadth of the single frame.’ We now see how it is that a writer so fond of measurements as P has omitted to give the third dimension: a frame has, strictly speaking, no thickness!*

[*] The Heb. name of this dye is פּוּאָה, frequent in the Mishna. In OT it occurs only as a proper name, e.g. the minor judge, Tolah ben Puah (Scarlet, the son of Madder! Jg 10^{1}).

[†] EV 'boards'; LXX στύλοι, Jos. and Philo κίονες, both = 'pillars.'

[*] So LXX, Pesh. etc.

[†] EV 'tenons'; LXX ἀγκωνίσκους = 'joints or arms,' but elsewhere μέρη, 'sides.'

[‡] RV 'joined'; LXX ἀντιπίπτοντας as in v.^{5} for מַקְבִּילֹת.

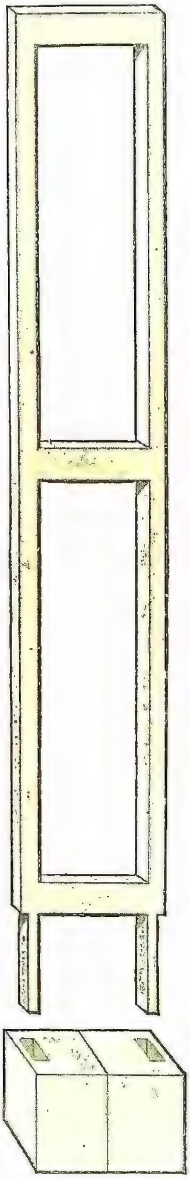
[§] The familiar rendering 'boards,' adopted by Tindale, goes back to Jerome, who thought of the tabulæ, of which the Roman tabernacula were frequently constructed, and from which, indeed, the name is derived.

[‖] No use is here made of the argument from Nu 7^{8} compared with 3^{36}, four waggons, each drawn by a pair of oxen, for the transport of the 'boards,' bases, pillars, etc., as these passages are probably from a different hand from Ex 26.



FRAME AND ITS BASES.

The frames, according to our present text, are to be overlaid with gold; but the position of this instruction (v.^{29}) after the other instructions for the frames have been completed (contrast 25$^{11.24}$ 30^{3}), the variant tradition of the Gr. of 38$^{18\text{ff.}}$ (περιηργύρωσεν, ‘overlaid with silver’), the late origin of the kindred sections in 1 K 6 f. (see TEMPLE), and other considerations, all make it very probable that we have here an addition to the original text, both as regards the frame and bars, and the pillars. Like the pillars of the court, the uprights of the framework are to be sunk in bases of solid silver,—the reason for two bases to each frame being now for the first time apparent,—regarding the shape and size† of which we are equally dependent on conjecture. For reasons that will appear in the next section, we may think of them as square plinths, ¾ cubit in the side and a cubit in height, forming a continuous foundation wall round the dwelling, with the uprights sunk well down so that the height of the framework was not materially added to.

To provide the necessary rigidity for the frames, the simple device is adopted of running five wooden bars along the three sides, passing through rings attached to the woodwork of the frames. Much needless discussion has been raised over the expression ‘the middle bar in the midst of the boards’ (v.^{28}), which has been taken by various writers to mean that the middle bar of the five is intended to pass from end to end through a hole pierced in the heart of the massive ‘boards’ of the traditional theory (see diagrams of Riggenbach, Brown, etc.). But the phrase is merely an epithet, after P's well-known manner, explanatory of the bar in question, the distinguishing feature of which is that it runs along the whole length of its side, north, west, south, as the case may be, in contradistinction to the remaining four, which we may presume run only half-way along—one pair at the top, the other pair at the bottom of the frames. This arrangement of the bars suggests that the frames were provided with three cross-rails—one at the top, rounded like the ends of the uprights to avoid injury to the curtains, another in the middle, and a third immediately above the bases. We thus obtain a double row of panels right round the dwelling (see the accompanying illustration with drawings to scale from a specially prepared model).

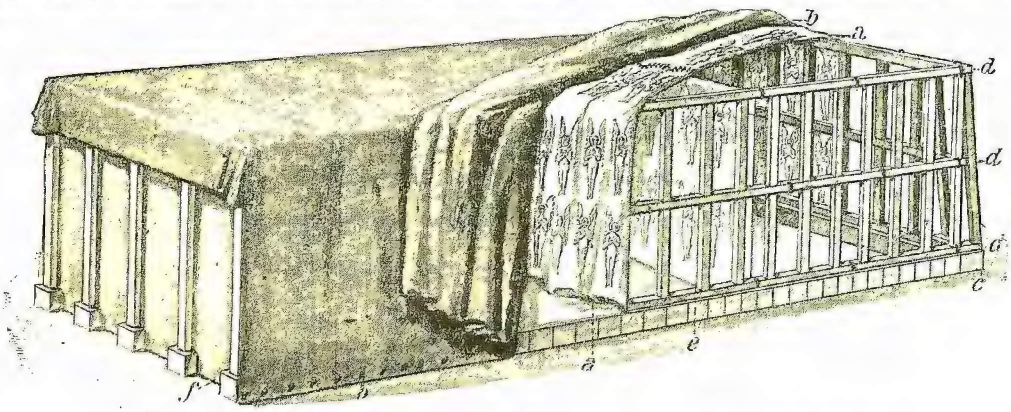
The difficulties of this section, however, are not yet exhausted. We have still to grapple with the problem of the arrangement of the frames, and in particular with the much debated vv.$^{23\text{ff.}}$, before we can proceed to discuss the manner in which the curtains were utilized. The discussion of the former problem may best start from the data of 26^{33}, from which we learn that the veil dividing the dwelling into two parts (see next section) is to be hung 20 cubits, the width of 5 curtains, from the front of the dwelling. Now, the admitted symmetry of the whole sanctuary requires us to infer that the area of the outer sanctuary is intended to measure 20 × 10 cubits, and that of the inner sanctuary 10×10 cubits, the measurements in both cases being exactly half those of the corresponding parts of the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel (see TEMPLE). With this agrees the direction of the text, that twenty frames, each 1½ cubits wide, are required for the two long sides, and six for the shorter west side (vv.$^{18. 20. 22}$). Now, an easy calculation shows that since the total area of the dwelling from curtain to curtain is 30×10 cubits, and inside width of the short side is only 9 cubits (1½×6), we must allow half a cubit (9 in.) for the thickness of the woodwork of either of the long sides. This would allow 6 in. (two handbreadths) for the thickness of the uprights of the framework and 3 in. (one handbreadth) for that of the bars.

---

* We may thus claim to have solved what our latest commentator has termed P's ‘secret’ with regard to v.^{17} (Baentsch, in loc.; cf. Holzinger, who gives up the verse in despair). Riehm had previously tried to solve the problem by taking the text to mean that each board consisted of two pieces mortised together by means of the yādôth (HWB^{2}, art. ‘Stiftshütte,’ 1579 f.). Jerome's interpretation is evidently borrowed from the Rabbis, some of whom thought that the yādôth joined one board to another (Flesch, Baraijtha, 51 f.).

† The oldest, but erroneous, conjecture on this point (Ex 38^{27}) has been already dealt with (§ iv footnote, p 656).

The assumption of the majority of previous writers, from the Baraitha to Baentsch, that the measurement, 30×10 cubits, gives the clear inside area of the tabernacle as formed by the wooden 'boards,' implying on the cubit of thickness theory (see above) an outside measurement of 31×12 cubits, falls to the ground if the view here advocated of the true nature of the 'boards' is accepted. But, even with the traditional interpretation, the theory of inside measurements is absolutely inadmissible. (1) The true walls of P's dwelling are, as we have already emphasized, the tapestry curtains, precisely as the linen hangings are the walls of the court (§ v.). The framework here takes the place of the pillars round the court, and, like these, must be treated as une quantité négligeable where proportions are concerned. (2) All P's other measurements are outside measurements, as in the altar of burnt-offering, the ark, etc. (3) Only on the supposition that the entire fabric of the tabernacle covered a space 30×10 cubits is the true proportion (3 : 1) of the structure and the complete symmetry of the western square maintained. It is absolutely necessary from P's standpoint that the perfect cube of the Most Holy Place shall be entirely contained within the centre square of its own court (see diagram). With an inside area of 30×10, requiring on the traditional hypothesis an outside measurement of 31×12, the symmetry of the whole sanctuary is ruined.



MODEL OF THE TABERNACLE in perspective with the two uppermost coverings removed, showing the framework covered by the tapestry curtains aa with the cherubim figures, the goats' hair curtains of 'the tent' bb, one of the corner frames c, the bars ddd, the veil e, and the screen f.

We are now prepared to take up the problem of the two frames described with tantalizing obscurity in the difficult verses $^{22. 23-25}$.* These two frames are expressly stated to be 'for the מִקְצֹעֹת † of the dwelling in the hinder part.' What, now, is the meaning of this rare word? The key, we believe, will be found in Ezekiel's presumably technical use of it to denote the projecting corners, popularly known as 'horns,' of his altar of shewbread (41^{22}, see for these § vi. above; and cf., besides the Assyrian altars, the plan of a Phœnician sanctuary in Pietschmann's Geschichte der Phœnizier, 200 f.). It is used by later writers to indicate a part of the wall of Jerusalem akin to, yet distinct from, פִּנָּה 'a corner,' apparently therefore one of the projecting bastions (2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh 3^{24}) which guarded the wall at important changes in its course. We conclude from these data that the word in the passage before us must denote something of the nature of a projecting buttress at the two western corners of the wooden framework. V.^{24} has been the despair of many generations of students, and is almost certainly corrupt. If with most modern scholars we read תְּמִים (twins) in both clauses, it seems to imply that these corner frames shall be made 'double,' i.e. consist of two ordinary frames braced together for the sake of strength; further, that each is intended to form a buttress sloping upwards and terminating short of the top of the framework, at 'the first' or topmost 'ring' (see RVm), that is, underneath the top bar of the west side (see illustration). In any case, three purposes are apparently served by these corner buttresses. They supply additional strength at the two weakest parts of the framework—the points of meeting of the two long walls with the west wall; they take up the folds of the curtains at these two corners, and—we do not hesitate to add—they raise the number of the frames to a multiple of four (48, so many were the pillars in Solomon's temple according to the Gr. of 1 K 7^{45}), and the number of the bases required for the dwelling to a multiple of ten (100, see next section).

(c) The arrangement of the Curtains of the Dwelling and the Tent. The divisions of the Dwelling. The Screen and the Veil (Ex $26^{9. 12ff. 31-33. 36f.}$ and parallels).—In the secondary stratum of P ($40^{17ff.}$) we read how 'the tabernacle was reared up' by Moses. First he put down its bases, then he placed its frames, put in its bars, and 'reared up its pillars.' Thereafter 'he spread the tent over the dwelling, and placed the covering of the tent above upon it.' Here the tapestry and hair curtains are strangely enough together named 'the tent,' and the two outer coverings similarly taken as one.* Now it is worth noting (1) that Moses is said to have 'spread' the curtains over the dwelling, the same word (פָּרַשׂ) being used as is employed of wrapping up the sacred furniture for transport (Nu $4^{6ff.}$ § xi.); and (2) that neither here nor elsewhere is the ordinary word for erecting or pitching a tent (נָטָה) applied to the tabernacle, as it is to the old 'tent of meeting' (33^{7}) and to David's tent for the ark (2 S 6^{17}, see § i.). This fact of itself tells against the view, noted above, that the curtains were stretched tent-wise above the dwelling, and in favour of the usual conception, that they were spread over the framework 'as a pall is thrown over a coffin.' The tapestry curtains measuring 40 cubits from front to back and 28 cubits across (§ vii. (a)) thus constitute the dwelling, the centre portion (30 × 10 cubits) forming the roof and the remainder the three sides. On the long sides it hung down 9 cubits till it met, as we may conjecture, the silver bases of the framework, which made up the remaining cubit (so the authorities of the Baraitha (Flesch, 50); cf. Philo, op. cit. ii. 148, who no doubt gives the true reason of the vacant cubit, 'that the curtain might not be dragged,' and Jos. Ant. III. vi. 4 [Niese, § 130]). At the back, however, where 10 cubits (40–30) were left over, the last cubit would have to be folded along the projecting base, one of the results of requiring the total length to be another multiple of ten (40 cubits instead of 39). A striking confirmation of the signification here assigned to the ḳĕrāshîm is now brought to light. Instead of nearly two-thirds of the 'all-beautiful and most holy curtain' (πάγκαλον καὶ ἱεροπρεπὲς ὕφασμα, Philo, l.c.) being hidden from view by the so-called 'boards,' the whole extent of the curtain is now disclosed, with, we may fairly conjecture, a double row of the mystic inwoven cherubim filling the panels of the framework, just as they filled the wainscot panels with which the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel were lined (1 K $6^{28ff.}$, Ezk $41^{18ff.}$).* The view of Bähr, Neumann, Keil, Holzinger, and others (see Literature), that these curtains were suspended, by some method unknown to the text, inside the framework,—in their case the gold-sheathed walls,—has been already disposed of (vii. (b)).

* For the extraordinary number of guesses that have been hazarded as to the meaning of these verses, see, besides the Comm., the text and diagrams of Riggenbach, Schick, and Brown.

† To be pointed so, with most moderns, for מְקֻצְעֹת of MT.

* The author of this section (P^{s}), however, may not have had Ex 25 f. before him in quite the same form as we now have it (see § iii. above).

Over the tapestry curtain was spread in like manner the curtain of goats' hair, the 'tent' of P^g. Our present text (vv.$^{9, 12}$), however, presents an insurmountable difficulty in the arrangement of these curtains. To cover the dwelling, and that completely, they required to be only 40 × 30 cubits. But even when the sixth curtain of the one set is doubled, as required by v.^{9}, a total length of 42 cubits remains. The explanation usually given, which indeed is required by v.^{12}, is that 'the half curtain that remaineth' must have been stretched out by ropes and pegs behind the dwelling; an assumption which is at variance with the arrangement at the other sides, and which leaves the sacred tapestry curtain exposed to view. The only remedy is to regard v.$^{12f.}$ as a gloss, as Holzinger does (Kurzer Hdcom. in loc.), from the pen of a reader who misunderstood v.^{9b}. Taken by itself, this half-verse plainly directs that the sixth curtain shall be doubled 'in the forefront of the dwelling'; that is, not, as Dillm. and other commentators maintain, laid double across the eastermost tapestry half-curtain, but—as already advocated in the Baraitha, p. 58—hanging doubled over the edge of the latter, covering the pillars at the door of the tabernacle and entirely excluding the light of day. This secures that the dwelling shall be in perfect darkness. This is not secured on the ordinary supposition that the edges of both curtains were flush with each other, for the screen could not possibly be so adjusted as to completely exclude the light. The objection, of which so much is made by Riggenbach, etc., that the joinings of the two sets of curtains would thus coincide and moisture be admitted, is utterly invalid when we recall the two heavy and impervious coverings that overlay the two inner sets of curtains. In this way, then, we find that the goats' hair curtains exactly fitted the dwelling on all three sides, covering the tapestry and the bases as well, and, in Josephus' words, 'extending loosely to the ground.' They were doubtless fixed thereto by means of the bronze pins of the dwelling (27^{19} P^g, which makes no mention of cords), precisely as the Kiswa or covering of the Kaaba at Mecca is secured by metal rings at the base of the latter (Hughes, Dict. of Islam, s.v.).*

Two items still remain to complete the fabric of the dwelling, viz. the screen and the veil. The former (מָסָךְ, RV 'screen,' AV 'hanging') was a portière of the same material as the portière of the court, closing the dwelling on the east side. It was hung by means of gold hooks or pegs from five pillars of acacia wood standing on bases of bronze ($26^{36f.}$ $36^{37f.}$ [LXX $37^{5f.}$]), a detail which marks them out as pertaining to the court rather than to the dwelling, the bases of which are of silver. Like the rest of the woodwork, they were probably left unadorned in the original text, for the text of P^s (36^{38}, cf. Gr. of 26^{37}) speaks only of the capitals being overlaid with gold, a later hand, as in 1 K 6 f., heightening the magnificence of the tabernacle by sheathing the whole pillars (26^{37}).

At a distance of 20 cubits † from the entrance screen was hung another of the same beautiful tapestry as the curtains (v.^{31}), depending from four pillars 'overlaid with gold,' and standing, like the framework, on bases of silver (v.^{32}). This second screen is termed the pārôketh (פָּרֹכֶת,‡ AV 'vail,' RV 'veil'; LXX καταπέτασμα, cf. He 9^3 'the second veil' as distinguished from the veil or screen just mentioned). By means of 'the veil' the dwelling was divided into two parts, the larger twice the area of the smaller (2 : 1). The former is termed by the priestly writers 'the holy place' (הַקֹּדֶשׁ 26^{33} and oft.); the latter receives the name קֹדֶשׁ הַקֳּדָשִׁים, best rendered idiomatically 'the most holy place,' also literally 'the holy of holies,'§ in LXX τὸ ἅγιον and τὸ ἅγιον (or τὰ ἅγια) τῶν ἁγίων. These names first came into use in priestly circles in the Exile. The corresponding parts of Solomon's temple were known as the hêkāl or temple proper (1 K 6^3 RVm), and the dĕbîr (EV 'oracle,' v.^{16}).‖ The former is retained by Ezekiel, while the latter is discarded and the 'most holy place' substituted (41^4, but also 'holy place,' v.^{23}). P by his nomenclature stamps his sanctuary still further with the attribute of holiness in an ascending scale as we approach the presence of J″.

viii. THE FURNITURE OF THE HOLY PLACE.—(a) The Table of Shewbread (Ex $25^{23-30}=37^{10-16}$ [LXX 38^{9-12}]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 6).—This section is intended merely to supplement the art. SHEWBREAD by giving the barest details regarding the 'presence-table' (שֻׁלְחַן הַפָּנִים, see l.c. § i.) of the priestly writers.

Our understanding of this section is materially assisted by the representation of the table of Herod's temple, which may still be seen on the Arch of Titus at Rome. Careful measurements were taken and drawings made both of the table and of the candlestick (see next section) by friends of Adrian Reland in 1710-11, at a time when the sculptures were less dilapidated than at present. These were published by him in his work, De spoliis Templi Hierosolymitani, etc., 1716.

The material was acacia wood, overlaid like the ark with pure gold. The sheathing of these two sacred articles of the cultus and of the later altar of incense (§ viii. (c)) is quite in place, and stands on quite a different footing from the sheathing of such secondary parts of the fabric as the framework and the pillars at the entrance, the originality of which we saw reason to question. The height of the table was that of the ark, 1½ cubits, its length and breadth 2 cubits and 1 cubit respectively. The massive top—in the Roman sculpture 6 in. thick—was decorated with a zēr (זֵר, AV and RV 'crown,' RVm 'rim or moulding') of gold. The precise nature of this ornament, which is also prescribed for the ark (v.[11]) and the altar of incense (30^3), is unknown. That it was some species of moulding may be regarded as fairly certain. The Gr. translators render variously by στεφάνη, whence the Vulg. corona and our 'crown'; by κυμάτια στρεπτά; or by a combination of both. The authors of the divergent Gr. text of 35–40 omit this ornament altogether (LXX $38^{1ff.}$). The phrase κυμάτια στρεπτά suggests a cable moulding, as explained by pseudo-Aristeas (Epist. ad Philocratem, ed. Wendland, § 58, 'worked in relief in the form of ropes'), which also suits Josephus' description (τὸ ἔδαφος ἕλικος [a spiral], l.c. § 140). On the other hand, the same phrase is used in architecture of an ogee moulding, and this is certainly the nature of the ornament on the table of the Arch of Titus (see Reland, op. cit. 73 ff., and plate of mouldings opp. p. 76). In any case, both the sides and ends of the massive top were separately decorated by a solid gold moulding, which gave them the appearance of four panels sunk into the table (Reland, ut sup., and cf. Jos. § 140, κοιλαίνεται δὲ καθ' ἕκαστον πλευρόν, κ.τ.λ.). The legs, according to Josephus, were square in the upper and rounded in the lower half, terminating in claws, a statement confirmed by the sculpture and by the analogy of the domestic art of the ancients. They were connected by a binding rail (מִסְגֶּרֶת, EV 'border') 'of an handbreadth round about' (v.[25]), also ornamented with a cable or an ogee moulding. It doubtless marked the transition from the square to the round portions of the legs. The broken ends of this rail are still visible on the arch with a pair of trumpets leaning against them (illustr. under MUSIC, vol. iii. p. 462). At its four corners four gold rings were attached, through which, and parallel to the sides, the two poles or staves were passed by means of which the table was moved from place to place.

---

* See illustration.

* The arrangement of the Kiswa, indeed, affords a striking analogy to that of the curtains of the tabernacle.

† This follows from the fact that the veil is to hang directly under the gold clasps joining the two sets of tapestry curtains, and therefore 5 times 4 cubits (the breadth of the individual curtain) from the front of the dwelling (v.^{33}). The importance of this datum for the dimensions of the tabernacle has already been pointed out.

‡ This word has an interesting affinity with the Assyrian word parakku, the innermost shrine or 'holy of holies' of the Babylonian temples in which stood the statue of the patron deity.

§ The usage of Lv 16 is peculiar to itself. The 'holy place' of P is here curiously 'the tent of meeting' (v.^{16} etc.); the 'most holy place' is named simply 'the holy place' (vv.$^{3, 16}$ etc.), shortened from 'the holy place within the veil' (v.^{2}).

‖ The presence of the term 'most holy place' in 1 K 6^{16} etc. is now recognized as due to post-exilic glossators.

For the service of the table a number of gold vessels (cf. Reland, op. cit. 99–122), presumably of hammered or repoussé work, were provided. These comprised, in our RV rendering, 'dishes, spoons, flagons, and bowls to pour out withal' (v.[29], cf. AV). The 'dishes' were the flat salvers or chargers on which the loaves of the presence-bread were conveyed to, or in which they were placed upon, the table, or both together. The 'spoons' were rather the cups containing the frankincense (LXX τὰς θυίσκας) which entered into this part of the ritual (Lv 24^7), two of which were still visible in Reland's day. The 'flagons'* were the larger, the 'bowls' the smaller vessels (σπονδεῖα καὶ κύαθοι) for the wine, which we must suppose also entered into the ritual of the shewbread. The silence of the OT on this point led the Jewish doctors to give novel and absurd explanations of the vessels last mentioned—such as hollow pipes between the loaves, or parts of a frame on which they lay. Similarly, these authorities differ as to whether the loaves were laid in two piles lengthwise across the width of the table—as one would naturally suppose—or along its length. A favourite tradition gives the length of each loaf as ten handbreadths (2½ ft.) and the breadth as five. Since the width of the table was only 1 cubit or six handbreadths, the loaves were baked with two handbreadths [their 'horns'] turned up at either end, thus taking the shape of a huge square bracket! (For these and similar speculations, as curious as useless, see Menaḥoth xi. 4 ff.; the Baraitha, § vii., with Flesch's notes and diagrams; Edersheim, The Temple, 154 ff.; and Ugolinus' treatise in his Thesaurus, vol. x.). The position of the table was on 'the north side' of the holy place (26^{35}).

(b) The golden Lampstand (Ex $25^{31-40} = 37^{17-24}$ [Gr. 38^{13-17}]; cf. Jos. Ant. III. vi. 7, BJ VII. v. 5).—Of the whole furniture of the tabernacle, the article to which, since Wyclif's time, our Eng. versions have given the misleading designation 'the candlestick,' afforded the greatest opportunity for the display of artistic skill. It was in reality a lampstand (מְנוֹרָה, λυχνία—the latter in Mt 5^{15} and parallels, where RV gives '[lamp]-stand,' Vulg. candelabrum) of pure gold (§ iii.), hence also termed the 'pure lampstand' (31^8 39^{37} etc. [cf. 'the pure table,' Lv 24^6]; for other designations see below). See also LAMP.

The lampstand on the Arch of Titus differs from that described in the text of P in several particulars, notably in the details of the ornamentation (see Reland's plate, op. cit. 6). In this respect it agrees better with the description of Josephus, who speaks of its 'knops and lilies with pomegranates and bowls,' seventy ornaments in all. The base, further, is hexagonal in form and ornamented with non-Jewish figures, while Jewish tradition speaks of the lampstand of the second temple as having a tripod base. The earliest known representation of the stand is found on certain copper coins doubtfully attributed to Antigonus, the last of the Hasmonæans (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 102, with woodcut). At a later period the seven-branched 'candlestick,' more or less conventionally treated, was a favourite motif with Jewish and Christian artists on lamps,* gems, tombs, etc.

Like the cherubim above the propitiatory (§ ix.), the lampstand was of 'beaten (i.e. repoussé) work' (מִקְשָׁה). A talent of gold was employed in its construction, the general idea of which is clear (see illustration): from a central stem three opposite pairs of arms branched off 'like the arrangement of a trident' (Josephus), curving outwards and upwards till their extremities, on which the lamps were placed, were on a level with the top of the shaft. The upper portion of this central stem, from the lowest pair of arms upwards, is termed the shaft (קָנֶה, so RV; not as AV 'branch'), also the lampstand par excellence (v.[34]); the lower portion is the base (so rightly RV for יָרֵךְ, lit. 'loins,' in the Mishna בָּסִים Kel. xi. 7). The latter, we have seen, probably ended in a tripod with clawed feet, as in the table of shewbread. The leading motive of the ornamentation on stem and arms is derived from the flower or blossom of the almond tree. The complete ornament, introduced four times on the stem and three times on each of the six branches, is termed גְּבִיעַ (gĕbîaʻ, lit. 'cup,' so RV; AV 'bowl'), and consists of two parts,* corresponding to the calyx and corolla of the almond flower, the kaphtôr (EV 'knop') and the peraḥ (EV 'flower') of the text. At what intervals these 'knops and flowers' are to be introduced is not stated (for the speculations of the Rabbis see Flesch, op. cit. with diagrams), nor do we know how the four sets of v.^{34} are to be distributed. It is usually assumed that these include the three knops which in v.^{35} ornament the points where the branches diverge from the stem. It seems to us more in harmony with the text to regard the three knops in question, with which no flowers are associated, as suggested rather by the scales of the stem of a tree, from whose axils spring the buds which develop into branches. We accordingly prefer to find seven knops on the central stem, viz. two 'knops and flowers' to ornament the base, three 'knops' alone, forming axils for the branches, and two 'knops and flowers' on the upper part of the shaft. Shaft and arms alike probably terminated in a 'cup' with its knop and flower, the five outspread petals of the corolla serving as a tray for one of the seven lamps.† The latter were doubtless of the unvarying Eastern pattern (see LAMP). The nozzles were turned towards the north, facing the table of shewbread, the lampstand having its place on the south side of the Holy Place. To see that the lamps were supplied with the finest produce of the olive ('pure olive oil beaten,' for which see OIL, vol. iii. p. 591^{a}, 592^{a}), trimmed and cleaned, was part of the daily duty of the priests. The necessary apparatus, the snuffers and snuff-dishes (which see) with the 'oil vessels' (Nu 4^{9}), were also of pure gold.

THE GOLDEN LAMPSTAND.

* A flagon is a favourite type on Jewish coins (MONEY, vol. iii. p. 431^a).

From the notices in the different strata of P (Ex 27$^{20f.}$, cf. 30^{7}, Lv 24$^{1ff.}$, Nu 8$^{1ff.}$) it is not clear whether the lamps were to be kept burning day and night or by night only. The latter alternative was the custom in the sanctuary of Shiloh (1 S 3^{3}). From Lv 24$^{1ff.}$ (note v.^{3})—of which Ex 27$^{20f.}$ is perhaps a later reproduction—it would appear that the lamps burned only 'from evening to morning.' At the time of the morning sacrifice they were to be trimmed, cleaned, and replaced (Ex 30^{7}, cf. Tamîd iii. 9, vi. 1), ready to be relit in the evening (30^{8}, 2 Ch 13^{11}). Against this, the prima facie interpretation, must be put such considerations as these: (1) the ancient custom of the ever burning lamp alluded to under CANDLE (vol. i. p. 348^{b}); (2) the expression נֵר תָּמִיד, a 'continual lamp or light' (Lv 24^{2}=Ex 27^{20}); and (3) since the dwelling was absolutely dark, there must, one would think, have been some provision for lighting it during the day. The practice of a later period, vouched for by Josephus (Ant. III. viii. 3 [§ 199], with which cf. his quotation from pseudo-Hecatæus, c. Apion. i. 22 [§ 199]), by which only three of the lamps burned by day and the remaining four were lighted at sunset, seems to be a compromise between the directions of the text and the practical necessities of the case (so Riehm, HWB^{2}, art. 'Leuchter'). The Rabbinical notices are still later, and differ from both the data of P and those of Josephus. (On the whole question see Schürer, HJP II. i. 281 f. with full reff., and 295 f.).

The fate of the golden lampstand of the second temple, made under the direction of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 4$^{49f.}$) to replace the earlier stand (τὴν λυχνίαν τοῦ φωτός, ib. 1^{21}, Ben Sira's λυχνία ἁγία, 26^{17}) carried off by Antiochus IV., has been narrated under SHEWBREAD (§ iii.). Onias in furnishing his temple at Leontopolis was content with a single golden lamp, suspended by a chain of gold (Jos. BJ VII. x. 3).

(c) The Altar of Incense (Ex 30$^{1-5}$=37$^{25-28}$ [the latter absent in Gr.]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 8 [§ 147 ff.]).—No part of the furniture of the tabernacle has been the subject of so much controversy in recent years as the altar of incense, which in our present text of Exodus occupies the place of honour in front of the veil. The attitude of modern criticism to Ex 30. 31 has been already stated (§ iii.), and it must suffice here to indicate in a summary way the principal grounds on which recent critics, with one voice, have pronounced against the presence of this altar in the tabernacle as sketched by the original author of Ex 25–29 (cf. EXODUS, vol. i. p. 810^{b}; INCENSE, vol. ii. p. 467 f.; TEMPLE).

(1) The tabernacle and its furniture have been described in detail, as also the dress and consecration of its ministrant priests, and the whole section brought to a solemn close with 29$^{45f.}$. Advocates of the traditional view must therefore explain the absence from its proper place in ch. 25 of an article ex hypothesi so essential to the daily ritual (30$^{7f.}$) as the altar of incense. They have also to account for the fact that the position of Ex 30$^{1-10}$ varies in the MT, the Samaritan-Hebrew, and Gr. texts (being altogether absent from the latter in the recapitulation in ch. 37). (2) P^{g} in the most unmistakable manner refers to the altar of burnt-offering as 'the altar' (so not less than 100 times, according to the Oxf. Hex. ii. 127), implying that he knew no other. Only in strata that bear other marks of a later origin does it receive a distinguishing epithet (§ vi. (a)). (3) The reference in 30^{10} is clearly based on, and is therefore younger than, the ritual of the Day of Atonement as described in Lv 16$^{12-14}$. But this chapter ignores the altar of incense, and, in harmony with Lv 10^{1} and Nu 16^{17}, requires the incense to be offered on censers. (4) Careful examination of the MT of 1 K 7 and Ezk 41 (see SHEWBREAD, TEMPLE) has disclosed the fact that an incense altar found a place neither in the real temple of Solomon nor in the ideal temple of Ezekiel. The references in 1 Ch 28^{18}, 2 Ch 4^{19} etc., are too late in date to enter into the argument as to the contents of P. The first historical reference to the 'golden altar' is found in the account of the sack of the temple by Antiochus IV. (1 Mac 1^{21}). On the other hand, the extreme scepticism of Wellhausen (Proleg., Eng. tr. 67) and others as to the existence of such an altar even in the second temple is unwarranted (see Delitzsch, 'Der Räucheraltar' in Zeitschr. f. kirchl. Wissenschaft, 1880, 114–121)

Assuming, then, that we have to do with a later addition (novella) to the original code, we note that this second altar is named מִזְבַּח מִקְטַר קְטֹרֶת (30^{1}) or simply מ" הַקְּטֹרֶת (30^{27} etc.), also the 'golden altar' (39^{38} etc., 1 Mac 1^{21}); in the LXX τὸ θυσιαστήριον τοῦ θυμιάματος, in Philo and Josephus τὸ θυμιατήριον—so Symm. and Theod. 30^{1}; for He 9^{4} see end of section. Like the larger altar it is 'four square,' a cubit in length and breadth, and 2 cubits in height, and furnished with horns (for these see § vi.). The material is acacia wood, overlaid with pure gold, the ornamentation a moulding of solid gold (זֵר, see § viii. (a)), with the usual provision for rings and staves (v.$^{4f.}$).* Its position is to be in the Holy Place, in front of 'the veil that is by the ark of the testimony' (v.^{6}). Aaron and his sons shall offer 'a perpetual incense' upon it night and morning, when they enter to dress and light the lamps of the golden stand (v.$^{7ff.}$). Once a year, on the Day of Atonement, its horns shall be brought into contact with the atoning blood (v.^{10}). Owing to the ambiguity in the directions of v.^{6} (cf. 6^{b} with 6^{a} in MT, Sam., and LXX; also Holzinger, in loc.) if taken by themselves, and to the influence of the late gloss (1 K 6^{22b}), a tradition grew up, which finds expression in the famous passage He 9^{4}, that the incense altar stood in the Most Holy Place, 'which had a golden altar of incense* and the ark of the covenant.' The same verse contains a similar divergent tradition regarding the contents of the ark (see next section).

* This appears from 25^{33}, where the cups are defined as each consisting of 'a knop and a flower'; hence in v.^{31} 'its knops and its flowers' are to be taken as in apposition to 'its cups' (see Dillm. in loc.), not, as already in LXX, as two additional ornaments (οἱ κρατῆρες καὶ οἱ σφαιρωτῆρες καὶ τὰ κρίνα; cf. the similar misinterpretation regarding the frames of the dwelling on the part of the LXX, § vii. (b) above).

† In the Mishna peraḥ ('flower') has on this account become the usual term for the plinth or tray of an ordinary lampstand (Ohaloth xi. 8, Kelim xi. 7). Cf. the ἐνθέμια of the divergent description in the Gr. text (37$^{17ff.}$).

* Differently expressed from P^{g}.

ix. THE FURNITURE OF THE MOST HOLY PLACE.—The Ark and the Propitiatory (Ex $25^{10-22}=37^{1-9}$ [Gr. 38^{1-8}]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 5).—Within the Most Holy Place stood in solitary majesty the sacred ark, on which rested the propitiatory or mercy-seat with its overarching cherubim. The history of the ancient palladium of the Hebrew tribes, 'the ark of J″' of the older writers, has been given under ARK. We have here a more elaborate shrine, to which P gives by preference the designation 'ark of the testimony' (אֲרוֹן הָעֵדֻת 25^{22} and often, ἡ κιβωτὸς τοῦ μαρτυρίου), a phrase parallel to and synonymous with that favoured by Deut. and the Deuteronomistic editors, 'ark of the covenant.' In both cases the ark was so named as containing the Decalogue (הָעֵדֻת 'the testimony,' $25^{16.21}$), written on 'the tables of testimony' (31^{18}). The ark itself sometimes receives the simple title 'the testimony' (16^{34} etc.); and the tabernacle, as we have seen (§ iii.), as in its turn containing the ark, is named 'the dwelling of the testimony' and 'the tent of the testimony.'† See TESTIMONY.

The ark of P is an oblong chest of acacia wood overlaid within and without with gold, 2½ cubits in length, and 1½ in breadth and height (i.e. 5 × 3 × 3 half-cubits). Each of its sides is finished with a strip of cable or ogee moulding (זֵר, EV 'crown,' see § viii. (a)) of solid gold in the same manner as the top of the table of shewbread; with this difference, however, that in the former the upper line of moulding must have projected beyond the plane of the top of the ark, probably to the extent of the thickness of the propitiatory, in order that the latter, with its cherubim, might remain in place during the march. Within the sacred chest was to be deposited 'the testimony' (v.^{16}) or Decalogue, as already explained. Before it—not within it, as a later tradition supposed (He 9^4)—were afterwards placed a pot of manna (Ex $16^{33f.}$) and Aaron's rod that budded (Nu 17^{10}).

Distinct from but resting upon the ark, and of the same superficial dimensions (2½ × 1½ cubits), was a slab of solid gold, to which the name kappōreth is given (only in P and 1 Ch 28^{11} EV 'mercy-seat').

The familiar rendering 'mercy-seat,' first used by Tindale, following Luther's Gnadenstuhl (cf. SHEWBREAD, § i.), goes back to that of the oldest VSS (LXX ἱλαστήριον, Vulg. propitiatorium)—and is based on the secondary and technical sense of the root-verb כִּפֶּר, viz. 'to make propitiation' for sin. Hence the Wyclif-Hereford rendering 'propitiatory,' derived from Jerome, is preferable to Tindale's 'mercy-seat.' In our opinion the rendering 'propitiatory' must be maintained. The alternative 'covering' (RVm) adopted in preference by so many modern, particularly German, scholars (cf. ἐπίθεμα in Gr. of Ex 25^{17}, and Philo, op. cit. [ed. Mangey, ii. 150] ἐπίθεμα ὡσανεὶ πῶμα [a lid]), is open to two serious objections. On the one hand it is based on the still unproved assumption that the primary signification of כִּפֶּר was 'to cover,'‡ and on the other hand the kappōreth was in no sense the lid or cover of the ark, which was a chest or coffer complete in itself. Dillmann and others have unsuccessfully attempted a via media by taking kappōreth in the sense of a protective covering (Schutzdach, Deckplatte, etc.). See, further, Deissmann, Bible Studies [Eng. tr.], p. 124 ff.

Near the ends of the propitiatory stood, facing each other, two small§ emblematic figures, the cherubim, of the same material and workmanship as the golden lampstand, viz. 'beaten' or repoussé work (מִקְשָׁה, χρυσοτορευτά) of pure gold. Being securely soldered to the propitiatory they are reckoned as 'of one piece' with it (v.^{19}). Each cherub was furnished, like the larger and differently placed cherubim of Solomon's temple (1 K $6^{23ff.}$), with a pair of wings which met overhead, while their faces were bent downwards towards the propitiatory. Whatever may have been their significance in primitive Hebrew mythology, the cherubim as here introduced, like the kindred seraphim in Isaiah's vision, are the angelic ministers of J″, guarding in the attitude of adoration the throne of His earthly glory (cf. Book of Enoch, ed. Charles, 71^7). The propitiatory, with the overarching cherubim, was, in truth, the innermost shrine of the wilderness sanctuary, for it was at once J″'s earthly and the footstool of His heavenly throne* (cf. 1 Ch 28^2). Not at the tent door, as in the earlier representation (Ex $33^{7ff.}$), but 'from above the propitiatory, from between the cherubim' (25^{22}), will J″ henceforth commune with His servant Moses (30^6). 'There, in the darkness and the silence, he listened to the Voice' (Nu 7^8).

For the transport of the sacred chest, its propitiatory and cherubim, two poles of acacia wood overlaid with gold are provided. These are to rest permanently (Ex 25^{15}, otherwise Nu 4^6, where the staves are inserted when the march begins) in four rings, attached, according to our present text, to the four 'feet' (פַּעֲמֹתָיו v.^{12}, so RV, but AV 'corners') of the ark.

But this text and rendering are open to serious question. For (1) of the shape, length, and construction of these 'feet' nothing is said; (2) why should the author employ the Phœnician word (פַּעַם) for 'foot' here in place of the usual רֶגֶל (v.^{26})? (3) If the rings were attached so far down, a state of dangerously unstable equilibrium would result; (4) all the oldest versions apparently read, or at least, as our own AV, rendered as in v.^{26} פֵּאֹתָיו 'its four corners.'† We must suppose, then, that the rings were attached, perhaps below the moulding, at the corners of the short sides of the ark (so the Baraitha, Neumann, Keil), along which, and not along the long sides (as Riggenbach, Dillm., and most), the poles rested. The object of this arrangement is to secure that the Divine throne shall always face in the direction of the march. The weight of the whole must have been considerable, with poles, certainly not 'staves,' and bearers to correspond.‡

In the second temple there was no ark, and consequently no propitiatory, notwithstanding the statement in the Apocalypse of Baruch (6^7) that it was hidden by an angel before the destruction of the temple, A.D. 70. According to P the sole contents of the ark, as we have seen, were the two tables of testimony on which the Decalogue was inscribed. Once a year, on the Day of Atonement, the high priest alone entered the Holy of Holies to bring the blood of the sin-offerings into contact with the propitiatory (Lv $16^{14f.}$; see ATONEMENT, DAY OF, vol. i. p. 199).

x. ERECTION AND CONSECRATION OF THE TABERNACLE. — In the oldest stratum of the Priests' Code the directions for the preparation of the sanctuary and its furniture (Ex 25–27), which have engaged our attention up to this point, are followed by equally minute instructions as to the priestly garments (28), and by the solemn consecration of Aaron and his sons for the priestly office (29). The altar alone of the appointments of the sanctuary is singled out for consecration ($29^{36f.}$). In the first of the accretions to the older document (30. 31), however, we find instructions for the anointing of 'the tent of meeting' and all the furniture of the sanctuary with the 'holy anointing oil' ($30^{26ff.}$), with which also the priests are to be anointed. When we pass to the still later stratum (35–40; see above, § iii.), we find a record of the carrying out of the preceding instructions to the last detail, followed by the erecting of 'the dwelling of the tent of meeting' ($40^{1ff.}$) on the first day of the first month of the second year, that is, a year less fourteen days from the first anniversary of the Exodus ($40^{1.17}$, cf. $12^{2.6}$). A comparison with 19^{1} shows that according to P's chronology a period of at least nine months is allowed for the construction of the sanctuary and its furniture. Some of the questions raised by $40^{18.19}$ as to the manner in which the curtains 'were spread over the dwelling' have been discussed by anticipation in § vii. (c); it must suffice now to add that after the court and the tabernacle proper had been set up, and all the furniture in its place, the whole, we must assume, was duly anointed by Moses himself in accordance with the instructions of the preceding verses ($40^{9f.}$), although this fact is not mentioned until we reach a later portion of the narrative (Lv $8^{10f.}$, Nu 7^{1}). This consecration of the sanctuary naturally implies that it is now ready for the purpose for which it was erected. Accordingly 'the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of J″ filled the dwelling' ($40^{34f.}$). J″ had now taken possession of the holy abode which had been prepared for Him. With the new year, as was most fitting, the new order of things began.

† In the art. ARK (§ i.) attention was briefly called to the three sets of designations of the ark characteristic of the early, the Deuteronomic, and the priestly writers respectively, of which all the other OT titles, some twenty in all, are merely variations and expansions. See for later discussions H. P. Smith, Samuel, 33; 'Ark' in Encyc. Bibl. i. 300 f.; Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves, 2 ff.

‡ The most recent research seems to point in favour of the alternative 'to wipe off'; see Zimmern, Beiträge zur Kenntniss d. babyl. Religion, 92; Haupt in JBL, xix. (1900) 61, 80.

§ It must be noted that, with bodies bent and wings outstretched, the cherubim were accommodated on a surface less than 4 ft. from end to end.

* For this idea and its possible bearing on the ultimate historical origin of the ark as the empty throne of an imageless deity, see Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves (1900), 44 and passim, based on the researches of Reichel in Ueber Vorhellenische Götterculte (esp. 27 ff.); cf. also Budde in Expos. Times, June 1898, p. 396 ff. (reprinted [in German] in ZATW, 1901, p. 194 ff.).

† Cf. 1 K 7^{30}, where פעמתיו of MT (AV here also 'corners') is similarly regarded by recent commentators as a corruption of פאתיו or פנתיו.

‡ The propitiatory, even if only a fingerbreadth thick, would alone weigh 760 lb. troy. The weight of the whole must be put at about 6 cwt. The Talmud mentions four bearers (Flesch, op. cit. 66). Two sufficed for the historical ark (ARK, vol. i. p. 150^b).

xi. THE TABERNACLE ON THE MARCH (Nu 2^{17} 3^{25-38} $4^{1ff.}$ etc.).—The cloud which rested on the dwelling by day and appeared as a pillar of fire by night accompanied the Hebrews 'throughout all their journeys' in the wilderness. When 'the cloud was taken up from over the dwelling' (Ex 40^{37}, Nu 9^{17}) this was the signal for the tents to be struck and another stage of the march begun; while, 'as long as the cloud abode upon the dwelling, whether it were two days or a month or a year,' the children of Israel remained encamped and journeyed not (Nu $9^{18ff.}$). The charge of the tabernacle and of all that pertained thereto was committed to the official guardians, the priests and Levites (Nu $3^{5ff.}$). When the signal for the march was given by a blast from the silver trumpets ($10^{1ff.}$), the priests entered the dwelling, and, taking down the veil at the entrance to the Most Holy Place, wrapped it round the ark ($4^{5ff.}$). This, as the most sacred of all the contents of the tabernacle, received three coverings in all, the others but two. Full and precise instructions follow for the wrapping up of the rest of the furniture (4^{7-14}). This accomplished, the priests hand over their precious burden to the first of the Levitical guilds, the sons of Kohath, for transport by means of the bearing-poles with which each article is provided (v.$^{15f.}$). The second guild, the sons of Gershon, have in charge the tapestry curtains of the dwelling, the hair curtains of the tent, the two outer coverings, the veil, and the screen ($3^{25f.}$ $4^{24ff.}$). For the conveyance of these, two covered waggons and four oxen are provided by the heads of the tribes ($7^{3.7}$). The remaining division of the Levites, the sons of Merari, receives in charge the frames and bars of the dwelling, together with the pillars and bases of the dwelling and of the court, with four waggons and eight oxen for their transport (ib.).* Everything being now in readiness, the march began. The Levites, according to Nu 2^{17},—and as the symmetry of the camp requires,—marched in the middle of the line, with two divisions of three tribes each before them and two behind. This, however, does not accord with Nu $10^{17ff.}$, according to which the sons of Gershon and Merari marched after the first division of three tribes, and had the tabernacle set up before the arrival of the Kohathites with the sacred furniture between the second and third divisions.

xii. THE HISTORICITY OF P'S TABERNACLE.—After what has been said in our opening section—with which the art. ARK must be compared—as to the nature, location, and ultimate disappearance of the Mosaic tent of meeting, it is almost superfluous to inquire into the historical reality of the costly and elaborate sanctuary which, according to P, Moses erected in the wilderness of Sinai. The attitude of modern OT scholarship to the priestly legislation, as now formulated in the Pentateuch (see §§ i. and iv. above), and in particular to those sections of it which deal with the sanctuary and its worship, is patent on every page of this Dictionary, and is opposed to the historicity of P's tabernacle. It is now recognized that the highly organized community of the priestly writers, rich not only in the precious metals and the most costly Phœnician dyes, but in men of rare artistic skill, is not the unorganized body of Hebrew serfs and nomads that meets us in the oldest sources of the Pentateuch. Even after centuries spent in contact with the civilization and arts of Canaan, when skilled artists in metal were required, they had to be hired by Solomon from Phœnicia. Again, the situation of P's tabernacle, its highly organized ministry, its complex ritual, are utterly at variance with the situation and simple appointments of the Elohistic tent of meeting (see § i.). With regard, further, to the details of the description, as studied in the foregoing sections, we have repeatedly had to call attention to the obscurities, omissions, and minor inconsistencies of the text, which compel the student to the conviction that he is dealing not with the description of an actual structure, but with an architectural programme, dominated by certain leading conceptions. The most convincing, however, of the arguments against the actual existence of P's tabernacle, is the silence of the pre-exilic historical writers regarding it. There is absolutely no place for it in the picture which their writings disclose of the early religion of the Hebrews. The tabernacle of P has no raison d'être apart from the ark, the history of which is known with fair completeness from the conquest to its removal to the temple of Solomon. But in no genuine passage of the history of that long period is there so much as a hint of the tabernacle, with its array of ministering priests and Levites. Only the Chronicler (1 Ch 16^{39} 21^{29} etc.), psalm-writers, editors, and authors of marginal glosses, writing at a time when P's conception of Israel's past had displaced every other, find the tabernacle of the priestly writers in the older sources, or supply it where they think it ought to have been (cf. 2 Ch $1^{3f.}$ with 1 K $3^{2ff.}$). See, further, Wellh. Proleg. (Eng. tr.) 39 ff., and recent works cited in the Literature at the end of this article.

xiii. THE RULING IDEAS AND RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TABERNACLE.—If, then, the tabernacle of the foregoing sections had no historical existence, is its study, on that account, a waste of time and labour? By no means. On the contrary, the tabernacle as conceived by the priestly writers is the embodiment of a sublime idea with which are associated many other ideas and truths of the most vital moment for the history of religion. In this place it is impossible to do more than indicate in summary form some of these vital religious truths to which reference has been made. We have already (§ iv.) expressed the conviction that the only standpoint from which to approach the study of the true significance of the tabernacle, as designed by the author of Ex 25-29, is that laid down by this author himself. Following the lead of Ezekiel, his chief aim, and the aim of the priestly writers who expanded the original sketch, is to show to future generations the necessary conditions under which the ideal relation between J″ and Israel may be restored and maintained. This ideal is expressed by Ezekiel and by P as a dwelling of J″ in the midst of His covenant people (reff. in § iv.). The methods, however, by which these two kindred spirits sought to impress this ideal upon their contemporaries are diametrically opposed. Ezekiel projects his ideal forward into the Messianic future; P throws his backwards to the golden age of Moses. Both sketches are none the less ideals, whose realization for prophet and priest alike was still in the womb of the future. Both writers follow closely the arrangements of the pre-exilic temple, P, however, striving to unite these with existing traditions of the Mosaic tent of meeting. It is the recognition of these facts that makes it possible to say that 'a Christian apologist can afford to admit that the elaborate description of the tabernacle is to be regarded as a product of religious idealism, working upon a historical basis' (Ottley, Aspects of the Old Test. 226).

* The fondness of the priestly writers for proportion (2 : 1) has again led to strange results, for, even with the colossal 'boards' of previous writers reduced to frames (see § vii. (b)), the loads of the Merarites were out of all proportion to those of the Gershonites. Nu 7, however, is now recognized as one of the latest sections of the Hexateuch.

The problem that presented itself to the mind of P was this: Under what conditions may the Divine promise of Ezk 37[27] ('my dwelling shall be with them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people') be realized? This we take to be the supreme idea of the priestly code, the realization of the presence of God in the midst of His people (Ex 25[8] 29[45]). This thought, as we have seen, is expressed in the characteristic designation 'the dwelling,' given by P to the most essential part of the sanctuary which is to be the concrete embodiment of the thought.

The Divine dwelling must be in accordance with the Divine character. Now, in the period from Deuteronomy to the close of the Exile, the two aspects of the Divine character which the inspired teachers of the time place in the forefront of their teaching are the unity and the holiness of J″. Each of these attributes has its necessary correlate. The unity of J″ requires the unity or centralization of His worship, which is the keynote of Deuteronomy. The holiness of J″ demands the holiness of His people, which is the recognized keynote of the Law of Holiness (Lv 19 ff.). The crowning result of the discipline of the Exile may be summed up in the simple formula 'one God, one sanctuary,' a thought which dominates the priestly code from end to end. That there should be but one sanctuary in the wilderness, a symbol of the unity of J″, is therefore for P a thing of course, requiring neither justification nor enforcement.

With regard to the other pair of correlates, a holy God and a holy people, the whole ceremonial system of the priestly code expends itself in the effort to give expression to this twofold thought. The centre of this system is the tabernacle and its priesthood, and every effort is made to render the former a visible embodiment of the holiness of the God who is to be worshipped in its court. We have seen (§ iv.) the precautions taken by Ezekiel to guard his new sanctuary from profanation; the same thought is prominent in H (Law of Holiness), and is impressively exhibited in the arrangement of the desert camp in P. Between the tents of the twelve tribes and the throne of J″ there intervene the cordon of the tents of the tribe of Levi, the court, and the Holy Place—into which priests alone may enter,—all so many protecting sheaths, to borrow a figure from plant-life, of the Most Holy Place, where J″ dwells enthroned in ineffable majesty and almost unapproachable holiness.* Once a year only may the high priest, as the people's representative, approach within its precincts, bearing the blood of atonement. Not only, therefore, is the one tabernacle the symbol of J″'s unity, it is also an eloquent witness to the truth: 'Ye shall be holy, for I, J″, your God am holy' (Lv 19[2]). Yet these precautions are, after all, intended not to exclude but to safeguard the right of approach of J″'s people to His presence. The tabernacle was still the 'tent of meeting,' the place at which, with due precautions, men might approach J″, and in which J″ condescended to draw near to men. It is thus a witness to the further truth that man is called to enjoy a real, albeit still restricted, communion and converse with God.

One other attribute of the Divine nature receives characteristic expression in the arrangements of P's sanctuary. This is the perfection and harmony of the character of J″. Symmetry, harmony, and proportion are the three essentials of the æsthetic in architecture; and in so far as the æsthetic sense in man, by which the Creator has qualified him for the enjoyment of the beauty and harmony of the universe, is a part of the Divine image (Gn 1[26f.]) in each of us, these qualities are reflexions of the harmony and perfection of the Divine nature. The symmetry of the desert sanctuary has already been abundantly emphasized. The harmony of its design is shown in the balance of all its parts, and in the careful gradation of the materials employed. The three varieties of curtains (§ iv.) and the three metals correspond to the three ascending degrees of sanctity which mark the court, the Holy Place, and the Most Holy respectively. In the dwelling itself we advance from the silver of the bases through the furniture of wood, thinly sheathed with gold, to the only mass of solid gold, the propitiatory, the seat of the deity. As regards the proportions, finally, which are so characteristic of the tabernacle, we find here just those ratios which are still considered 'the most pleasing' in the domain of architectural art, viz. those 'of an exact cube or two cubes placed side by side . . . and the ratio of the base, perpendicular and hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle, e.g. 3, 4, 5 and their multiples' (see art. 'Architecture' in Encyc. Brit.[9]). The perfect cube of the Most Holy Place is universally regarded as the deliberate attempt to express the perfection of J″'s character and dwelling-place, the harmony and equipoise of all His attributes. The similar thought, the perfection of the New Jerusalem, 'in which no truth will be exaggerated or distorted,' is expressed by the fact that 'the length and breadth and height of it are equal' (Rev 21[16]).

The 'symbolism of numbers' in the measurements of the tabernacle, of which so much has been written, is too firmly established to admit of question (for general principles see art. NUMBER). The sacred numbers 3, 4, 7, 10, their parts (1½, 2, 2½, 5) and multiples (6, 9, 12, 20, 28, 30, 42, 48, 50, 60, 100), dominate every detail of the fabric and its furniture.† In all this we must recognize an earnest striving to give concrete expression—in a manner, it is true, which our Western thought finds it difficult to appreciate—to the sacred harmonies and perfection of the character of the Deity for whose 'dwelling' the sanctuary is destined.

---

* For 'the fundamental sense of unapproachableness which is never absent from the notion of J″'s holiness,' see HOLINESS, vol. ii. p. 397[a].

† The curious student will easily detect these measurements and numbers in the previous sections.

On the other hand, that the author of Ex 25-29 intended to give expression to ideas beyond the sphere of J″'s relation to His covenant people, or even within that sphere to invest every detail of material, colour, ornament, etc., with a symbolical significance, we do not believe. Following in the wake of Philo (op. cit.) and Josephus (Ant. III. vii. 7), the Fathers, and after them many writers down to our own day, among whom Bähr stands pre-eminent, have sought to read a whole philosophy of the universe into the tabernacle. Now it is designed to unfold the relations of heaven and earth and sea, now of body, soul, and spirit, and many wonderful things besides. Happily, the taste for these fanciful speculations has died out and is not likely to revive.

Quite apart from the authors of such far-fetched symbolisms stand several of the NT writers, who see in the tabernacle the foreshadowing of spiritual realities. Once and again the terminology of St. Paul betrays the influence of the tabernacle (e.g. the laver of regeneration, Tit 3^5 RVm). For the author of the Fourth Gospel the tabernacle on which rested the Divine glory in the cloud prefigured the incarnate Word who 'tabernacled (ἐσκήνωσεν) among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father' (Jn 1^{14}). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, again, the tabernacle, its furniture, and ministering priesthood supply the unknown author with an essential part of his argument. With 'singular pathos,' to borrow Bishop Westcott's apt expression, he lingers over his description of the sacred tent and all its arrangements. Yet, like the whole Levitical ceremonial, it was but the shadow of the heavenly substance (8^5), a 'parable for the time present' of 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle' (9^{11}) which is heaven. Into this tabernacle Jesus Christ has entered, our great High Priest, by whom the restricted access of the former dispensation is done away, and through whom 'a new and living way' has been opened of free access into the 'true' Holy of Holies (9^{24}), even the immediate presence of God. Last of all, in the Book of Revelation we have the final consummation of the kingdom of God portrayed under the figure of the tabernacle: 'Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall tabernacle (σκηνώσει) with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them' (Rev 21^3—for v.^{16} see above)—in which the final word of revelation takes up and repeats the sublime ideal of Ezekiel and the priestly writers. 'In this representation of the New Jerusalem culminates the typology of the OT sanctuary' (Keil).

LITERATURE.—Works on the tabernacle are legion, but there is no monograph from the standpoint of the foregoing article. The student must start from a careful study of the text of Exodus and of the more recent commentaries, such as Dillmann-Ryssel, Strack, Holzinger, Baentsch. The commentary in the International Critical Series by the writer of this article is in preparation. The critical problems are treated by Popper, Der bibl. Bericht über die Stiftshütte, 1862; Graf, Die geschichtl. Bücher d. AT, 51 ff., 1866; Kuenen, Hexateuch; Wellhausen, Prolegomena; and more recent writers (see § ii. above). In addition to the relevant sections in the Archæologies of Ewald, Haneberg, Keil, Benzinger, Nowack (vol. ii.), the articles should be consulted in the Bible Dictionaries of Winer, Riehm, and PRE^{2} (by Riggenbach), all under 'Stiftshütte'; artt. 'Tabernacle' and 'Temple' (the latter especially) in Smith's DB. The more important monographs are by Neumann, Die Stiftshütte, 1861; Riggenbach, Die Mosaische Stiftshütte^{2}, 1867; Schick, Stiftshütte und Tempel, 1898; and (in English) Brown, The Tabernacle^{6}, 1899. The most exhaustive treatment of the tabernacle, its arrangements and its significance, is Bähr's Symbolik d. Mosaischen Cultus, 2 vols. 1837-39 (Bd. i. 2nd ed. 1874), full of fanciful ideas. On somewhat different lines is Friederich, Symbolik d. Mos. Stiftshütte, 1841. Sound criticisms of both, and an attempt to reduce the symbolism to saner limits, characterize Keil's full treatment in vol. i. of his Archæology (Eng. tr.). See also Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews, 1889, Essay on 'The general significance of the Tabernacle,' p. 233 ff.; Ottley, Aspects of the OT, esp. p. 261 ff., 'The symbolical significance,' etc.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.—The names of this feast and the references to it in the Bible are given in the art. FEASTS AND FASTS.

As the present article is a supplement to the above-named general one, the reader is recommended to refer to the latter (vol. i.), especially pp. 860, 861, and the synopsis on p. 863. (In the reff. to Tabernacles outside the Pentateuch insert 'Neh' between 'Ezr 3^4' and '8$^{14-17}$'). In what follows, a number by itself will be a reference to a page in that article.

Of the six passages containing injunctions concerning the observance of this feast, two are from Ex. and two from Deut. (863). The two in Ex. call it the Feast of Ingathering, refer to it as one of the three Pilgrimage Feasts (860^a and note), place it at the end of the year, and enjoin the attendance of all males at the sanctuary with offerings.

The injunctions in Deut. contain noteworthy additions to those in Exodus. The Feast of Ingathering is called the Feast of Booths (ṣukkôth, without explanation as if the term were familiar), its duration is fixed for seven days, and it is to be kept at Jerusalem, 'the place which the LORD thy God shall choose.' Also in the year of release in the Feast of Tabernacles the law shall be read before all Israel in their hearing (Dt 31$^{10f.}$). The name of the festival points to the custom of erecting booths in the vineyards during the time of the vintage (cf. Is 1^8 'a booth in a vineyard,' RV), a custom which is continued to the present day in parts of Palestine; it served also (Lv 23$^{40-43}$ [H]) to remind the Israelites that their fathers dwelt in booths or tents during their passage from the house of bondage to the Promised Land. Of the two ceremonies enjoined in Dt 26, the second (vv.$^{12-15}$) was probably performed at this festival. Both in Ex. and Deut. the connexion of this and all three Pilgrimage Feasts with agriculture is clearly indicated (cf. 860^b).

Before considering the two remaining passages, let us trace the observance of the feast before the Exile. It appears to have been a custom of the Canaanites to keep a vintage festival, for according to Jg 9^{27}, after gathering the vineyards and treading the grapes, the men of Shechem held a feast in the house of their god, and at this gathering dissatisfaction with Abimelech's rule was openly expressed. (For a discussion of this incident see art. ABIMELECH, and cf. Moore on Jg 9^{27}).

In Jg 21^{19} mention is made of a similar festival observed at Shiloh, when the maidens went out to dance in the vineyards; but note the contrast between the Canaanites in the house of their god and the feast of the LORD held by the Israelites. Although this festival was held at Shiloh, where the ark was, it appears to have been an observance by a tribe or part of Israel only.

The yearly sacrifice which Elkanah offered to the LORD of Hosts in Shiloh (1 S 1^3) was probably in the autumn. The dedication of Solomon's temple took place 'at the feast in the month Ethanim, which is the seventh month' (1 K 8^2),* i.e. at the Feast of Tabernacles. It was in imitation of this feast that Jeroboam instituted a feast at Bethel in the eighth month (1 K 12^{32}).

From these references to the feast in pre-exilic times it may be inferred that, (1) at least in the times before the establishment of the kingdom, the pilgrimage to the sanctuary was made but once a year (most probably in the autumn); (2) festivals at other times of the year were also observed [cf. 1 K 9^{25}, 2 Ch 8^{13}, Is 9^3 ('the joy in harvest'; the same word as in Ex 23^{16} is applied to the feast elsewhere called the Feast of Weeks)

---

* A difficulty arises in comparing this passage with 1 K 6^{38}, where it is stated that the house of the LORD was not finished till 'the month Bul, which is the eighth month.'

29^{1} ('let the feasts come round,' RV) 30^{29}, Hos 2^{11} Am 5^{21}].

Let us now consider the two remaining passages, which contain injunctions concerning this feast (Lv 23 and Nu 29), and here we notice that, instead of prescriptions relating to the three Pilgrimage Feasts as in Ex. and Deut., we have a sacred calendar in which the position of each festival is fixed by the month and day. A special name (מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ 'a holy convocation') is given to the festivals, or rather to certain days of the festal periods, and servile work is prohibited on those days. The Feast of Tabernacles lasts for seven days as in Deut., but an eighth day is observed at its close as an עֲצֶרֶת 'a solemn assembly' (see Driver's note on Dt 16^{8}).

The post-exilic references to this feast are contained in Ezra and Nehemiah. In Ezr 3^{4} it is stated that the Feast of Tabernacles was observed by the returned exiles as soon as the altar was set up, and before the foundation of the temple of the LORD was laid. The terms used in vv.$^{3-6}$ show acquaintance with the prescriptions of P with reference to burnt-offerings.*

Very different in character from the notice in Ezr 3 is the account found in Neh 8$^{13-18}$. Here the details are interesting and instructive. The reference to Lv 23$^{40-43}$ is clear. The material gathered by the people is that prescribed in Lv 23^{40} (the wording of the two passages is in some respects different; cf. Ryle's note on Neh 8^{15}). With it they make booths, and set them up in the courts of the temple and in the open spaces of the city, and dwell in them, according to Lv 23^{42}. The feast was kept seven days, and the ʽăzereth of the eighth day was duly observed.† The writer is aware that a new method of keeping the festival is introduced, one unknown to the people during the rule of judges and kings, and the ceremonial throughout is that enjoined in Leviticus. It is not, however, definitely stated whether the numerous sacrifices prescribed for this festival in Nu 29 were offered on this occasion.

The OT history of the Feast closes here. The eighth day, which is still distinguished from the seven days of Deut., is by the time of the writer of 2 Mac 10^{6} reckoned as part of the Feast. Josephus (Ant. III. x. 4) speaks of keeping a festival of eight days, and also mentions the custom of bearing the lulab, consisting of a myrtle, willow, and palm branch in the right hand, and the ethrog or citron in the left. For this and other ceremonies observed at the feast see Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 5; the Talmudic treatise, Sukkah; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 149, 157; and the references on p. 861 of art. FEASTS; and the NT references in the synopsis.

On one point is stress laid in all the accounts: that the ingathering which the feast commemorates is general ('when thou gatherest in thy labours out of the field,' Ex 23^{16}; 'the fruits of the land,' Lv 23^{39}; 'from thy threshing-floor and from thy wine-vat,' Dt 16^{13}). The Feasts of Unleavened Bread (mazzôth) and of Weeks or Harvest marked certain stages in the work of ingathering, but the autumn festival, the last of the yearly cycle, was the thanksgiving for the combined produce of the whole year. As the vintage and olive harvests had just been gathered, the worshippers might think chiefly of these rich gifts, yet the injunctions above quoted bade them take a wider view, and thank God for all His good gifts. It is also to be noted that in the autumn festival no special offering of the fruits of the earth is enjoined corresponding to the sheaf of the wave-offering (Lv 23$^{9-14}$) at Passover, and the two wave-loaves with sacrifice at Pentecost (23$^{15-21}$). Yet in other respects the Feast of Tabernacles is specially distinguished from other feasts. In Deut. it is the only one of the three at which the Israelite must dwell at Jerusalem for seven days, and in Numbers the sacrifices prescribed for this festival are in excess of those for any other (for details see p. 861^{b}). Its pre-eminence is asserted by Josephus (Ant. VIII. iv. 1—it was ἑορτὴ σφόδρα παρὰ τοῖς Ἑβραίοις ἁγιωτάτη καὶ μεγίστη). In the OT it is sometimes called 'the Feast,' κατ' ἐξοχήν: 1 K 8$^{2.65}$ (=2 Ch 5^{3} 7^{8}), Ezk 45^{25}, Neh 8^{14}; cf. Lv 23^{39} (H), 1 K 12^{32} (Driver, Deut. 197). But it was also the festival which in early times was common to Israel and to the heathen round about them. May it be that the wider view of the autumn festival and the avoidance of any special offering of the fruits of the ground at this season were designed in order to make a distinction between their own festival and that of their neighbours, and possibly to avoid excesses which attended the heathen celebrations,—to impress upon the Israelite, when he appeared before the LORD his God, that he was present at a harvest thanksgiving rather than at a vintage carnival?

TABITHA.—See DORCAS.

TABLE.—A word used in several senses, either in sing. or plural, 108 times in the OT and 20 times in the NT. In the former when singular it is usually (56 times) the tr. of שֻׁלְחָן shulḥân (LXX τράπεζα, Vulg. mensa). 'Table' is used with the following meanings. 1. A flat-topped stand, upon which victuals were set during meals, and around which people squatted or reclined. Such stands were usually small; in ancient Egypt they were rarely more than a foot in height. Lepsius represents a table of this kind heaped with meat, bread, and fruit, with two persons sitting by it (Denkm. ii. 52). In the Middle and New Empire stands are sometimes represented as frameworks of laths bearing jars and other vessels on the top, and with an undershelf for the solid food. Such tables are named wṭḥ or wtn or tbhu. In Assyrian contracts, temple tables are called šalḥu. The tables used by the fellahin of Palestine are mostly round, and rarely more than 12 inches high. Probably the ancient domestic tables were also round, as Goodwin and Zornius have inferred from such expressions as 'round about the table.' The table in the prophet's chamber (2 K 4^{10}) was probably a stand of this kind. It is possible that the shulḥân may have been originally a mat or something spread under the food platter, as can be often seen at present among the fellahin; but it must sometimes have been sufficiently high to allow of portions of food dropping from it. The seventy kings who gleaned their meat under Adonibezek's table (Jg 1^{7}) may have been fed from the leavings of the royal meals; but the boast is probably an Oriental exaggeration, and the number a copyist's mistake. Posidonius tells of the king of the Parthians throwing food to persons sitting around him (Athenæus, iv. 38). The Greek trapeza was usually four-footed, hence perh. the name (Eustath. Comm. ad Odyss. A. 111); nevertheless it was sometimes called tripous (Ath. ii. 32), a usage ridiculed by Aristophanes in an extant fragment of Telmesses. Homer represents each guest as having a separate table (Od. xvii. 333). These were sometimes covered with a cloth (Crates, Theria, in Ath. vi. 267). The table was removed after the feast. The larger tables of a guest-chamber were longer trapezai, around which the guests reclined, and helped themselves from the common dishes; hence the expression in Lk 22^{21} 'the hand . . . is with me on the table.' The food was usually on a platter, but sometimes laid on the table without any dish; hence the disgust of the condition described in Is 28^{8}.

* The doubts raised as to the historical character of this section do not materially affect the statement here made.

† The difference between keeping the festival with and without the additional eighth day is illustrated by comparing the accounts of the dedication of Solomon's temple in Kings and Chronicles. In 1 K 8^{66} it says, 'on the eighth day he sent them away,' i.e. on the 22nd of the month; but in 2 Ch 7$^{8-10}$ it says, 'in the eighth day they made a solemn assembly (ʽăzereth) . . . and on the three and twentieth day of the seventh month he sent the people away. . . .' The Chronicler describes the feast as kept according to the rule of Leviticus; the writer of Kings assumes that the rule of Deut. was followed.

2. To prepare a table for any one is to feed or nourish him, as in Ps 23^{5}. Figuratively, the personified Wisdom is said to furnish a table for man's instruction (Pr 9^{2}). Distributing the means of sustenance to those of the early Christians who lacked, was called by the apostles 'serving tables' (Ac 6^{2}). To eat at one's table is to be a member of his household or an honoured guest. David, as one of Saul's officers, ate at the king's table (1 S 20^{29}), and Mephibosheth as a guest ate at David's table (2 S $9^{7-10.\,11.\,13}$, 1 K 2^{7}). The 850 prophets who are said to have eaten at Jezebel's table (1 K 18^{19}) did not necessarily sit down with their royal hosts, nor did the servants of Solomon who consumed the meat of his table, the variety and amount of which amazed the queen of Sheba (1 K 10^{5}): the expression means that they were fed by the royal bounty (see Heraclides in Athen. iv. 26). The same is probably true of the 150 Jews and rulers whom Nehemiah claims to have had at his table (Neh 5^{17}). The honour of sitting at meat with the king was a special favour (2 S 19^{28}), requiring careful behaviour (Pr 23^{1}), and sudden leaving of the table was a mark of displeasure (1 S 20^{34}). Those round the table are said to sit at table (1 K 13^{20}), and the members of the family circle are said to be round about the table (Ps 128^{3}); squatting, as the children of the fellahin do still. 'The table,' in the sense of the indulgence in dainties, is to be a snare for the wicked (Ps 69^{22}, Ro 11^{9}). God's table to which the birds of prey are invited is provided with the flesh of His enemies (Ezk 39^{20}), a figurative description of His just judgment of the wicked. The table in Ezk 23^{41} is prepared for purposes of the toilet.

In the NT 'table' is used in the sense of meal in Lk 22^{21-30}, Jn 12^{2} (where RV substitutes 'sat at meat' for the AV 'sat at the table'). In Jn 13^{28} 'no man at table' is the tr. of οὐδεὶς τῶν ἀνακειμένων. The dogs in the neighbouring Gentile district fed under the table (Mt $15^{27.\,28}$, Mk 7^{28}, Lk 16^{21}). Lazarus the beggar desired the crumbs which were gathered and thrown out from under the rich man's table (Lk 16^{21}),

3. For the table of shewbread see artt. SHEWBREAD, and TABERNACLE, p. 662 f.

4. The 'table of the Lord' stands in Mal $1^{7.\,12}$ (cf. Ezk 41^{22} 44^{16}) for the altar. In 1 Co 10^{21}, where it is contrasted with the 'table of devils,' it is evidently from the context the Lord's Supper as compared with pagan idol-feasts, the expression being probably borrowed from our Lord's words 'at my table' in Lk 22^{30}.

5. The tables of the money-changers (αἱ τράπεζαι τῶν κολλυβιστῶν) were the small square trays on stands which are familiar objects at the gates and bazaars of Eastern towns on which coins are displayed, and beside which the money-changers stand. These are not infrequently overturned in the numerous disputes about the value of exchanges. These money-changers were the bankers of primitive times: thus in the Isæus of Dionysius of Halicarnassus the expression τράπεζαν κατασκευάζεσθαι is used in the sense of setting up a bank (Reiske, vii. 309). Our Lord overthrew those set up in the courts of the temple (Mt 21^{12}, Mk 11^{15}, Jn 2^{15}).

6. Table in the sense of a flat surface upon which writings were inscribed is expressed by the word לוּחַ. See following article.

7. In Ca 1^{12} 'table' is the tr. of מֵסַב, rendered by LXX ἐν ἀνακλίσει αὐτοῦ and Vulg. in accubitu suo; cf. perh. 1 S 16^{11}, and in late Heb. מְסִבָּה (Levy, 3. 163) and הֵסֵב (ib. 464; Schechter, Ben Sira 56). It probably means, from the context, a couch. See, further, the Comm. ad loc.

In RV 'table' is left out in Mk 7^{4}. AV here tr. κλινῶν, 'tables,' but puts 'beds' in margin. The words καὶ κλινῶν are read by ΑDΧΓΠΣΦ al min $^{\text{pl}}$ latt syrr. $^{\text{pesh hel}}$ go arm Or; omitted by ℵBLΔ min $^{\text{perpauc}}$ syr $^{\text{sin}}$ me.

TABLE, TABLET.—1. לוּחַ (etym. unknown). This word, which may be used of wooden boards or planks (Ex 27^{8} 38^{7} in the altar of the Tabernacle, Ezk 27^{5} in the ship fig. of Tyre, Ca 8^{9} in a door) † or of metal plates (1 K 7^{36} on bases of lavers in Solomon's temple)†, is far more frequently used of stone tablets, esp. those on which the Ten Words are said to have been written (Ex 24^{12} $31^{18\,\textit{bis}}$ $32^{15\,\textit{bis}.\,16\,\textit{bis}.\,19}$ $34^{1\,\textit{ter}.\,4\,\textit{bis}.\,28.\,29}$, Dt 4^{13} $5^{19\,\text{(Eng. 22)}}$ $9^{9\,\textit{bis}.\,10.\,11.\,15.\,17}$ $10^{1.\,2\,\textit{bis}.\,3\,\textit{bis}.\,4.\,5}$, 1 K 8^{9}, 2 Ch 5^{10}); of a tablet for writing a prophecy upon (Is 30^{8} [‖ סֵפֶר], Hab 2^{2}); fig. in Pr 3^{3} 7^{3} (wise counsels are to be written on the table of the heart), Jer 17^{1} (the sin of Judah is graven [חֲרוּשָׁה] upon the table of their heart). In all these passages both AV and RV tr. לוּחַ, when used of stone, by 'table(s),' except Is 30^{8} where RV has 'tablet,' a rendering which might well have been adopted uniformly. The LXX reproduces by πλάξ (except Ex 24^{12}, Is 30^{8}, Hab 2^{2} [all πυξίον], Pr 3^{3} 7^{3} [both πλάτος], and Jer 17^{1} [wanting in LXX]), and this is also the NT term (2 Co 3^{3}, He 9^{4}). The 'writing-table' (πινακίδιον, RV 'writing-tablet') of Lk 1^{63} was probably a waxen tablet. For a description of the use of both stone and wax for writing purposes see art. WRITING.

2. גִּלָּיוֹן (the tablet inscribed with a חֶרֶט [stylus], 'to Maher-shalal-hash-baz,' Is 8^{1} AV 'roll'). The essential signification of this word appears to be something with a smooth polished surface, whether of wood, stone, or metal.* [For גִּל׳ גָּדוֹל B has τόμος καινοῦ μεγάλου, A τόμ. χάρτου κ. μ., Aq. κεφαλὶς μεγάλη, Symm. τεῦχος μέγα]. The only other occurrence of the Heb. word is in Is 3^{23}, where [in plur.] it prob. means 'tablets of polished metal,' 'mirrors' (so Targ., Vulg., Ges., Del., Cheyne, Dillm.-Kittel, but see Marti, ad loc., and cf. the LXX τὰ διαφανῆ Λακωνικά). 3. AV 'tablets' (כּוּמָז [etym. unknown]; LXX περιδέξιον, περιδέξια; RV 'armlets'), Ex 35^{22}, Nu 31^{50}. The Heb. word prob. stands for some neck ornament† (RVm 'necklaces'; cf. Dillm.-Ryssel or Baentsch, Exodus, ad loc.). 4. The 'tablets' (i.e. lockets) of AV in Is 3^{20} become in RV 'perfume boxes' (so Ges.; cf. Vulg. olfactoriola), and some such sense [possibly 'ointment boxes'; so P. Haupt (deriving from Assyr. pašâšu, 'to anoint oneself') in Cheyne's 'Isaiah,' SBOT p. 82] is required by the context for the Heb. בָּתֵּי הַנֶּפֶשׁ, although it may be doubted whether נֶפֶשׁ ever in the OT [Pr 27^{9} is a doubtful passage] actually means 'odour.' The meaning is perh. 'of health,' i.e. serving to give health to those who smell them (='reviving,' 'refreshing'; cf. the Niph. of the root נפשׁ, and its use in Ethp. in Syr.

* In the Talmud גִּלָּיוֹן stands for the empty margin of a page or roll.

† This is no doubt the meaning of the English word used by AV, for in the language of the day an ornament hanging from the neck could be called a 'tablet,' as Golding, Ovid, 123, 'Riche pearles were hanging at her eares, and tablets at her brest.'

=ἀναψύχω). See, further, art. PERFUME, vol. iii. p. 747^a. J. A. SELBIE.

TABOR (תָּבוֹר; B Θαχχειά, A and Luc. Θαβώρ; Vulg. Thabor).—A city in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch 6^{77}). No name having any similarity to Tabor occurs in the earlier list of Levitical cities in Zebulun (Jos $21^{34.35}$). Various suggestions, none of them quite satisfactory, have been made in regard to this place,—that the occurrence of the name in 1 Chron. is due to a transcriber's error; that it is an abbreviation of Chisloth-tabor, a town on the border of Zebulun (Jos 19^{12}); that it is the Daberath of Jos 21^{28}, now Debûrieh; and that either a town on Mount Tabor or the mountain itself is intended. Some authorities suppose it to be the same place as Tabor on the border of Issachar (Jos 19^{22}, B Γαιθβώρ, A Θαφώθ, Luc. Θαβώρ), and that at which the brothers of Gideon were slain by Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8^{18}). C. W. WILSON.

TABOR, MOUNT (הַר תָּבוֹר; LXX ὄρος Θαβώρ, τὸ Ἰταβύριον (in Jer. and Hos.); Thabor).—One of the most celebrated, and, at the same time, one of the most striking, mountains in Palestine. At the N.E. extremity of the rich plain of Esdraelon, and only about 5 miles E. of Nazareth, a limestone hill of unique outline rises to a height of 1843 feet above the sea. This is Mount Tabor, the Atabyrium, or Itabyrium of Greek and Roman writers, now called Jebel eṭ-Ṭûr. The mount overlooks the adjacent hills of Lower Galilee, and, being connected with them only by a low ridge, is practically isolated. Its form approaches that of a truncated cone with rounded sides, and a fairly level, oval-shaped summit. When viewed from a distance, especially from the S.W., it has the appearance of a hemisphere, and is remarkable for its symmetrical form, its graceful outline, and its wooded slopes. The mount is often capped with mist, and even in the dry season heavy dews refresh the parched soil, and give new life to the oaks, pistachios, and other trees that partially cover its slopes. In these coverts, during the Middle Ages, wild beasts found shelter; and wild boars, birds, and small game still make them their home. The slopes are steep and rocky, but the ascent can be made with ease—nearly everywhere on foot, and in more than one place on horseback. The view from the summit is disappointing, in so far that there is no one spot from which a complete panorama can be obtained; but from many points places of the greatest sacred and historic interest can be seen. To the S.W. and W., stretched out like a map, the great plain of Esdraelon extends beyond Taanach and Megiddo to the gorge of the Kishon and the ridge of Carmel. To the N. are the heights of Lûbieh and the 'Horns of Hattîn,' where Guy de Lusignan and the Templars made their last stand before surrendering to Saladin; and beyond them lie Ṣafed and the hills of Upper Galilee, with snow-capped Hermon and the peaks of Lebanon in the distance. To the N.E. and E. are the Sea of Galilee and the rugged Ḥaurân, the Jordan Valley, the deep gorge of the Yarmuk, and the high tableland of Bashan; and to the S.E. the mediæval fortress of Belvoir (Kaukab el-Hawa), the Jordan Valley below Bethshean, and the mountains of Gilead. To the S., on the lower slopes of Jebel Duhy (Little Hermon), are Nain and Endor, and beyond Jebel Duhy can be seen the crest of Mt. Gilboa.

A mountain so situated, and so beautiful, necessarily played an important part in the history of Israel. Its isolation, and the steepness of its slopes, marked it out, from time immemorial, as a fortress or rallying point; and its attractive beauty led the Rabbis to maintain that it was the mountain on which the temple ought of right to have been built had it not been for the express revelation which ordered the sanctuary to be built on Mount Moriah (Schwarz, p. 71). Amongst the mountains of his native land, the Psalmist (Ps 89^{12}) could have selected no more fitting representatives than Tabor with its rounded features and scattered glades, and Hermon with its lofty peak and pure canopy of snow. So, too, its natural strength and conspicuous position led the prophet (Jer 46^{18}) to use it and Carmel as an image either of the power and pre-eminence of the king of Babylon, or of the certainty and distinctness of God's judgments. Some commentators suppose Tabor to be the mountain alluded to in Dt $33^{18.19}$ (see discussion in Driver, ad loc.); and hence it has been conjectured that Tabor was an early sanctuary of the northern tribes, which afterwards became the scene of idolatrous rites (Hos 5^1).

Mount Tabor is mentioned by its full name only in Jg $4^{6.12.14}$, where it is stated to have been the place at which Deborah and Barak assembled the warriors of Israel before the memorable victory over Sisera (Jos. Ant. V. v. 3).

The mount is probably (but see Dillm. ad loc.) intended in Jos 19^{22}, where the boundary of Issachar is said to have reached to Tabor; and this view was held by Josephus (Ant. V. i. 22) and Eusebius (Onom.). Whether the Tabor at which the brothers of Gideon were slain (Jg 8^{18}) was the mount, is more doubtful (see preceding art., and Moore, ad loc.). According to Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 3), Mt. Tabor was in the district of Shaphat (Jehoshaphat in 1 K 4^{17}), one of Solomon's commissariat officers. In the 3rd cent. B.C. there was an inhabited city, Atabyrium, on Mt. Tabor, which Antiochus the Great took (B.C. 218) by stratagem and afterwards fortified (Polyb. V. lxx. 6). In the time of Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 105–78) Tabor was in the possession of the Jews (Ant. XIII. xv. 4). But the mount passed to the Romans when Pompey conquered Palestine, and, near it, Gabinius, the Roman proconsul of Syria (c. B.C. 53), defeated Alexander, son of Aristobulus II., who had risen in revolt (Ant. XIV. vi. 3; BJ I. viii. 7). At the commencement of the Jewish war Tabor was occupied by the Jews, and fortified by Josephus, who surrounded the summit with a wall (Vit. 37; BJ II. xx. 6, IV. i. 8). A little later, after Josephus had been taken prisoner by the Romans at Jotapata, a large number of Jews took refuge in the fortress. Placidus was sent against them with a body of horse, and, having succeeded by a feint in drawing the fighting men into the plain, defeated them and cut off their retreat. Upon this, the inhabitants of the place, whose supply of water, derived from the rainfall, was failing, submitted (BJ IV. i. 8).

The later history of Tabor is connected with the belief that Christ was transfigured on the mount, and with the churches and monasteries erected upon it in consequence of that belief. The narrative (Mt 16. 17, Mk 8. 9) seems to demand a site near Cæsarea Philippi; but, apart from this, the existence of a fortified town on the summit of Tabor before and after Christ, makes the selection of that mountain improbable. Eusebius, who states (Onom.) that Tabor was situated in the plain of Galilee, and from 8 to 10 Roman miles E. of Diocæsarea (Sefûrieh), makes no allusion to the tradition; whilst the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) places the scene of the Transfiguration on the Mount of Olives. The first notice of Tabor as the place of the Transfiguration is a remark by Cyril of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 350 (Cat. xii. 16). Jerome, A.D. 386, says that St. Paula 'climbed Mt. Tabor on which the Lord was transfigured' (Ep. Paul. xvii.; cf. Ep. ad Mar. viii.), but does not mention a church. Antoninus Martyr, c. A.D. 570, saw (vi.) three churches 'at the place where St. Peter said to Jesus: "Let us make here three tabernacles."' Arculf, c. A.D. 670, found (ii. 25) a large monastery with many cells, and three churches, enclosed by a stone wall. Willibald, A.D. 754, mentions (xiii.) a monastery and a church, 'dedicated to our Lord, and to Moses and Elias.' Sæwulf, A.D. 1102, saw three monasteries, and adds that the one dedicated to Elias stood a little apart from the others. The Russian abbot, Daniel, A.D. 1106–1107, gives a full description of the mount, which he compares to a haycock, and of its holy places (lxxxvi.–lxxxviii). Its slopes were covered with olive, fig, and carob trees; and on the summit, at the S.E. end of the platform, a small rocky knoll was shown as the place of the Transfiguration. Here there was a fine church, probably that built by Tancred, and near it, on the N. side, a second church dedicated to Moses and Elias. The churches and a Latin monastery were enclosed by solid stone walls with iron gates; and outside the walls were fields, vineyards, and fruit trees. A bowshot W. of the place of the Transfiguration was shown a rock-hewn cave in which Melchizedek was said to have dwelt and to have received Abraham when returning from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer (cf. Fetellus, A.D. 1130). Amongst the churches and monasteries noticed by Sæwulf and Daniel must have been the church built by Tancred, to whom Galilee was granted as a fief; and the monastery founded by the Black Friars of the reformed order of Benedictines of Cluny, who in A.D. 1111 disputed the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Nazareth (Albert of Aix, vii. 16; W. of Tyre, ix. 13; de Vitry). In 1113 the monasteries were pillaged by Arabs from Damascus, and the monks massacred; but they were soon reoccupied. Theoderich, in 1172, mentions a church and monks under an abbot (xlvi.) who, according to Ludolph von Suchem, 'used a leaden bulla, like the Pope'; and places the scene of the meeting between Melchizedek and Abraham at the foot of the mount. In 1183 the monks repulsed an attack by the troops of Saladin. Two years later, 1185, Phocas, a Greek monk, found a Latin monastery at the place of the Transfiguration, and to the north of it a Greek monastery. He also saw the grotto of Melchizedek, with chambers above and under ground, and many cells for anchorites; and close by, a church on the spot where Melchizedek met Abraham. In 1187 the mountain was laid waste by Saladin; but in 1212 it was strongly fortified by his brother el-Melek el-ʿÂdel. The fortress was unsuccessfully attacked by the Crusaders in 1217, and dismantled by el-ʿÂdel in the following year. The monastery and church must have been spared, or little injured, for Yâkût, A.D. 1225, mentions it (ii. 675; cf. Mar. i. 434) as standing on the S. side of the mountain; and adds that there were many vineyards, from which the monks made wine. This is confirmed by the tract 'Citez de Jherusalem,' pt. ii., which notices 'a church of black Latin monks' on Mt. Tabor. In 1263 the Church of the Transfiguration was levelled with the ground by order of Sultan Bibars; and later visitors found only 'hollow places and caves beneath the ruins of splendid buildings, wherein lurk lions and other beasts.' Amidst these ruins, however, the Latin and Greek monks from Nazareth continued to hold an annual service in memory of the Transfiguration. The ruins on the summit are those of a fortress with square flanking towers, and, in places, a rock-hewn ditch. There are also many rock-hewn cisterns and a pool, and the remains of the churches and monasteries noticed above. The ruins are Jewish, Byzantine, Crusading, and Arab; but, without excavation, it is difficult to make any clear distinction between them. The Latins and Greeks have in recent years erected churches and monasteries on the sites of the earlier buildings, and the Latins have recovered the place of the Transfiguration mentioned by abbot Daniel.

TABOR, THE OAK OF (AV THE PLAIN OF TABOR; אֵלוֹן תָּבוֹר; ἡ δρῦς Θαβώρ; quercus Thabor), is mentioned (1 S 10^{3}) between Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah and the 'hill of God,' or Gibeah, as one of the points passed by Saul on his homeward journey after his anointing by Samuel. The site is unknown. Thenius emends, from Gn 35^{8}, א׳ תָּבוֹר to א׳ דְּבוֹרָה 'Oak (terebinth) of Deborah' (Rachel's nurse). This tree is called in the Genesis passage Allon-bacuth, and Ewald and others identify it further with the palm (תֹּמֶר) of Deborah mentioned in Jg 4^{5}. (Cf. Moore on Jg 4^{5}; Dillm. on Gn 35^{8}; Siegfried-Stade and Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. אֵלוֹן).

TABRET (see art. TABER) is AV tr. of תֹּף in Gn 31^{27}, 1 S 10^{5} 18^{6}, Is 5^{12} 24^{8} 30^{32}, Jer 31^{4}, Ezk 28^{13}. The same Heb. word is tr. 'timbrel' in Ex 15^{20}, Jg 11^{34}, 2 S 6^{5}, 1 Ch 13^{8}, Job 21^{12}, Ps 81^{2} 149^{3} 150^{4}. The RV, strangely enough, follows this want of uniformity in rendering, except in 1 S 10^{5} 18^{6}, where it substitutes 'timbrel' for 'tabret.' It might have been well to drop both 'timbrel' and 'tabret,' neither of which conveys any clear sense to a modern ear, and adopt some such rendering as 'tambourine' or 'hand-drum.' The LXX always tr. תֹּף by τύμπανον except in Job 21^{12}, where we have ψαλτήριον, and Ezk 28^{13}, where a different Heb. text. has been followed. [This last may have been the case even in Job 21^{12}]. See, for a description of the תֹּף, vol. iii. p. 462^{b}.

The AV rendering of Job 17^{6} 'aforetime I was as a tabret,' has arisen from a confusion of תֹּפֶת 'spitting' [ἅπ. λεγ.] with תֹּף 'tambourine.' The words תֹּפֶת לְפָנִים אֶהְיֶה, in parallelism with the preceding הִצִּיגַנִי לִמְשֹׁל עַמִּים ('I am made [lit. 'one hath made me'] a byword of the peoples'), mean 'I am become one to be spit on in the face' (RV 'an open abhorring'). See A. B. Davidson, ad loc., and cf. the notes of Dillm. and Duhm. The LXX reproduces תֹּפֶת by γέλως, 'a laughing-stock.'

TABRIMMON (טַבְרִמּוֹן, 'RIMMON [Ramman] is good or is wise' [see TABEEL]; B Ταβερεμά, A Ταβενραημά, Luc. Ταβερεμμάν).—The father of Benhadad, 1 K 15^{18}.

TACHES.—An old word of French origin (cf. attacher) used by AV to render the Heb. קְרָסִים kĕrāṣîm, which occurs only in P's description of the tabernacle (Ex 26$^{6.\ 11.\ 33}$ 35^{11} etc.). The Gr. rendering is κρίκοι, which denotes the rings set in eyelets at the edge of a sail for the ropes to pass through; Vulg. circuli, RV 'clasps.' The Heb. word evidently signifies some form of hook or clasp like the Roman fibula (see Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Antiq. s.v.). Fifty 'taches' or clasps of gold, attached at equal distances along the edge of one set of tapestry curtains, fitted into the same number of loops along the edge of the second set, and 'coupled' the two sets together. A similar arrangement of bronze clasps joined the two sets of hair curtains which formed the 'tent' (see TABERNACLE, § vii. (a)). The veil which divided the tabernacle or 'dwelling' into two parts, the Holy Place and the Most Holy, was suspended immediately underneath the line of clasps, a detail of considerable significance for the dimensions of the tabernacle (see § vii. (c)).

A. R. S. Kennedy.

TACKLING.—In Is 33^{23} 'Thy tacklings (חֲבָלָיִךְ) are loosed,' the Heb. word plainly means a ship's ropes. And that was the ordinary meaning of the Eng. word 'tackling' about 1611, as in Shaks. Rich. III. IV. iv. 233—

> 'Like a poor bark, of sails and tackling reft.'

But the Eng. word was also used more comprehensively of the whole gearing, as in Ascham's Scholemaster, 65, 'Great shippes require costlie tackling.' And so it is used in Ac 27^{19} 'We cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship' (RVm 'furniture'). The Greek word (σκευή) is as vague, says Rendall, as the English 'furniture,' and may include any heavy fittings that could be readily detached, or spare masts and spars. See Ships and Boats.

The word is of Scand. origin; the le in 'tackle' is the instrument, so that the tackle is that which takes hold of; the ing is collective.

TADMOR (1 K 9^{18} [so Ḳĕrê, AV, RVm; Tamar in Kĕthîbh and RV; B om., A Θερμάθ, Luc. Θοδμόρ], 2 Ch 8^4 B^{K} Θοεδομόρ, A Θεδμόρ, Luc. Θεδμάρ).—The Tamar of 1 Kings is believed by the present writer to be the same place as the 'Tadmor' of 2 Chronicles (see, however, art. Tamar; G. A. Smith, HGHL^{1} 270, n.^{2}; Kittel, Könige, ad loc.).

Whatever view be held as to Tamar, Tadmor is undoubtedly the Palmyra of history, a city whose ruins have excited the admiration of all travellers, and whose history under the rule of Odenatus and Zenobia can never be read without feelings of high interest. The city rose from an oasis in the Syrian desert due to springs welling up through the sands, or from rivulets descending from the neighbouring hills, giving rise to vegetation and groves of palms.* At a later period it was supplied with water by means of an aqueduct built by Justinian. The position of the city is about 150 miles N.E. of Damascus, half-way between the valleys of the Orontes and the Euphrates; and the caravan routes in ancient times as well as in the beginning of our era, connecting the Persian Gulf with the Mediterranean, and between Northern Syria, Petra, and Central Arabia, passed through Palmyra. During the wars between Rome and Parthia, Palmyra endeavoured to maintain a position of neutrality; and, about the year A.D. 130, Hadrian took the city under his special favour, giving it the name of Adrianopolis. At a later period Palmyra received the Jus Italicum and became a Roman colony; and in the early period of the Persian wars the city became an important military post, and the inhabitants thus gained a knowledge of military tactics which they afterwards turned to use against their instructors.

Odenatus and Zenobia.—Up to this time Palmyra was governed by a senate; but on the defeat of the Roman army under Valerian by Sapor, king of Persia, and the rejection of the offer of alliance made by Odenatus, who had attained the position of king or prince of Palmyra, the Palmyrene army hovered round the Persian host as it was retreating across the Euphrates with the captive Roman emperor and enormous booty, and inflicted such loss on the Persians that they were glad to put the river between them and their pursuers.† By this exploit Odenatus laid the foundation of his future fame and fortunes. With the consent of the emperor Gallienus the Roman senate conferred the title of Augustus on the brave Palmyrene, and seemed to entrust to him the government of the East, which he in effect already possessed.*

On the death of Odenatus, by assassination, Zenobia his widow, who had shared with him the government of the kingdom, became his sole successor, with the title of 'Queen of Palmyra and the East.' Of this remarkable personage Gibbon says: 'Modern Europe has produced several illustrious women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire; nor is our own age destitute of such distinguished characters. But if we except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, Zenobia is perhaps the only woman whose superior genius broke through the servile indolence imposed on her sex by the climate and manners of Asia. She claimed her descent from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, equalled in beauty her ancestor Cleopatra, and far surpassed that princess in chastity and valour.'† On ascending the throne (A.D. 267) Zenobia maintained the same policy of hostility, both to Persia and Rome, which had been adopted by her husband, and defeated a Roman army commanded by Heraclianus. She also invited the celebrated Platonic philosopher Longinus to her capital to be her instructor in Greek literature and her counsellor in affairs of state. But Aurelian, who had ascended the throne of the Western empire, had resolved to endure no longer the authority of a rival in the East; and in A.D. 272 he marched to attack Zenobia with all the forces of the empire. Zenobia, being but weakly supported in the unequal contest by Varahran, successor to Sapor, was defeated in battle, and attempted to escape by flight towards the Euphrates,‡ but was captured on the banks of that river and brought before her conqueror, who carried her to Rome to grace his triumph. While crossing the straits which divide Europe from Asia, Aurelian received intelligence that the Palmyrenes had risen in revolt and massacred the governor and garrison he had left behind. Enraged at this conduct he at once retraced his steps, and the helpless city felt the full weight of his resentment. A letter of Aurelian himself admits that old men, women, children, and peasants were involved in indiscriminate slaughter; but, taking pity on the miserable remnant of the inhabitants, he granted them permission to rebuild and inhabit the city. 'But (as Gibbon observes) it is easier to destroy than to restore. The seat of commerce, of arts, and of Zenobia gradually sank into an obscure town, a trifling fortress, and at length a miserable village. The present citizens of Palmyra, consisting of thirty or forty families, have erected their [mud] cottages within the spacious court of a magnificent temple.' §

Ruins.—The ruins of Palmyra attest its former magnificence. The principal building is the great Temple of the Sun (Baal), with its lofty arch and grand rows of columns, originally about 390 in number; but besides this there are remains of the walls of Justinian which enclosed the city, and outside the wall towards the north several ruined sepulchral towers, together with the remains of the aqueduct.‖ For an account of the Gr. and Aram. inscriptions see de Vogüé, Syrie centrale, pp. 1–8. TAHAN (תַּחַן).—The eponymous head of an Ephraimite clan, Nu $26^{35\,(39)}$ (Τάναχ), 1 Ch 7^{25} (BA Θάεν, Luc. Θάαν). The gentilic name Tahanites (תַּחֲנִי, ὁ Ταναχ(ε)ί) occurs in Nu $26^{35\,(39)}$.

TAHASH (תַּחַשׁ, Τόχος).—A son of Naḥor by his concubine Reumah, Gn 22^{24} [J]. The name means 'porpoise,' and this animal was probably the totem of the (unidentified) tribe that bore it.

TAHATH (תַּחַת).—1. A Kohathite Levite, 1 Ch $6^{24\,(\text{Heb. }9)}$ (B om., $A^{a?}$ sup ras Θάαθ) $^{37\,(\text{Heb. }22)}$ (BA Θάαθ). 2. 3. The eponym of two (unless the name has been accidentally repeated) Ephraimite families, 1 Ch 7^{20} (A [only first time] Θάαθ, B om. both times).

TAHATH (תַּחַת; BA Luc. Κατάαθ, F Κατθάαθ).—One of the twelve stations in the journeyings of the children of Israel which are mentioned only in Nu 33. It comes between Maḳheloth and Teraḥ (v.$^{26\text{f.}}$), and, like them, has not been identified.

TAHCHEMONITE, AV Tachmonite.—See HACHMONI.

TAHPANHES, TEHAPHNEHES (תַּחְפַּנְחֵס Jer $43^{7\text{ff.}}$ 44^{1} 46^{14}, תְּחַפְנְחֵס Ezk 30^{18}, תחפנס [text. error] in Kĕthîbh of Jer 2^{16}, Ταφνάς, Ταφναί).—A city on the E. frontier of Lower Egypt. There is no doubt that it is the same place that was known to classical writers as Daphnæ. The etym. of the name is unknown, and no hieroglyphic equivalent has yet been found. It seems likely, however, that this frontier city was named 'the beginning of the . . . (?)' Ta-ḥat-p . . . (?). The modern name, Tell Defneh (often mis-spelled Defeneh or Defenneh on maps) is very close to the Greek. The site is now a desolate mound on the edge of the desert, and but little removed from the brackish swamp of Lake Menzaleh. Formerly this district was to a great extent cultivated, being irrigated and drained by the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, now silted up. Pelusium, situate at the mouth of the Nile and surrounded by swamps, was nearly 20 miles away. Flinders Petrie excavated the site for the Egyp. Expl. Fund, and has demonstrated much of its history. One mound is apparently Ptolemaic and Roman, showing where the Daphno of the Rom. itineraries had been. Another mound, still apparently bearing a name connecting it with the Jews, contained remains of a palace or citadel destroyed by fire, which stood in the midst of a great camp. In the camp and fortress were found amongst other things thousands of arrowheads, of small weights, and many fragments of fine Gr. and Egyp. pottery; while in the foundations of the central building were plaques inscribed with the name of the builder, Psammetichus I. This king, the founder of the Saite dynasty (B.C. 664) is recorded by Herodotus (ii. 30) to have established a garrison at Daphnæ as one of three chief frontier posts, and the Greek objects found there show that Herodotus was referring to the same place when he mentions (ii. 154) that Psammetichus established a camp of Ionians in this region. The number and variety of the weights afford some indication of the amount of trade and money-changing that must have gone on here. It is very unfortunate that no inscriptions of importance could be found; a great tablet of hard quartzite was indeed discovered, but, as it had been exposed for centuries to mutilation, few signs were left upon it. They are apparently the remains of a historical inscription of Psammetichus I. There was little indication of Daphnæ having existed before Psammetichus, but for two centuries from that time it was a frontier post of the highest importance, and a name particularly well known to nations living on the E. of Egypt. A colony of fugitive Jews under Johanan established themselves there after the murder of Gedaliah, Jer $43^{7\text{ff.}}$ 44^{1}. The fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy, made on this spot, that Nebuch. would invade and take Egypt ($43^{8\text{-}13}$), has not yet been ascertained from the monuments, but the excavations gave evidence of violent destruction and conflagration. Herodotus (ii. 30) says that in his time the Persians kept up the garrison there. The place is mentioned Jth 1^{9}.

Hanes, in Is 30^{4}, can hardly be Daphnæ, for the latter did not rise to importance till a later date.

TAHPENES (תַּחְפְּנֵיס; B Θεκεμεῖνα, A Θεκεμίνα, Luc. Θεχεμεῖνα).—The name of the queen of 'Pharaoh king of Egypt,' who gave his sister in marriage to Hadad the Edomite before the death of David (1 K 11^{19}). Winckler (AT Untersuch. 1–6), and still more Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Hadad'), consider the passage as full of corruptions, the chief point being that Miẓraim (Egypt) should be corrected back to Muṣri (in North Arabia). If we accept the text as it stands, Hadad's marriage was not so grand as to be improbable. David was contemporary with the weak 21st dynasty, which appears to have had no influence abroad; nor is it probable that the 21st dynasty kings reigning at Tanis had any considerable authority even over the high priests at Thebes. The name 'Tahpenes' has an Egyptian appearance, but has not hitherto been found on the monuments.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

TAHREA (תַּחְרֵעַ).—A grandson of Mephibosheth, 1 Ch 9^{41} (B Θαράχ, A Θαρά, Luc. Θαράα). The name appears (prob. by a copyist's error) in 8^{35} as Tarea (תַּאְרֵעַ; B Θερέε, A Θαρέε, Luc. Θαράα).

TAHTIM HODSHI, THE LAND OF (אֶרֶץ תַּחְתִּים חָדְשִׁי; B εἰς τὴν Θαβασὼν ἥ ἐστιν Ναδασαί, A εἰς γῆν Ἐθαὼν Ἀδασαί; terra inferiora Hodsi).—A place east of Jordan, which Joab and his officers visited when making the census for David (2 S 24^{6}). It is mentioned between Gilead and Dan-jaan. The MT, however, is certainly corrupt. In all probability we should read הַחִתִּים קָדֵשָׁה 'to the land of the Hittites, towards Ḳadesh [sc. Ḳ. on the Orontes].' The emendation הַחִתִּים is due to Hitzig (GVI p. 29), קָדֵשָׁה to Thenius (who suggested קָדְשִׁי or קָדֵשָׁה). Both emendations, which are strikingly confirmed by Luc. εἰς γῆν Χεττιεὶμ Καδής, are accepted by Wellh., Driver, Budde, et al. Another emendation of חדשי is that of Ewald (Hist. iii. 162), who would read חרמן (Ḥermon). This is supported by Buhl (GAP 69), and somewhat favoured by Löhr and H. P. Smith (Sam. ad loc.), mainly on the ground that Ḳadesh on the Orontes is too far north to suit the requirements of the passage.

TAKE.—The verb 'to take' is one of a short list of English words which Earle 'can offer with most confidence as words which have come in through Danish agency' (Philology, § 59). It is at any rate a Scand. word; and from the meaning of the Gothic tekan and its relation to Lat. tangere it is probable that its earliest meaning is to 'touch with the hand,' as in Morris' Old Eng. Misc. p. 31, 'Ure lord . . . spredde his hond, and tok his lepre; . . . and al so rathe he was i-warisd of his maladie.' From this would easily flow 'lay hold of,' 'seize,' 'receive,' and the like. The examples that deserve attention in AV may be grouped as follows:—

1. To seize one's person: Sir 23^{21} 'This man shall be punished in the streets of the city, and where he suspecteth not he shall be taken (πιασθήσεται)'; Jn 7^{30} 'Then they sought to take him (πιάσαι), but no man laid hands on him.' Cf. Mt 4^{12} Tind.

‘When Jesus had hearde that Jhon was taken, he departed into Galile.’

2. To come upon one unexpectedly: 2 Mac 5^{25} ‘Taking the Jews keeping holiday, he commanded his men to arm themselves’; 1 Co 3^{19} ‘He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.’ Cf. Earle, Microcos. ‘A Constable’—‘Hee is a very carefull man in his Office, but if hee stay up after Midnight you shall take him napping’; Shaks. As You Like It, IV. i. 175, ‘You shall never take her without her answer, unless you take her without her tongue.’ So to be taken (i.e. ‘overtaken’) with night, Sir 36^{26}; with evil, Gn 19^{19}; disease, 2 Mac 9^{21}, Mt 4^{24}; fever, Lk 4^{38}; palsy, 1 Mac 9^{55}; pangs, Mic 4^{9}; one's iniquities, Pr 5^{22}; a demoniacal seizure, Mk 9^{18}; fear, Lk 8^{37}. Cf. Lk 7^{16} Rhem. ‘And feare tooke them al, and they magnified God’; Rutherford, Letters, 61, ‘Take you no fear.’

3. ‘Take’ was formerly used of the fascination of some good or bad influence, which was often supposed to be due to supernatural powers. Thus Palsgrave, ‘Taken, as chyldernes lymmes be by the fayries, faée’; Cotgrave, ‘fée, taken, bewitched’; Markham, Treatise on Horses, ‘A horse that is bereft of his feeling, mooving, or styrring, is said to be taken . . . some farriers conster the word taken to be striken by some planet or evil spirit.’ So Pr 6^{25} ‘Lust not after her beauty in thine heart; neither let her take thee with her eyelids’ (וְאַל־תִּקָּחֲךָ, LXX μηδὲ συναρπασθῇς); so 6^{2}; Sir 9^{4} ‘Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts’ (μήποτε ἁλῷς; RV ‘Lest haply thou be caught’), 23^{7}. Cf. Bunyan, Holy War, 17, ‘They were taken with the forbidden fruit’; Adams, II Peter 46, ‘It is said that Judith's pantofles ravished Holofernes' eyes; her sandals took him.’

4. The following phrases demand attention: (1) Take care, in the sense of ‘be anxious’ (see CARE), To 5^{20} ‘Take no care, my sister, he shall return in safety’ (μὴ λόγον ἔχε); 1 Co 9^{9} ‘Doth God take care for oxen?’ (μὴ τῶν βοῶν μέλει τῷ θεῷ; RV ‘Is it for the oxen that God careth?’ Tind. ‘Doth God take thought for oxen?’—See THOUGHT. (2) Take indignation, Bel ^{28} ‘They took great indignation’ (ἠγανάκτησαν λίαν); 2 Mac 4^{35} (ἐδείναζον). The usual phrase is ‘to have indignation,’ as Mal 1^{4}, Mt 26^{8}. (3) Take heart, Bar 4^{30} ‘Take a good heart, O Jerusalem’ (θάρσει). (4) Take one's journey, Dt 2^{4}. Cf. Ex 40^{36} Tind. ‘When the clowde was taken up from of the habitacyon, the children of Israel toke their iornayes as oft as they iornayed.’ (5) Take order, see ORDER. Cf. Ac 8^{2} Rheims, ‘Devout men tooke order for Stephens funeral.’ (6) Take a taste of, 2 Mac 13^{18} ‘When the king had taken a taste of the manliness of the Jews’ (εἰληφὼς γεῦσιν). (7) Take thought, see THOUGHT. (8) Take in vain, see VAIN, and cf. Erasmus, Crede, 153, ‘This thynge is to be noted and marked that he dyd not saye, thou shalte not name god, but he sayde, thou shalte not take the name of god. For that thynge is taken which is applyed and put to some use, and that thynge is taken in vayne and indiscreetly which is taken to a prophane and a vyle use, as when a man swereth by god in a matter of smal wayghte or valoure.’

Notice, finally, some antiquated uses of the phrase to take up: (1) To lift, Is 40^{15} ‘He taketh up the isles as a very little thing’; cf. Ac 7^{43} ‘Ye took up the tabernacle of Molech’ (i.e. to carry it about with you); 21^{15} ‘We took up our carriages’ (ἀποσκευασάμενοι, edd. ἐπισκ., RVm ‘made ready’). (2) To translate to heaven, 2 K 2^{1} ‘When the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind,’ 2^{15}, Ac 1^{2} ‘Until the day in which he was taken up,’ $1^{9.\,11.\,22}$. (3) To utter, used of a parable, as Nu 23^{7} ‘He took up his parable, and said,’ so $24^{3.\,15.\,20.\,21.\,23}$, Mic 2^{4}, Hab 2^{6}; also of a proverb, Is 14^{4}; a word, Am 5^{1}; a reproach, Ps 15^{3}; a lamentation, Jer 7^{29}, Ezk 19^{1}; a weeping, Jer 9^{10}; and a wailing, Jer 9^{18}. Cf. Ps 16^{4} ‘Nor take up their names into my lips’; Ezk 36^{3} ‘Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers.’ (4) In Neh 5^{2} the meaning is to obtain on credit. ‘We take up our corn for them, that we may eat and live’ (RV ‘let us get corn’; see Ryle's note). Cf. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, i. 1, ‘I will take up, and bring myself in credit, sure.’ J. HASTINGS.

TALE.—The Anglo-Sax. talu meant a ‘number’ (cf. Germ. Zahl) as well as a ‘narrative,’ and the verb tellan meant to ‘count’ as well as to ‘narrate.’ In all the examples but one of ‘tale’ in AV (apart from the Apocr.) it means ‘number’ or ‘sum.’ Thus Ex 5^{8} ‘And the tale of the bricks which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them’; so 5^{18}, 1 S 18^{27}, 1 Ch 9^{28}. In Nu 1^{36} Tindale speaks of Benjamin being numbered ‘by the tale of names,’ but in 1^{30} Zebulun is counted ‘after the numbre of names,’ and in 1^{38} Dan is numbered ‘in the summe of names.’

In like manner ‘tell’ occurs frequently in the sense of ‘count,’ as Gn 15^{5} ‘Tell the stars, if thou be able to number them’; 2 Ch 2^{2} ‘Solomon told out threescore and ten thousand men to bear burdens’; Sir 18^{5} ‘Who shall number the strength of his majesty, and who shall tell out all his mercies?’ Cf. 1 S 14^{17} Cov. ‘Saul sayde unto the people that was with him, Tell and se which of us is gone awaye. And whan they nombred, beholde, Jonathas and his wapen bearer was not there’; Is 10^{19} Cov. ‘The trees also of his felde shalbe of soch a nombre, that a childe maye tell them’; Nu 1^{27} Cov. ‘All that were able to warre, were tolde in the trybe of Juda’; cf. also Jer 33^{13}, 1 K 8^{5}, 2 K 12^{10}, Ps 22^{17} 48^{12} 56^{8} 147^{4} (in several of which ‘tell’ might be misunderstood as = ‘mention’), and Milton, L'Allegro, 67—

> ‘And every shepherd tells his tale
> Under the hawthorn in the dale.’

In 1 S 27^{11} occurs the expression ‘tell on,’ used, as it is still vulgarly, in the sense of ‘inform against.’ J. HASTINGS.
